But Barbara had not seen her faithful servant for the last time. She was soon to meet him again. And of this meeting I have heard the story so often that it has grown impossible for me to feel that I was not there in person, so I shall tell it as if such were the fact.

Fred and Barbara seemed inclined to spend the rest of their lives in one prolonged wedding journey. They visited our old home in England, stayed several months in Paris, and then made a tour of the States for a year. Drifting about in this way, they strolled one noon into the dining-room of a New York hotel and sat awaiting their luncheon. The waiters were all negroes, and as Barbara idly looked at them, wondering at the similarity of their appearance, her attention was caught by something familiar in the figure of the head waiter, whose back was towards her. Suddenly he turned, and Ned and his "Miss Princess" were face to face.

In the joy of that meeting, even the man who had stolen his treasure was forgiven. He had no words too eloquent to express his passionate delight, no entreaties too urgent to implore their stay. The best that the hotel could offer was theirs, and no hands but Ned's were allowed to proffer the dishes. Barbara's happiness was but little less than his, and when they left the dining-room after the prolonged meal, it was with the promise to make their stay an extended one. With this understanding, Ned bade them a reluctant farewell for the afternoon.

But in an hour or so a message was brought to him that Mrs. Damer wished to see him in her sitting-room. He found her alone, lying in a corner of the low divan, looking pale and suffering.

"Ah, Ned," she cried as he entered, "my head does ache so! I have been to see Aunt Mary, and she keeps her house as hot here as she did when she lived at home. It made me so ill—just as it used to!"

Ned was all tender sympathy. She was his little mistress once more, and he was her great gentle nurse. He brought her a cup of strong tea made by his own hands. Had she asked for nightingales' tongues he would have produced them somehow. Barbara sipped the fragrant tea and listened to the familiar voice contentedly.

"Ned," she said, looking up at him suddenly, "why did you run away?"

For a moment Ned's composure failed him and his eyes dropped. Then a smile crept over his face.

"Yer see, honey," he said, "I was just 'bleeged to go. My Lord Concarson, he don' sen' fer dis nigger deep in de night an' all de way from de Islant of Dardanelles, lessen he means business. I didn't even have de time fer to say good-bye to my pretty baby."

Barbara listened with soft laughter.

"Ned," she said, "tell me about the Island of Dardanelles."

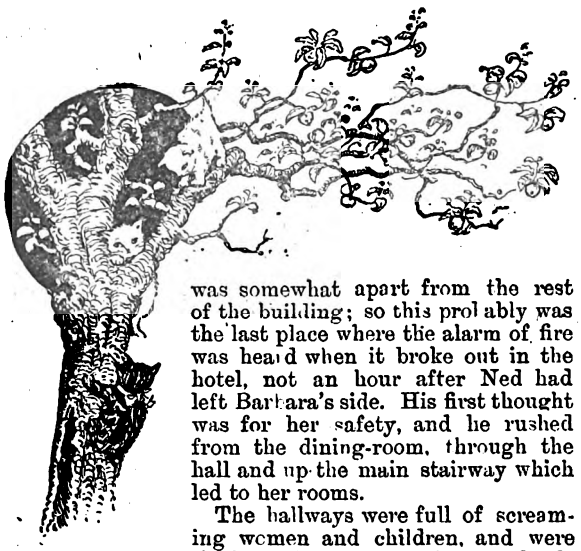
Ned obediently began a long, fallacious tale of a lovely, lonely land, a land of tropic growth and splendour. The story was such as he had told Barbara over and over again in her baby days. Gradually her eyelids sleepily drooped and fell; opened, drooped again, and then, under the spell of the familiar phrases, she fell asleep.

* * * * *

"Fire! Fire!"

The dining-room of the hotel where Ned was in charge

Digitized by Google



was somewhat apart from the rest of the building; so this probably was the last place where the alarm of fire was heard when it broke out in the hotel, not an hour after Ned had left Barbara's side. His first thought was for her safety, and he rushed from the dining-room, through the hall and up the main stairway which led to her rooms.

The hallways were full of screaming women and children, and were thick with smoke. Great clouds were rolling in from every side. On the first landing Ned met Barbara's husband, a baby in either arm, and a half-fainting woman clinging to his shoulder.

"Miss Barbara!" gasped Ned.

"Safe," was the laconic answer as Fred bundled the babies into Ned's arms and caught the tottering woman.

The fire had been smouldering too long before being discovered to think of saving much more than human life now that the flames had broken out, and it required brave and determined efforts to accomplish even this.

At last the order was issued by the captain of the fire brigade that no one should further risk life and limb by re-entering the doomed building. Ned had been foremost among the workers, and he now prepared to enjoy himself.

An African is always a voluptuary in his pleasures, and abandoning himself with true negro delight to the sway of excitement, Ned drifted about with the seething and twisting of the crowd, until he found himself standing close by Fred's side. He then resisted the pressure which was bearing him forward, and spoke reproachfully:

"I jes' hope you got Miss Princess a-lookin' at dis yer fire from somewhar. She allays did love a fire. Many's de one I done tuk her toe outen de back gate, when ole Miss think she war in de nussery an' I war in de woodhus. Thar warn't none on it she didn't see a-sittin' up on my shoulder an' crowin' like a little rooster. O'e Miss, she cot me takin' her out onct; and she did raise! I disremember jes what she tol' me, but I know I ain't tuk de chile no mo'. Ho! ho!"

Fred listened with much amusement.

"I am afraid your Miss Barbara cannot see this fire from where she is," he said. "I took her across the city early this afternoon to visit her aunt. It is not my fault that she is not with me. They didn't want me, and told me so."

"An' yer ain't seen Miss Barbara sence de fire broke out?"

"No—for Heaven's sake, man, what is the matter with you?"

The two faces looked into each other—a strange contrast. One with staring white eyeballs and eyes full of a horrible intelligence—the other white and ghastly with its dawning terror.

No further words were needed. Both men turned and sprang forward as moved by one muscle. But the action of the negro was with hand and foot. A well-directed blow from his ponderous fist made the husband of his young mistress stagger, and when he recovered his footing Ned had gained a moment's advantage and was cleaving his way through the crowd, which opened for him as did the Red Sea for Moses—"a wall on the right hand and on the left."

As he reached the door of the burning building his path was barred by a fireman in his full panoply and power of office.

"Git out, ye black fool!" he shouted in unmistakable Irish.

Out swept that powerful black arm, and with what seemed but a gesture, the burly Irishman was brushed aside. The next moment Ned was up the deserted stairway, and had gained the first landing. Here he paused. There was now no one to bar his progress but death, clad in his most fearful terrors.

The negro stooped and began to draw off his boots.

The stairway hung by a thread and his step must be cat-like. He cast one look back into the surging mass of life below, and saw there a man struggling vainly in the grasp of a dozen hands. He heard a hoarse voice crying:

"Let me go! My wife is in that place!"

Above the roar of the fire, above the shout of many voices, rose the stentorian tones of the captain of the brigade.

"Hold on to him, boys, hold on to him. There's one chance in a hundred, and that hangs on those steps. There shan't be a foot set on 'em."

Ned heard, saw, and was satisfied that the first part of his mission was accomplished. He set his bared foot on the charred steps and began the ascent, the first turn hiding him from the eyes of the crowd below.

A death-like silence fell on the multitude, a silence rendering more horribly audible the resistless, sullen roar of the fire, which licked and curled about the eaves of the house, and which the hissing water seemed but to feed. Great tongues of flame broke from one window and another. A woman's hysterical sobs alone broke the stillness, and she was sternly hushed.

Barbara's husband ceased to struggle in the fireman's grasp.

Have you ever known what waiting means—known more than its impatient restlessness? Have you ever felt that stopping of the heart's pulses for one moment of anxious listening, and then at some sound the wild rush and thunder of the blood in your veins, the agony of the clutch at your very life and being, your breath stopped in your throat? If you have never known all this, you have never known waiting, and you may pray Heaven to spare you that knowledge. This suffering and this knowledge are Frederick Damer's.

Crash!

A cry rose from the listening crowd in answer to the sound, and the woman who had sobbed before was carried away fainting.

"Thank goodness, it's only the lower stairway gone," said the captain. "The landing still holds. I can reach it with a ladder. Get me one."

"I'll go with you," said a quiet, determined voice beside him. It was Barbara's husband.

The captain turned and looked at him closely; apparently what he saw satisfied him.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, sir," he answered calmly. "Give him your helmet, Jack. We must go now, sir. I hear them on the stair."

They entered the burning house together. At any moment the roof might fall. Four lives were now in jeopardy where two had stood before. The sound of a footfall slowly became an established fact.

"That ain't but one person walking, sir," said the captain gently, "and you'd best not hope, for that foot's bare."

"Then he is carrying her," said Fred, and again nothing but the dread fire sounds and that stealthy footfall broke the silence.

At last! at last! Out of the smoke, out of the flame, on to the frail platform, stepped the gigantic negro, his clothes literally torn and burnt from his body; the blood streaming from a ghastly wound in his head; his breath coming in sobs like those of a wounded stag; but in his arms, gathered close to his breast, her fair curls gleaming in its blackness, lay the unconscious form of his Miss Barbara.

Once more he was carrying her safely home from a fire, and now, indeed, for the last time. By the help of the two waiting men the descent of the ladder was made, and Barbara lay in her husband's arms. Even at this supreme moment, he observed with a rush of grateful emotion that the blanket in which she was swathed had been saturated in water.

As the rescuer and the rescued passed out from the blazing house, a wild shout burst from the excited crowd, which pressed forward beyond control. But even as his dimmed sense heard the cries as the blessed air of heaven smote upon him, Ned staggered and dropped to the ground. The blood gushed out from his ears and mouth. He was picked up by strong hands and carried into a neighbouring house, where at least there were quiet and care.

In another room in the same building Barbara lay, still unconscious; but the swoon caused by fright and shock soon yielded to treatment, and she awoke, crying hysterically for "Mother!" and clinging nervously to her husband.

But her first fully conscious thought was for Ned. Fred could not command his voice to answer her eager, persistent questions, and it was the physician in charge who gently broke to her the news of his danger, and who left her in order to seek the latest report of his condition.

In those few moments, alone with the wife, "brought to him like Alcestis from the grave," I think we may forgive a brief forgetfulness of the Hercules whose gift she was; but it was with a sense of remorseful awakening that Fred looked at the grave face of the physician as he entered, saying, "I can give you but little encouragement."

"Oh no! no!" cried Barbara. "You can, you must save him! Go to him, both of you. I promise to be perfectly quiet. I won't move—only go; oh, go!"

As the door closed behind the two men Fred turned to the physician with an inquiring look, and was answered by a shrug of the shoulders and an outward motion of the hands, more expressive than any words. Everything that skill could do had been done, but from the first it needed no medical verdict to tell that there was no hope.

Ned did not seem to suffer, but lay almost unconscious, breathing heavily. Fred, bending over him in an agony of grateful pity, saw his lips move, and, bending nearer thought he heard him whisper, "Miss Princess."

"Shall I bring her to you?" he asked, and, waiting for no answer, went hastily for his wife.

She started up with eager eyes as he entered. "Is there no hope?" she cried.

"There has been none from the first," he answered. "Dear, he is asking for you. Can you bear it? There is not a moment to lose."

"Oh! take me to him quickly, quickly!"

He lifted her tenderly, and half led, half carried her to the room of the dying man. But in his short absence there had been a change in the sufferer. Agony had partially restored consciousness, and each breath was a moan.

"Oh, Lord, come git me!" he was crying feebly as they entered the room.

"Love, it is too late. You must not stay now, nor would he wish it."

But Barbara broke from her husband's detaining arm, and threw herself on her knees by the bedside.

Her presence seemed to rouse him. He opened his eyes and looked at her tear-wet face.

"'Tain't so terrible bad, darlin'," he gasped brokenly. "I ain't a-cryin' none—jis' whisperin', jis' whisperin'——"

Barbara buried her face in the bedside and burst into a passion of tears. Her husband stepped forward to draw her away, fearing she might disturb the dying man; but Ned seemed to divine his intention, and, rallying his strength, laid a detaining hand on her sunny curls, raising her face to his sight.

"Don't take on so, darlin'," he whispered. "I's got to go, but I ain't goin' fur, honey, not to say fur." A gleam of the old humour shot across his face. "Ned only gwine to de 'slant of Dardanelles, honey, fer to wait on my Lord Con——"

A sudden shudder shook his whole frame; his face was contorted in agony. Barbara's husband laid his hand quickly across her eyes to shut out the sight.

And when he drew it away again all was over. Ned had at last made his voyage to the Blessed Isles.

ALEC ARTHUR ANSTEY.

"PEARSON'S MAGAZINE."

THE current issue of this magazine is an unusually brilliant production. It is crammed with interesting articles, stories to suit every taste, and illustrations and photographs such as can be found in no other magazine published. It is a tip-top issue. The following are some of the contents:—"Pictures and their Painters," "Snowed-Up in June," "From Reading to Paris in a Houseboat," "Liquid Air," "Ourselves versus the World," "The Vicomte's Double," "How Criminals are Identified," "The Adventures of Captain Kettle," "Wire Walking." Its cover is one of exquisite design, and is in itself a real work of art.

YOUR NAME MAY APPEAR.

in this week's number of Pearson's Weekly as the person to whom a £5 note was addressed, and who failed to apply.

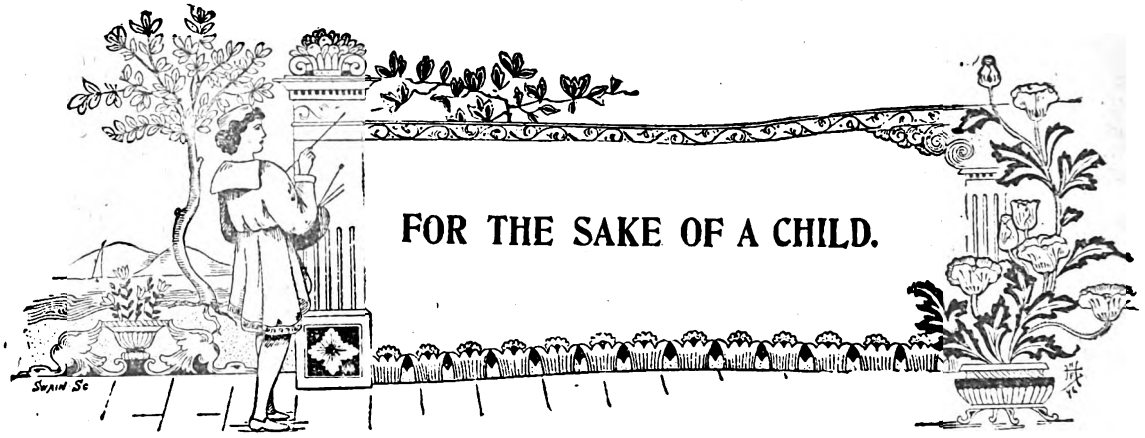
Every week the Editor of Pearson's Weekly addresses ten envelopes to ten people whose names are selected at random from the various Directories all over the Kingdom. Each of these ten envelopes contains a £5 note.

Perhaps your name appears on one of these envelopes this week. If so, you have only to drop a post-card and the crisp £5 note will be sent to you.

There are no other conditions imposed, except the method of addressing the envelope.

Get a copy of Pearson's Weekly at once. Don't lose the opportunity of making £5 simply through indifference!

Digitized by Google



FOR THE SAKE OF A CHILD.

HE was only a little boy. Only a little boy with golden hair and great blue eyes and white transparent skin, and he looked as if he had walked straight out of one of the great east windows in the church and come down to sing with his beautiful voice, which would make the old peasants cry when they listened.

And if anyone had asked him why he was singing you should have seen the flush which would creep into his cheeks. You should have watched him raise himself on his elbow and point out of the open window to the bright sky and the sun which shone winter and summer down on to the seaward slope. He would have grown quite excited, his eyes would have sparkled, and he would have answered back:

"I am singing to mother in her home up there, because I am going to see her soon, the good priest tells me."

So Guy's little throat would swell, and the soft, sweet voice would ring out, while his thoughts were carried far away from the dingy little bedroom, with the cobwebs which swung drowsily in the corners, and the pale mauve dust which raced about under the bed.

* * * * *

Joseph was standing in the street below. It was not really a street, it was not exactly a flight of steps either, merely a steeply descending path with great bare boulders of rock and rank weeds growing in between. The houses themselves, on either side, with their little green shutters and rough mural decorations, were so close together that when Joseph came home in the evening with his donkey laden with faggots, the ends would sweep the walls on either side, as anyone could see who took the trouble to look.

He was at the door of his cottage now with his arms folded against the door-post, and his head buried in his sleeve, and if anyone had been there to notice they would have seen that his face was bleeding.

Half an hour later he was still standing there. The singing overhead had ceased, and a sad little voice was calling, "Father! Father!"

Still Joseph did not move, only he shifted once from one leg to the other, and his whole frame shook with a sob. A little girl came running down the path towards him, her hair streaming behind her, her little feet in their wooden shoes pattering louder and louder on the cobbles.

"Joseph!" she called; "Joseph!"

But the man took no notice until she stood, pulling his sleeve, and quite out of breath with her running

"Joseph, Francis is dead," she panted. "They found him up there in the olive grove behind the Villa Panama."

Joseph's arms fell to his side, and he staggered back against the other post. His face was grey and ashen, except for the grey smudge on his cheek and the jagged wound below the eye.

"Dead! Holy Virgin have mercy on me," he cried. His whole body vibrated; his head wandered. He bent down and seized the little girl by the shoulders, looking at her so fiercely that she was quite frightened, and struggled to get away.

"Who found him?"

"Marie. And Luc has gone for a gendarme, for they think he was murdered."

Joseph's grasp loosened on the little girl's dress. She wriggled out of his reach, and ran away crying.

Joseph's heart began to beat furiously. "What shall I do? Where shall I go?" he asked himself. His lips were agitated, his legs trembling.

A glass of wine would have given him courage, but the cask was empty. He felt distracted. A bitter taste filled his mouth, and he rolled his tongue round trying to moisten the dryness of his palate. In another moment he felt he would be sick. He was suffocated with fear, and that terrible sinking sensation made his whole body jerk with violent spasms.

There was no time to waste, however; the wound on his face would accuse him.

"I was a fool not to think of that before, dash it!" he said to himself. He might protest, but they would not believe he was innocent.

He crossed to the back of the house and threw open the little window. The fresh breeze blowing from the east cooled his burning forehead, and he drew a long breath gratefully and stood still to listen.

Was anyone coming?

He heard feet tramping on the stones outside; they came nearer and nearer, and then died away. If anyone had come in then he could not have moved.

"Father! father!"

The sweet voice seemed louder and more imperative. Joseph's eyes filled with tears, and he shook his head slowly from side to side.

"Ah! little one, what would your mother say?" he groaned.

He longed to go upstairs and say good-bye to his little boy, but a power which seemed irresistible held him back. He dare not trust himself by that bed of sickness.

Digitized by Google

Hark! What was that? A hand on the door; someone was coming in.

He vaulted out through the open window, perspiring in every pore, his heart beating wildly. In another minute he was running with marvellous agility over the rough, broken ground behind the house, slipping from shrub to shrub, dodging from tree to tree, and not even daring to look back. Before the sun was set he would be far on his way to the frontier.

* * * * *

Three days had passed. Joseph stood alone on the top of a mountain, looking with eager, bloodshot eyes towards the west, where the sun was already disappearing. He stretched out his hands with a pathetic gesture.

"Heaven protect you, little one!" he stammered. "Heaven protect you!"

For three days he had suffered ceaselessly. He was still in France; still, if the gendarmes had only known it, within twenty miles of his home Here at least he was safe, on the top of this snow-clad mountain, among the ruins of an ancient fortressed city. If needs be, he could defend that narrow slippery path against an army. One rock would decimate a regiment.

The loaf he had taken with him, however, had disappeared. All day he had eaten nothing; tasted nothing but handfuls of frozen snow; and his mouth and throat were burning. As soon as it was dark he must make his way to the nearest village, and steal what he could not beg.

It was bitterly cold, although the sun was still shining brightly, and a warm haze seemed to be hanging over the country down below. Joseph shivered, and turned back to the dark underground cellar where he had taken refuge. He stumbled along, staggered now and then like a man that is drunk, and bruising himself over the broken masonry which lay scattered about between the crumbling walls and picturesquely shapeless towers which still stood, weatherbeaten monuments of Saracen's skill.

His boots were sopping with the snow, and the clothes, which had been warm enough down below, were pierced through and through by the wind which cut across the Alps.

It was warmer down in the cave where he had passed the night, and comparatively dry, and here he curled himself up and went to sleep, stupefied with suffering and anguish.

It was already night when he awoke. He sat up listening.

Surely he heard someone calling.

A soft child voice seemed echoing in his ears.

"Father! Father! I want you, father dear."

He rubbed his eyes and went outside.

A terrible stillness brooded over the world. Not a sound of any kind reached his ears. The hum of an insect, or the cry of some night bird would have brought him comfort.

Joseph was alone with Nature in one of her grandest aspects, and he shrank back into the darkness of his cellar, cowed and afraid.

The moon was shining down on the snow-clad mountain till it glistened like polished silver; countless myriads of stars shone in the black canopy above. For miles round he could see the jagged mountain peaks detaching themselves greyly from the sky, here plunged in blackest shadow, there flooded with the splendance of the moonlight, and Joseph turned his back upon it hastily and threw himself down in a corner of the cave with the shame and the misery that possessed him.

How long he crouched there he did not know. He tried to sleep, but hunger and thirst were tormenting him; his brain seemed on fire; remorse, keen, bitterest remorse, had taken the place of fear; he was at enmity with God and man, an outcast, a criminal, without home or shelter in the world, without a morsel of bread, without a drop of water.

His despair was dreadful.

And then all of a sudden the words of the kind old priest, who lived in the little village, passed through his mind.

"Three days more—four at the most—is the longest we can hope to keep little Guy with us."

Was his darling dying? Perhaps at that moment dead. In the great anger which had threatened his own life, he had forgotten how soon the spirit of that little boy would pass away.

He sprang to his feet suddenly, and straightened himself with a sort of fury.

Was he never to see his child again on earth? Perhaps he had already gone to meet his mother in the fulness of that love which death had been powerless to sever.

He raised his white face and looked about him wildly.

Whatever happened he must go home; whatever risk he ran he must see those blue eyes once more, and stroke the soft halo of golden curls. If the grave once parted them, who knew that they would ever meet again? It seemed to Joseph, standing there, that he had forfeited his right to see his little one in the great hereafter.

Fear laid a detaining hand upon him, but he shook it off with surprising resolution.

"No, no," he cried, half aloud; "I must go and see him. I must go whatever happens to me."

A great quietness stole over his soul as he crept out into the moonlight and began to climb down the slippery path as fast as the steep descent would allow. He was feeling a different man now that he had made up his mind to risk detection to have a last look at his little boy; perhaps to send a message to that other loved one whose mortal resting-place was marked by a little wooden cross in the great cemetery outside the town.

Joseph was so exhausted with hunger and cold that he could hardly drag himself along.

Nevertheless, he set out resolutely, his eyes set, his head thrown back, one hand tightly closed, the other grasping his stick.

For six hours he toiled along the mountain roads, up and down, up and down, without pausing to take breath. If he once stopped he felt that he never would go on again.

Presently there came the first grey gleam of coming dawn, and once he turned his head and saw a soft pink light creeping over the snow-capped mountains he had left behind.

He passed through the town, pressing close to the shadow of the houses, on and on, until at last he found himself following the winding dusty road which led up to the village where he had been born, and where his fathers had been born. Then he began to imagine there were steps pursuing him, and he broke into a run. It was not the thought of capture which frightened him; it was the dread of being taken away before he could see little Guy again

The morning light came on dimly at first, and then the sun came up over the mountains, with a sudden rush of gold and pink across the pale blue sky which made the motionless Mediterranean shine with the glory of a new-born day.

Digitized by Google

Joseph still ran on. When he perceived the grey roofs of the houses he quickened his steps. He was so eager that his foot hardly seemed to touch the ground.

No one passed him. The village was still asleep. A dog barked as his feet clattered on the cobbles, but no one looked out. He had reached the cottage door, his hand was on the handle when a tall figure loomed round the corner in a long blue overcoat and scarlet epaulettes.

Chiquet, the gendarme, had seen him.

Joseph stood stock-still for a moment, quite overwhelmed. Then he dashed in and bolted the door behind him. Three steps at a time he bounded up the stairs and threw open the door.

His sister, when she saw who it was, sprang forward with a little cry.

"So you have come back," she said slowly, "you brute."

He regarded her fixedly, trying to read his fate in her angry face. Had he come too late after all?

He tried to push by her, but she stood in the doorway, her arms akimbo, her massive frame immovable.

"So you have returned at last," she repeated.

"Yes, yes. And Guy?"

"You must not go in."

"Must not go in. Why?"

"The little boy is dying. He is already ——"

"Father, father, is that you? Oh, father ——"

Joseph sprang forward. He threw himself on his knees by the bedside, and covered the white upturned face with kisses.

A faint smile lit up the child's countenance for an instant, and he opened his eyes feebly.

Joseph seized the little outstretched hand.

"Poor little Guy," he murmured, tenderly stroking back the hair from the damp, feverish forehead. "Poor little Guy."

How thin, how pale, the boy had grown. His cheeks were hollow, his lips were white, his hands bloodless, and great black circles marked his eyes. Half-an-hour later, and Joseph's sacrifice would have been in vain.

His sister was weeping now. She had crept up behind him and stood looking down pitifully on the child's fading beauty. Instinctively they both felt the hour had come.

"Father."

"Yes, little one," so tenderly.

There was a long pause. The blue eyes were shut again. Presently they opened wildly.

"Father, I am so glad you have come."

The little fingers tightened their grasp; a spasm ran through the tiny body. Joseph rested his head on the edge of the bed sobbing.

He could hear Chiquet battering on the door below, and shouting to be let in. His sister bent down and touched him roughly.

"It's all over," she said. "Come, Joseph; you are making a fool of yourself."

Joseph looked up. If he was quick there was yet time to escape. In another moment the door would be broken down; the whole village would be aroused.

He rose to his feet, wiping his eyes with his sleeve. He kissed his sister on both cheeks, and crept towards the door.

There was a stir on the little bed; the blue eyes were opened again. Joseph turned at once, a terrible calmness in his face.

"Go," cried his sister, stamping her foot on the ground quite angrily; "you must not stop. Hark! They are breaking down the door. You can do no good by stopping."

Joseph stood irresolute.

"Father!"

The voice was so low this time that he could hardly hear it.

"Yes, darling."

"Are you going away?"

"Yes, for a little time."

The blue eyes fixed themselves on him wonderingly, and then two great tears crept through the long lashes and rolled down the wasted cheeks.

Joseph turned to his sister, his whole frame shaking with sobs.

"Go down, quick," he cried hoarsely. "Pile up the chairs and tables. Anything to gain a minute."

Then he went back once more to the death-bed of his little boy.

"Father, am I dying?"

Joseph nodded his head.

"I am going to mother. The good priest told me so."

"Yes."

Once more the blue eyes closed, and a rare smile lit up the little face.

Presently they opened again.

"I am happy—oh, I am so happy, father."

Joseph laid his hand soothingly on the burning forehead.

"Hush!" he said softly.

"You will come, too, soon, won't you?"

Joseph buried his face in the bed-clothes.

"No, little one," he sobbed. "I don't think so. Give my love to mother and say——"

He broke off suddenly. Guy's breathing had stopped. A beautiful smile was lighting up his face. Joseph stooped down and kissed the little forehead. It was quite cold now. Joseph thought he was dead.

He drew himself up miserably and listened. No one had come upstairs yet. His sister was shouting to Chiquet through the door. There was still time to escape. Gently he withdrew his hand from under the little boy's.

"Ah," he thought, "if I had not quarrelled with François I might have faced death. Now I am afraid."

Once more the little form on the bed moved. Guy opened his eyes appealingly. After that there was no more thought of going. Joseph knelt down beside the bed again.

Five minutes later Chiquet came up the stairs. He opened the door cautiously. He had prepared himself for a desperate struggle. His shoulders were thrown back, his legs planted firmly, his sword drawn.

"Joseph," he bellowed. "You ——"

He stopped suddenly.

His prisoner was still kneeling beside the little bed, his great frame quivering, his head between his hands.

For a long time he stood there irresolute. Joseph's sister crept in on tiptoe and laid her hand on her brother's arm. All the anger had gone out of her face.

"Chiquet is waiting for you," she faltered.

Joseph got up at once, turning his face away because his eyes were red and swollen.

"Come, good Chiquet," he said. "The little boy is dead."

A. D.

Digitized by Google

ASTOUNDING SUCCESS IN THE TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

MARVELLOUS RESULTS.

EXTREME OBESITY BECOMING A THING OF THE PAST.

MANY persons are doubtless familiar with the nature of the extraordinary revolution in the cure of obesity which, within recent years, has been wrought by the original researches of the now eminent expert, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It is evident that the certainty, the rapidity, and the agreeable surroundings of his curative process have been recognised, in a very large degree, among ladies and gentlemen belonging to the highest social circles. Keen observers who have an opportunity of judging assert, through the pages of Society papers and otherwise, that owing to the general employment of Mr. Russell's treatment, extreme obesity is becoming as much a thing of the past at fashionable gatherings as intoxication; and no doubt it will soon be regarded as nearly as disgraceful. The issue of an eighteenth edition of the author's singularly convincing little text-book, "Corpulency, and the Cure," however, serves to remind us that the popularity of the system has now reached spheres far remote from those of West-end fashion. The book of 256 pages may be had, post free, by sending three penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices as above, and it is worth the careful attention of those who wish to free themselves of a burden of fat—not merely because it is unseemly and adds enormously to the apparent age of the sufferer—but because extreme obesity terribly interferes with the energy necessary in these days of competition to make one's way in the world, or even to earn a very modest competency. A large proportion of the letters of Mr. Russell's grateful correspondents refer to their delight at being enabled—within a very brief period, and without any irksome conditions implying semi-starvation—to attack their accustomed tasks with pleasure instead of wearied disgust, through being reduced to their normal weight. The popularity of the system is also largely due, doubtless, to the English hatred of mystery, which is utterly swept aside by Mr. Russell. He fully explains his modus operandi, and supplies the recipe for his preparation.

[The following are extracts from other journals.]

CORPULENCY AND THE CURE.

THE appearance of an eighteenth edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's now famous "Corpulency, and the Cure," constitutes an unusual phenomenon in the publishing world, such as suggests some curious considerations. What, it may be demanded, are the characteristics of the books whose popularity is so enormous as to enable them to run through eighteen editions within a comparatively few years? Some little time ago it became a favourite recreation—much to the advantage of certain publishers—to make out a list of "a hundred books" with which it was suggested all students ought to be familiar. How few of these, the results of the highest efforts of human thought, have reached an eighteenth edition before generations, sometimes centuries, after their original publication had passed away. It would seem, indeed, that immediate popularity can be gained—and, what is more to the purpose, steadily retained up to an eighteenth edition—only by ministering in a remarkable and exceptional degree to the requirements of stern utility. This, indeed, is what Mr. Russell has accomplished by the introduction of the novel method of curing obesity which is fully described in his book. This compendious little volume, of 256 pages, may be had (post free), we note, by sending three penny stamps to the author's offices, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. The enormous circulation represented by these eighteen editions is fully accounted for by a perusal of the book. It is quite evident that—as is proved by the evidence of thousands of cases successfully treated—Mr. Russell has completely revolutionised the treatment of corpulence. He has shown that any person may get rid of the superfluous fat carried on the body within, at the outside, a few weeks' time and at such a rapid rate that 7lb. or 8lb. are frequently disposed of within a week. This is done, too, without undue interference with the ordinary habits of life in respect to eating and drinking, and—paradoxical as it may appear—the amount of food consumed is generally increased during the process of weight-diminution. The weighing-machine is Mr. Russell's ally, constantly appealed to, in order to place the results beyond doubt. Such conditions are so obviously suitable to the requirements of fat persons that their generally growing desire to study the book is easily explained.—Grantham Times.

REDUCTION OF SUPERFLUOUS FAT.

WE have received a copy of "Corpulency, and the Cure," and a very useful and well-written little treatise it is, showing how from 3lb. to 14lb. of fat can be harmlessly removed in a week. We quote rather an amusing extract which was published on the subject by the European Mail. The editor says: "I noticed the other day that someone had contributed a paragraph containing instructions for persons who wished to reduce their weight. I don't doubt but what, if the advice given was followed, the desired effect would result; but to follow it out properly one would not have much time left during the day. Care was to be taken not to eat this and not to eat that, while to dream of certain drinks was sufficient to increase the weight by about a hundredweight. Now, Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., is my man. His treatment does not consist of any starvation business. Quite the contrary, for the mixture he prescribes is an invigorating tonic, and improves the appetite wonderfully. He treats corpulence as a disease, and so long as his instructions are followed no one need worry about dietary restrictions, but jog along in peace and continue the usual breakfast of half-a-dozen poached eggs, two or three gammon rashers, and a pound of steak. It is a good job for the success of the 'Pickwick Papers' that the book was written before Mr. Russell came upon the scene, otherwise it is doubtful whether we should have ever heard of those jovial characters, Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Weller, senior, or that truly wonderful being, the Fat Boy. The only case I can speak of personally in connection with this mixture is a friend of mine, who tried it with remarkably good effect. He was enormously fat, and, although he did not believe in Mr. Russell's treatment, when someone told him the mixture made a very pleasant drink in hot weather, he tried it for this purpose. This was in June a few years ago. In September he had to be measured for a new suit of clothes, as those he had were getting very loose, and didn't fit at all. He continued with the mixture, and the tailor had to take fresh measurements at Christmas. Well, he didn't quite have to put on a couple of overcoats so as to make a shadow, but the measurements round his waist were just half what they were twelve months before. Like a sensible man, he always recommends Mr. Russell now wherever he can. So do I." His book only costs three penny stamps, but is worth a guinea. Send to Woburn House for it.—Boston Independent.

Digitized by Google

MANY HAPPY RETURNS OF THIS PAGE.

ON page 329 will be found particulars of an entirely new form of football competition. If you propose to go in for it, get to work at once and solve as many of the names as you can. You might also mention the competition incidentally to your friends.

RECRUIT.—Here are a few of the rules of war as at present formulated by civilised nations. The use of poison against the enemy is forbidden, also murder by treachery, such as assuming the uniform or displaying the flag of a foe; the murder of those who have surrendered, whether upon conditions or at discretion is unlawful, and the use of such arms as will cause unnecessary pain or suffering to an enemy is also forbidden.

S. L.—It is said that there are more widows in France than in any other country.

M. S.—Forged bank notes may be detected from the genuine articles in that they are always a trifle smaller. The plates for counterfeit notes have to be modelled from a genuine note, and are, therefore, the exact size, and the bills from it, when damp, shrink. Government plates, which it is impossible to steal, are somewhat larger than the notes made therefrom, on account of allowing for this shrinkage of paper.

WILLIE.—Our word "negro" was taken directly from the Spanish "negro," meaning black, and would hardly be called a nickname. The common Ethiopian nickname "Sambo" is from the Castilian "Zambo," meaning "bow-legged."

W. K. would like to know which is the oldest prison now used as such in Great Britain.———Probably Newgate, which has been used as a prison for nearly seven hundred years. Its history as such can be traced back at least so far as the year 1218. As a matter of fact, it is now only used as a place of temporary detention for prisoners awaiting trial at the Old Bailey, and as the place of execution of criminals condemned to death in the county of Middlesex.

SACERDOTE.—The clergy of Russia are divided into two classes—the white or village clergy, who must all be married, and the black or monks, who must not marry. The higher dignitaries of the church are chosen from this latter class.

K. P.—Probably the employés of the Spanish railway companies have more consideration shown to them than those of any other country. One of their privileges is that of being entitled to the best seats, quite regardless of the tickets sold to passengers.

BATHER.—I have only heard of one case of the kind, which was reported on good authority about two years ago. Gezibar, a native of Silesia, was so buoyant that when he jumped into a river, he sank only half the length of his body. By attaching a weight of six pounds to his feet he went down as far as the shoulders, and it took twelve pounds to get his head under water.

G. W.—There are about fifty-five dogs to every thousand inhabitants of the United Kingdom.

F. H. H.—A shilling is intrinsically worth tenpence-halfpenny.

S. W.—The title "reverend" was until the sixteenth century addressed to many others besides clergymen, such as judges and eminent writers; but from that time its use has been strictly confined to the clergy.

A. P. would be glad if we could tell him what animal can live the longest without food.——— Disregarding the bat and the toad, about which naturalists cannot agree, the answer must be the serpent. One of these reptiles, when kept in confinement, has been known to refuse all food for the space of twenty-two months.

D. G.—Nearly every British battle-ship carries eight, and every cruiser four, fully qualified divers, whose duty it is to repair any damage sustained by the vessel below the water-line, clearing the propellers and recovering the anchors.

D. D. S.—The smallest independent state is Tavolara, a little island off the north-east coast of Sardinia, some three miles long, about two-thirds of a mile in breadth, and with a population of fifty-five. This tiny republic was recognised by Italy in 1887; before that time it was a monarchy.

"WHICH English railway passes through the greatest number of counties?" is the question put by SLATER.——— The endless complications of branch lines used by several different companies jointly make it necessary to restrict the application to main lines. The answer is the Great Western, whose main line passes through nineteen counties. The Midland comes next with sixteen, and the London and North Western third with ten.

C. B.—Probably the guinea pig is the most active of new born quadrupeds. It sees from its birth, eats strange food, and runs about with freedom during the first hour of its life.

MEX.—The post of President of Mexico does not seem to be conducive to longevity. Of the fifty-five rulers since 1821, four were executed, five were murdered, and seven killed in battle. Of the remainder, it is safe to say that the cares of office shortened rather than lengthened their lives.

SEVERAL correspondents believe that they have caught us out in a serious error in regard to the statement we made the other day to the effect that no man can join an American cavalry regiment if his weight be over 160 pounds. They point to the fact that General Shafter turns the scale at considerably more than this.——— I am quite aware of this fact, but General Shafter has only of recent years put on his enormous weight. When he joined the army he was quite an ordinary individual, so far as his physique is concerned.

A. E. K. comes along with this question: "Why is it that birds with long legs usually have short tails?"——— The only use of a bird's tail is to serve as a rudder during the act of flight. When a bird has long legs these are stretched directly behind it when flying, and answer as a sort of rudder, and a long tail is not required. We are adapted to our environment.

T. S.—Teak is the great source of wealth in Northern Siam. The best workers in the forest are Khamus, who live on herbs and roots, rats and snakes.

JACK.—You would not be permitted to enter a theatre in Heligoland by yourself, as you are under sixteen. You could no doubt gain admittance in company with an elder person. The natives have their own language or dialect. "Snake Jim Hollunder?" is what they say when they wish to know if you speak their tongue.

A. S. C.—The snail travels at the rate of one half inch per second, a man walking at an ordinary rate would cover a distance of four feet in the same time.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Back blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Sept. 13th, if intended for the Issue on sale Sept. 27th, and dated Oct. 1st. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C

Digitized by Google

£1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1

Cash Prizes.

Stock must be cleared to make room for Winter Goods. Grand Bargains in Ladies' and Gentlemen's Real Irish Handkerchiefs, which, owing to the continued serious depression in these goods, have been GREATLY REDUCED IN PRICE.

		Usual Price.
Lot 1.	½-dozen Ladies' Hemstitched Cambric - -	7/6	doz.	for	2/6.
Lot 2.	½-dozen Ladies' Hemstitched Cambric - -	6/-	,,	,,	2/-
Lot 3.	½-dozen Ladies' Hemstitched Fine Lawn- -	5/3	,,	,,	1/6.
Lot 4.	½-dozen Gents' Fine Linen Cambric - - -	9/6	,,	,,	1/9.
Lot 5.	½-dozen Ladies' Fancy White Borders - -	9.6	,,	,,	3/-

All Full size. Goods willingly changed if not approved of.

DURING OUR SPRING SALE WE CLEARED AN ENORMOUS STOCK BY OFFERING PRIZES TO THE VALUE OF OVER £300!

And are now fully prepared to double this amount by repeating our genuine offer as a startling advertisement. Therefore any purchasers of any lot (or lots) can enter the following Skill Competition FREE. If you solve both sentences correctly and if only one sentence is correct you will receive a Beautiful Silk Handkerchief. We do not offer big cheques of £5 or £10 (which are seldom won), but only Prizes which we are prepared and willing to DISTRIBUTE TO OUR CUSTOMERS.

WE WILL SEND YOU £1;

OG T* T*E SS C*D DN

W* R*T O*R GE OR.

Each * represents a letter, and when filled in form two sentences regarding this advertisement. Those who wish to enter must enclose written copy of solutions with order, and at the same time state, in case you should not whether you prefer a LADY'S or GENT'S Silk Handkerchief. Also enclose stamped addressed envelope for results. Competition closes September 24th.

WIN A SOVEREIGN,

As a guarantee of good faith the sealed Solution has been deposited with our Solicitors.

All Parcels post free in the United Kingdom. Postal Orders payable to James Robertson & Co., at Holborn Office. Number of Order should be kept.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials from all parts of the World testify as to the sterling value of our goods.

Any reader of Short Stories may, before ordering, obtain a of Lot 3, and extracts from Testimonials, by forwarding us a penny stamp for postage.

Free Sample Handkerchief,

JAMES ROBERTSON & CO., LINEN MERCHANTS, (Dept. A.) 63, High Holborn, London.

Special Sale Quotations for Sheets, Table Cloths, Toilet Covers, Towels, Gents' Shirts, etc., on application. We intend to keep up our reputation for Sterling Value Goods at Wholesale Prices, and also for Straightforward and Liberal Prize Competitions.

£1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1 £1

Digitized by Google

PUT YOUR FINGER ON A GOOD THING AND USE

NUCOLINE

A PURE VEGETABLE BUTTER.

For Baked and Boiled Pastry, Frying, &c.

A Perfect Cooking Butter.

Nutritive, Digestive, Economical.

Five Prize Medals Awarded.

Stocked by all London Stores, &c.

A Sample Tin sent post free for 3 stamps. Write—

LODERS & NUCOLINE Ltd., SILVERTOWN, LONDON, E.

'DOLLY' BLUE

Notice.—"DOLLY" Blue is neatly tied in a white bag to a small handle to hold by whilst using. It is the cheapest and best Laundry Blue in the market. "Dolly" Blue is sold by all Grocers and Oilmen at 1d. per bag.

"DOLLY" CREAM & TINTS.

"DOLLY" Cream Colour, for Tinting Curtains, Muslins, Laces, Silks, Blouses, etc., a Rich Cream Shade.

"DOLLY" Tints, manufactured in Six Shades—Pink, Terra Cotta, Old Gold, Heliotrope, Sea Green, and Canary Yellow—for Tinting Faded Ribbons, Laces, etc. Sold everywhere, 1d. per bag. Will wash out when required.

Sample Box, containing Seven Tints, post free for 8d.

W. EDGE & SONS LIMITED, BOLTON, LANCS.

B&M

Softer with every Wash.

UNSHRINKABLE FLANNELS

For Garments of every kind.

ENDLESS WEAR.

May be obtained through any respectable Draper, Hosier, Tailor, or Outfitter. For name of nearest agent apply to BARKER & MOODY, Perseverance Mills, LEEDS.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.

Dr Tibbles'

MALTATED BANANA FOOD.

UNIQUE FOR INFANTS & INVALIDS AND ALL SUFFERERS FROM INDIGESTION.

Makes a Delicious Porridge

DESCRIPTIVE PAMPHLET OF Dr TIBBLES' BANANA BISCUITS AND OTHER SPECIALITIES, FREE FROM Dr TIBBLES, COUNTY CHAMBERS, BIRMINGHAM.

Reckitt's Blue.

Ask for it and See that you get it.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

IF "A YOUNG GOOSE" MEANS "GOSLING," WHAT DOES "TO CONSUME BY FIRE" MEAN? See page 360.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 507. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 17TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

THE WONDERFUL FOOD BEVERAGE.

A Food Beverage such as Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, with its unique powers of nutriment and exceptional vitalising properties, is a means whereby strength and nervous energy is gained as a rational outcome of increased vitality.

It has the refreshing properties of fine tea, the nourishment of the best cocoas, and a tonic and recuperative force possessed by neither, and can be used in all cases where tea and coffee are prohibited.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, 6d., 9d., and 1s. 6d. can be obtained from grocers, chemists, and stores, or from 60, 61, and 62, Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

But mention SHORT STORIES.

Digitized by Google

BIG MONEY PRIZES!

£4 IN CASH £4

AND A BEAUTIFUL REAL GOLD RING!!

The above prizes are to be given away simply to advertise

FOMA WAFERS

The great cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, and all Liver and Stomach disorders. FOMA WAFERS cure with Electric Swiftness. They are very pleasant in flavour, and can be taken at any time of the day with safety. Price 1s. 3d. per packet, post free. Foreign Orders, 2s. 6d.

SPECIAL OFFER.—To every person who purchases a packet of Wafers, and who fills in correctly the ten words as below, we promise to send £4.

EXTRA SPECIAL OFFER.—To each person who sends for five packets of Wafers at one time we will send a beautiful real GOLD RING (send size of finger). We know that you will be more than delighted. These are the words to be filled in correctly:

FA W*S A*E M*S F*R
IN QY CE
T S*M.

FOMA WAFERS ARE MARVELLOUS FOR INDIGESTION, and QUICKLY COMPOSE THE SYSTEM. Cure with Electric Swiftness.

DIRECTIONS.—When you have found the correct words, write them out on a sheet of paper and send it with a postal order for 1s. 3d. (for a packet of Wafers) and a plainly addressed stamped envelope (for the results) to SANGERS & CO., 4 Duke Street, Charing Cross, London, W.C. All who wish to enter must send their orders for Wafers at once, as the offer closes on October 29th, 1898. The results and Prizes will be posted to all on October 29th. The Wafers will be sent off as soon as possible after the order is received. N.B.—Those who send for five boxes of Wafers at one time will receive the GOLD RING with the tablets by registered post. Write your address very plain on the envelope for results. Mention the name of this paper.

A REVOLUTION IN FOUNTAIN PENS

WHY PAY 10/6 FOR A PEN WHEN YOU CAN GET THE SAME FOR 5/-

HALF-SIZE OF THE PEN AT 5s.

Fine, Medium, or Broad Pointed nibs suitable for Shorthand or Longhand.

THE RELIANCE FOUNTAIN PEN has a 14-carat gold nib (Iridium tipped), an Improved double Ink Feed, and a fine chased Ebonite Holder.

WILL NOT GET OUT OF ORDER.

WE CLAIM THIS PEN TO BE THE BEST EVER OFFERED.

A stationer says: "This pen of yours writes very nicely, it will give everybody satisfaction."

Another, "The pen purchased from you has given every satisfaction: I find it far better value than the 10/6 pens.

We send this pen, complete in box, with filler and directions, post free for 5/-

A Large size, holding an Extra Supply of Ink, post free for 7/6.

A GREAT SAVING OF TIME—ALWAYS HAVE YOUR OWN PEN AND INK WITH YOU.

:o:

EVERY PEN GUARANTEED.

You should not hesitate, but order at once.

THE RELIANCE PEN CO. LIMITED,

26 IVY LANE,

PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

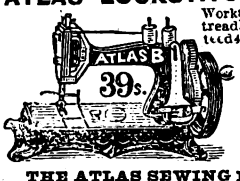
REMEMBER, a 10/6 FOUNTAIN PEN for 5/-

A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
182B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

LISTS POST FREE

	£ s.	Monthly.
JUNO Road Racer	11 0	18/4
" " "	12 12	21/-

Monthly. Roadster, £10. 16/8
Road Racer, £11. 18/4
Lady & Gent. £12 12/- 21/-
£14 14/- 24/6
£16 16/- 24/-
Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free.
METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft.

HAVE YOU SEEN OUR CATALOGUE OF CHEAP CROCKERY?

If not, please get a post-card, and send it to

THE

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

And you will get it by return, together with particulars of the most Wonderful Package of Crockery the World has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

THOUSANDS SOLD ALL OVER THE WORLD.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, STAFFS.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 6s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 39 MINCING LANE, LONDON, E.C.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 29 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

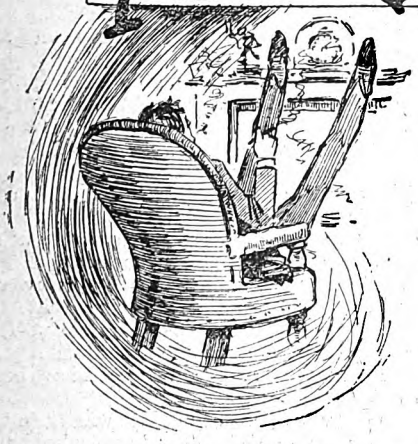
Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case. 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

SHORT STORIES

No. 507.] For the Week ending September 17th, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

HOMESPUN YARNS



No. 1.

TRIED IN THE FIRE.

By Levin Carnac.

WHEN I was a lad, like a good many lads with a strong taste for the literature of adventure, I made up my mind to go to sea. I went—and liked my first taste of ship-life so little that I ran away at the first port we touched at.

This was Williamstown, one of the ports of Melbourne, on the opposite side of Hobson's Bay from Sandridge, and thence I made my way with all speed I might and the fear of the policeman behind me, up the Bush by way of Kilmore and the Pyalong ranges.

It was a good twelve months before I saw Melbourne again. During that year of rambling and wild living I picked up the materials of more than one striking story of real life, and that which follows here is reconstructed from the elements gathered from one of the companions of my wanderings with swag and billy over the bush-tracks in search of work and change of scene.

My friend was an educated man and an accomplished, if penitent, scoundrel by his own showing, and it is the story of his reformation that I am going to tell as nearly as I can put it into the form in which I had it from him one splendid moonlight night over the camp fire:

All rights reserved.]

"I call myself an honest man now, and I am as honest as a good many respectable sharps who wouldn't shake hands with me in public for £5 unless it was at a philanthropy show, but a few years ago—never mind how many—I was as tough-laid a scoundrel as a policeman could wish to catch between Bombay and Ballarat. I was a sort of gentleman thief and swell cracksman, with a turn for anything, from housebreaking to forgery.

"Tom Markham was a clerk and cashier in a shipping firm in Melbourne that owned a line of small vessels trading to the South Seas, and, not to make the most disagreeable part of my story too long for my taste or yours, I managed to steal and realise some securities belonging to these people in such a way that I got off scot clear, while poor Tom got seven years for not doing it?

"What complicated the matter a good deal was the

Digitized by Google

We shot down all but two of the mutineers.

fact that Tom and I were both in love with the same girl, and it happened rather curiously that a year or so after Tom was sent up I was able to put her father under a very considerable obligation to me with part of the proceeds of the very robbery for which he was innocently suffering.

"I always thought that Lucy liked Tom a good deal more than suited my plans; but, of course, with the stain of felony on his name, marriage with him was not to be thought of, and so the field was left open to me.

"By this time I had got together quite a respectable pile by the exercise of talents on an extremely productive field, and was getting anxious to marry and settle down quietly and honestly for the rest of my natural days. Lucy's father was a civil engineer, and one day, by some stroke of good luck, he got a very fair appointment at the Cape that was advertised in the Argus.

"I had no particular wish to be in Australia when poor Tom came out, and I thought I might as well make a move then as later on; so when the old man found a little difficulty in getting together the passage-money for himself and daughter, I opened my heart to him and said that if his daughter would marry me I would go with them to the Cape and settle down there. Under these circumstances I could very well offer to advance him what he wanted to make up the passage-money.

"Lucy herself at last formally accepted me as her lover, but by some great good fortune for her, she refused to marry me until her father was settled at the Cape.

"We took passage in a crack three-masted schooner that had been in the tea trade and was then running with light cargo and passengers between Port Phillip and Cape Town.

"One lovely night after we had doubled Cape Leeuin I went down on to the main deck when the other passengers had turned in, and after taking a few turns up and down, I leant my arms on the bulwarks and stood looking out over the moonlit sea and back upon the life I hoped I had left for ever. I had done very well, on the whole. I felt no compunction for my thefts and swindles, for after all they were no worse in reality than the legal rogueries that are practised every day by the swindlers who are clever enough to keep on the right side of the line between sharp practice and crime; but there was just one that troubled what remained of conscience I possessed very sorely, and that was the way that I had blasted poor Tom Markham's life, and taken from him the sweetheart who was going to marry me when we reached Cape Town.

"So strongly had this regret got possession of me that for once I lost my almost perfect self-control, and said aloud:

"'Poor old Tom, I wish to Heaven it could have been done otherwise!'

"Hardly were the words out of my lips when I felt a hand on my shoulder, and heard Tom's voice whisper in my ear:

"'Yes, Fitzgerald, you may well say that. You have stolen more than money or securities from me. No—you needn't start and turn white. I'm not going to expose you or make any fuss about what can't be mended now. If I wanted to I couldn't, for your word would be a good deal better than mine, seeing you are a cabin passenger and I am only a green hand hired for the trip, and a runaway convict into the bargain. I've watched you ever since we left the Heads to see if you'd recognise me, and as you haven't done so I think I must be fairly safe.'

"By the time he had done speaking I had recovered from the shock of the unexpected meeting, and, so, putting out my hand to him I said:

"'Tom! if you can forgive the dirty trick I played you, say so and shake hands, and when we get to the Cape I'll whack up everything I possess with you, equal shares, and you shall start fresh in life as well as me.'

"'That's a fair offer, Fitz,' said Tom taking my hand, 'it's as much as you could be expected to do, and on that basis we'll make it up. My notions of what they call honesty have changed a good bit since I graduated on to the Government works, and I see now that you must have either done what you did or gone to p.s. yourself—and for you it might have been a lifer if anything else had come out. It's rather rough, though, about Lucy. I love her just as much as ever I did, and I'd lay my life down willingly to please or serve her—and—and that's why I'm going to stand aside, Fitz, and let you walk over for her. I'm not fit for her now. My nature's poisoned and brutalised, and I'm—well, I'm just the outcast that you've made me, and that I'll have to remain, so you can have her and I'll stand aside.

Digitized by Google

"'But mind this, Fitz' (and here his voice grew hard and he gripped my arm like a vice), "if you don't prove worthy of her, as sure as there's a Heaven above us I'll find you out and revenge myself and her with——'

"The rest of the threat was never uttered, for, as he spoke, a whiff of blue smoke rose from the open forehatch, followed by a denser cloud, and the next instant the dreadful cry of 'Fire' was ringing from stem to stern of the ship.

"What followed I remember only as a wild dream of frantic, hopeless struggles to subdue the flames, of closing the hatches and pumping tons of water down into the hold, and hearing the fierce roar of the struggle between the flames and the water in the furnace that was raging just below the cracking, steaming deck on which we stood. At last the imprisoned steam burst up a portion of the deck, and then all was over except taking to the boats as fast as we could.

"Unhappily for us all we had no regular crew, for good sailors were very scarce in Melbourne in those days, and our forecastle was full of a lot of riff-raff from half the countries of Europe. Of course they broke loose as soon as they saw the game was up, and made a rush for the boats. As they did so I made for the poop on which Lucy and her father and the other passengers were standing waiting for the quarter-boat to be lowered. I dived down into my cabin, crammed a few things into my valise, stuck my revolvers into my coat pockets, and ran back on deck just in time to help to drive back half a dozen of the crew who were making for the davit-ropes.

"Close by Lucy, but standing with his back to her, I found Tom. He was only armed with a marline-spike, so I gave him one of my pistols, and we stood there side by side with the flames creeping nearer to us every moment, and the still moonlit water beneath us waiting to swallow up the doomed ship, fighting for the safety of the girl we both had wooed and I had so basely won.

"In the end we shot down all but two of the mutineers, and they made a run for the bulwarks, jumped over, and tried to swim to the long boat which the others had succeeded in launching. Their shipmates were in too much of a hurry to get away from the burning ship to stop for them, and they were pulled down by the sharks, as they deserved to be. Meanwhile, we had got the quarter-boat into the water and lowered the women and provisions and baggage into it.

"Before Tom or I had made a move to get into her she was overfull. One more might be squeezed into her, but it was perfectly plain that two would be fatal. Tom and I looked at each other for a moment and then at Lucy in the boat. In an instant all the good there was in both of us came out, and we each stepped back and said to the other: "Get in, old man, I'll stop."

"There was no time to argue, for the flames were upon us, so Tom, to settle the matter, took me by the shoulders and forced me over the side, saying, "You can make her happier than I can. Go and do so, and God be with you both."

"As he uttered the blessing he let go my shoulders, ran across the deck, pitched a hen-coop into the sea, and jumped overboard after it.

"Was he drowned? No; we kept him near the boat on his hen-coop all night, and the next day we had the good fortune to be picked up by a English clipper bound to Melbourne.

"I got back a changed man. That awful moment on the burning deck had scorched all the meanness right out of me. I saw what was the proper thing to do and I did it. I gave myself up to the police, cleared Tom completely, and went to do the remainder of his time instead of him. In consideration of my confession, and giving up a lot of the stolen property, I got off with five years. When I came out Tom and Lucy were married. They wanted me to go and stop with them for a bit, but I took to the bush instead, and I've been on the wander ever since, and shall be to the end of the chapter. Well, good-night, young fellow. I'm turning in now."

"Has Mantalius a very deep voice?"
"Very. When that man sings it hurts his corns."

Mistress: "Where have you been before?"
Servant: "Just give me a directory and I'll mark the places where I have not been."

Customer: "Is that the razor you shaved me with the last time?"
Knight of the Razor: "Yes, sir."
Customer: "Chloroform, please!"

"Man overboard!" cried the sailor, seeing a man fall into the sea.
"What do you mean with your 'Man overboard'?" gasped the unfortunate, bobbing up. "Baron Von Feiglestock is overboard!"

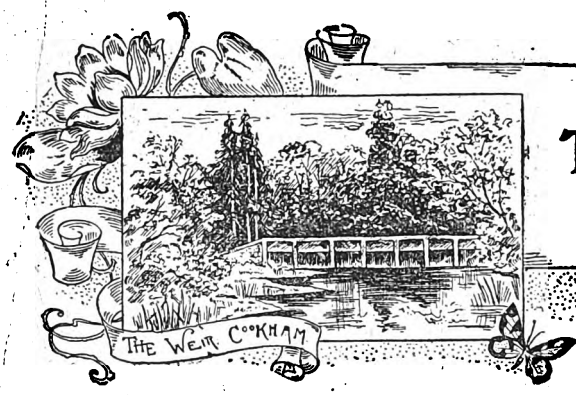
Jinks: "To-day I pleased a pretty woman by telling her that a certain red-faced, snub-nosed, bald-headed mortal looked like her."
Winks: "Get out!"
Jinks: "The red-faced, snub-nosed mortal was her first baby."

Magistrate: "For striking the plaintiff a punch on the nose I fine you forty shillings."
Culprit: "Forty shillings is a big thing with me, yer worship. Can't I pay it in instalments?"
Magistrate: "No; did you punch his nose in instalments?"

A: "Our postage system is, after all, shockingly unreliable. I intend to lodge a complaint with the authorities."
B: "Indeed! Do your letters often miscarry?"
A: "Yes; for instance, that five pound note you promised to send me a week ago hasn't yet arrived."

First Cyclist: "Do you see that gentleman yonder? He holds the greatest number of prizes and medals ever possessed by any one man."
Second Cyclist: "What! That fellow? He doesn't look a bit like a champion."
First Cyclist: "It's just as I tell you, though. He is a pawnbroker, you see."

Digitized by Google



The Gambler's Ward.

SOME few years ago I went to stay with an eccentric French friend who lived in a quaint, old-fashioned house about ten miles from Paris.

He was a confirmed old bachelor, a student, an antiquarian, a collector of curios, and a deeply-read man, whose wealth had left him free to follow his natural bent, and who was dreaming away his life in the pursuit of various hobbies apart from his fellow-men, buried in the ashes of the past.

The day after my arrival we had just finished lunch, and he was explaining at great length the origin and use of a curious Etruscan vase, when my eyes, which, like my thoughts, were very disposed to wander, lighted upon an object that caused me to utter an exclamation of horror and amazement.

"What is the matter?" asked Julien de Noirville, coming back reluctantly to the present.

"Look!" I said quickly, pointing to a house that overlooked part of his garden.

At one of the upper French windows that opened on to a narrow stone ledge, not wide enough to be dignified by the name of a balcony, behind heavy iron bars, was the pale, agonised face of a girl, surrounded by long, fair hair, which fell in tangled masses on her emaciated shoulders. Her thin, claw-like hands were beating restlessly against the panes, and tears were rolling down her wasted cheeks. She was dressed in some kind of loose pink garment, that was both torn and dirty, and altogether she presented the most pitiable and dejected appearance.

"Oh, that's the lunatic!" said Julian indifferently.

"Who is she?" I asked.

"Ah, by-the-way, she is a countrywoman of yours!" he answered with more interest. "She's a Miss Grace Standish, and I have my doubts as to whether she is mad. Some weeks ago she jumped from that window into my garden and took refuge in the library. I found her there and she implored me not to send her back to prison, and told me a terrible story of the cruelty she was suffering from, that she was being done to death for the sake of her money, and all that sort of thing. Her friends traced her and insisted on her return to that house, telling me that she was a maniac, and of course, I had to let her go. Since then they have put those bars outside the window."

"But haven't you done anything to help her—to rescue her?" I asked impatiently.

"My dear Harry, you English are so fond of mixing yourselves up in other people's affairs! What could I do?

"Just imagine my plunging myself into the quicksands of litigation about an utter stranger, who may have been telling me some wild, hysterical delusions. Besides, I had just received a most valuable collection of Inca relics and had to tabulate them."

I turned away, disgusted at his selfish, inert conduct, and determined to find out more about the girl, who I felt sure was the victim of gross cruelty.

I prosecuted cautious inquiries and found that her story was only too true. Her father, Sir George Standish, had died when she was a baby, and her mother, a Frenchwoman, who survived her husband by a few years, left her own brother, Lucien de Longueville, as the child's sole guardian.

As Grace approached her majority his treatment of her became more and more unnatural, till, finding that his conduct towards his orphan niece was severely commented upon in England, he had removed her to France, shut her up in this gloomy house in the care of an old Frenchman and his wife, and had given out that her brain was hopelessly affected.

Starvation, solitude, and ill-treatment had already worked havoc upon both her mind and body, but the expression of her face was far from being that of an irresponsible maniac.

M. de Longueville had further strengthened his position by securing the assistance of an unscrupulous French doctor, who, in return for very handsome fees, gave certificates as to her mental condition which enabled her guardian to make free use of her money.

I determined to see her and hear something from her own lips, so I watched the house for days, and at last gathered that she was left alone for a short time in the middle of the day while the hard-featured old hag who was supposed to look after her, went down to have her own dinner.

I climbed up into a tree, whose friendly branches rendered me less conspicuous than if I had used a ladder, and, swinging myself on to a branch near the window, called gently:

"Miss Standish! Miss Grace! A friend wants you!"

She crept timidly to the window, only to start back again as soon as she caught sight of a strange face, but I beckoned kindly to her, and pointing to the window, said:

"Can you open it? I want to talk to you—to help you."

She managed to unfasten the hasp, but she was too weak to push the window open, so I placed my foot on the stone ledge and, while holding on with one hand, pulled at the barrier between us.

Digitized by Google

"I am an Englishman, and I mean to get you out of this." I began.

"It's too late, too late," she moaned. "I heard them say this morning that I hadn't long to live, and I thank God for it. I can endure no more, I begged them to put me out of my misery months ago, and then they said I was dangerous and tied my hands and feet to a chair. See!" she said, holding out her wasted arms, upon which were thick red seams, "that's where the ropes cut me."

"The brutes," I muttered; "but you must be brave; it is not too late, only you must look out for me and try to tell me everything that will help me to save you. First of all who is the doctor that comes to see you?"

"Ah, how good you are!" she said, the tears filling her large, sorrowful eyes. "But I dare not hope, they will never let me out. They say I am mad, and I think they will soon make me so. Dr. Gabriel is the one who comes. A little dark man with cruel eyes and fat white hands."

Her voice had sunk into a low whisper, and I could see she was trembling violently from the excitement, so I judged it wiser to leave for that day before we should be surprised or she should be unable to conceal the fact of my visit. I shut the window after a few more encouraging words, and promised to come again soon.

She smiled sadly with infinite gratitude and pathos, and stood watching my descent with hungry eyes. Friends and kindness seemed unknown quantities in her young life.

I told Julien de Noirville what I had done, and he patted my shoulder kindly, saying in a tone of apology:

"My solitary life makes me selfish, I'm afraid, but I'm very glad you've taken the matter up, and if you want money, come to me."

I paid a visit to the British Ambassador and found he was away. I then wrote to him, but from his answer I could see that M. de Longueville had made his own cause good with the authorities, and in the face of serious international complications the fate of a poor mentally afflicted girl was but a mere trifle.

I gained the ear of the French magistrate who knew something of de Longueville's character, and engaged Maître André, a clever counsel to conduct the case.

After various consultations I took advantage of de Longueville's absence in Monte Carlo to call upon Doctor Gabriel, whom I found in his luxurious rooms on the first floor of a large house in one of the best parts of Paris.

He read my card, and looking up repeated the name, "Captain Lorrimer," thoughtfully, then, with a polite bow, he said:

"Pardon! Monsieur le Capitaine! but I do not remember the name. You have come to consult me; it is not my hour, but I will make an exception."

"Yes: I came to consult you on a matter of vital importance," I interrupted brusquely, for his oily manner irritated me. "I am here to ask you about Miss Standish."

He started slightly, then, assuming an air of deep sympathy:

"Ah, la pauvre demoiselle! It is a sad, sad, cruel case!"

"You use the right word—cruel. It is deliberate murder, and you know it as well as I do. You know she is perfectly sane, or you know nothing about your profession, but you sell your honour and her life for the filthy lucre that keeps you here in luxury while she is being slowly done to death!"

"Sir! You insult me! You shall give me satisfaction! No gentleman could hear such words—" he stammered, choking with rage and waving the fat white hands of which Grace had spoken.

"We will settle that afterwards," I said coolly. "You must first sign this little document, which lets you off a great deal too easily."

I laid before him a parchment which had been drawn up by Maître André, and which ran as follows:

"I, Hector Gabriel, do hereby certify that Miss Grace Standish has fully regained the use of her faculties, and is perfectly competent to manage her own affairs."

"Never!" he cried, pushing it from him and beginning to pace up and down in an excited fashion. "Never! I will never sign such a thing. She is mad, hopelessly mad."

"We have only your word for it, and as you refuse to save yourself by this means, I shall apply for an order to enable the two first mental specialists in London and Paris to examine her. Then the whole profession will know of your complicity in the crime and," I said, moving a step nearer to him, "if the law does not punish you as you deserve, I'll hunt you down and shoot you myself, for you're not fit to live!"

He tried a little more bluster, but his cunning told him that the game was in my hands, so after a few more muttered imprecations he signed the paper. As I prepared to leave the room with my trump card in my pocket, he suddenly changed his tune and almost grovelled at my feet, imploring me not to expose him. He had been poor, the money tempted him, he had not consented to any cruelty, and he had tried to prevent violent measures.

I flung him off and went away to watch my opportunity of telling Grace of my unlooked-for success.

When M. de Longueville returned and found that his niece had been removed from the house in which he had left her, he was inclined to treat the matter with a high hand, and talked of taking proceedings, but when he was compelled to face Miss Standish in a court of law, his valour oozed out at the tips of his fingers, and a more abject coward it has never been my lot to see.

Grace told her story with a simple pathos and intelligence that went straight to all hearts. The prospect of release had already begun to tell favourably on her, and it was easy to see that a few months of freedom and happiness would make her blossom out into a beautiful girl.

Her uncle was ordered to make full restitution of all that he appropriated since she came of age, and give an account of the way he had administered the estate during her minority. Through his dishonesty and extravagance her fortune was found to have been considerably diminished, but as he was a bankrupt and a gambler there was no redress.

Grace had the sublime generosity to offer him a sum of money on condition that he would go to America and stop there; but before the news reached him he had taken a longer passage into the unknown, and the world was better for his absence.

No, I did not marry Grace Standish.

After a time I went to India, and although we corresponded as friends we neither entertained for the other that feeling which would justify our union. Three years later she wrote to tell me of her engagement to a young London journalist, and when I returned to England a few months afterwards I was invited to dine at the house of the newly-married couple

MARY FERMOR.

Digitized by Google

A JURYMAN'S STORY.

WE had been out twenty-four hours, and stood eleven to one. The case was a very plain one—at least, we eleven thought so.

A murder of peculiar atrocity had been committed, and, though no eye had witnessed the deed, circumstances pointed to the prisoner's guilt with unfailing certainty. The recusant juror had stood out from the first. He acknowledged the cogency of the proofs, confessed his inability to reconcile the facts with the defendant's innocence, and yet on every vote went steadily for acquittal. His conduct was inexplicable. It could not result from a lack of intelligence, for, while he spoke but little, his words were well chosen, and evinced a thorough understanding of the case.

Though still in the prime of manhood, his locks were prematurely white, and his face wore a singularly sad and thoughtful expression. He might be one of those who entertained scruples as to the right of society to inflict the death penalty. But no, it was not that, for, in reply to such a suggestion, he frankly admitted that brutal men, like the violent brutes they resemble, must be controlled through fear, and that dread of death, the supreme terror, is, in many cases, the only adequate restraint.

At the prospect of another night of fruitless imprisonment we began to grow impatient, and expostulated warmly against what seemed an unreasonable captiousness; and some not over-kind remarks were indulged in as to the impropriety of trifling with an oath like that under which we were acting.

"And yet," the man answered, as though communicating with himself rather than repelling the imputation, "it is conscience that hinders my concurrence in a verdict not approved by my judgment."

"How can that be?" queried several at once.

"Conscience may not always dare to follow judgment."

"But here she can know no other guide."

"I once would have said the same."

"And what has changed your opinion?"

"Experience."

The speaker's manner was visibly agitated, and we awaited in silence the explanation which he seemed ready to give.

Mastering his emotion, as if to answer our looks of inquiry, he continued:

"Twenty years ago I was a young man just beginning life. Few had brighter prospects, and none brighter hopes. An attachment dating from childhood had ripened with its object. There had been no verbal declaration and acceptance of love—no formal plighting of troth; but when I took my departure to seek a home in the Western States of America, it was a thing understood that when I had found it and put it in order she was to share it.

"Life in the backwoods, though solitary, is not necessarily lonely. The kind of society afforded by Nature depends much on one's self. As for me, I lived more in the future than in the present, and hope was an ever-cheerful companion.

"At length the time came for making the final payment on the home which I had bought. It would henceforth be my own; and in a few months my simple dwelling, which I had spared no pains to render inviting, would be graced by its mistress.

"At the land office, which was some sixty miles off, I met my old friend George Chambers. He, too, had come to seek his fortune in America; and we were both delighted at the meeting. He had brought with him, he said, a sum of money which he desired to invest in land on which it was his purpose to settle.

"I expressed a strong wish to have him for a neighbour, and gave him a cordial invitation to accompany me home, giving it as my belief that he could nowhere make a better selection than in that vicinity. He readily consented, and we set out together. We had not ridden many miles when George suddenly recollected a commission he had undertaken from a friend, which would require his attendance at a public land-sale on the following day.

Digitized by Google

"Exacting a promise that he would not delay his visit longer than necessary, and having given minute directions as to the route, I continued my way homeward, while he turned back.

"I was about retiring to bed on the night of my return, when a summons from without called me to the door. A stranger asked shelter for himself and his horse for the night. I invited him in. Though a stranger, his face seemed familiar. He was probably one of the men I had seen at the land office, a place, at that time, much frequented. Offering him a seat, I went to see his horse. The poor animal, as well as I could see by the dim starlight, seemed to have been hardly used. His panting sides bore witness of merciless riding, and a tremulous shrinking, at the slightest touch, betokened recent fright.

"On re-entering the house, I found the stranger was not there. His absence excited no surprise; he would doubtless soon return. It was a little singular, however, that he should have left his watch lying upon the table.

"At the end of half an hour, my guest not returning, I went out again to the stable, thinking he might have found his way thither to give personal attention to the wants of his horse.

"Before going out, from mere force of habit—for we were as yet uninfested by either thieves or policemen—I took the precaution of putting the stranger's watch in a drawer in which I kept my own valuables. I found the horse as I had left him, and gave him the food which he was now sufficiently cooled to be allowed to eat, but his master was nowhere to be seen. As I approached the house, a crowd of men on horseback dashed up, and I was commanded in no gentle tones to 'stand.' In another moment I was in the clutches of those who claimed me as their 'prisoner.'

"I was too much stupefied at first to ask what it all meant. I did so at last, and the explanation came; it was terrible! My friend with whom I had so lately set out in company had been found murdered and robbed near the spot at which I, but I alone, knew we had separated. I was the last person known to be with him, and I was now arrested on suspicion of his murder.

"A search of the premises was immediately instituted. The watch was found in the drawer in which I had placed it, and was identified as the property of the murdered man. His horse, too, was found in the stable, for the animal I had just put there was none other. I recognised him myself when I saw him in the light.

"What I said, I know not. My confusion was taken as additional evidence of guilt. And when, at length, I did command language to give an intelligible statement, it was received with sneers of incredulity. The mob spirit is inherent in man—at least, in crowds of men. It may not always manifest itself in physical violence. It sometimes contents itself with lynching. But whatever its form, it is always relentless, pitiless, cruel. As the proofs of my guilt, one after another, came to light, low muttering gradually grew into a clamour for vengeance; and but for the firmness of one man—the officer who had me in charge—I should doubtless have paid the penalty of my supposed offence on the spot.

"It was not sympathy for me that actuated my protector. His heart was as hard as his office; but he represented the majesty of the law, and took a sort of grim pride in the position. As much under the glance of his eyes as before the muzzle of his pistol, the cowardly clamourers drew back. Perhaps they were not sufficiently numerous to feel the full effect of that mysterious reflex influence which makes a crowd of men so much worse, and at times so much better, than any one of them—singly.

* * * * *

"At the end of some months my trial came. It could have but one result. Circumstances too plainly declared my guilt. I alone knew they lied. The absence of the jury was very brief. To their verdict I paid but little heed. It was a single hideous word; but I had long anticipated it, and it made no impression.

"It may be hard for the condemned criminal to meet death; it is still harder for him who is innocent. The one, when the first shock is over, acquiesces in his doom, and gives himself to repentance; the heart of the other, filled with rebellion against man's injustice, can scarce bring itself to ask pardon of Heaven. I had gradually overcome this feeling, in spite of the good clergyman's irritating efforts, which were mainly directed towards extracting a confession, without which, he assured me, he had no hope to offer.

"On the morning of the day fixed for my execution, I felt measurably resigned. I had so long stood face to face with death, had so accustomed myself to look upon it as a merely momentary pang, that I looked forward to death as a relief. She for whom I had gone to prepare a home had already found one in Heaven. The tidings of my calamity had broken her heart. She alone of all the world had believed me innocent; and she had died with a prayer on her lips that the truth might yet be brought to light.

"All this I had heard, and it had soothed as with a sweet incense my troubled spirit. Death, however unwelcome the shape, was now a portal beyond which I could see one angel waiting to receive me. I heard the sound of approaching footsteps, and nerved myself to meet the expected summons. The door of my cell opened, and the sheriff and his attendants entered. He held in his hands a paper. It was doubtless my death-warrant. He began to read it. The words 'full and free pardon' were the first to strike my preoccupied senses. They affected the bystanders more than myself. Yet so it was; I was pardoned for an offence I had never committed.

"The real culprit, none other, it is needless to say, than he who sought and abused my hospitality, had been mortally wounded in a recent affray in a distant city, but had lived long enough to make a disclosure, which had been laid before the governor barely in time to save me from a shameful death, and condemn me to a cheerless and burdensome life.

"That is my experience. My judgment, as yours, in the case before us leads to but one conclusion, that of the prisoner's guilt; but not less confident and apparently unerring was the judgment that falsely pronounced my own."

We no longer importuned our fellow-juror, but patiently awaited our discharge on the ground of inability to agree, which came at last. The prisoner was tried and convicted at a subsequent term, and at the last moment confessed his crime on the scaffold.

Wilson Jackson.

Digitized by Google

Football Players Competition!

OPEN TO EVERYBODY. £10 IN PRIZES. OPEN TO EVERYBODY.

Below will be found ten sets of words, each of which indicates the name of some well-known football player.

For example, "A young goose" signifies, of course, Gosling.

Ten names will appear each week for five weeks, making fifty names in all.

Keep all your lists by you until you are told to send them in.

To the person who succeeds in solving the greatest number we will give

A CRISP £5 NOTE.

TO THE NEXT, £2; TO THE NEXT, £2; AND TO THE NEXT, £1;

while consolation prizes will be awarded to the extent of twenty handsome volumes which competitors may select for themselves from the catalogue of books issued by this firm.

If you are weak in the names of football players, your brother, or cousin, or male friend will give you a helping hand.

SHORT STORIES "FOOTBALL PLAYERS" COUPON No. 2.

11. A pretty girl.	11. .....
12. In want of a pig's thigh.	12. .....
13. To consume by fire.	13. .....
14. Jenny Wren's nephew.	14. .....
15. A tribesman of India.	15. .....
16. To ward off.	16. .....
17. A swarm of little fish.	17. .....
18. Named a spring.	18. .....
19. Gritty countries.	19. .....
20. A fish and part of a lamp.	20. .....

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

A LETTER'S EXPERIENCE.

I HAVE existed but a few hours. I was born this morning on the red velvet lid of an ebony writing-desk. A woman wrote me into existence, and as I grew under a fine gold pen, I first perceived the tips of slender white fingers whose regular sway back and forth gave me a delicious sensation. Then I distinguished the face bent above me, a pretty face, pale and sad, with great, grey eyes, under which were black circles, rosy, wet eyelids, but white lips. Her hair fell in disorder over her forehead, curling behind her ears down to her shoulders. My first lines, in a slanting English handwriting, were to this effect:

Had passed a miserable night; impossible to sleep; strange dream, and awoke trembling; pity and mercy asked in the same line. Then the ball of the night before was spoken of; she had been very unhappy and had left full of presentiment, although he was there. "Why was this?"

She leant on the desk, her head on her hand, and fell into a reverie. Her sleeve fell back and I felt the perfume of her warm, soft arm penetrate me. She remained thus for some time, her beautiful, large eyes full of sad thoughts. Suddenly two tears gathered, and I began to understand the sense of the words "Why was this?" The tears trembled on her eyelids, then ran down her cheek. The poor little woman sighed and returned to me.

He had been very neglectful at the ball, and she had caught his eye only once or twice. . . . The pen began to write rapidly, the words were scratched off, sentences followed each other without punctuation, a passionate love filled my pages in a retrospective glance. "The transport of the first days," doubts, timidity, the avowal, first kisses. Then the day when jealousy was awakened, so terrible, yet so charming, terror, agony, if ten minutes late, the promise of eternal fidelity, renewed vows—all this as the eyes rained tears and the pen went on impetuously, tightly held in the thin fingers.

My four pages were full, when someone entered the room. I fell among a pile of letters, faded flowers and debris of all sorts. In one corner lay a white cravat, twisted round a little dried-up bouquet. It was of corded muslin and made me suddenly think of a certain date, of which I speak later.

When I was taken out of hiding the young woman was dressed ready to go out, with a thick veil covering her red-lidded eyes. She added two words, "Come to-night," and I waited impatiently for a name that I expected to see, when I felt two fresh, warm lips pressed so passionately against me that the paper crackled.

Then a flower was slipped between my leaves, and I was shut up in an envelope and addressed, and the—ah, I cannot say for sure what happened. My impressions are vague. I was put in a pocket later, where I found a little handkerchief damp with the tears I had seen wiped away.

We were together until once more I was brought forth, but to fall into a vile box, where I remained all alone. It had an opening on top from which I could see people passing to and fro. I was kept here a long time, and thought I should never get out again, when thump, a heavy mass fell on me, then another, and still another. I was nearly stifled under the load. A hideous blue envelope fell on my side, as if to crush me out of existence. Perhaps it contained some villainous news, some hypocritical lie, some message of evil, and I, yet palpitating from the fine English handwriting on my pages, had to be mixed up with all this.

A key clicked in the lock, crick, crack, and an enormous red hand plunged into the box, and, taking the packet, disappeared and came again. Twice I slipped between his big fingers—I was too delicate for such handling—but I was seized at last and crumpled up in a bundle tied with string. Then I was carried along till we were surrounded by voices, scratching of pens, and I was seized anew by a hand that pressed something dreadful upon me. I received two dire strokes right over the poor little flower between my pages.

When I came to myself again I found myself on a chimney-piece, the room filled with shadows of the dying day. At length, after a long wait, my envelope was torn open and I was glanced over rapidly by two superb but icy-cold blue eyes, so dry and hard that they gave me a shock. Only my first lines were read—he seemed to divine the rest—and then he threw me roughly on the chimney-piece again; the flower fell unheeded to the floor—I saw it no more.

The one who rejected me so unkindly was a very handsome man, tall and well-made, with curly, blonde hair and long, carefully-trimmed moustache. He was elegantly dressed, and his hands were white and delicate.

As I lay in an uncomfortable position close to a chandelier, the man, evidently forgetful of my existence, devoted his attention to tying a white cravat (the mate of the one in the desk), and no doubt at this very moment my dear friend who sent me forth this morning was wondering how I was being received.

Oh, if I could only efface all that she had confided in me! He re-read me, however, after a time, and little by little memory awakened in turn over the history contained therein, but his expression remained hard and cold.

Reproaches, tears, heart-throbs, all were unavailing. I heard him murmur, as he paced up and down the room: "If I go there will be more tears, and what is to be done? It is not my fault that I do not love her any longer. I am decided. I cannot go to-night. I will write and tell her so. I will say—" and he wrote.

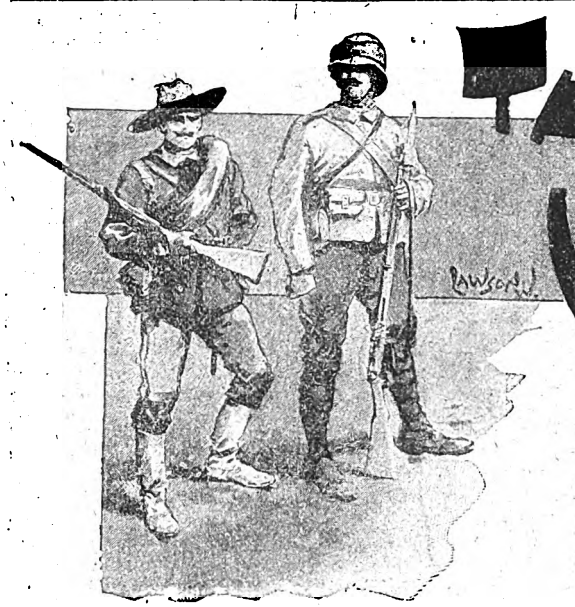
What a difference from this morning, when I saw a sweet woman's face bending over me, feverish with emotion caused by thoughts of him, and this man seated before a table searching his brain for phrases to fit, but the words would not come any more easily than the ideas. He tore up six pages before finishing three lines.

I tell you all this from the bottom of a drawer where I am lying. There are letters and faded flowers and ribbons all round me and I recognise the perfume of my tear-stained pages. Where shall I be to-morrow? What will become of me? This is my thought as I dream of the black eyes full of tears and the cold blue eyes that have ceased to respond.

L. M. N.

Digitized by Google

The Summary will Enable You to Begin this Magnificent Serial To-day.



THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

Time 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

France and Germany declare war against Great Britain.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

An inventor secures an audience with the Prince of Wales and demonstrates to him the utility of a new weapon, with the result that steps are immediately taken to manufacture an enormous number of them.

The Hornet, a torpedo boat, commanded by Rodney, blows up the Suez Canal. Paris is in a state of fermentation owing to the repulse of the Allied fleet.

Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour's fleet gains a decisive victory over the Allies off the Rock of Gibraltar.

A representative of the New York World interviews Lord Salisbury on a matter that is not yet made public.

The British organise two expeditions, one to invade France, and one to invade Germany. The first army corps appears off Havre, and after a short bombardment which lasts till nightfall, the fleet withdraws, the troopships move northwards, and the soldiers are landed at a point opposite Blèville.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Capture of Havre.

To the 8th Chasseurs à Pied, led by General d'Aubigny in person, was given the honour of leading the attack on the British centre.

Their advance through Blèville had been skilfully covered by the 102nd and 72nd Infantry, who had thrown forward a thick cloud of skirmishers. These, however, hung back owing to the very warm reception they were receiving from a body of troops which lined a narrow belt of trees fringing some brushwood at the base of the rising ground capped by ten field batteries.

D'Aubigny saw his chance of not only discomfiting the occupants of this favourable cover but also rendering the position of the artillery untenable by reason of the excellent mark they would offer to his men, firing at ease and in comparative safety at a distance of about 1,000 yards.

Driving his feet home in the stirrups, dropping the reins on his horse's neck, with képi in his left hand and sword aloft, the handsome soldier turned round in the saddle and cheered his men on. The bugles and drums crashed in the pas de charge, the regiment gave a frantic shriek of exultation, and a wild dash was made over the intervening space of 200 yards.

An answering and deeper roar came from the trees, and the French rush had hardly commenced before the 42nd Highlanders sprang out to meet them.

Once before—long years ago at Corunna—had the Black Watch crossed bayonets with Frenchmen whilst both regiments were charging simultaneously. Not for one instant had the result of that fearful crash of arms been in doubt, and if the dim shades from the Peninsula had been able to witness the manner in which their successors hurled back the 8th Chasseurs à Pied they must have cried in ghostly glee: "Ah, the regiment never dies!"

It was hardly fair to the Frenchmen to ask them to meet that charge.

By sheer weight alone they were driven to the earth as a terrier might be repulsed by a mastiff. General d'Aubigny's horse reared and fell on top of him, and Colonel Wauchope jumped his charger over his prostrate foe as he galloped furiously to the front to prevent the pursuit from being pushed too far. It was no part of Lord Roberts' plan to occupy Blèville—yet.

"Hech, mon, but this is a braw day for Galashiels," said an elderly sergeant, as he followed his section back to the cover of the trees.

"They're the 8th Chasseurs" (he pronounced it Chassoors), said a private, turning over the body of a Frenchman with his foot. "D'ye ken the meanin' o't?"

General d'Aubigny's horse reared and fell on top of him.

Digitized by Google

"It's an eediom," replied the sergeant, "but the Scoatch equeevalent is 'rinnin' awa'.'"

D'Aubigny, who was thought to be dead, was only stunned. When he regained his senses some hours later, the tide of battle had rolled over him, and he was able to escape northwards in the dusk.

Under the guidance of Brigadier-General McCalmont.

The action became general by 8.30 a.m., and by nine o'clock Bléville was very strongly held by the enemy. The French front was narrower than the British, owing to the mad haste with which troops had been hurried along the parallel roads coming up from the east of Havre.

General de Rosny, quickly perceiving that he was not getting the due advantage of his superior numbers, threw forward a strong force of cavalry and guns to turn the British left flank.

The guns, thirty-six of them, occupied a slight eminence on the extreme left front of the British line, and opened fire with shrapnel with such beautiful precision that half-an-hour of such work would practically destroy that wing.

Their cavalry at the same time delivered a front charge, which, under ordinary circumstances, would have proved sheer madness against British infantry in line of columns, but which was now a really brilliant piece of strategy, whilst the ranks were being thrown into confusion by the murderous hail of shrapnel.

But some such contingency had been foreseen, and a British cavalry division of 3,000 sabres, led by Sir Baker Russell, in the uniform of the 13th Hussars, rode sharply out at the trot from behind the squares, and went straight for the French horsemen. The 17th Lancers were in front, followed by the Blues, the King's Dragoon Guards, the Queen's Bays, and the 3rd and 4th Hussars, two squadrons of the latter being left with Brigadier-General Massy, to be used at his discretion, for the further protection of the left wing.

With an appalling crash the opposing masses of horsemen met in mad career. The gradient of the ground was slightly against the Englishmen, who, although they stopped and beat back the French, were compelled to fight every yard of the way, the outcome of this inequality in the manœuvring space being one of the most sanguinary cavalry fights on record.

At last the French were fairly compelled to turn tail and bolt, and the guns quickly limbered up, as they knew that the next move of the British mounted contingent would be directed against them.

It was absolutely imperative therefore that they should return, unimpeded, by the way they had come.

Massy knew what the cessation of fire meant. "For Heaven's sake, stop them!" he shouted to Major Ramsay, who commanded the squadrons of Hussars, and no further directions were heeded.

The 4th bounded forward with a yell of delight, and Harington, who was mounted on a magnificent hunter, asked and obtained permission to go with them.

The guns were half a mile away, and the only practicable line of advance for the Hussars was rigidly circumscribed by a deep brook and a seemingly impassable belt of thick bushes.

The road followed by the guns crossed the front at a point easily distinguishable, and Major Ramsay swore a mighty oath as he realised that the French gunners must be able to pass that point before the 4th could reach it, ride they ever so hard.

Harington also saw the difficulty, and in that moment Irene's words, her imperious look, her queen-like gesture, came to him as an inspiration.

All thought of the future left his mind. He was possessed of the one idea that those guns must be stopped, and he alone in that gallant company knew exactly how to do it. Nay, he alone could do it, for his horse would succeed where inferior animals must fail.

For the next five minutes, he said afterwards, he was mad.

Quitting the squadron, he took his horse a flying leap across the stream, landing on the opposite bank at a spot where the tall hedge offered a small opening.

The thorough-bred hunter scrambled up the bank, pushed through the fence, Harington's face and tunic being badly cut by the thorns, and in a second the pair were flying across country to diagonally intersect the French line of retreat.

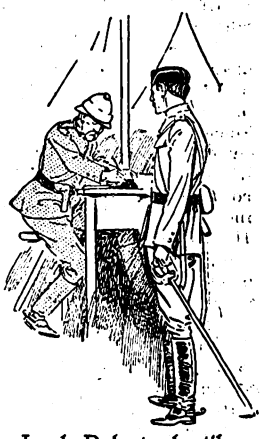
So busy were the gunners in plying whip and spur that they never noticed this solitary horseman, who was approaching the narrow, deeply-dyked lane along which they were thundering towards safety.

Leaping such obstacles as he encountered, Harington gained the roadway abreast of the leading gun. He charged the off-wheel horse with such an impact that the animal, with his fellow wheeler and driver, was driven sideways into the ditch on the far side of the road. The sudden check on the traces brought down the four leaders, the gun overturned, and the next gun smashed into it before the drivers could avert the disaster.

The road was hopelessly blocked, and two minutes later the Hussars were fiercely engaged in capturing thirty-six guns.

Teddy wheeled his horse after the shock of the encounter, leapt back across the dyke, and the terrified hunter forthwith bolted for the British lines at a pace he had never travelled behind a fox.

Lord Roberts had keenly watched the whole incident through his field-glasses. Whilst the Hussars and gunners were settling the question as to the possession of the field pieces he ordered the left wing to swing round and the centre to attack Bléville.



Lord Roberts hastily scribbled a despatch.

The time had come for the crucial movement of the day, and Sir Baker Russell's superb charge, followed by Harington's daring exploit, had opened the way for it.

General Massy was congratulating the Grenadier officer on his escape when a galloper arrived from the Commander-in-Chief, requesting his presence at the earliest opportunity, and Teddy hurried off, his hunter by this time having had some of the steam taken out of him.

When he saluted Lord Roberts, the latter looked keenly at him and said: "Major Harington, I desire to congratulate you. I shall have much pleasure in recommending her Majesty the Queen to decorate you with the Victoria Cross."

Promotion on the field is the rarest and perhaps dearest honour a soldier can receive, and Harington's emotion prevented him from uttering a word in reply.

The Duke of York, who was with the Commander-in-Chief, also spoke to him in terms of warm appreciation, and

Digitized by Google

Teddy was quite grateful to a man who asked him how much he gave for the bay horse he was riding.

By eleven o'clock the position of the French Army was about as bad as that held by Napoleon's troops at Sedan.

Although not surrounded, they were terribly cramped for room. Before the pitiless fire of the Lee-Metfords they were fast losing men, and, what was worse, the morale of the troops was beginning to yield to circumstances.

Their superiority in field-guns was of no avail, as the roads were now hopelessly blocked, and more than half of their artillery was never in action. It could not get to the front.

A "Times" official met his lordship.

Excellent though the Lebel rifle was, it could not make such an impression upon the widely-spread British line as was produced by the continuous emptying of magazines by our troops into the dense masses of Frenchmen.

General de Rosny did not lose his head under these trying conditions.

He realised that he had been far too precipitate in the attack. Impetuosity and élan were of little avail against such a determined yet well-restrained foe, so he decided, too late, to fall back upon the line of forts, and give battle later in the day with fresh troops and with more skilful disposition of his forces.

He was a soldier of iron nerve and marvellous physique. Otherwise, he would never have succeeded in saving the lives of himself and several of his staff by pulling in a small boat over forty weary miles of the English Channel after the collapse of the attempted landing at Worthing.

But he miscalculated the most potent factor in warfare, whether ancient or modern, namely—human nature

His men were weary, hungry, and dispirited. Want of sleep, want of food, and above all, want of success, do not develop the best fighting qualities of the Frenchman. The order for retreat was a harbinger of disaster, and when the keen eye of Lord Roberts discerned the change—with the result that a series of desperate charges were pressed home by the British cavalry and infantry—the retreat became a rout, the French army lost all semblance of order, and the men plunged wildly into the one avenue of escape towards Havre, the ravine.

And during these desperate hours, where was the British artillery, whose motto is "Ubique," whose officers and men consider themselves the salt of the earth?

Only sixty of the two hundred guns available had come into action, and more than one experienced soldier had thought in the depths of his heart that Lord Roberts was not making sufficient use of the guns.

But when the French troops were streaming in tens of thousands into the broad and deep ravine, a hell fire of shrapnel and canister, at point blank range, was poured into them by 140 guns massed in a splendid position on the right flank, where they had up to that moment been comparatively useless.

The other guns limbered up and galloped furiously in the direction of Montivilliers, where, aided by the whole of the British cavalry, they were able to turn the flank of the second line of the retreat, and de Rosny, drawing rein on a hill near Sanvic, at last understood that a French army can advance, but it cannot retreat.

Haggard, gaunt, with exhaustion slowly conquering his physical force, and despair gnawing at his breast, the French Commander-in-Chief turned his bloodshot eyes upon an aide-de-camp who rode madly towards him from Havre.

It was yet little past noon. There was still hope! Reinforcements had arrived from Amiens or Rouen! Perchance an attack was about to be delivered on what was now the rear of the British line! The cruisers from the Mediterranean were about to engage the British fleet! Any of these things could retrieve the fortunes of the day.

"Mon Général," cried the messenger, "nous sommes détruits. The English are in Havre. They have occupied Harfleur, and the railway line beyond that point is blown up. The Forts de l'Heure and de Tourneville have fallen, and they are attacking the Fort de Frileuse. General Bonnemain says it is a question——"

De Rosny stared at the officer during this recital with the horror of absolute mental collapse in his gaze.

"There is no question," he cried. "I will at least make a third attempt to serve France!" and, drawing a revolver from his holster, he blew his brains out before any member of his staff could interfere to prevent him.

. . . . . .

At nine o'clock that morning Lord Roberts had heliographed a message to Lord Charles Beresford that all was well on land and that the enemy were developing the attack on the lines anticipated.

The Admiral immediately gave orders for the return to Havre of the fleet and remaining transports with troops on board, the latter steaming leisurely and accompanied by a number of tugs and flat-bottomed boats.

In an hour's time the full strength of the fleet was again engaged in the bombardment, and a reconnaissance pushed well home showed that the Army Corps at Harfleur, Confreville and Videmare had hurried off in the direction of Bléville. The fort behind Ste. Adresse was silenced and the battery, Bastion de la Floride and Fort de l'Heure were in ruins.

Everything was ripe for the crowning blow.

Several gunboats advanced right into the Avant Port and vigorously engaged the citadel and the coast defence vessels, whilst thousands of troops made a dash for the Boulevard Maritime, the first landing being effected opposite the Hotel Frascati by the 1st Battalion of the 18th Royal Irish.

At the same time the tugs were rapidly towing a fleet of 300 boats, each holding 100 men, up the estuary to a point opposite the Vallée d'Oudalle, where a feeble opposition was speedily silenced by the fire of four cruisers, which had no difficulty in approaching close to the shore as a high spring tide was now available.

"We have occupied Havre!"

The 3rd and 4th Battalions of the King's Royal Rifle Corps were charged with the duty of seizing the approaches to Harfleur and Gainneville. They experienced a temporary check at the canal, but the 60th is seldom at a loss for expedients. Two barges were seized, placed lengthwise across the canal and lashed together, thus providing a capital bridge for the passage of infantry.

Major Vere gained the D.S.O. by leading a detachment of twenty men who swam to the other side and swung the barges under a heavy fire from troops advancing through the valley.

Some sharp fighting took place at this point and in the streets of Havre.

But the British forces considerably outnumbered their opponents at both places, and the spirits of the men had been raised to the highest pitch by the sounds of the inland battle, from which they had been debarred.

Digitized by Google

By noon a junction was effected opposite Harfleur, which was carried at the point of the bayonet, and Major-General Lord Methuen, who was in command, personally led a rapid advance upon the Fort de Frileuse.

Here a slice of luck aided the British troops.

The flight of fugitives through the main gate of the fortress had frightened a team of commissariat horses, and a bad smash-up of waggons jammed the drawbridge.

Before the wreckage could be cleared, the Royal Irish Regiment dashed upon the guard, and in ten minutes all defence was at an end.

Some 8,000 troops, under the guidance of Brigadier-General McCalmont, had been detached from the main Havre contingent and marched through the Place de l'Hotel de Ville, Rue Thérèse and Ingouville, towards the Fort de Tourneville, whose commander promptly capitulated, a feat for which he would have been shot had he fallen into the hands of his enraged fellow-countrymen afterwards.

By nightfall Havre was fully occupied, but there was no rest for the weary troops, who at once proceeded to throw up field fortifications on all the roads which offered easy access for troops coming from the north or centre of France.

The victory had cost us some 8,000 men in killed and wounded, besides the loss of a cruiser and some gunboats, but the official estimate of the French loss was 30,000, and no fewer than 42,000 prisoners were taken.

The most valuable prize that fell into the hands of the British was a park of artillery, 850 field guns, with 400 rounds of ammunition per gun, which were stowed away on the vessels in the Basin de l'Eure, together with a vast quantity of useful stores, in which the British Army was sadly deficient owing to the haste in preparation for the invasion.

* * * * *

Throughout the fight round Blèville a small knot of civilians attached to the Commander-in-Chief's staff took a professional interest in the proceedings quite apart from that felt by the combatants.

The representatives of the English and American Press were almost as anxious concerning "copy" as they were for the result of the engagement.

Chief among these were the war correspondents of the Times and the New York World. The Times' man was more experienced in war alarms than his confrère from the States. He knew almost as well as Lord Roberts the exact moment when the battle had irretrievably gone against the French, and by reading the heliographs from dispatch vessels in the offing he was also acquainted with the progress of events at Havre. Indeed, this was common knowledge to all.

The New York World's correspondent was disgusted when he saw his rival turn his horse's head and gallop off towards the shore, whilst the issue was apparently trembling in the balance, but he had his reward.

Shortly afterwards Lord Roberts hastily scribbled a dispatch, and handed it to a field officer, whom he instructed to proceed at once to Southampton in the Racer, and supplement his brief announcement of the victory by a more-detailed statement written during the passage.

Mr. Chauncey sought and obtained permission to accompany this officer, as did all the other correspondents, and as they raced to the landing place they saw a steam tug laboriously throbbing its way seawards.

"There goes the slow old Times," he shouted gleefully to the others. "I guess we'll throw him a tow rope before three o'clock." It was then 1.15 p.m.

But in his headlong ride for the shore, Mr. Chauncey had not noticed, far out at sea, a small and graceful steam yacht, the Enchantress, belonging to a millionaire colliery proprietor—a vessel whose trials on the Clyde had created a sensation by revealing a speed of over thirty knots an hour.

As the Racer steamed away north, she passed the returning tug, and there was no Times' man on board that slow but useful craft.

The Times had long waited for a war which would seem of sufficient importance in the eyes of its conductors to warrant haste in collecting news—haste which might otherwise be unseemly.

Such a war had now commenced. The occasion was worthy even of the best energies of the greatest newspaper in the world.

CHAPTER XIV.

What "The Times" Did.

The Times correspondent was Lord Dunraven.

When he reached the cabin of the Enchantress, where an expert typewriter was awaiting him, he methodically arranged his notes, secured the current copies of the Army and Navy Lists, and devoted a good half-hour's thought to his subject before he uttered a word.

Then he started, and by the time the yacht had drawn up alongside the landing-stage at Southampton a ten-thousand word report, fully descriptive of the bombardment, the landing of the troops, and the battle itself was ready to be telegraphed to London. A Times official met his lordship as he stepped ashore, and told him that a large staff of telegraphists, with two Wheatstone instruments, were awaiting him at the post office. For this reason the editor had departed from his original intention of securing the delivery of the "copy" by special train.

Raced through the streets.

Lord Dunraven drove rapidly to the post-office, and having handed in his fateful message, demanded from the postmaster the use of the telephone.

"You cannot reach the Times office by that means," was the reply. "The wire only extends to St. Martin's-le-Grand, and we are forbidden to switch on to the National Telephone Company's system.

His lordship was about to burst forth into a bitter objurgation on red tape and its absurd restrictions when the postmaster continued.

"Those are the rules, but I'm jiggered if I don't break 'em. I'll have you through in half a minute, sir. Kindly step inside and sit down in front of the instrument." Then curiosity overcame the claims of duty, and he added: "Perhaps you'll tell us the news, sir, after you have finished."

It was five minutes past six, and the only cause of the excellent postmaster's momentary stiffness about the telephone lay in the fact that had the long telegraphic message been delivered for transmission a minute before the hour he could have charged a shilling for every seventy-five words instead of the cheaper press rate for night work.

The managing editor of the Times in person answered the telephone, and the following curious conversation took place:

"Who's there?"

"Dunraven."

"Oh, I'm Moberley Bell. Had a good passage?'

"First-rate. We've taken Havre!"

"Capital. How much?"

Digitized by Google

"I have spent the night in reading and smoking and thinking."

"I beg your pardon?"

"How much copy have you sent?"

"Five columns. It is now on the wire."

"This is superb. Where are the rest?"

"The rest of what?"

"The other newspaper men."

"About two hours behind me, I reckon."

"Ah, that justs suits my plans. Now dictate me about three hundred words of the events of the past two days."

Lord Dunraven gave Mr. Moberley Bell the desired synopsis, adding, at the conclusion of the recital, "I'm off back again after I've bought some things I'm short of, and the telegraphists assure me the message has gone through all right."

"Very well. There will be a cable laid by the middle of the week. Good-bye, and good luck!"

"Just one final word. I am short of cigars. Send some. The Chief's staff would appreciate a few boxes."

At 7.30 p.m. Lord Dunraven bought a copy of the Southern Echo containing, "by the courtesy of the editor of the Times," a reproduction of his telephonic message, and the following remarkable announcement:

"The proprietors of the Times have purchased the use of our printing machines for the remainder of this evening, and a special edition of the Times will be issued from this office at 8.30 p.m. containing a full descriptive report of the capture of Havre. Similar arrangements have, we understand, been made in every important town in the United Kingdom."

When Mr. Chauncey quitted the Racer at the landing-stage at eight o'clock the first person he met was Lord Dunraven.

"Been here long?" he inquired.

"Two hours," was the laconic reply, and his lordship handed the American the paper he was reading.

Chauncey cast his eye over the double-leaded paragraphs already referred to. He was too good a fellow to bear malice, so he smiled as he said:

"It's a clean scoop. You might wait five minutes and take me back. I guess we taught you a bit whilst you were trying for the Cup!"

* * * *

By special resolution, Parliament sat every day during the war at six p.m.

The House had barely opened when Mr. Balfour entered, and his obvious excitement as he intervened in a debate concerning the remission of income tax on small incomes, sent a thrill through the Chamber.

"We have occupied Havre!" he shouted, and the yell with which his news was received departed from all Parliamentary precedent. Mr. H. W. Lucy devoted a large part of his "Sketch in the House" to comparison of that particular cheer with the usual roulade of applause which obtains in St. Stephen's, and came to the conclusion that the record established on the night of the downfall of the second Gladstone Ministry—when Lord Randolph Churchill gave the time by jumping on to the front Opposition bench—was hopelessly broken.

The Leader of the House exclaimed, as soon as he could obtain a hearing, that the only intelligence received by the Government was that placed at their disposal by the Times. "But," he added, "this is not the first occasion when a great newspaper has outpaced the authorities in the conveyance of news of national importance and rendered signal service to England by its enterprise and resource."

Digitized by Google

For one fierce moment Dr. Tanner longed to leap to his feet and cry "Remember Piggott!"

But he was now the pampered hero of the House of Commons, and his popularity was too new-born to be exposed to the chill blast of an untimely interruption.

At Exeter Hall a May meeting of the Peace Society had assembled in earnest conclave. Speaker after speaker had urged that the present iniquitous war only demonstrated more clearly the imperative necessity for general disarmament and international arbitration, suggested by the Tsar the year before, when the deep roar of a vast crowd in the Strand penetrated to the spacious room where the members of the society were gathered.

Suddenly a young cleric entered with a newspaper in his hand, and gave it to the chairman. Lady Henry Somerset, who was delivering an impassioned address on the horrors of war, paused as the elderly chairman rose from his seat.

"Brethren," he said, "it is given here, on the responsibility of the Times, that the English arms have prevailed, and that the French are in full retreat along the north bank of the Seine."

No member of the Peace Society ever afterwards alluded to the scene that followed, but the room was not required for the evening meeting.

And imperial London herself gathered together in the stupendous majesty of her millions, tossed her head in mad delight at the news. Her people raced through the streets and did absurd things in the delirium of their joy. Distinctions of class and rank disappeared in the face of such glad tidings, and fabulous prices were given for copies of the late edition of the Times, which was turned out at the rate of a million copies an hour, every printing machine in Fleet Street being utilised, as the elements of journalistic competition did not enter into that pæan of national rejoicing.

It was afterwards estimated that four million copies of the Times were sold that night throughout the country at a recognised cost of one penny each.

The great paper next day modestly confined its references to the feat to a bare enumeration of the different journals by whose kindly help it was enabled to supply Great Britain and Ireland with the intelligence so eagerly looked for.

"The cost of the undertaking amounted to about £5,000," said the Times, "and the proceeds of the sale will probably leave a profit of an equal sum. We have determined to devote that amount to head a list of donations which we ask from our readers for the purpose of providing the necessary funds for an organisation which will be named the Army Aid Society.

"This Society will undertake to supply our armies in the field with such medical comforts and other simple but necessary luxuries as cannot in the nature of things be arranged for departmentally.

"It will be administered by two members of Parliament, two experienced commissariat officers, two army chaplains, and two doctors, who, with the managing editor of the Times, will form a committee of nine persons charged with the efficient and discriminating purchase and distribution of the requisite articles."

Thus was inaugurated the famous Society which did so much during the subsequent progress of the war to lighten the suffering of the troops serving abroad and to cheer their rare moments of relaxation.

Money was subscribed in tens of thousands of pounds, and the Army Aid Society kept Tommy well stocked with extra clothing, blankets, costly surgical appliances, wines, preserved fruits and pickles, selected brands of tobacco, books, periodicals, musical instruments, and the like.

Never was fund so successful, and never had a philanthropic proposal received so magnificent a send-off as £5,000 from the originating journal.

It may be here mentioned that months later, when Lord Dunraven was the guest of the evening at a banquet given in his honour by the staff of the Times, Mr. Walter, the principal proprietor, presented him with a handsome volume containing a copy of every newspaper which had published the Times' report on that eventful night.

In sheets of many sizes and different colours, in every variety of type and headline display, they formed a unique and remarkable collection, of which the recipient might well be proud.

* * * * *

The only man in London who was not carried away by the exultation of the moment was Lord Wolseley.

With characteristic caution he waited calmly until Lord Roberts' dispatch had arrived, and he then closely questioned the staff officer who brought it regarding various passages in the longer report the latter had prepared.

Still the Commander-in-Chief's face wore an anxious expression. He passed some time at the United Service Club, and then returned to his room at the Horse Guards.

Realising that he could not sleep, and that departmental work was impossible at so late an hour, he took a small volume of "Plutarch's Lives" out of an inner pocket of his overcoat, and settled himself in an easy-chair with a cigar.

But ever and anon he started to his feet and paced the room with quick, uncertain strides, as the same perplexing problem presented itself to his mind. By sheer force of will he would resume perusal of the book and lose himself in its marvellous pages, until some chance allusion would again conjure up the difficulty which he had resolved to dismiss as impossible of solution until the next day should have passed.

On Sunday morning the Adjutant-General, on his way to the Horse Guards, encountered thousands of Londoners hurrying to church and chapel to return thanks to Providence for the victory vouchsafed to England, and to ask aid and sustenance in the future.

Entering Lord Wolseley's apartments he was surprised and alarmed at the hard appearance of his chief.

"Have you had no rest?" he said, with some degree of perturbation.

"No. I have spent the night in reading and smoking, and thinking—the latter unwillingly."

"Let me send out for some breakfast," said Sir Redvers Buller. "You must not allow yourself to run below par in this fashion."

"I will take some tea, thank you, Buller," replied the Commander-in-Chief, "but I can neither eat nor sleep until I have heard from Evelyn Wood. Roberts has won half the game; the other half is settled by this time, but we cannot know before to-night."

(To be continued.)

ONE MILLION COPIES

OF

THE ROYAL MAGAZINE.

READY OCTOBER 14th.

Digitized by Google

A Coward and a Hero.

IT was the sixteenth of December, before Son-Tay. For two days we had splashed in the mire of the rice fields, the water up to our knees. I knew well we could get used to it, but it was worrying all the same. Nevertheless, we marched steadily on, as regular and attentive as if we were at drill.

I tell you, this is true. I am an old hand; I have been nine years in the service and six with the rank of sergeant, and the number of young soldiers I have trained and commanded "right about face" is incalculable, but never have I seen men march like these, shoulder to shoulder, as exact as if drawn by a line; and that, I tell you, in two feet of mud. Sapristi! but it was superb. I was jubilant, and yet a little vexed, to see how well the scamps could keep step when they chose. Ah! well; I had nothing to complain of that day.

Halt! Well, not a bit too soon, I thought, and yet a droll place to halt in. No matter. I filled my pipe, and looked round to see where we were. Rice fields to the right and the left, and behind us a thick slush made by our trampling feet. A little corporal who has a tongue well hung, indeed, too well hung, called out to me:

"Sergeant Bertrand, Sergeant Bertrand, no need to light your pipe. Wait a while, they will light it for you."

The jackanapes! As if I didn't know we should soon be under the fire of the enemy. Suddenly I heard them calling the roll of my company, and saw my brave fellows break ranks and trot like rabbits across the rice fields to meet the baggage-master, who was returning with a great package under his arm.

Letters! Now, I ask you, was this a good time to distribute letters? There they were, running like so many madmen. I was the only one to remain tranquil. It is true, I have no one to write to me, no family—no friends, nobody—all alone in the world, like an old bear. Heaven help me! At last I see my men return to their places, holding up their hands to keep their letters from being soiled by the water, as carefully as if they were guarding the last words and testimony of their dying mothers. Ah! Jacque has a letter.

"News from home, Jacque?"

Jacque is a sergeant in my company. I am chief of the first section, he of the second. A handsome young fellow with a bright boyish face, a beardless chin, and cheeks as smooth as a girl's. Nevertheless, I have a little grudge against him. It is always vexing to see these brats of twenty-two promoted alongside of an old trooper like me, but for all that he is a nice boy, and the men would go through fire and water for him. He is well connected, of good family, and often receives letters with the seal of the war department, but that is his business, not mine.

I watched him out of the corner of my eye as he ran through his letter. Then I saw him wipe away a tear, a little tear, which glistened on the end of his eyelash. I pretended not to see it, even joked a little, to make him laugh.

"What has she written to you, Jacque? What says my fair lady?"

He turned to me without a smile, and gravely said:

"I have no lady fair, Bertrand. It is from my mother."

"Ah!" I felt as if I had made a fool of myself, and said no more, but Jacque continued:

"Do you see these letters, Bertrand? It would be better not to receive them in times like these."

That was my opinion, as I have already said. It was not good to allow them to break ranks, the scamps; they ask nothing better. But out of politeness to Jacque, I said:

"It is always pleasant to receive good news from home, no matter where one happens to be. I hope you have heard nothing disagreeable."

Jacque shook his head.

"Oh, no; on the contrary."

That was all. Really Master Jacque was not talkative this morning. His eyes were fixed on the horizon far away, where there was nothing to be seen but a bit of blue sky. I wondered what he could see over there.

"Forward, march!" I repeated, at last. "Forward, march!" for my section.

Jacque, no doubt, was still dreaming, and did not hear the command, for I heard the lieutenant behind me say:

"Ah, well, Sergeant Jacque, lagging behind—already?"

I hoped to hear a reply of some kind, no matter what. When an officer so far forgets himself as to speak in that way to a subordinate, I like to see a little indignation. Parbleu! you dare not speak out loud; that is against the rules, but a muttered word under your breath is a solace to your self-respect.

But Jacque said not a word, he simply repeated "Forward, march!" in a dragging tone, as if he were weary. That is to say, it was not the tone a French sergeant uses when he commands "Forward, march!" They never mumble those two words, but shout them out with enthusiasm. What was the matter with Sergeant Jacque this morning? He was not like himself.

Ah, that was a rough day, I tell you. When night came, we were still in the water, but up to our waists this time. And all round us little field-pieces were spitting fire, like so many demons. But we marched steadily on, until we were within 500 yards of the citadel. Not a gun-shot, not a movement; the rascals were saving their powder until we were nearer. I said to myself:

Digitized by Google

"Wait, old fellow, you will have something to warm you up by and by; don't be discouraged."

When, behold, we were again commanded to halt. The captain stepped in front of the ranks, and asked in a low voice—all the same it was distinctly understood:

"A non-commissioned officer willing to undertake a secret and dangerous mission."

Naturally I stepped forward. Now, I have the misfortune to be a little too well appreciated by my captain, an old toughskin like myself, who had been my lieutenant in Africa.

"Not you, Bertrand. I know you well, and when I want you I will find you. Just be kind enough to remain quiet."

You see, some officers will not grant you the least favour. Then I said to myself:

"This is just the thing for Jacque."

The captain seemed to be of the same opinion, for he stopped exactly in front of him and repeated under his nose:

"A non-commissioned officer willing to undertake a dangerous mission."

It was plainly to be seen he was making advances to Jacque, and you will think I am joking when I tell you my fine fellow lowered his eyes under the gaze of the captain and said not a word. You may be sure the captain was angry, for it is not pleasant to make advances to any one and have them thrown back in your teeth. I heard him sneer under his moustache:

"Well, he means to take good care of his skin."

Ah, it was rough. Jacque turned as red as a beet, but said not a word; only when the captain had passed he raised his eyes and fixed them on that bit of blue sky far away on the horizon, where I could see nothing, nothing at all. Then I said to myself:

"Well, my fine fellow, you are decidedly a coward."

To be brief, Berthelot of the third division was chosen for this expedition; he returned without even a scratch, the jackanapes, when my poor Jacque——

Well, we set off again: there was no lagging behind this time. About two hundred and fifty yards from the walls the scoundrels gave us a broadcast in the face. Sapristi! how it rained. The balls fell to the right, to the left, in the rice fields, making a "flic floc" as they struck the water. We answered them; but it was like firing in the air, the rascals were so well protected by their walls. This fusillade lasted only about ten minutes, but I shall remember it a long time.

However, it could not continue in this way. The bugle sounded the charge. Sapristi! That music always sends a shiver of gaiety through me. Behold us running with fixed bayonets, like madmen! But, as I had already noticed, the gateway of the citadel opened upon a high embankment, scarcely three yards wide; to enter that we must climb the narrow ascent and push in, two by two, under a terrible fire, and that, too, through a palisade of bamboo, which the rascals had constructed to bar the way, already narrow enough. Ah, it was sufficiently difficult without that bamboo, and goodness only knows what it cost us. I saw my two lieutenants fall, the adjutant of the battalion, and many others. Impossible to pass that confounded bamboo. My captain raged like a demon. At last he commanded:

"A section up there!"

This time it was serious—very serious. No time to hesitate; all who climbed there would go to certain death. I think the captain must have retained some spite against Jacque, for he turned to him and said:

"Go up there, sir, and tear away that bamboo."

It is but justice to say he did not wait to be told a second time. Touching his cap, with "All right, captain," he started in a quick run. In passing me he drew a package of letters from his pocket.

"Take care of this for me, Bertrand," and in the twinkling of an eye he was up with his section.

Brave boy! It was beautiful to see him, so cool, so calm; not a loud word, not an oath, only quick, determined orders. "Tear away this," "throw that in the ditch." He was as tranquil as if superintending a squad of soldiers on fatigue duty. And all the time the enemy were pouring upon them a deadly fire, the balls whistling, tearing the bamboo, ploughing up the ground, every now and then crushing in a shoulder, carrying away an arm, or breaking a leg. What a sight it was! They were all left there, all my comrades — Jacque among the number, but he was the last. Just as the work was finished a ball struck him between the eyes. Just as he raised his arms to shout a great "Hurrah!" he fell dead, face foremost.

Perhaps it was not very proper, what I did next morning, but really it was too much for me—that packet of letters that Jacque gave me as he went to his death. I would not keep them, I thought, "a boy who acts like a coward, and a few hours after dies like a man. It is unnatural, there must be something under this;" and I felt I had the explanation there under my hand in those letters. They burned me. It was impossible to keep them. Ma foi! I could not; then—then I drew out the packet.

Upon my word there was only one letter, the one he had received that morning. Nothing else. And what a letter it was! He was right, poor boy. One ought not to receive a letter like that just before a battle. As for me, I cried like a baby, and was scarcely able to read it for the tears in my eyes. It was from his mother, and here is what the good woman wrote to her boy as she ended her letter:

"Now, my precious Jacque, take care of yourself for my sake. Remember, you are all I have in this world, and if anything should happen to you, I should surely go mad. It is true the time passes very wearily when one is waiting, but I try to be patient, to forget the present, and only think of the future when you will return. Above all things, my precious boy, be prudent. Do whatever you are commanded to do like a brave soldier, but do not expose yourself unnecessarily. I forbid you. No, no, my darling Jacque, I forbid you nothing. I implore you, before entering into any engagement, to think of your mother, who is always thinking of you, and do not risk too much. Promise me this. will you not? And remember, a man is not a coward because he loves his mother."

The letter fell from my hands. I understood all now. He had thought of his mother, the brave boy, and waited until he was directly commanded to go. And, no doubt, that morning, when he was looking far away to that bit of blue sky where there was nothing to be seen, he was thinking of his mother and of that promise he had sworn to keep.

And that is why Sergeant Jacque, who died like a hero with his face to the enemy, was considered a coward earlier in the day.

HARRY DUNSTAN.

Digitized by Google

CAUGHT IN MY OWN TRAP.

DORA and I had been silent fully fifteen minutes—an unusual occurrence for us—when she suddenly broke out into one of her gayest, sweetest peals of laughter. The train was going at the rate of forty miles an hour, but Dora's laugh rang out above all the noise and confusion.

"What is it, Dora, you witch, you?" I said, half piqued that she had not first told me what pleased her, and laughed afterwards.

"Nothing, Nell, only I was just thinking of something funny," she said, in a hoarse whisper. "Do you see that gentleman in the opposite corner, with the beautiful black moustache and dreamy brown eyes? Well, he's been watching you behind that book for the last half hour, looking as if he would love to take a bite of the red roses on your cheeks. Don't blush, but he is in love with you. I know it. I was just thinking of some of the stories I have read about young ladies mistaking handsome young fellows for their brothers, and thought what fun it would be if you could only manage to mistake that gentleman for your brother Fred."

I was ready for fun in a moment.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," I broke out eagerly. "You know I haven't seen Fred since I went to Cambridge, three years ago, and of course he's changed a great deal since then. Well, if that literary gentleman with brown eyes (he is handsome, isn't he, Dora?) should get out at our station, I'll wait till he gets mixed up in the crowd, see him suddenly for the first time, rush up to him in a flutter of delight, call him Brother Fred, and give him such a kissing as he hasn't had since he saw his sweetheart last."

"Yes, I would, if I were you," said Dora sarcastically. "You daren't, you know."

"Don't I dare, though? Wait and see."

And so I dropped back into the cushion in silence till the train stopped at our station.

Dora gave me a wicked look, and whispered that she knew my courage would fail me, for the gentleman was really getting out.

I was not to be triumphed over, though; and so, as we stepped on to the platform I saw the literary gentleman standing amidst the crowd, and with a little bound threw myself in his arms, and kissing him full on the mouth, hysterically exclaimed:

"Fred, you dear brother, how do you do?"

I caught a glimpse of Dora—she was in danger of going into convulsions. I was expecting to hear the stranger say, confusedly, that there was some mistake, but, to my surprise, he gave me a hearty embrace—kissed me two or three times—said he was well—that I had grown a great deal, and inquired for my little friend Dora—who, all this time, was exciting the sympathies of the crowd, as they supposed she was insane, judging from her frantic laughter.

"Father and mother are expecting you, Nellie, and are so impatient they can hardly wait to see you. I was afraid you would not know me, but I am really glad that my image has been treasured up so carefully in my sister's heart."

I was bewildered beyond measure. It really was Fred, then, and I had not known him! I felt slightly ridiculous, and while introducing Dora to my brother, whispered her to keep quiet in reference to my intended trick.

I was too much confused to think of inquiring how he came to be in the compartment without seeing me; so we all went to the carriage which was waiting for us, and drove rapidly to our home.

I had never known Fred to be so affectionate. He held my hands in his own all the time, and kissed me at unnecessary intervals; but to tell the truth, I had never loved him half so well before—never thought him half so handsome.

We reached the gate. Mother kissed me and cried over me; father repeated it; and finally a frank, hearty voice broke out with:

"Hallo, sis! aren't you going to notice your scapegrace of a brother at all?"

And to my astonishment a handsome fellow I had not yet seen gave me a genuine hug, and a kiss that you could have heard across the garden.

"There is some mistake," I murmured; "are you my brother Fred? I thought that gentleman was," pointing at the handsome gentleman I had embraced at the station.

"Why, sis, are you crazy? Of course I'm your brother, and that fellow there is my college chum, Archie Winters, who went half way up to London to meet you. What are you blushing at, Nell? I didn't have time to go, and let him take your photo with him, so that he would be sure and know you. He's been playing off some of his mad pranks, and passing himself off for me, I'll warrant."

I looked at Archie Winters beseechingly, and as they were all going into the house, I whispered to him:

"For pity's sake, do not speak of that mistake. How could it have happened?"

"I overheard you talking in the carriage, and will keep your secret only on one condition."

He whispered something to me that made my face flush scarlet; but I was at his mercy, and said I would think of it, reader; and to the delight of the whole family—Dora and Fred in particular—Archie and I were married in less than six months. And Dora said to me, as I bade her good-bye, that it would give unspeakable delight to Fred and herself, if I would attend their wedding in two months, and I did so.

GERTRUDE TRAVERS.

Digitized by Google

THIS is the story of Jean Bisson and Margaret Icart, the bravest man and the fairest woman in Grève de Lecq, which is the prettiest sea-nook on the north coast of Jersey—as it was told by honest Jean himself one summer's night at sea nearly twenty years ago to a wandering stranger who was whiling away a few weeks of rest and leisure in the little fishing village, and had a fancy for moonlight cruises over the changeful waters that lie between the Islands and the mainland of France.

"Marget and I grew up together from childhood in Grève de Lecq yonder, and many is the time I have carried her out on my back into the surf to meet her father's boat as it came in from the fishing before he went away to Newfoundland, and we never heard any more about him; and many is the time, too, that I have mourned that things could not have remained as they were then, when there was no care in all the world, and Marget and I loved each other with the child-love that is the best of all loves on earth.

"But, alas! we grew up as everyone must, and in time the friends and neighbours got to look upon us as made for each other, and talked about our marriage as something that would come round as surely as the next fishing would happen in due course. Marget and I, too, had understood each other about this ever since we had built sandhouses on the beach together, and played at housekeeping with shells and bits of drift-wood for furniture.

"When my elder brother Robert married, we were doing very well as partners in the fishing, and my share was quite enough to warrant me in going to Marget's mother and asking her to let my sweetheart come to me for good and all. She welcomed me as my own mother would have done, and so the matter was arranged, and Marget and I were as happy as any pair in the six islands.

"There seems to me to be some fate which prevents men and women being as happy as they think they ought to be; and that fate stepped in and kept Marget and me apart just when we thought we were coming together for the rest of our lives.

"A week before the day fixed for our wedding, I climbed the bluff that rises to the left of the harbour to have a look round with my glass, and saw a big three-masted schooner about twelve miles away to the north-west, seemingly waterlogged, and flying signals of distress. I ran down to the cottage and told my brother. Ours was the handiest boat for launching, so we found two other men who were willing to risk the run out, and after a bit of hard work, we had the boat safely outside the harbour and headed for the schooner.

"There was a very big sea running, and by the time we had made an offing of five or six miles it blew so hard that it was all we could do to keep the boat on her course. The vessel we were trying to make was drifting down the Channel before an easterly gale and steering very wild, as water-logged ships always do. She was evidently making water fast, for the nearer we got to her the lower she seemed to lie, and the heavier she seemed to pitch in the sea-way. When we were a couple of miles or so from her, working as well as we could to windward, so as to run down sharp when we got abreast of her, she was making such bad weather of it that we began to doubt if she would hold out till we reached her.

"It was like a race between the water and us which should have the lives of those on board, and at last Robert said:

"'Boys, if we don't get on a bit faster the schooner will be gone before we make her. D'ye think the boat'll stand another reef?'

"She was already staggering a good deal under the close-reefed lug, but we saw that Robert meant trying a bit more, and if he was ready to run the risk we were not going to hang back, and so we just nodded, for the wind was screaming so across the water that talking was not easy, and shook the reef out as quickly as we could with our numbed fingers. Then we hoisted the sail again, and sat close under the weather gunwale to keep her in trim.

"All this time the gale was blowing harder and edging more round to the south-east, and at last Robert gave the signal to me to ease off the sheet and run down to the schooner. When the boat's head fell off the wind, Robert half stood up in the stern sheets to mark her position, and as we rose to the top of a wave we all looked ahead and saw—nothing. The water and the leak had beaten us in the race, and our errand had been in vain. There was nothing to do but to go back. We took one last look over the water through the spray that drove nearly level across it, and then we dowsed the sail and got on the other tack to make for home.

Digitized by Google

"When we brought her head up to the wind we found that we could not get her to lie within three points of the island. The gale had kept veering southward, and we found ourselves half-an-hour later a good twelve miles off the shore and dead to leeward of the land. There was nothing for it but to try and beat up, and so all that afternoon and night we toiled against the ever-increasing gale, now gaining a mile and now being beaten back as far again, until we had lost all idea of where we were in the wilderness of blinding spray and black darkness.

"It was about two hours before daylight that we began to suspect that the boat was making more water than came over her side, and soon we could hear it spurting under our legs as we sat on the thwarts. We felt for the leak, and what we found told us that unless a miracle saved us, we were on our last trip on blue water. The pitching and straining of the boat had opened one of her seams almost from stem to stern, and every time she plunged, the water spurted in through the rent in her side in gallons. When we discovered it the rent was on the weather side, and consequently the open seam was mostly out of the waves, but if we had put her on the other tack she would have filled in an instant.

"This made things about as hopeless for us as they could be, for we couldn't go on the other tack without sinking, and yet if we kept on as we were going we knew enough of our position to be pretty certain that we should run under the full force of the gale on to the Paternosters, that great reef of rocks which lies off Cape Grosnez, and be dashed to pieces or drowned as the fates might decide.

"Therefore we had to decide between certain drowning and the chance of weathering the Paternosters, and so making some point on the island. Of course, we took the open chance, and kept the poor old leaky boat as close to the wind as we could.

"For over two hours more we drove on, breasting the great white-topped waves which broke over us in a hail-storm of spray as we rushed through them, and keeping the boat as clear of water as we could with the dipper and our hats, until the morning at last broke grey and dim over the misty sea, and showed us the long line of black cliffs that marked the coast of Jersey, looming to the southward under the low driving clouds, and right ahead the white broken water that was foaming round the sunken reefs of the Paternosters.

"Tack we dare not for fear of sinking before we reached the rocks, and to keep on meant only another kind of death.

"My brother, sitting at the tiller, took in our desperate situation at a glance the moment it was light enough to see clearly. He looked at the line of rocks to windward, then at the breakers ahead, and then at the rent in the side of the boat, and said:

"'There's only one chance for us now, lads. We must stop that leak somehow and tack, or none of us will see home and friends again. Take off your stockings and jam them into the seam and hold them there while I put her about; it's our only chance, and please God we'll keep the water out enough to float her until we make the harbour.'

"The next minute our sea-boots were off, and the next we were caulking the leak with our long woollen stockings, driving them in with thole-pins as best we could. Then at the word from Robert as he brought the boat's head to the wind we downed the sail, shifted it over, hoisted it on the other tack, and stood away for the island.

"We cleared the rocks, and our two mates kept the stockings jammed into the leak while I took the dipper and bailed the water out for dear life—and Marget.

"We headed well up for the harbour, and it was just a matter of whether we could keep afloat long enough to make the land or not. When all was done that could be done, Robert stretched out his cold wet hand to me and I grasped it, and he drew me to him and said in my ear—

"'Jean, it will be a miracle if either of us gets back alive. If I am taken and you left, promise me that you will care for Lorette and the little one, and the other little one that is coming, as though they were yours. They will have no one to look to but you, so promise me, Jean, in the name of the mother that bore us both.'

"In such a moment even Marget was forgotten, and I answered—

"'If it shall be so I will be a brother to Lorette and a father to the little ones as long as God shall give me strength to be so.'

"My brother made no reply, but he smiled and gripped my hand again, and so the promise was made good for ever.

"Half an hour later we were within a hundred yards of the mouth of the harbour, and we could see the neighbours running down to the end of the jetty to give us what help they could, though that would not be much if we failed to make the harbour mouth.

"We drove on heavily, for the boat was now nearly half-full of water, and just as we came within earshot of the shouts of encouragement and welcome home we sank in the trough of the sea and lost the wind for an instant. The sail flapped once and the boat's head fell off till she lay broadside-on to the end of the pier. The next moment a huge wave rose up behind us, and swept us like a straw upon its crest towards the granite wall that was now but a few yards off. I remember nothing more save the hiss of the seething wave as it hurled us forward, the cry of the people on the jetty, and a crash of splintering wood that was drowned by the roaring of water in my ears, and I sank amidst the ruins of the shattered boat.

"It was twenty days before my eyes opened on the world again, and when they did so I was lying in the best bedroom in Robert's house, and on one side of my bed stood Lorette and on the other Marget. My first question was for my brother and my boatmates, and as I asked it in a strange weak voice that startled me with its unfamiliar sound, I saw Lorette put her hands to her eyes and leave the room with bowed-down head.

"Then Marget, in answer to the mute inquiry of my eyes, sat on the side of the bed, and took my wasted hand in hers, and told me how the boat was dashed to pieces against the end of the pier, and how Robert and the two others were stunned by the shock and sank instantly, only to be picked up two days later bruised and dead on the rocks of St. Brelade's, while I, by a miracle, was carried past the pier-head and into the harbour, which was full of great breakers rolling over each other through the narrow mouth and heaping up in white mountains of foam inside.

"I heard her voice tremble as she told me how my senseless body was flung four times on the beach and four times dragged back again by the hungry under-tow, but I did not learn from her how I was saved at last. It was Lorette who told me the next day how Marget, when my body came back for the fifth time, knotted a light line round her waist, and, shaming the men in the strength and daring of her love, flung herself into the surf and clasped her strong arms about me, holding me in an embrace that the cruel sea itself could not tear loose, and so was dragged ashore with me back from death into life again.

Digitized by Google

"Later on, as I lay in the sun on the bluff above the harbour, slowly getting strong again, I thought of all this, and marvelled at the strength of the love that could nerve a woman to such a deed as that, and then, like a dark wall between this love and the life that it should have blessed, rose the memory of the vow that I had pledged to my dead brother out yonder on the dark stormy sea the last time that our hands had met this side of the grave. How could I keep that oath as it was written in the Book of God and marry Marget? No half-keeping would do, for if the sea had not spared me to keep it fully and with a whole heart, why did I, of all the four that went out that fatal day, come back alive?

"When I was strong enough to get to work again I was strong enough also to keep my vow, and so one day I took Marget up the glen for one of our walks, and told her of the promise that lay between us, dividing her life from mine through the long years that I had sworn to succour and cherish those whom my brother had commended helpless to my hands.

"I did not insult her with the mockery of releasing her from her promise to me. I knew that our love was given and taken for good and all, and only He who had put it into our hearts could take it out again. Like the brave, true girl that she was, Marget saw the path of duty lying before me as plainly as I did, and told me with her hands on my shoulders and her sweet eyes brimming over with tears, as she spoke the death-sentence of her life's happiness and all the hopes and longings that had grown up with her growth, that only one thing could kill the love that she had for me, and that would be the baseness of breaking such a promise as mine.

And when she had told me this she put up her face to mine and said:

"'Kiss me now, Jean, for the last time, and tell me that you will be faithful to Lorette and her little ones, for in the sight of Heaven your life belongs to them henceforth.'

"Then I stooped down, and with my heart almost breaking for sorrow, sealed on her lips the oath that I had taken in the presence of death, and which she had bidden me keep at the cost of all that made life sweet to her.

"So we parted as lovers, henceforth to meet only as friends with our love buried deep in our hearts—never, so far as we could see, to bear the fruit of which it should have been the seed.

"Thus it came about that I took up my abode with Lorette and her little son and new-born daughter, to devote to them the life that I had given. Lorette, like the kind, brave soul that she was, made many entreaties that I should leave her and go to Marget; but when Marget told her at last that if I did so she would turn her back on me for ever, she saw that my course was fixed and said no more.

"From then the slow years dragged on, and we each went our way apart with unclasped hands—we who had all our lives longed for the time when we should clasp them so fast that only death should loose them again. Of course, at first the neighbours wondered; but when they knew, they were silent and respected our unseen sorrow, and no stranger in Grève de Lecq would have suspected that a tragedy was being played out beneath the calm surface of our simple lives.

"But at last, after nearly five years, the wound was torn open again, and all the work of patience and endurance undone in a few hours of mad regret. It happened in this wise.

"Marget and her mother were very poor, for all they had to live on was what they could earn between them at net-making, and when the mother lost the use of her hands through rheumatism, Margaret could barely make enough to find them in food. We fisher-folk were all very poor in those times, and only won a hard living from the sea at the best; so though we helped each other as we could, the help did not amount to very much. Now, there was living at St. John's, a mile or so inland from Grève de Lecq, a young farmer so well-to-do that, compared with us, he was rich, and he had loved Marget for years, but had never spoken his heart to her, for he and I were friends, and he respected my older right. But now as the years slipped by and she and I still went our ways apart, he began to hope again, and at last came to me like an honest man as he was, to have the truth from me.

"No words can say what it cost me to tell him that Marget and I had long since given up all idea of marriage, and to bid him God-speed in his suit with her. Yet God gave me strength to do it, and, more than that, to plead with Marget herself for him, and ask her, for the sake of her poor old mother and for the sake of her own young life that she was wasting, to say 'Yes' to Maurice Guerin's question if she could.

"She listened, and, after much sorrowful heart-proving, she said 'Yes' to him and 'Farewell' to me.

"Then the tightened chain of my endurance broke, and when she left me to go to him, I cast myself to the earth and prayed that the hand of the dead might be taken off my heart, or else that it might close upon it and chill it to death in its grip.

"Even as I spoke it in my bitter despair, my unrighteous prayer was answered, for, as I returned to the cottage, Robert's little girl ran out towards me, screaming out that her mother had fallen down dead. I rushed into the room and found Lorette lying on the floor, with her hand clasped to her heart, and just breathing. When I raised her head and asked what had happened, she summoned strength enough to whisper, 'It's my heart. I have had pains there often. Something seems to have broken. You and Marget will take the children, won't you?'

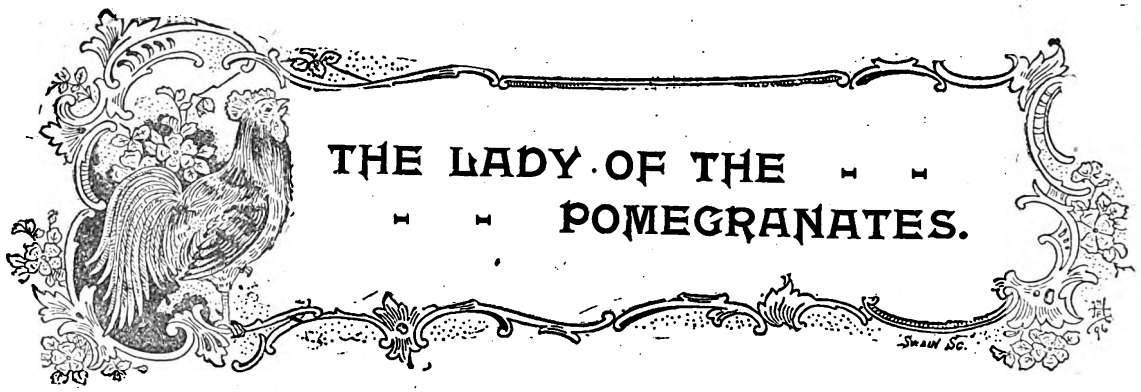
"Then her head fell on my shoulder, and Robert was no more alone in heaven. As soon as she was buried I went to Maurice Guerin, and told him the story of my promise and its fulfilment, and asked him to stand aside for me as I had stood aside for him.

"Poor fellow, he was to have been married in a month from then, but when he knew all he took me by the hand and said:

"'If that is so, who am I that I should compare with you in her eyes? You have served for her better than Jacob did for Rachel. Take her, and may the good God bless you both as you have deserved of him.'

"And so as Lorette's grave closed over her the shadows parted, and the light that had been quenched in the sea sprang up again and will shine until the shadows close once more, and the cup of Marget's life or mine shall be full."

Digitized by Google



THE LADY OF THE POMEGRANATES.

I WAS preparing for my final examination at college, when I received an extraordinary visitation which affected my whole life and gained for me my wife, whom I love most devotedly.

Early in life it was noticed that my mind had a remarkable philosophical and scientific tendency, and I was educated with a view to a life of study. I was particularly attracted by all psychical phenomena, and even in my schooldays I became convinced that there was an element governing our lives of which we know not the first principle. I believed that there were real manifestations of an unknown power in the universe, one that was as truly and simply ruled by fixed laws as are the phenomena of physics and chemistry.

By the time I first went to college I had already attained a distinction as an experimental scientist, and of course I continued my efforts in the same direction. I may say, without appearing conceited, that I gained honours which far exceeded those of former collegians, and soon became the pet lion of the faculty.

Often as I compared our present attainment with what was known in the time of Roger Bacon, I became more and more impressed with the fact that his theories had also been looked upon as far beyond the possibility of human existence, and he was believed to be a disciple of the evil one. My own theories gained no better reception from the world. And yet Roger Bacon had opened the way to the mysteries of nature, which were now as simple and plain as the transition from daylight to darkness. I fancied myself as standing in about the same relation to our era, and believed my theories would lead to revelations even greater than those of this pioneer investigator.

I had experienced a theory that the soul was a natural composition capable of being experimented with as truly as the atmosphere or water. I also believed that communication between persons separated by the greatest distance would in some simple way be attained and regulated as readily as our voices are now carried by the telephone.

I had read all that had been written by the scientists of France and Germany, and I felt that the time was not far distant when their gropings would be rewarded by discoveries in the realm of psychical phenomena and open an entirely new era in scientific research. I was a militant member of many psychical societies, and examined the realm of ghost lore, with a mind freed from the superstitious fear that has ever been an obstacle to seekers for truth.

I was left an orphan in the hands of an honest and capable board of trustees, who managed my immense fortune. I had no near relatives and no taste for society. I was entirely free, and resolved to devote my life to the investigation of the so-called "occult" phenomena, which I was confident I would show to the world were as clearly regulated by laws as the principles of hydraulics or pneumatics.

At all events, I had resolved that my final thesis should be a discussion of strange future possibilities that would certainly command attention, and announce my intended line of research.

I was at work upon this paper one afternoon in my study, when I had an extraordinary experience. I had written for a long time when I seated myself comfortably to think my way to a clearer expression. In a few seconds I saw the door slowly open, and a woman of great beauty stood before me, with a shining branch of pomegranate in her hand.

She advanced and placed it on the desk, and I quickly arose from the chair, amazed and startled. She turned, looking at me with appealing eyes, and departed.

I saw the door close as she went, and followed in great haste down the corridor, but could see no one.

Then I returned and found the branch. I examined it closely and saw at once it was a product that could not grow in this latitude. It was certainly a real substance, for I could handle it and feel it. The fresh green foliage and reddish-yellow fruit were real entities. I cut a piece of the fruit and saw the brilliant scarlet of the seed and pulp.

Then my mind reverted to the bearer and I remembered every detail of her appearance. I was powerfully moved by the fact that she was beautiful; and it seemed strange, for I had paid but little attention to the beauty or plainness of women. Why, I wondered, should I be so impressed by the exquisite grace and sweetness of my strange visitor?

Nothing about her had escaped me, yet her coming and going could not have occupied more than a moment of time. She was fair, and her head bore a luxurious growth of golden hair; her hands were finely shaped, and her form slender and perfect in contour. Her carriage expressed a subtle grace as natural as it was rare.

Her dress I recalled with equal minuteness. It was, certainly not adapted to an April morning in England. It was more suited to the hottest of summer days. I also noticed that while her complexion had been so fair, she had lustrous eyes of deepest black. I pondered on this fact as showing that she was of foreign origin.

During the days following this event I did not seem myself. Indeed, I began to fear that I should never again go about my studies as contented as I had been. I constantly found myself dreaming of this daylight apparition—for apparition I became convinced it was I made an effort to do my work, but my mind could not be stayed from wandering, and I had difficulty in commanding the concentration to do the work at hand, while nothing of original research was accomplished.

Digitized by Google

I made inquiries of many persons, but no one had been seen to answer my description, the nature of which always aroused curiosity. Useless as I felt it to be I investigated every clue that might prove I had received a genuine guest.

But the Lady of the Pomegranates had not been seen.

One night, a month after this experience, I spent a long evening in the room of one of the professors, with whom I was on good terms. I told him my story, and when I had finished I showed him the branch of pomegranate of which I had taken the greatest care. He examined it so closely that I knew at once he was really interested. He said it could not have been produced except in the warmer latitudes, and asked if he might show a bit of it to a botanist. I reluctantly consented.

As kindly and gently as possible, he told me that he believed I was influenced by the mood brought on by the writing I had been doing. I was under considerable stress, he explained, and he could easily understand that my fatigue and nervousness had been the cause of this phantom of my mind. But by the branch of pomegranate he admitted he was mystified. He had no theory for this. Probably some perfectly natural and explainable means had brought it to my room. Quite likely it had been intended as a joke by some of the students.

I, of course, did not accept his opinion that my visitor was a passing phantasy of my mind. I daily became more strongly entrenched in the conviction that I was on the eve of events which would affect my life. But I found myself obliged to adopt the "rest cure" upon which he insisted, or he would have taken strong measures. In a few days I was informed that the botanist had discovered the branch to belong to a rare species of pomegranate, which grew only in warm latitudes, and generally along the north-eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea.

A month's stay in a quiet village soothed and rested my shaken nerves, but more truly was I grounded in the faith that the woman I had seen I should see again. My mind was fully made up as to my movements when I had finished my university career.

I was bound to realise that my whole life was wrapped up in this woman, and that I was deeply in love with one of whom I knew nothing. To find her was to be the fulfilment of my whole existence. Out into the world I determined to go and search until I had found her, even if it required a lifetime. My dear old friend, the professor, was pained by the calm and determined manner in which I spoke. He told me flatly that I had become a monomaniac, as insane on this subject as others are on all things. But, except in this, he regarded me as sound, and would not interfere to restrain me.

My real purpose was to be able to meet the woman I loved in a style suited to her rank.

At the earliest moment I set out for Rome, where I intended to stay first. I set up a household that astonished the good people, and I replaced my valet by an Italian, one who had served an old count of one of the oldest houses in Italy. The old man's estate had depreciated so that he was obliged to relinquish his household and live in retirement on a small pittance. It will appear later that the change was a most fortunate event.

My method of procedure proved even better than I had expected. I found that palaces and villas, castles and châteaux, opened their doors wide for me on production of my letters of introduction, and my progress was almost impeded by the necessity of remaining several days at each one as a guest of honour. For I was convinced that the woman I sought was of noble birth, and must be sought among the highest classes.

As I needed time to make a thorough examination of all the noble families, I was not disturbed by the delay.

I posed as an Englishman of wealth and education desiring to see and know the Italians and their country, but in all the attention I was accorded I gained no pleasure. A restless impatience possessed me, and grew upon me each day. It required a greater effort to appear interested in my entertainers, and I grew to fear the strain would cause me to break down.

Another fear possessed me and made me long to make more progress in my quest. I knew I had left the professor of psychology the sole possesser of my secret. He could not fail to be impressed by what he read of me in the papers, and should he tell the true cause of my extravagance, I felt that my scheme would be spoilt.

For six months I travelled, without making any apparent progress. My faith was by no means weakened, and I was about to turn from Italy to Spain when an incident of the merest triviality held me back.

I have said that my valet had once served an Italian count whose financial condition had driven him to the most humiliating economies. I had listened to several recitals from my servant on this man's character. He was an entertaining talker, and I fancied I was always a hero to my valet. I, however, interested myself but little in his affairs, until I was told that his whole entourage was to be laid under the hammer by a forced sale. The many financial embarrassments with which the estate was encumbered, demanded an immediate settlement, and the poor nobleman was now obliged to part with all, leaving him nothing but his title. My valet probably supposed it would be a mere bagatelle for me to buy up the property, and at last persuaded me to inspect it.

The villa and demesne were only twenty miles from Florence. The aged count and his family had retired to a humble Swiss chalet near Lucerne, which had served as a simple summer residence. We set out in considerable state, driving our own carriage, passing through a most delightful country. I had never seen anything in nature so surpassingly lovely, and the experience appealed most gratefully to my senses. Before we reached the villa I was possessed with a wild desire to own it.

The estate was one of the finest in Italy, and I could never understand how the family had met with such reverses. The building dated from the middle of the Renaissance, and was erected in the best style of that time. It was a most superb pile and its harmony and poetry were entrancing. In the court was one of those magnificent Italian gardens, to which antiquity has added an unspeakable glory and which is sanctified by the care of generations of devoted gardeners.

There was a presence here which overwhelmed me with peace and happiness. It followed me through the vast corridors and endless suites of chambers, each supremely elegant with the artistic taste of the greatest Italian decorators. What is it, I asked myself, that thrills me so? What power renders me so blissful here, and so far from my quest?

Digitized by Google

I sat for a long time on a balcony overlooking the serene inner court in the afternoon light, whence came a soothing perfume from myriads of flowers and shrubs nodding in the spray of the fountains. Something attracted my attention. I looked and saw—the fresh green and glowing fruit of the pomegranate!

Surely, I thought, I have been here before. I have seen that. Is it, can it be the property of my love, the "Lady of the Pomegranates?"

I hastened to the garden, and my valet, noticing my white face, asked if I were ill. But I paid no attention, nor stopped until I had reached the spot and had a branch in my hands.

Forgetful of the presence of another, I kissed it tenderly and rapturously. It was the same that my botanist had said was so rare. But my valet would know, and I asked him in great excitement.

Amazed at my excited manner, he told me its interesting history. It was one of the prized possessions of the villa. It had survived in the garden for three hundred years, but it seldom flourished unless there was a daughter of great beauty in the existing generation.

It was a singular fact in the family history that now and then a daughter would be born gifted with great beauty and attainments. This had happened three times during the past three hundred years, and it was observed that there was a strong resemblance, as, he said, one could see by the paintings. The lives of these women had been most remarkable. They had married out of their own country, and to their inferiors in rank. The pomegranate possessed a strange connection with these daughters of the noble house, and their births were heralded by its freshening growth and the subsequent blossom. It was always carefully tended by the maiden herself, and seemed almost to be conscious of her presence.

At the time of the wedding its growth was most luxurious, and it served as the chief decoration of the villa.

The first of these three countesses had married a Spanish planter, the second a Mexican. By each a branch had been taken away, and had lived and thrived in new lands.

I could hardly maintain my composure when my servant continued. The present daughter of the count bore a striking resemblance to her two famous ancestresses, and, as the pomegranate had begun to revive during the past few years, it was believed that she was fated to the same peculiar destiny. It was the great sorrow of the count, to whom the daughter was the only comfort.

Vain endeavours had been made to persuade the girl to accept the hand of one of her many lovers among the Italian nobility. She had declined, affirming her belief in the family tradition, and insisting that she did not love them.

My amazement at this recital can be imagined. I now understood the influence I had felt throughout the day. Then the portrait gallery came to my mind, and I eagerly asked where it was, for I had passed none in my rounds. I was told it was locked, as the pictures had not been removed, and the count was obdurate in his determination that no one should see it.

My disappointment was plainly visible to the servants and agent of the count. My suspense was indescribable. I had one resource, however, which I felt would bring me into the presence of her who I knew was destined to be my wife. I informed the agent that I would buy the property, but that I was extremely particular in all my business transactions, and I did not wish to make the purchase through any intermediary. My one condition was that we should make a personal exchange of documents. I made the agent understand that he would not suffer pecuniarily.

In order to be able to start as soon as possible for the Swiss chalet at Lucerne, I gave the agent three days for an answer to my ultimatum. The count had always entertained a dislike of Englishmen, but he was not his own master and his creditors made him submit to my conditions.

We set forth in great state. My valet was almost as radiant as I in the expectation of again seeing his beloved master.

Assured as I was by my belief that no earthly power could keep us long apart, I yet took every precaution that there should be no unnecessary delay. My greatest obstacle was the father's prejudice for my nationality. Thus I had arranged to take him by surprise, and had purposely left the day of my appearance a matter limited to ten days.

The ruse was successful. I called at the count's chalet before sending my horses to an hotel, and was told that the count was out. My handsome outfit made its impression, however, and I was invited to alight, enter, and wait his arrival.

I had hardly entered the house when I again perceived the delicious atmosphere of my affinity. I had scarcely been in the modest drawing-room ten minutes before the mystic power of our two personalities brought us together.

I was as certain she would enter as I should be to expect to see a friend in London when calling at her home. During our wedded life, I have studied this psychical instance carefully. I have also endeavoured to explain the material reality of the pomegranates I saw first. But although I have been baffled so far, I shall in time add the explanation of this to my many other marvellous discoveries in psychical science.

I heard footsteps, and turned toward the door. It opened, and the young countess entered as she had that day in April. There she stood, the same person I had seen, breathing and real. I advanced to meet her. She came to meet me at once, placed her hands upon my shoulders, and raised her lips to mine before a word had been spoken.

Then in a few words it was all explained, and we talked and chatted as naturally as if we had know each other always. We could not have been two more perfectly blended personalities if we had known each other from childhood.

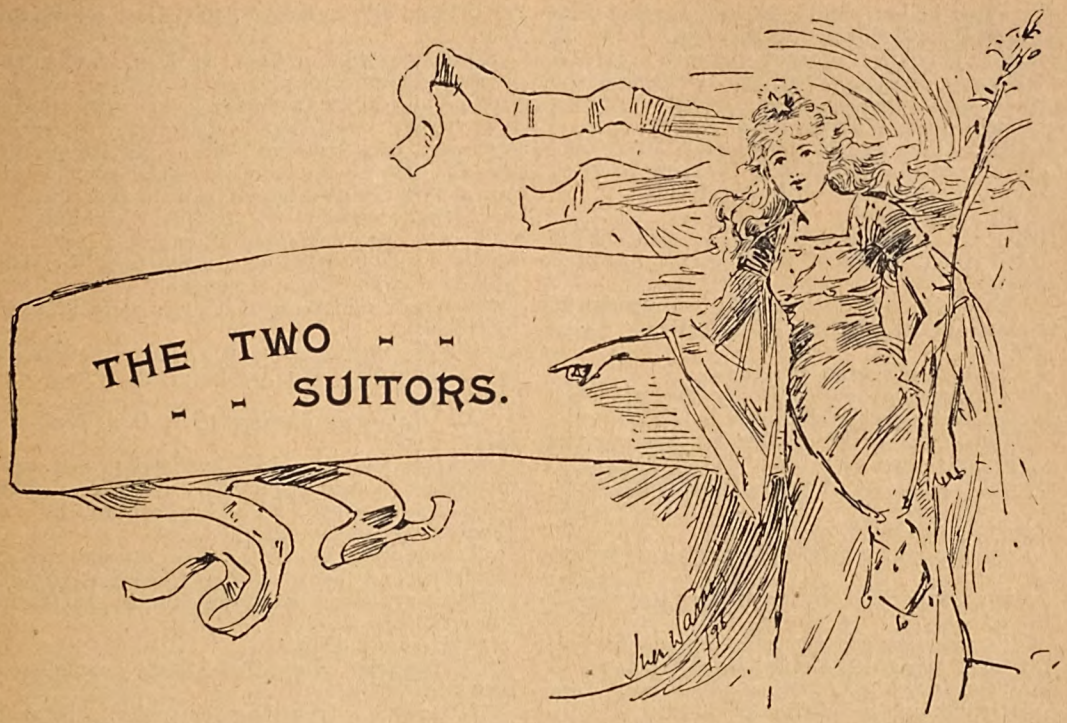
We knew each other's faces. She first saw mine, she said, one day during last April, when on gathering a branch of pomegranates, she seated herself on the same balcony where I had first seen the tree. With eyes wide open, she had seen me in my study, and placed the branch at my side. When she awakened from her reverie, the pomegranates were nowhere to be found.

We heard the count's footstep, and he stood before the door. I shall never forget his face; it was such a study of misery and disgust.

But my wife said: "Father, dear, he whom I have expected has come at last, and you are saved, and we are happy."

S. E. JOHNSON.

Digitized by Google



THE TWO SUITORS.

All through that long July day, as Emily Howland paced backwards and forwards across the schoolroom floor, hot, weary, and worn, the tall mansion of Squire Morrison loomed up before her eyes.

In the distance it seemed cool, inviting, and sweet, its white sides gleaming out from the shadows of stately oaks and elms. She could see the network of gravelled paths cross and recross the spacious grounds, the blossoming shrubs dotted about here and there, and once in a while catch a glimpse of little Gertie Morrison as she walked beneath the trees.

A flush, something very like pride, rose to her cheek at the thought that, if she so willed, it might be all her own. She was nothing but a poor girl; a poor, proud girl, perhaps I should say, teaching from day to day to earn the bread she ate and the clothes she wore. Her father lived on a stony, poverty-stricken patch of land two or three miles from the village, just managing, the year through, to keep his family from starving.

Emily, by dint of hard, persevering study, had scraped together knowledge enough to teach in the village school.

Mentally, she found breathing space, and from a shy, reticent, almost stupid girl, grew to a dignified, thoughtful young woman. Comely, too, in looks, with clear, dark face, well-defined features, and sunny brown hair, and a straight, well-rounded figure.

Looking over her life, as she did repeatedly that day, it is not to be wondered at that the girl's eyes brightened and her cheeks flushed hotly, thinking of the conquest she had made; for Squire Morrison, who had asked her to be his wife, was the wealthiest man in the village, nay, in the whole county, and dozens of young ladies would have gladly become mistress of his home, if not his heart.

That night the Squire was coming for his answer. In her heart she had no love for him; her pride and vanity alone were touched, but the better part of her nature was not gladdened or warmed. She was weary; this man could give her rest. Her people were poor, very poor; if she became his wife, her purse would be well filled. Her brothers and sisters were growing up ignorant and uneducated; here was a chance close at hand whereby she might give them aid.

On the other side—and her breath came in quick, short gasps, while thinking of it—she had a lover, in every way her equal; a young man with brown face and hands, 'tis true, but brave, manly, and thoroughly devoted to her.

She thought of the two homes that were offered to her. In one she could sit in white-handed ease, dressed in silks, jewels, and laces, her carriages and servants at her command.

She could have books to read without stint, pictures to look upon, velvet carpets upon which to walk, and, more than all—and she tried hard to make herself believe that this was the paramount thought—she could help her poor people at home!

In the weather-stained house, with its three or four rooms, she should have—well, first of all, Mark, dear, good, true Mark—but there would be floors to scrub, dishes to wash, paint to keep clean, and Monday's washing to do. No fine dresses there; no luxury nor ease; but close economy, a little better than that which she had known perhaps, but still close, for Mark had his widowed mother to take care of. No help for the boys and girls at home, nothing beyond bread and meat, if they were starving.

So she went over the ground, times without number, sometimes determining, with a firm-set mouth, to become mistress of the fine mansion, and then again vowing to cling to Mark's love, no matter what temptations rose in her path. At last the first class stood up to spell, and, walking up and down before it, book in hand, Emily almost forgot where she was. A shadow fell across the open door, and, looking up, she saw Mark Browne, dressed in his Sunday suit, his forefinger pressed roguishly upon his lip.

Digitized by Google

"It has been a hard day for you," he said later, looking into her feverish face, while the noisy group bounded out of doors at the welcome word "dismissed."

"Yes," with a little sigh.

"Sit here," he said, placing her a chair. "while I get your hat and jacket. I wish I had a carriage to take you home in."

"A carriage," she repeated, smiling that he should strike the tenor of her thoughts so perfectly. "I wish so, too, Mark."

His handsome face lengthened a little.

"It will all come in good time, Emily," he said hopefully, caressing her glossy brown hair. "If I haven't that, I can save you a little labour by fastening the windows, locking your desk, and afterwards — why, here's my arm to lean upon as we take the cross-cut home."

"You are so good, Mark."

This to him in a low, earnest voice, and yet to herself a great deal more.

"What is it, Em? Has anything unusual occurred? You speak so oddly."

"Do I?" quite ignoring the question, and turning her head that he might not see the blush that rose to her cheeks. "You've been having a holiday?" she added quickly, taking her hat from his hand.

"Yes; as we walk across the field I'll tell you about it. But now let me say that, for some reason, I cannot tell what, you have not been out of my mind five minutes to-day."

She started and looked up nervously into his face. Did he know, had he heard of the Squire's proposal?

"To tell the truth, Emily, I think you've passed enough of your time in this school," he said, turning the key in the lock. "Mother is getting old, and the old house is lonely; it needs some one younger to look after it, and I think you'd better give up teaching and come home this autumn."

Her heart fluttered strangely. Their path, winding across the green field, was nearing a rise in the ground that overlooked Squire Morrison's house and grounds. East of it Mark's brown cottage lay, small, poor, and insignificant.

"Isn't it lovely?" she exclaimed.

"I think it can easily be made so," his eyes lighting up as he spoke.

"Oh!" said Emily.

The young man looked inquiringly into her face.

"I was speaking of Squire Morrison's."

He was silent for a little, and then said, as he bent down to snatch up a handful of ox-eyed daisies:

"It has everything to make it beautiful, but I'd sooner be Mark Browne in the poorest hut than the Squire in all his luxury!"

"You would?"

"I would, and wouldn't you, Em?"

"I don't know. I think, just now, Mark, I'd like a little taste of wealth and refinement, as a change."

"Refinement and wealth do not always go in pairs," he said impulsively.

Again there was a silence.

Mark walked along with his eyes bent upon the ground. Emily studied his face eagerly, the clear, honest face with its bright, hopeful look a little subdued now.

Should she tell him, then and there, of what she had been thinking that day?

Would he care for her when he knew that she stood, like an idle woman at her shopping, comparing his love—rich, great, and true—with a glittering, vain show that the years would leave a miserable ruin at her feet? No, she would give herself a little further time; she would warm herself in the sunshine of this man's heart a little longer, and then, if duty to herself and her family demanded that she should turn from him, she would never, never look back again.

"You have something to tell me," she said, to change the subject.

"I had quite forgotten it, and now it seems hardly worth noticing. It's nothing; only I went over to Archer to-day."

"And got your photograph? Oh! Mark, I'm so glad!"

Her face was all aglow, and the young man, not comprehending her mood, looked at her wonderingly.

"You are nervous," he said, placing the little proof-picture in her outstretched hand.

"It isn't quite you, Mark; these likenesses never quite satisfy one, you know. Nevertheless, I'm very glad to get this," she added quickly, seeing that his face wore a serious look.

"Yes, I know, Em."

"Do you know, Mark, that I think you ought to have been an artist?"

"If I ought to have been, or ought to be, shall be," he said confidently. "I am young yet, and our talents won't bury themselves. It'll all come about in God's good time. We will do the best we can, and wait."

"If one can only wait patiently," she sighed.

"Two can, if one cannot. We are very strong together, Emily. Love gives everybody strength. If I hadn't you I should be hopeless at times, and should not care which way the world went."

While he said this she was plucking at the night-green moss which clung to the roots of the old trees. She almost wished for the moment that he did not love her quite so well. It would be so hard to break from him. It would wreck and blacken his whole life. The sound of carriage wheels aroused her. She started up, knowing, intuitively, what presence was nearing them.

"I ought to go home; I have an engagement to-night."

She did not mean to say this, but it escaped from her in the moment's confusion.

"An engagement?" wonderingly.

It was an odd thing for Emily to speak of engagements. He did not question her, but rose to his feet, saying something about going after pond lilies with the boys.

Just then Squire Morrison whirled by. He lifted his hat with his white hand as he passed. A deep blush overspread the girl's face, but she did not look at Mark.

"It's late to go on the pond," she said, trying to speak indifferently. "I believe I can see a cloud through the trees—don't go to-night."

"I shall go," in a low tone.

"Well, then, good-bye; you must not accompany me any farther."

"Good-bye!" just touching her fingers, and turning from her down the path.

She did not move from the spot where she was standing. Her heart grew heavy as lead. When should she see him again? How would they meet after that hour?

Digitized by Google

"Mark, dear Mark!" she cried, springing after him.

"What is it, Emily?" coming sedately back to her.

"Nothing, nothing, only don't go in that way—say good-night better. I love you, Mark!"

He held her face for a minute tenderly between his hands and looked down into her wet eyes.

"Good-night, my darling! God keep you! Good-night!"

The storm rolled up black and heavy from the west, but it did not detain Squire Morrison at home. Carefully dressed, cane in hand, he went down the village street to the cottage where Emily Howland was living with an old couple.

She sat in her room watching the inky cloud with feverish anxiety and peering into the gathering darkness towards the pond that lay south of the village. Just as the fury of the cloud burst in wind and rain, shaking at the windows, flinging back shutters spitefully, and carrying great blinding clouds of dust before it, her middle-aged, aristocratic suitor gained the house.

"If he were only in Mark's place," she thought, little knowing the substance of her wish.

"The storm is fearful," he said, taking her cold hand and leading her courteously to a seat.

There was a protecting tenderness in his manner that touched her. She looked up into his face, hardly knowing what she was doing, and then dropped her eyes timidly before him. The man of the world was charmed.

She was trying to read his heart, he thought, and he had got a glimpse of her beautiful eyes.

He talked soothingly to her in a gentle, well-modulated voice, never once alluding to the subject which was uppermost in his mind, until the wind lulled away to a whisper, and there was a glimmer of light in the west. Then he said, taking her hand—

"Have you decided—will you be my wife, Emily?"

She had been sitting quietly beside him, her white face half turned from his gaze—going over the old ground again, weighing his wealth and position with the priceless treasure of Mark Browne's love. Things seemed terribly mixed to her; there was a dim mist floating before her eyes, and she was like one in a dream. His question, like a sharp blade, divided the darkness before her, and meeting the swift light she started to her feet. Squire Morrison looked at the transfigured face in wonder, almost in awe.

"What is it?" he asked, trying to arrest her eager gaze, which was fixed on something above and beyond him.

"Forgive me, sir," she said, sinking down, "but it has come to me—I cannot be your wife."

She was trembling in every limb as she spoke.

"Why?"

She turned her eyes slowly to his face in a way that startled him, and said, in a voice scarcely above a whisper, yet clear and distinct:

"Because I love Mark Browne, and do not love you. In God's sight I am his wife."

Just then there was a confused murmur of voices in the street. It came nearer—crying, moaning and lamenting. The Squire flung back the shutters. Three men were carry a burden, followed by a little crowd of men, women and children.

At that moment a saffron light shot out from the west, showing the white, dead face of Mark Browne.

"Drowned in the pond when the storm first broke. He was out after lilies," a voice said.

And they passed on.

S. Ardley.

A - TIP-TOP - MAGAZINE.

PEARSON'S FOR SEPTEMBER IS A BRILLIANT ISSUE.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE for September is an unusually brilliant issue. It is crammed with interesting articles, stories to suit every taste, and illustrations and photographs such as can be found in no other Magazine published. It is a tip-top issue.

The following table of contents speaks for itself:

PICTURES AND THEIR PAINTERS. (Illustrated). Here is some bright art gossip, illustrated with photographs of beautiful pictures, superbly printed.

SNOWED-UP IN JUNE. By John S. Begg. (Illustrated).—All about the observatory on the summit of Ben Nevis, about the strange phenomena there to be seen, and about the arctic weather experienced even during mid-summer.

SIGNORS OF THE NIGHT. By Max Pemberton. (Illustrated).—The fiction element begins with another of Mr. Max Pemberton's brilliant stories, under this general title. This is a vividly written, powerfully descriptive story of old Venice, for the sake of which alone the Magazine is worth procuring.

FROM READING TO PARIS IN A HOUSE-BOAT. By Walton Adams. (Illustrated).—Describing how a journey was made from Reading to Paris in a House-boat, a wonderful voyage of adventure occupying three weeks.

THE LAST OF THE BORGIAS. By Fred M. White. (Illustrated).—A wonderful story, one of the series describing the strange history of Victor Colonna, Professor of Science, and his experiments in the lost art of poisoning.

LIQUID AIR. By Charles E. Tripler. (Illustrated).—Mr. Tripler, the famous American scientist, gives in this article the first authentic account published in this country of the marvellous manner in which he can liquefy air. The photographs explain at a glance the wonderful properties of this new liquid and the revolutionising effects of its application to every-day life. Liquid air is the newest wonder of science. The extraordinary account of its properties reads like a story of magic.

MOTHER BUNCH. By Edwin Pugh. A bright story. The love-making of old Mother Bunch, a workhouse inmate, affords excellent and amusing reading.

OURSELVES versus THE WORLD. By J. Holt Schooling. (Illustrated).—One of the most interesting of Mr. Holt Schooling's well-known statistical articles. It will make you proud to read how nobly the old British Lion holds his own against the world.

THE VICOMTE'S DOUBLE. By E. W. Jennings. (Illustrated).—Another powerful story, written in an inimitable style which will appeal to all.

HOW CRIMINALS ARE IDENTIFIED. By Tighe Hopkins. (Illustrated).—In this article there is an extremely interesting account of the Bertillon System and its introduction into England. It is illustrated with photographs specially taken in Wormwood Scrubbs, showing how all possibility of error in identifying criminals is eliminated by the use of the system.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. By W. L. Alden. (Illustrated).—In this feature the well-known humorist continues his philosophical thoughts, dealing with telephones, chests of drawers, and clocks; little worries all have experienced.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. By Cutcliffe Hyne. (Illustrated).—A more exciting half-hour's reading than is afforded by this marvellous adventure of Captain Kettle cannot be imagined. The intrepid little Captain's deeds have attracted such attention that they need no further recommendations here, suffice it to say that no one will be disappointed in the expectations which Mr. Hyne's stories always arouse.

WIRE WALKING. By Austin Fryers. (Illustrated).—A description of some marvellous feats on the tight-rope, illustrated with photographs which will fairly take your breath away.

GOD AND THE PAGAN. By W. A. Fraser. (Illustrated).—With this powerful story, last, but not least, this September Number of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE comes to an end. It will be acknowledged that it would be a hard matter to bring together a better collection of stories, articles, and illustrations.

SEPTEMBER, 1898. PRICE SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

Professor Winthorne's Prodigy.

For over thirty years, I, Professor Amos Winthorne have directed and superintended Bridgely College to the best of my ability. More properly speaking, perhaps, my prosperous institution should be designated as Bridgely School, for I regret to say that I possess no authority whatsoever to apply to my house of learning the pompous affix by which it is generally known. My boys, however, are prepared for college, and I can affirm with a just pride that many of the most brilliant and prominent men of England have been pupils at my school before passing through Cambridge or Oxford with honours due in some respect to my untiring efforts in their behalf.

The number of my pupils at no period was less than thirty, and in busy years fifty and more. I took personal charge of the higher classes, and was assisted in the discharge of my duties by two experienced teachers, also by Miss Atherstone, my niece, who directed the primary department with a discerning tact that I cannot too highly praise. The pupils under her care varied in age from five to ten years, and occasionally I examined them myself, and when I noticed that some individual child was particularly bright, and gave promise of future excellence, I invariably would make him an object of special study, and then, after a short time, if I discovered that his intellect was of a stronger calibre than that of his little comrades, I would place him in a higher class even before the close of the school term.

French and German were taught my boys by Professor Dupré, while Professor Henderson, a celebrated Hellenist, gave instruction in the classics. The higher English branches, mathematics, elocution, etc., fell to my charge, as well as the class in botany, while Spanish and Italian were also taught by competent instructors.

Bridgely Hall was in reality more of a pleasant home than a school because, while attending to the mental welfare of my pupils, I likewise heeded their many juvenile desires with parental affection. All of us lived quite en famille, and my reputation for leniency seemed to check all ideas of license and mischievousness among them, for a more properly behaved set of youngsters I have rarely seen. I endeavoured to be just and kind, rarely scolded, and, in fact, had little reason to do so, for my pupils loved and respected me, appreciated my tender feelings towards them, and recompensed me with zealous endeavours to improve.

One pleasant afternoon in April, as I was enjoying a favourite meerschaum in my study, the servant handed me a card, saying that a gentleman and his little boy were waiting to see me in the library. I glanced at the card, on which was engraved in heavy Gothic characters:

"James Sanderson, Barrister, London."

"A new pupil, perchance," I murmured.

"Oh, he's a wee darling, sir," said the servant. "He has butter-coloured hair, and doesn't speak English. I never heard the like of how he talks. He's French I think, sir."

"Very well, Mary, I will be down in a moment."

Inwardly congratulating myself that the renown of the school had crossed the Channel, and totally forgetting the indisputable proof of Caledonian origin in the gentleman's name, I hastily slipped off my loose coat and, attiring myself in scholastic black, slowly descended the stairway, and, with an expression which I knew to to be urbane in spite of studied efforts to make it appear severe, I entered the parlour.

Mr. Sanderson was standing near the table in the middle of the room, turning the leaves of an album containing photographs of my former pupils. At a glance I knew him to be a gentleman. He was fully six feet in height, with closely shaven cheeks, dull grey eyes, and an intelligent forehead.

He was faultlessly dressed, but there was something in his appearance which suggested the sporting man. His son was employed playing marbles on the carpet. He was a fair, rosy litttle fellow with a slight squint, which was by no means a deformity, and which lent variety to his chubby features, He was dressed in a blue jacket, and his yellow hair had been pomatumed into a preposterous top-knot. He picked up his marbles and leered at me.

"Good afternoon, Professor," said Mr. Sanderson. "I have heard a great deal about your school—I, ahem! beg pardon—Bridgely College, and the praise bestowed upon it by my friends has induced me to bring my son to you. I have read your prospectus; the terms and the locality suit me exactly. I am not, I admit, what the world would call a wealthy man, and I have been seeking a cheap establishment of this kind for some time."

This last remark wounded my feelings, and I could not refrain from observing; "Mr. Sanderson, the invariable price for a pupil under ten years of age at Bridgely is two hundred pounds per annum, and I cannot agree with you in regard to its inexpensiveness."

"Oh," he ejaculated, rapidly. "Beg your pardon, Professor, you misunderstand me, by Jove, you know! I didn't wish to make any allusion to—to, let me see Dotheboys Hall and old Squeers. Lord, no! Everything here is stunning." And so saying, he began toying with my album. I perceived nevertheless, that his vulgar apology was tinged with irony; I knew it by the look in his dull eyes.

"No excuses necessary, Mr. Sanderson. Has your son had any rudimentary instruction?"

"Oh, very little, but he's a precocious young beggar and needs discipline. I give you carte blanche for an occasional flogging when he deserves it."

"But my dear sir," I interrupted. "it is not my habit to flog my pupils. When boys are wayward I endeavour to make them feel ashamed of their bad behaviour, and use gentle persuasion. I prefer to win them by——"

At this moment I received a moist mud pellet full on my cheek, and, turning with rage and mortification, I saw my new pupil in the act of making faces as only a Drury Lane clown could have done.

"No, no!" he yelled, "no cane!"

His father laughed.

Digitized by Google

"Excuse Jack," he added, "he's full of fun;" and then turning to the boy, he said:

"You won't be flogged this time, Be a good boy, learn your lessons, and if you get to the top of your class I'll send you half a sovereign a month for toffee—don't cry."

I looked at Jack and saw that he had not the slightest intention of weeping; on the contrary, an expression of ineffable joy pervaded his rosy countenance.

"The child," I remarked, "seems to be advanced for his age. What might that be?"

"He will be seven next July. He was born in France; his mother was a Frenchwoman and Jack speaks the language fluently; English also."

Jack then cried out in infantile glee:

"I speak both admirably."

"Oh, oh," I said, patting him on the cheek. "So young and already vain?"

"The boy knows the alphabet, and reads a bit," said the father; "I hope you'll be able to shape him into something. I am obliged for business reasons to leave England, and, if anything happens, here is my address, and, by the way, Mr. Winthorne, will you kindly excuse me offering you the payment of the first year in advance? I know it is against your rules" (it was not), "but I take this liberty, being uncertain as to the duration of my sojourn abroad."

"Thanks, Mr. Sanderson. I will write you a receipt and assuredly do my best to develop your son's talents."

"Yes, Jack has decided talent for such a snip; he takes it from his mother, bright and quick, to the point. Now I will bid you good afternoon, Mr. Winthorne. Good-bye, my child," said Mr. Sanderson. So saying he seized the boy, lifted him to his face, kissed him on both cheeks, interrupting his demonstration of affection by peals of laughter. I could not understand the man. The child stuck out his tongue and roared like a fiend. An hour later he was studying his lessons in the primary department.

About a week after this event my niece entered my study, saying she had something to tell me about the new-comer.

"Has he misbehaved, Miss Atherstone?"

"Oh by no means. He is remarkably quiet and industrious. but from what you have told me I begin to think that Mr. Sanderson has underestimated his son's ability, because I have never met, in my whole experience with such a wonderful scholar."

"Indeed, pray tell me of his powers."

"When on Monday last I gave him two easy lessons in spelling and simple addition, he surprised me by mastering them and the entire multiplication table besides, in one afternoon, and during the week he has made such progress in orthography and geography, that I would like you to examine him yourself. He is head of the class, and keeps the position. You know I am not prone to exaggerate."

"Ah!" I said smiling, "he spells difficult words, does he? What, for instance? Constantinople?"

"Indeed he does, and phthisis, rhythm, parallelogram, scissors, syntax, conchology."

"Is it possible? Does he appear to know their meaning?"

"Certainly; and his explanations are very lucid. As for that he is continually poring over the encyclopædia, and his memory is simply prodigious."

"Well, well, I will examine this sucking Webster to morrow."

Upon repairing to the primary the following day, I found that Miss Atherstone had assuredly not exaggerated. In answer to my questions Jack gave a chronological list of the French and English kings with unfaltering precision. I tried him with geography, and he furnished me with the capital of every country I mentioned, occasionally adding several of the most important towns, with their population: and, furthermore, I found to my astonishment when I called Jack to the blackboard that the rule of three had no secrets for him, and in orthography he was unassailable.

Of course such a boy could not remain in this department, and I gave orders for his transfer to the third class, formed of boys from ten to fifteen, and, without losing any time, I wrote to his father, asking as a particular favour the authorisation to take Jack under my personal charge and begin a Latin course. Mr. Sanderson replied that he felt highly honoured, and requested me to direct Jack's studies in the way I deemed most judicious. Forthwith I began the interesting experiment, and Jack seemed delighted to have other opportunities afforded him for advancement, and, at his own solicitation, he entered Mr. Henderson's Greek class, beginning the Latin rudiments with me.

Two months had barely elapsed when this prodigy stood at the head of the third class in French literature, English composition, mathematics, German, and the classics. His progress in Latin was incredible; he would translate Horace and Virgil with the greatest ease, and Greek he had mastered equally well. I at first imagined that he used "cribs," and, aided by his formidable memory, learned his lessons parrotwise, but I was soon undecieved, and began to look upon this strange child as a new "Admirable Crichton," and unexpected honour to my school. He was sent to the second class a few weeks later, and began Spanish and Italian simultaneously.

His method of learning foreign words was curious. He would select from his dictionary about three hundred words and adjectives, copy them on a long slip of paper, and number each word.

He then would read them over twice attentively, and without a mistake recite them all, giving the number likewise.

"What is bird in Spanish?" would ask Señor Alzamora.

"Pajaro, masculine, ave also. Nos. 8 and 191."

The boy, in spite of his labours, enjoyed good health: he was full of fun and the incarnation of jollity. Of course he was greatly beloved by his comrades, old and young. They looked upon him as a marvel and were even respectful to him. He was perfectly conscious of his phenomenal powers, but was by no means conceited.

Further surprises, however, were in store for me. At the July examinations, Jack carried off all the first prizes in all the branches.

He was as strong in the composition of French and German verses as he was competent in botany, trigonometry, and languages. He would cite from over one hundred authors, but philology was his strongest point.

I wrote once more to Mr. Sanderson asking permission to keep Jack by me during his holidays, as I considered the dear boy one of my family. Mr. Sanderson called in person, and was received by Jack with every demonstration of delight. His father brought him a well-filled purse and some rare Italian books he needed, and I left them together. The interview lasted for over an hour, and from my study I could hear outbursts of laughter, Jack's squeaky treble blending with his father's sonorous baritone guffaws.

Digitized by Google

"A happy reunion, indeed," I murmured.

When the bell rang, Mr. Sanderson reappeared and gave his consent to my proposal. Jack was to stay with me. During the summer vacation the majority of my pupils remained at Bridgely. Those who wished to pursue their studies could attend the morning and evening class, but this was not obligatory. Jack never missed one, and continued to improve in the most miraculous way.

One event occurred during the vacation worthy of notice. I have the well-established reputation of being one of the best Orientalists in England, and had made the study of Eastern languages the chosen occupation of my life. In my study I possessed a valuable collection of manuscripts, grammars, and dictionaries in Sanskrit, Arabic, Turkish, Armenian, Persian, Hindustani, Tamil, etc., and I often sent contributions to our leading reviews on matters appertaining to those languages.

One afternoon, having been suddenly called away from my labours, I left upon my study table an article relating to a disputed passage in the Gulistan, giving what I considered to be the correct translation.

On my return I found, in amazement, on the margin of the article, a totally different rendering of the question, written in Persian, and, worse than that, I was forced to admit that it was the genuine reading, elucidating what had hitherto been obscure to me! Who could have written it?

No one at Bridgely College knew a word of Persian. I acknowledged that I instantly thought of my wonderful boy, but I dismissed the idea with a shrug of incredulity.

However, I resolved to find the key to the mystery, and continued my article, purposely filling it with the most outrageous blunders.

An hour later I found Master Jack correcting them.

"Heavens! this is sorcery! Where did you learn Persian?"

"In your library, Professor, and all the rest, too."

"What! Armenian? Turkish?"

"Yes, sir."

I instantly proceeded to examine him, and, with the first real pang of envy I ever felt in my life, I was forced to admit that the boy spoke the truth. He could converse in seven Eastern languages with Satanic ease.

My envious feeling was of short duration, and, transformed to stammering wonder, I clasped him to my arms, crying:

"My boy, my boy, you are a second Mezzofanti, the greatest living linguist."

"Oh, no, sir!" he exclaimed, disengaging himself violently. "Mezzofanti knew seventy languages; I only know fifteen."

"You will surpass him, my boy; you are the eighth wonder of the world," I cried in rapture. "I will write to Rome, to London, to Paris. I will call a meeting of linguists and philosophers here—here at Bridgely College! I will make you famous, Jack; you have given me an imperishable fame. You shall learn even more—Dutch, Icelandic, Hungarian, Swedish, Portugese! Think, Jack! Danish, Chinese, Russian!"

I saw him smile faintly when I mentioned Russian.

Deeply impressed by this extraordinary revelation, I immediately proceeded to compose a circular containing all the facts and events I have mentioned in this narration, and lost no time in forwarding it to all the universities and important colleges of Europe, cordially inviting the leaders of literature and science to Bridgely for the purpose of publicly examining my prodigy.

Answers poured in from every portion of the Continent; people flocked to our quiet village from every institution of celebrity, and, in a word, six weeks later Bridgely was crowded with the literary élite of Europe.

I will pass briefly over the colossal success of this glorious day. Suffice it to say that Jack passed through the ordeal, grandly, triumphantly, magnificently. The omniscient child, hailed with tumultuous applause after every signal victory, proved his modesty as well as his genius. His powers were tested by grey-haired professors, and with such difficulties that I was exasperated; yet the wonderful child answered them all.

His refutation of Luther in Greek was sublime, and his dissertation proving conclusively that spiritualism was known to the Egyptians, founding his reasons from lately discovered inscriptions on Theban obelisks, was eminently applauded; likewise his impromptu odes in eleven languages, and his essay on the Basque dialects.

At the conclusion of this solemn and imposing exposition of genius, Mr. Sanderson, who had been roaring with laughter, I grieve to say, during the whole proceedings, took Jack away far a short trip to Paris.

A week later I received the following letter from my old friend, Professor Clarke, who had assisted at the examination:

"Dear Amos,—I congratulate you upon the great success of your infant prodigy! He is truly a wonderful creature! I did not wish to expose you to ridicule in public, otherwise I would have told you how cruelly you have been fooled. Your marvel-child, your 'second Mezzofanti,' etc., is not a child. Professor Ivan Paschkoff (alias Jack Sanderson) is the most distinguished linguist in Europe. You know his name well; he is a walking encyclopædia of general knowledge, besides being Professor of Oriental Languages at the University of Moscow. He is a dwarf, a native of Odessa, and is at present in his forty-eighth year. A Russian student informs me that this is not the first time that Paschkoff has played this trick. While at your school he shaved twice a day, used powder and paint artistically and arranged his hair with all the skill of an experienced actor.—Yours sincerely,

J. Clarke.

"P.S.—Mr. Sanderson, Jack's alleged father, is the wealthy Lord Dennymore, the sporting earl. He is the greatest practical joker in England, and I presume rewarded Paschkoff munificently for his trouble."

Edgar Pathony.

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

£60

TO BE GIVEN AWAY,

Among those taking part in the following

Free Cash Prize Competition

NO ENTRANCE FEE WHATEVER.

1st Prize £25. 2nd Prize £20.
3rd Prize £10. 4th Prize £5.

The above money prizes will be given away as an advertisement amongst the competitors who can rearrange the following twenty-four letters to represent the names of four well-known trades, selected by us.

TUBREHCKAREBROCEGRPARDER.

Send in your solution at once, and we will inform you if correct, and give you full details of the Competition with conditions and date of closing. If you cannot solve all four do as many as you can, as there are four prizes to compete for. No Solution can be received after October 17th, 1898.—Address: "COMPETITION" MANAGER, 117A SEVEN SISTERS ROAD, LONDON, N.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS
THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Vi la, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

THREE NEW NOVELS. Ready This Day.

THE SEED OF THE POPPY.

By CLIVE HOLLAND, Author of "An Egyptian Coquette," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

BROTHERS OF THE PEOPLE.

By FRED. WHISHAW, Author of "A Russian Vagabond," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

New Volume of "Latter-Day Stories."

A ROMANCE OF A GROUSE MOOR.

By M. E. STEVENSON, Author of "Juliet," "Mrs. Severn," &c. Small crown 8vo, cloth, with Portrait. Price 2s. 6d.

A List of New Season's Announcements will be forwarded on application.

London: C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

LAST WRITTEN - - - - FIRST READ.

F. H. T.—The reason why ships are not struck by lightning is attributed to the general use which is now made of wire rope for rigging purposes, as well as to the fact that the hulls of ships are usually constructed of iron and steel. Thus the whole vessel forms an excellent and continuous conductor, by means of which the electricity is led away into the ocean before it has time to do any serious damage.

Q. S.—The chief warder in one of Her Majesty's prisons receives a salary of from £165 to £215 a year.

D. M. B.—Night blindness is a peculiar affection of the eye, in which the the patient sees very well during the day, but becomes blind as night approaches. It is mostly met with in warm climates, and usually gives way to mild treatment.

M. N. — So far as I am aware Canton is the only city in the world in which wheeled vehicles are never seen. The streets are so narrow and ill-paved that the only alternative to walking is to ride in a Sedan chair, or to employ the services of a donkey.

A. D.—Anyone who knows anything about zoology will tell you that monkeys have neither fleas nor any other parasites whatsoever. When monkeys begin to pick each other about in the friendly manner you have observed, they merely detach bits of hardened sebaceous matter which has been excreted by the glands.

FROGGIE.—It takes any given portion of the Gulf Stream two years to travel from Florida to the coast of Norway.

TOBIA makes the following inquiry: "Is there any country where children are allowed to choose their own names?" ————Reading between the lines it occurs to us that "TOBIAS" is not exactly satisfied with the name his parents chose for him when a helpless infant. It may afford him some grain of satisfaction to know that there are two such countries. In New Zealand the Maori priest repeats to the infant a lengthy list of the names of its ancestors, fixing upon the one which the child by sneezing or crying when it is uttered, apparently prefers; while in Russia, the Cheremiss shakes the baby till it cries, and then repeats a string of names to it till it selects one for itself by ceasing its tears.

A. T.—Yes, it is true. At one time the Jews were a fair-haired race; now they are, with few exceptions, dark. Such is the case, in a lesser degree, with the Irish, among whom, 150 years ago, a dark-haired person was almost unknown.

F. C. M.—The greatest diving feat ever achieved was in moving the cargo of the ship, Cape Horn, wrecked off the coast of South America, when a diver named Hooper made seven descents to a depth of over 200 feet, remaining at one time forty-two minutes under the water.

A. B.—The remains of all the Tsars of Russia since Peter the Great lie in a memorial chapel built on one of the Islands of Neva. All the cenotaphs are exactly alike, each being a block of white marble without any decoration whatever. The only distinction by which each one is marked is the name of the deceased emperor.

AMATEUR.—The biggest billiard-room in the world is underneath Charing Cross Railway Station, London. It is a great haunt of Germans, Frenchmen, and others of our Continental visitors. There are thirty tables.

D. R. S.—Two wealthy Jews of Bagdad now own all remains of the ancient town of Babylon.

SIMETHA.—The eye of the vulture is so constructed that it is really a high-power telescope, enabling the bird to see objects at an almost incredible distance.

QUEENIE.—The proper way to brush the hair is not to brush it lengthwise, but to hold the ends of the hair, if it is long enough, and simply scrub the scalp with the brush. This process promotes the circulation of the blood and excites the pil-glands to action. After the hair has been thoroughly brushed in this way, it should be then finished with a few vigorous strokes lengthwise of the hair.

WOOD.—The advantage is on the side of the iron ship. Mathematical calculations show that an iron ship will carry 116 tons to the 100 tons carried by a wooden ship of the same dimensions and loaded to the same draught of water.

TRAMP.—The total strength of the United States Army, regular and volunteer, up to July 19th last was 227,000—44,000 being regulars and 183,000 volunteers.

OTTO.—Sir Henry Irving made his first appearance on the stage on the 29th of September, forty-two years ago, as "Gaston" in Richelieu. His first appearance in London was made in 1866, in the St. James's Theatre. He has been manager of the Lyceum Theatre since 1878.

B. B. writes to say that: "It is a fact not generally known that if one holds his breath, wasps, bees, and hornets can be handled with impunity. The skin becomes sting-proof; but should the smallest quantity of air escape from the lungs, the sting will penetrate at once." B. B.'s explanation of this phenomenon is that holding the breath partially closes the pores of the skin.

OSTLER.—Your kicking horse might possibly be cured by the following treatment. Tie one of his forelegs with a rope to the hind leg on the other side; then, as soon as he commences to kick, he jerks his front leg off the ground and goes down in a heap. I am told that two or three doses of this kind will cure the worst case possible.

H. E. L.—The Parliamentary exclamation "Hear, hear," was not always an expression of approval; and it was not always "Hear, hear." It was originally, "Hear him, hear him," and was used to call attention to a speaker's words. It is easy to see that this exclamation was occasionally derisive; it was described by one Member in 1770 as "disorderly."

J. N.—The Queen's will is engrossed on vellum, quarto size, and is bound as a volume and secured by a private lock.

N. B. has heard that seaweed is edible. He wants to know what sort of a food it makes. ————Although not the diet for an epicure, seaweed is, when dry, richer than oatmeal in nitrogenous constituents, and takes rank amongst the most nutritious of vegetable foods.

A. P. S.—Angle worms can be obtained anywhere by wetting the ground with a solution of blue vitriol or with soap suds, which will bring them out in surprising numbers.

R. B.—When two rainbows are seen at one time, the inner is brighter than the outer; moreover, the position of the bands of colour is reversed. This is because in the one the sun's rays are reflected once, whereas in the other they are reflected twice.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Sept. 20th, if intended for the Issue on sale Oct. 4th, and dated Oct. 8th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

£5 FOR CORRECT ANSWERS.

Most Unique Contest of the Age—£5 paid for Correct Lists made by Supplying Missing Letters in Places of Dashes—No Lottery—Popular Plan of Education—Read all the Particulars.

On the vote for public education, Sir John Gorst explained in the House of Commons that it was estimated the sum spent upon education in the course of the coming financial year would be £11,690,000. This sum was an earnest of the conviction of the people that education was a national necessity, and that the country depended for its greatness on an intelligent and instructed population, just as much as it did upon fleets and armies. All readers of this paper will, doubtless, endorse this view, and we, the publishers of "HOMELAND," now offer you an opportunity to display your knowledge and receive most generous payment for a little study. The object of this contest is to give an impetus to many dormant minds to awaken and think; also, we expect by this competition of brains to extend the circulation of "HOMELAND" to such a size that we shall be able to charge double the present rate for advertising in our columns. By this plan of increasing the number of subscriptions, and receiving more money from advertisers of soaps, pianos, medicines, books, baking powders, jewellery, etc., we shall add thousands of pounds a year to our income, and with this mathematical deduction before us, we have decided to operate this most remarkable "missing letters" contest.

HERE'S WHAT YOU ARE TO DO.

There are thirty words in this schedule, from each of which letters have been omitted, and their places have been supplied by dashes. To fill in the blank spaces and get the names properly, you must have some knowledge of geography and history. We want you to spell out as many words as you can, then send to us with a Postal Order for 1/6 to pay for a One Year's Subscription to "HOMELAND." For correct lists we shall give £5 in cash. Also, if your list contains twenty or more correct words, we shall send you a beautiful Egeria Diamond Scarf Pin (for lady or gentleman), the regular price of which is 2/6. Therefore, by sending your list you are positively certain of the 2/6 prize, and by being careful to send a complete list, you have an opportunity of the £5 cash award. The distance that you live from London makes no difference. All have equal opportunity for winning. Full particulars of the prize awards will be published in "HOMELAND."

PRIZES WILL BE SENT PROMPTLY.

Prizes will be honestly awarded and promptly sent. We publish the list of words to be studied out. In making your list of answers, be sure to give the number of each word:

1. -RA-I- A country of South America.
2. -A-I-I- Name of the largest ocean.
3. M-D--E--A-E-- A sea.
4. -M--O- A large river in South America.
5. T-A--S Well-known English river.
6. G-AS-OW A great Scotch city.
7. H-----X A Yorkshire town.
8. N-A-A-A Noted for display of water.
9. PO-TL-ND A place in England.
10. -A-RI- A city of Spain.
11. H-V--A A city on a well-known island.
12. D-BL-N An Irish city.
13. G--R-L-A- Greatest fortification in the world.
14. S-A-LE- A great explorer.
15. C-L-F---I- One of the United States.
16. B-SM---K A noted ruler.
17. --CTO-I- Another noted ruler.
18. P-R-U-A- A country of Europe.
19. A-ST-A-I- A big island. [American.
20. M--IN-E- Name of the most prominent
21. P-R-SM--TH A famous English seaport.
22. Y--KS--RE An English county.
23. B--G-T-N A south-coast holiday resort.
24. T-NN--ON A noted poet.
25. W-ST-IN-T-R A famous abbey.
26. J-RS-Y An island in the English Channel.
27. H-M-L-N- A popular family magazine.
28. B-H-I-G A sea.
29. A-L-N-I- An ocean.
30. M-D-G-S-A- An island near Africa.

In sending your list of words, mention whether you want prize money sent by cheque, money order, or registered post; we will send any way that winners require. The Egeria Diamond is a perfect imitation of a Real Diamond. We defy experts to distinguish it from real except by microscopic test. In every respect it serves the purpose of Genuine Diamond of purest quality. It is artistically mounted in a fine gold-cased pin, warranted to wear for years. This piece of jewellery will make a most desirable gift to a friend if you do not need it yourself. At present our supply of these gifts is limited, and if they are all gone when your set of answers comes in, we shall send you 2/6 in money instead of the Scarf or Shawl Pin, so you shall either receive the piece of jewellery or the equivalent in cash, in addition to your chance of winning £5 cash prize. This entire offer is an honest one, made by a responsible publishing house. Now study, and exchange light brainwork for cash. With your list of answers send postal order for 1/6 to pay for twelve months' subscription to our family magazine, "HOMELAND," which is only sold by subscription; also send a stamp for immediate reply. If you have already subscribed, mention that fact in your letter, and we will extend your subscription from the time the present one expires.

THIS COMPETITION CLOSES SEPTEMBER 30th, 1898.

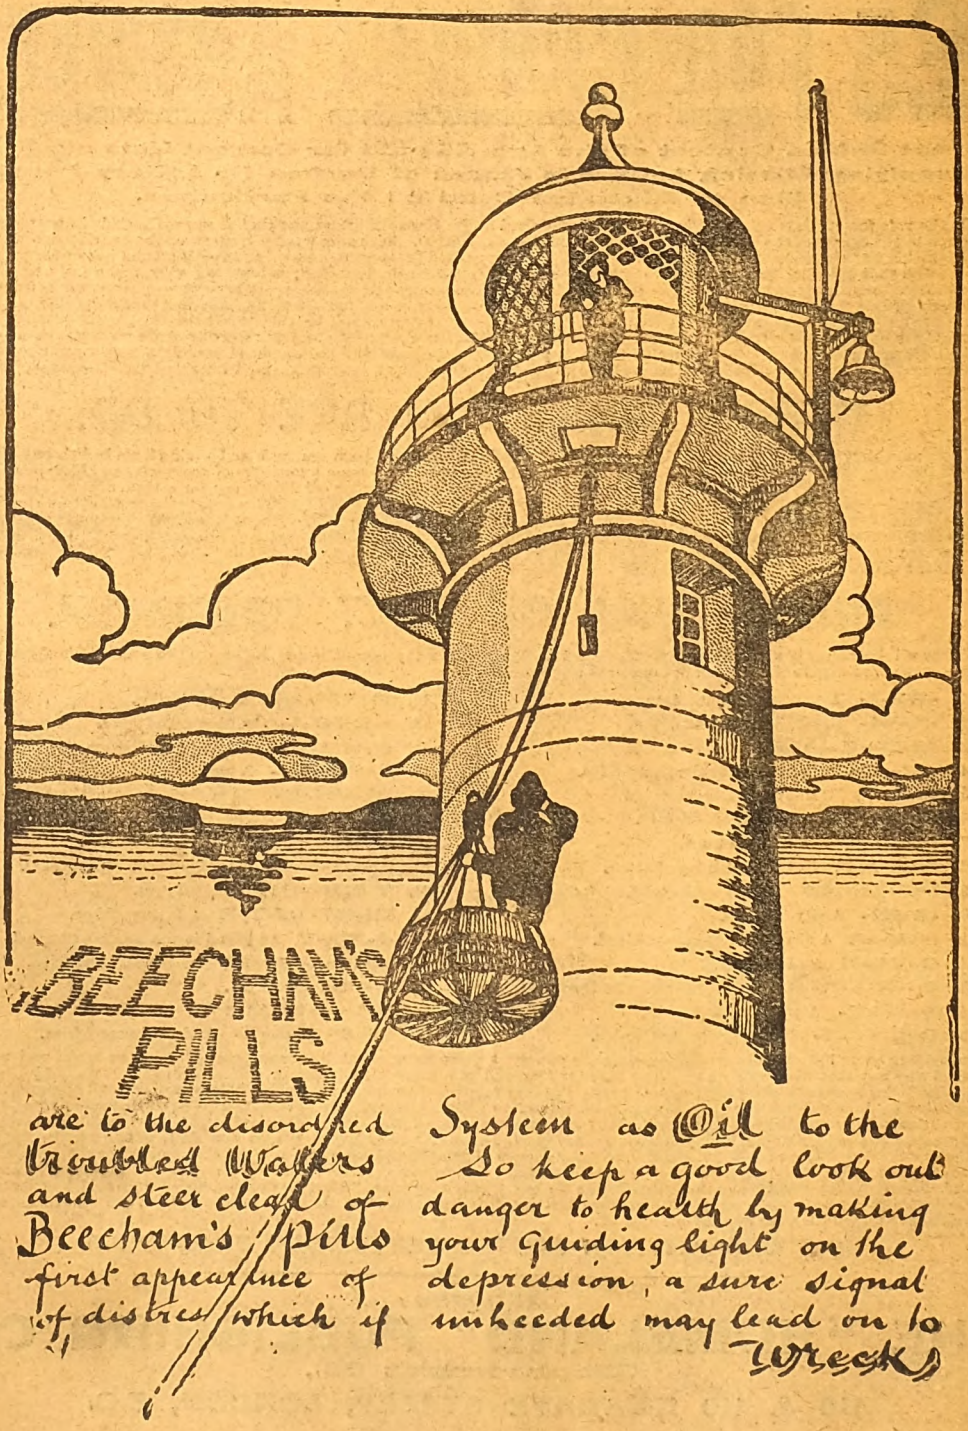
ADDRESS;

THE "HOMELAND" PUBLISHING CO.

(Department 86),

118 & 119 NEWGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

THE MOST NOVEL FOOTBALL COMPETITION ON EARTH

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 508. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 24TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

"CADBURY'S COCOA knows no superior as a perfect food, and is absolutely genuine."
—Gentlewoman.

Cadbury's cocoa

The LANCET says:

"CADBURY'S represents the standard of highest Purity."

ABSOLUTELY PURE, THEREFORE BEST.

The ANALYST says:

"CADBURY'S is the typical Cocoa of English manufacture."

IT IS "A PERFECT FOOD," THEREFORE BEST.

The MEDICAL MAGAZINE says:

"For Strength, for Purity, and for nourishment, there is nothing superior to be found."

CADBURY'S is not dark in liquor like those prepared with Alkali.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 39 MINCING LANE, LONDON, E.C.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,

62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row. (Est. 1850.)

Parcel free from observation

THE BEST HAIR DYE

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE John Noble

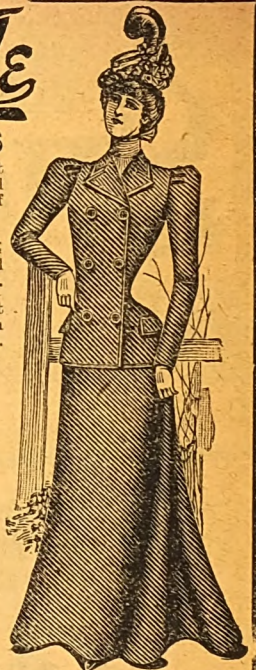
HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

LOOK WELL, WEAR WELL, and cost next to NOTHING. Promptly sent by parcel Post direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World.

PATTERNS POST FREE, together with New 84-page Autumn and Winter Dress and Drapery List to all who name this Magazine when writing.

A FULL DRESS-LENGTH of Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating, in which the Costumes are made (6 yd., 52 in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d.

CANNOT BE BOUGHT IN A SHOP.



MODEL 990. A well-made and very carefully finished double-breasted Reefer Coat and Full Wide Skirt in the latest style. 10/6 Price 10/6 complete Costume. Carriage 6d. The Skirt alone for 5/6. Carriage 5d.

COLOURS of Cheviot Serge and Costume Coating:—Black, Navy, Electric Brown, Ruby, Grey, Myrtle, Fawn, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

The THREE SIZES IN STOCK of Ladies' Costumes are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms); Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other size can be specially made to measure, 1/6 extra.

NEW AUTUMN AND WINTER DRESS FABRICS.—A box of 1,000 patterns LENT to select from, and sent carriage paid. Prices from 4½d. to 5/6 per yard.

MODEL 978. A smart new design. well-cut Bodice, trimmed braid, Full width 10/6 tailor Skirt in latest design. Price complete Costume, 10/6. Carriage 6d. The Skirt alone for 5/6. Carriage 5d.

Bankers: "London and Midland Bank Limited."

Please name Short Stories when writing, and send order direct to

BROOK STREET MILLS,

JOHN NOBLE LTD., MANCHESTER.

For SNOW White LINEN ALWAYS BUY

NIXEY'S BLUE

FLANNELETTE BAGS READY FOR USE.

LARGE PENNY BAGS.

No. 508. ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending September 24th, 1898.

A Cousin's Welcome.

THE Mystic had been at her moorings some little time, and quite a number of her passengers had disembarked, when a hansom dashed down the pier and halted at the foot of the gangway. Its occupant leapt out, and hurried up to the steamer's deck. He was a young man, tall, lithe of limb, clear cut as to feature, and conforming to the latest fashions in dress.

"How long's she been in?" he panted to an officer who stood by the entrance to the companionway. "Anybody gone ashore yet?"

"Yes, sir," was the reply. "Quite a number."

"Miss Murray," went on the young man. "Do you happen to know where she is? I——."

"There she is, sir, over yonder, by the rail, looking straight down among the people on the pier."

"That's it. She's looking for me. Much obliged," and he was off in a trice, pushing his way among kissing, handshaking, and generally embracing couples, who would have been quite embarrassed at another time,

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

but whom nobody minded in the excitement of the moment.

The girl chanced to turn her head just as he reached her side. She had a sweet face, with large brown eyes, and the rich colour of an English complexion.

'Did you think I wasn't coming?" exclaimed Orville, tucking his stick under one arm so as to give her both his hands. "But I had a rush to get here. Well, what do you think of us?"

'Oh, I think it is all charming—perfectly jolly, we should say at home, but I suppose I must begin to break myself of that now."

She looked at him for an instant with an expression in the brown eyes that Orville did not quite understand.

"Oh, don't think of giving it up for the world!" he exclaimed. "Your letters have made me picture you as about the jolliest girl going. But we must be off if we're to catch the last train for home to-night. I'll see if I can't hurry matters with those Custom fiends."

But these gentlemen managed to delay their victim just long enough to cause them to miss that train.

"I think we might as well reconcile ourselves at once to spending the night in town. You don't mind, I hope?"

Orville snapped his watch shut, and glanced a little anxiously at that English cousin of his, to note if she might appear shocked at the suggestion. But there was no sign of disturbance in her face; there was even a note of relief in her voice, as she replied:

"Then I shall have a chance to get a little more used to you before meeting the others."

Again she looked at him in that odd way that puzzled Orville, but then one does not mind being puzzled if the perplexing factor is at the same time a fascinating one, as in this case it was.

"What luck to have her turn out so pretty!" he told himself. "And to think that she is going to spend the summer with us!"

Orville led the way to his hansom, and the next moment they were jolting over New York's rough pavements, towards the central part of the city.

"Well," began his companion, and looking up at him demurely, as soon as a pause in his rapid series of questions about her voyage gave her an opportunity to originate a remark: "are you disappointed in me? You know that we are doing a very unusual thing. And yet, somehow, I do not feel as if I had met you for the first time in my life only half-an-hour ago."

"Of course, you're not expected to feel that way. I'm sure I don't. I am not one bit disappointed in you. But do you really think you'll like it over here? You will find a good many things very different."

"But I haven't found you different, have I?" she asked quickly. "That is, different from what I had expected. I mean, different in the sense of my feeling strange with you. In other ways you are quite different."

"Oh, am I," laughed Orville. "That's good. Won't you be kind enough to particularise?"

"Well, you won't be offended now, will you? In the first place, you dress a little more—more stylishly than I thought you would."

"Dress better!" broke in Orville. "What did the girl expect to see—a tramp?"

"There, now, I was afraid you would misunderstand me; and perhaps I had got a wrong conception. To be sure, you are not a regular clergyman."

"Well, I should say not," laughed Orville; "but here is Madison Square. Isn't it pretty? And see that tower, in the garden over there. We quite pride ourselves on that. We'll be at the hotel in a minute now."

"I suppose you want to go straight to your room and rest," he said, when he came back to her, after registering.

"Yes; I find I am growing a little nervous."

"Nervous? Why, what on earth is there to be nervous about? We'll get a train the first thing in the morning, and as soon as the girls get hold of you, they'll make you feel at home in short order."

"The girls! What girls?"

They were ascending in the lift with the boy, who was to show them to their rooms. His companion put the question with such a suggestion of sharpness in her tones, that Orville stepped to one side, so that he might get a better view of her face. There was utter surprise depicted there.

"Why, my sisters, to be sure," he replied.

"Your sisters? Why, you never mentioned——"

But the lift stopped at the third floor, and the boy opened two doors on the opposite side of the hall from each other.

"Now I will go to my own room, and leave you to lie down and take a little rest," said Orville, as he handed her the handbag he had been carrying. "Then we can have dinner, and spend the evening in any way you like."

"Our not going to your house to-night will not disarrange anything in the preparation for the—the ceremony?"

She laid a timid, detaining hand on his coat-sleeve. She spoke softly, while a flush stole into her cheek. The boy had been tipped and taken his leave. There was no one but themselves in the long hallway.

"The ceremony?" gasped Orville. "What——"

"Oh, I suppose you Americans call it something else. But of course this delay won't interfere; it was very silly of me to inquire. But you are sure you don't want to draw out from the bargain, now that you have seen me? It is not too late yet, you know."

She looked up at him, mirth and gravity struggling for the mastery of her eyes. Even while he felt that the girl must be bereft of her senses to talk in such enigmas, he was more impressed by her beauty than ever.

But what could she mean? He could call to mind no bargain in which she was concerned. Even his readiness at repartee deserted him in this crisis. He hesitated, trying to catch her meaning.

A change instantly swept over her face.

"You are disappointed. I can read it in your eyes," she said, the merriment all gone out of her own. "I ought not to have come. I should never have consented to the thing in the first instance."

Her head dropped. She put one hand against the side of the doorway, as if a sudden weakness had overcome her.

Orville was dazed—stupefied. He had not the remotest idea why a girl, who was simply his English cousin, and whom he had gone to the steamer to meet, should talk in this strain. He feared that she might begin to cry at any minute; and Orville could not stand the sight of woman's tears. He felt that he must get away, at all hazards, and gain time to think the matter over.

"What nonsense you are talking!" he exclaimed in his brisk way. "Of course, I'm not disappointed in you. You go in and lie down, and be ready to eat the dinner I'm going to order now."

Digitized by Google

He gave a rapid glance in either direction along the hallway, then bent over and kissed her on the lips. His intention was to flee then on the instant, but her arms were about his neck, and he was held a willing prisoner for a second or two. Then she broke from him, fled into her room, and closed the door.

Orville walked off down the corridor towards the lift, his brain in a whirl. He had counted on his cousin Celia and himself proving very good friends, after their long years of correspondence, but to have her talk as she had talked was altogether outside his calculations. He took out his handkerchief to mop the perspiration from his brow as he recalled several of her odd speeches.

"She must be touched here," he murmured, allowing the handkerchief to rest on his temples for an instant.

"There can't be any other explanation. She's been queer all along, ever since we started from the steamer in the cab. But her letters were always straight enough. It was odd, though, that she would never send us a photograph of herself. I paid her back though, for that, when I sent her a view of my back hair. What am I going to do with her now—sweet little thing as she is, too? What a thousand pities! I hope she won't become violent."

He kept on in the lift down to the office floor. He felt that he must have a smoke, to try and quiet his nerves.

Quietude was not long in coming. As he strolled about the marble corridor, and watched the wreaths ascend from his cigar, the strangeness of certain things about this foreign cousin of his seemed to follow them into misty space and disappear. In its place came the recollection of the sweetness of that kiss, and of the clinging arms about him that had followed it.

"Perhaps cousins are always affectionate in England, as brothers and sisters are sometimes here," Orville mused. "Still, it's queer I never heard of it being so. And there was that talk about ceremony. The deuce! Why, perhaps the girl expects I'm going to marry her. She wouldn't have let me kiss her otherwise. What could I have said in my letters? But, no—no! It can't be that. It's all with her. An awful predicament for me to be in, truly. But I must worry through and humour her till I can get her out to mother and the girls. They'll know what's best to do."

He finished his cigar, ordered dinner, and at half-past six presented himself at the door of his charge's apartment. She had evidently been waiting for him. Her smile of welcome gave him a peculiar, yet pleasurable sensation.

"I'm afraid you are spoiling me," she said, as they entered the ornate dining-room, and took seats at the table reserved for them. "We can't always expect to be so luxurious. And—and aren't you a little bit extravagant?"

"Perhaps I am," he replied, carrying out his idea of humouring her as much as possible. "But then, you know, you can only arrive in America for the first time once. Now, what do you want to see to-night?"

She arched her brows in perplexity for an instant.

"See!" she repeated then. "I am perfectly satisfied with what I am at present seeing."

She was looking straight at him. Orville grew red, in spite of himself.

"Thank you," he replied, "but you can see me at any time, you know. What do you say to a comic opera? There is a pretty good one at the Casino."

"A comic opera?"

She dropped her fork with a little clatter on her plate.

"Well, a comedy at the Lyceum, then?"

"But do you go to the theatre?"

"Certainly; why shouldn't I?"

Orville forgot his companion's infirmity, and expressed all the surprise he felt in his tone and look.

"Well, I know that in the Established Church the clergy see no harm in it, but in your case I——"

She paused, and Orville hastily interposed with

"Oh, my case is all right; you can be assured of that. We'll call at the Casino, eh?"

"Of course, wherever you think it right to take me I shall be content to go," was the reply.

And to the Casino they went. Her enjoyment of the music was great, and in talking the opera over with him, Orville found her perfectly rational. In fact, from the close of the dinner until they separated for the night, he enjoyed her society extremely.

"She must be only touched at certain times," he said to himself when he reached his own room.

The next morning she seemed somewhat agitated in the train that was bearing them out to New Hope.

"What if your people don't like me?" she said.

"They're sure to like you," he replied.

"You are very good to say so, and I suppose I shouldn't worry over that, for we shall be with them such a short while."

Orville opened his mouth to utter an exclamation of surprise, but shut it again as he recalled his companion's sad affliction.

"As soon as I get her safe into mother's hands," he reflected, "I suppose it would be advisable for me to take a long trip somewhere."

He had telegraphed by what train he might be expected. When he drew up at New Hope Station, he was surprised to see the coachman with the dogcart.

"Why didn't you bring the carriage, John?" he asked. "We can't all three ride in that. You'll have to walk over."

"I thought you was alone, sir."

"I can't see how you came to think that; but never mind, run over to the house by the short cut, and be ready to take Rex. Then you want to come over for Miss Murray's trunk."

"I took that over last night, sir."

"You are certainly dreaming, John. The trunk came by this train. Now be off with you. Such a stupid fellow," he remarked, as he gathered up the reins.

It was a beautiful spring day. As they drove up to the house, a commodious structure, the family were seen to be sitting on the piazza.

"Better late than never," exclaimed Orville as he halted Rex under the porte cochère.

Just at this moment he caught sight of a stranger among the others on the porch—a woman, plain, and apparently thirty-five years of age.

"How did you come to miss Cousin Celia, Dean?" exclaimed his mother, coming forward.

"Miss Cousin Celia!" he repeated. "Why, I've got her safe enough. Here she is now. We missed the train yesterday."

He sprang out of the dogcart, and offered his hand to his companion. She drew back, while a look of perplexity, quickly giving place to dismay, appeared on her face.

"Cousin Celia!" she murmured faintly.

"Cousin Celia!" echoed Mrs. Orville, glancing from the occupant of the carriage to the strange woman on the piazza. "Why, here is Cousin Celia. She came yesterday afternoon, and had to find her way out alone as best she could."

Digitized by Google

"Then who is this——" began Orville, the world and the things in it seeming to swim before him. But his own amazement quickly merged into pity for her who was placed in such an embarrassing position by this outcome of the affair.

"This is Helen Murray," she now said faintly. "A frightful mistake has been made. What must you think of me? When I remember——"

But she could not bear the recollection. She covered her face with her hands.

"Don't fret yourself about it," said kind-hearted Mrs. Orville. "Come, get out and rest after your long journey."

Orville assisted her to alight, and the three went into the house together. Here Helen Murray lost no time in making explanations that satisfactorily accounted for what, to Orville, had seemed to be mental derangement on her part.

It appeared that she had always been a close student of the habits and customs of the Japanese. Her greatest ambition had been to live among them. She had written an article for one of the reviews on the Japanese in England. It had excited considerable interest, and several letters of inquiry came to the author, one of them being from a certain Samuel Wescott, an American, who was fitting himself to be a missionary in Japan. One letter led to others; a brisk correspondence ensued: resulting presently in mutual confidence and eventually in an engagement to be married. The ceremony was to take place as soon as the girl arrived in America, after which the young couple were to start immediately for Yokohama.

She had expected him to meet her at the pier. He had written her that he had shaved off his beard since his last photograph was taken. When Orville came up to her so confidently she did not question his identity. She knew nothing of any other Miss Murray on the steamer.

"And now I must go away at once," she said, when she had finished her story. "I realise how foolish I was to come to America at all."

"But you can't go away till this afternoon, in any case," Mrs. Orville told her. "There are no trains. Now make yourself comfortable here. My son will send any telegram for you you may wish to dictate."

"Samuel will think I haven't come, I suppose," she replied, musingly. "Oh, I don't know what to say—what to do."

Orville knew very well what he did not want her to do, and that was to marry the missionary.

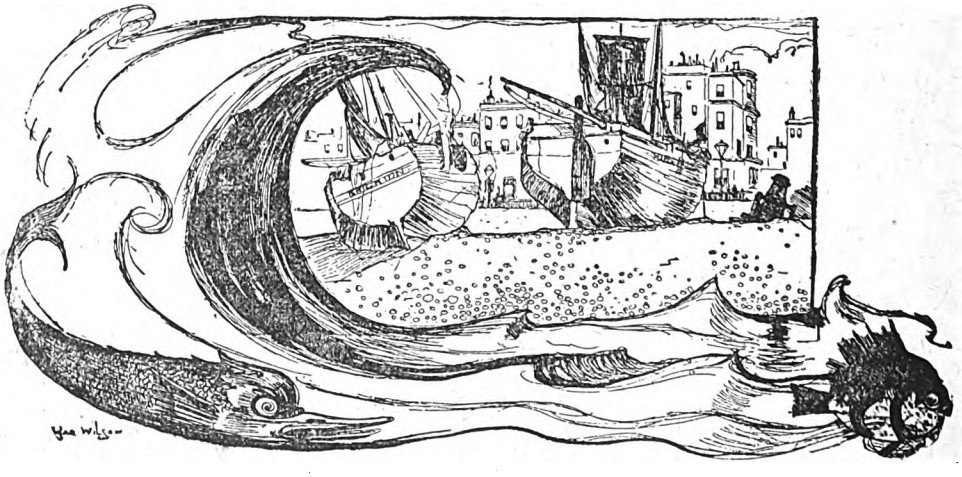
"Isn't she charming?" he said to his mother.

And when he was introduced to the plain Miss Murray, who was really his cousin, he wondered however he could have thought her letters bright.

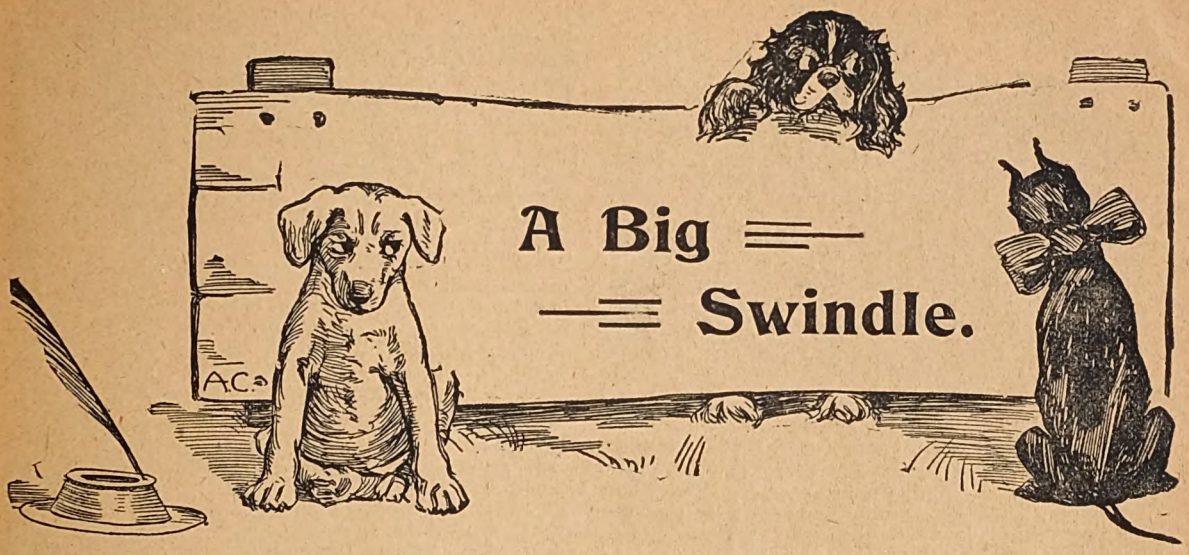
They finally prevailed on Helen to remain in New Hope till she could hear from Mr. Westcott, to whom she sent a telegram, announcing that she was there. He came to see her at once, but that she was disappointed in him was at once apparent.

Helen Murray did not marry the missionary. She had found sight a more trustworthy guide than fancy to lead her in the selection of a husband. While threatening to return to England by every steamer, she continued to stay on at the Orvilles', who were loath to part with her; and, from all indications, when she does leave their roof, it will only be to find shelter beneath another of the same name.

Arthur Middleton.



Digitized by Google



A Big Swindle.

Monsieur Bouloy was a broker and banker in the Rue St. Augustin, Paris. On February 5th, 1860, an elderly lady, in widow's weeds, accompanied by a young man about twenty-five years of age, who walked with a crutch and a stick, alighted from a carriage at the door of M. Bouloy's office, which they entered.

The lady, who was shown into the private room of the principal, introduced herself as the widow of a M. Duperre and the young man as her son Henri.

She assisted the young man to sit down in a comfortable position, saying:

"My son, monsieur, has the misfortune to be lame, owing to an injury he received when a child."

M. Bouloy expressed regret, and asked the lady how he could serve her.

"My late husband," she replied, "left some valuable stocks, and I am anxious to dispose of a part of them. My physician, Dr. Tocanier, recommended me to apply to you as a gentleman of honour, and one well acquainted with the best methods of transacting such business, and was good enough to send us hither in his carriage."

M. Bouloy bowed and assured the lady that it would give him great pleasure to aid her in any way in his power. He glanced through the window and recognised the handsome bays and the livery of the famous physician.

"These," she continued, drawing forth a large envelope from her handbag, "are what I thought of parting with at present."

"I regret to say, madame," he said, "that at present this stock is selling far below par. I may inform you, however, that it is liable at any time to take a rise!"

"That is just it, monsieur," she said, "and I desire you to keep it by you until such time as you think it judicious to sell."

After some talk M. Bouloy opened the safe and placed the envelope with its contents therein. While he was so occupied the young man gave a groan. The lady arose hastily and cried:

"Dear me; another of those dreadful fits!"

M. Bouloy turned and saw the lady with her arms round the neck of the youth, gazing, with tearful eyes and an expression of anguish upon her countenance, at the closed eyes and drawn face of her son.

"Ah, it is very sad, madame," he said. "What can I do for you?"

"Oh, monsieur," was the answer, "if you could procure him a glass of brandy it would speedily restore him."

"I will do it with pleasure," he replied, and left the room, going into the adjoining one, and directing a clerk to get the restorative. Then he returned to the private apartment, and said that he had dispatched an employé for the brandy. It was speedily brought, and the young man revived soon after a few drops had been swallowed. Then, with many thanks and expressions of gratitude, the widow and her son withdrew accompanied to the carriage by M. Bouloy, who then returned to his sanctum, locked his safe, and attended to further business.

Next day a M. Plat visited M. Bouloy, and the latter gentleman, knowing that the former had a short time before held a large amount of the stock which Madame Duperre desired to sell, asked his visitor what he had done with it.

"Why," said he, "I hold it still, and should be glad to have more of it."

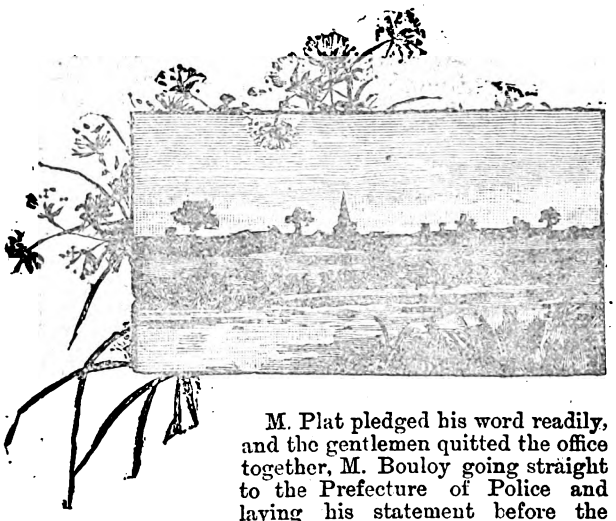
Then M. Bouloy said he had a large quantity of it to sell, and M. Plat asked to see it. M. Bouloy opened his safe and took out the envelope. On opening it, his astonishment was great when he found inside a lot of blank script.

"What means this?" he exclaimed as he examined the worthless stuff. Then he turned towards the safe and began nervously to remove its contents. "I am robbed!" he cried. "Robbed of over a million francs in notes of the Bank of France. I was directed by General Thomet to realise for him on valuable securities, and to keep the proceeds at hand to give him at a moment's notice, and I am robbed of all. I am a ruined man!"

"Have you any clue to the thief?" asked M. Plat.

"I am dazed—I cannot think," was the answer. "I will at once consult the police. I beg that you will say nothing of the affair to anyone."

Digitized by Google



M. Plat pledged his word readily, and the gentlemen quitted the office together, M. Bouloy going straight to the Prefecture of Police and laying his statement before the chief there. Roquepine, a famous detective, was called in, and all the facts were disclosed to him.

"It is all very clear to me, monsieur," said the detective. "Madame Duperre and her son are the thieves, without doubt. The fainting fit was a ruse, and the request for brandy was made with the hope that you would quit the room and leave them alone with the safe. The groan and the fit came on just as you had placed the envelope in the safe, and before you had time to secure it, and the package of money was abstracted."

"But how did the thieves know the money was there?" asked M. Bouloy.

"At present that is hard to say, but by-and-bye the question may be answered," the detective replied.

"But they came in Dr. Tocanier's carriage," said the banker, "and said they were recommended to me by him. He is my physician and an intimate friend."

After further talk M. Bouloy departed, and soon after his arrival at his office he was joined by Roquepine. The latter examined the safe, listened anew to the recital of all the facts, and departed.

He first went to the residence of Dr. Tocanier, and found that gentleman at home. As he related to the doctor the circumstances of the visit of the lady calling herself Madame Duperre, and the young man whom she represented as her son, to the office of M. Bouloy, and the subsequent disappearance of the money from the safe, the doctor's astonishment grew beyond description.

"I had never seen the lady or young man before," he said. "She represented that she had been recommended to consult me as to the fainting-fits to which she said the young man was subject, and after questioning him I prescribed for him. They were about to take their leave, when the young man was seized with a fit. The lady seemed almost distracted with grief, and appeared most anxious to get her son home.

"'How ever shall I get him home?' she exclaimed, 'for, to tell you the truth, doctor, I am too poor to hire a vehicle.'

"My carriage was at the door, and what could I do less than place it at their disposal? It was accepted with thanks, and, out of delicacy, I told the coachman to receive his instructions from the lady."

Dr. Tocanier summoned the coachman and questioned him. He said that he was first directed to drive to the Rue de la Paix, and that the lady requested him to take them to the office of M. Bouloy, in the Rue St. Augustin. There they alighted, and he was asked to await their return. As he had been directed by Dr. Tocanier to receive his instructions from the lady he thought that it was all right. When they returned to the carriage the lady directed him to drive to the Rue d'Enghien, soon after turning into which they alighted, and he saw them no more.

The detective was more puzzled than ever. These persons had evidently been cleverly disguised, and probably the lameness of the young man had been assumed for the occasion. They were not likely to go in company again, and he might search months in a vain effort to come across either one of them.

Then another thought struck him. The stock which had deceived M. Bouloy was probably counterfeit. Were this lady and this young man connected with a gang of forgers? Supposing they were, in what direction must he look for the outlaws? One thing the detective thought was certain—namely, that by some means they must have known what valuable property was in the safe. Another thing seemed equally clear, namely, that they must have known the position of the safe.

Roquepine made his way once more to see the envelope and its contents. He examined these mementoes of the crime with great care, and he made a discovery. Inside the flap of the envelope were a few figures in pencil. They were very indistinct, but with the use of a powerful lens, Roquepine made them out thus:

17,400 francs.
270 „

17,670

Now the question was, what did these figures signify? To what did they relate? The detective copied them, meditated over them far into the night. He reached no satisfactory conclusion. Next day he went to see M. Bouloy.

"Monsieur," he said, "what do you think those figures mean?"

"It is very hard to say," was the reply. "All that strikes me is that it is an addition of 17,400 francs and 270 francs."

"Under what circumstances would you add figures together in that way?" the detective asked.

M. Bouloy smiled.

"How could I tell?" said he. "Under any circumstances, when I wished to reach the amount of two numbers."

"When do you do this kind of sum most frequently, monsieur?" was the next question.

"When I am adding the interest to the principal," was the answer.

"That is it!" exclaimed the officer. "Now I have it. One or the other of these parties had 17,400 francs on deposit somewhere, and, on drawing it, they put the figures down and added the interest. I have a clue at last."

Roquepine went on a tour of the banks where deposits were usually made. In the Rue de Maubeuge he found a small private bank, the cashier of which told him that on January 26, 1860, Madame Fourcy had drawn from the bank the sum of 17,400 francs, leaving on deposit

Digitized by Google

1,237 francs, and that the interest due to her on the whole deposit was 270 francs and some centimes.

"Where does Madame Fourcy reside?" asked the officer.

"Her address, as given to us, is No. 9, Rue de Laval," was the answer.

"Did she usually come herself to the bank?" asked the detective.

"She came herself, as a rule, but she was sometimes accompanied by a young man," the cashier replied.

"Many thanks, monsieur," said Roquepine, and departed.

As he went along the street, he said to himself, "Now I think I am on the track."

He went to the Prefecture of Police and reported progress. Accompanied by another officer, he visited the Rue de Laval. No. 9, Madame Fourcy's residence, was a respectable, well-kept dwelling. Roquepine rang the bell.

Was Madame Fourcy at home? No. Was the young gentleman at home? No. When was either expected? The domestic did not know, but thought both would be in soon.

The detectives watched, one at each end of the street. Presently a well-built, good-looking young man, dressed very becomingly, came along. Roquepine strolled after him. He went up the steps of No. 9. As he entered the door with a latchkey Roquepine was upon him with a revolver to his head.

"You are my prisoner," said the officer; "offer no resistance, or it will be worse for you." He offered none, for a very good reason. He was so utterly amazed and taken aback that he became as limp as a wet rag. Roquepine put handcuffs upon him and led him into a side room, closing the door so as to leave it slightly ajar.

In a few seconds there came a ring at the bell. The domestic's footsteps were heard, and the door was opened. The next instant there was a scuffle, and Roquepine knew that his assistant was doing his part of the work. But a prolonged struggle and many screams in a woman's voice were heard before a well-dressed elderly woman was forced against the door and into the parlour, the officer grasping her by the wrists and preventing her, so far as he was able, from biting him.

The two prisoners were made to sit down, and, while his assistant stood guard over them, Roquepine searched the house.

The domestic, who appeared to be an innocent young person, was greatly alarmed at what had happened, and was hastily preparing to leave the house. Roquepine marched her into the parlour, and placed her in charge of the officer on duty there. Papers were seized, and Roquepine, calling a cab, conducted the woman and the young man to the Prefecture of Police, leaving the other officer in care of the house.

Investigations showed that the young man, whose name was Frederick, was in reality the son of the woman known as Madame Fourcy. He had been for some time in the employ of General Thomet as private secretary, and had thus become acquainted with the fact that M. Bouloy had converted the general's stock into money, and that it was in the safe awaiting the general's pleasure. As soon as the letter informing the general of the fact came into young Fourcy's hands he conceived the idea of getting possession of the money. How to do it, however, was the difficulty. As a preliminary measure, and to prolong the time for consideration, he poured into the usual noonday cup of coffee of the general a drop of a powerful drug, which brought on a sudden and violent attack of dysentery. Then the young man's active brain concocted a scheme which his mother, a very unscrupulous woman, readily undertook to aid him in executing.

The following day the general was too ill to go out and, at his own suggestion, the secretary visited M. Bouloy to inform him that the general would call upon him probably the next day or the day after. He carefully noted the position of the safe, and then immediately went home and, assuming the disguise which he had prepared, departed with his mother, also thoroughly disguised, to carry out the plot they had devised. The fact that Dr. Tocanier was the general's medical attendant, and always drove about in a handsome carriage, suggested to young Fourcy the first part of the programme.

The money was recovered, and mother and son convicted of the robbery and sentenced to terms of penal servitude.

R. Allen.

Digitized by Google

NOT WANTED.

A STORY FROM REAL LIFE.

No; there didn't seem to be any more use for him, in this world at any rate. You see he was old and shaky—both in mind and body, his daughter used to say, when she thought the deaf old man couldn't hear her. But he did catch what she said sometimes, and his poor, dim eyes would grow dimmer for a moment with a mist that used to clear away in two or three big drops that trickled through his thin, big-jointed fingers, as he rested his poor puzzled head on his hands and tried to think why things should be as they were.

They had not always been so. The last ten years of his life were only a confused, blurred sort of picture to him—something like a landscape seen through a telescope out of focus. But beyond them the mists cleared away and the afterglow of a sun that had set for ever lit up a pleasant land whose paths he had trodden with firm tread, and whose vales had echoed with the clear, strong notes of his manhood's life-song.

Yes; life had been a very different matter with him then. He did good work in the factory, and made good money by it, and he had a nice little sum saved up for the rainy days that had come so quickly. That was before Joe Buckley, his daughter's husband, had persuaded him to take it out of the bank and put it into the rotten building society that had only given him back half-a-crown for every hardly-spared pound he had trusted it with.

It was true that Joe and 'Lina had taken him in and promised him a home for life when "t'owd woman" died and took the last of the earth's sunshine with her to Heaven; but that arrangement had not worked somehow.

It was only the stubborn Lancashire pride that kept them from letting him drift into the union, and now things had got so bad that every now and then his dull ears, quickened by a deadly fear, would catch fragments of such sayings as Joe let fall that last fatal day when he came home at dinner time and bluntly told his wife that he had "had a row wi' t' gaffer, and wasn't going back to work."

It was in the angry discussion that followed between Joe and his wife, that Joe let fall the cruel words which broke the old man's cowering spirit for good, and brought home to his fast-clouding mind the one clear, terrible truth that "he wasn't wanted."

"Thou'rt a great lazy lout, and tha'll never stir thysel' to keep a job while tha thinks thy wife 'll work to feed thee."

That was what 'Lina almost screamed at him in her anger and despair at the dreadful prospect of a wageless Saturday, and the hard words roused Joe's blood, and he struck the table and shouted:

"Howd thy lip! I'll work when I like and play when I like. There'd be plenty to eat till I'm workin' again if we didna waste brass feedin' them as should be in t' union!"

In the silence that followed Joe's outburst the angry man and woman heard a little broken moan, and saw the old man's shrivelled frame shrink smaller in the bare, high-backed arm-chair, where he sat blinking through the mist in his eyes at the flickering fire.

'Lina felt a pain at her heart for a moment, for he was her father, after all; and Joe went rather aimlessly into the back kitchen, as if to end the discussion, but in half-an-hour the cruel words were forgotten except by the one who was not intended to hear them.

The Union! No, he was old and poor and helpless, and nobody in the world seemed to want him any more, but there was somewhere better than that if he really had to go. It was a fine afternoon, and he thought he would go out for a bit and try and think about it.

It was no intention of his that took him past the workhouse on the outskirts of the town. He only wanted to get into the fields beyond, down there by the river. He could think better there, for the river banks were part of the picture that he could see so clearly when he looked back at the time beyond the mists.

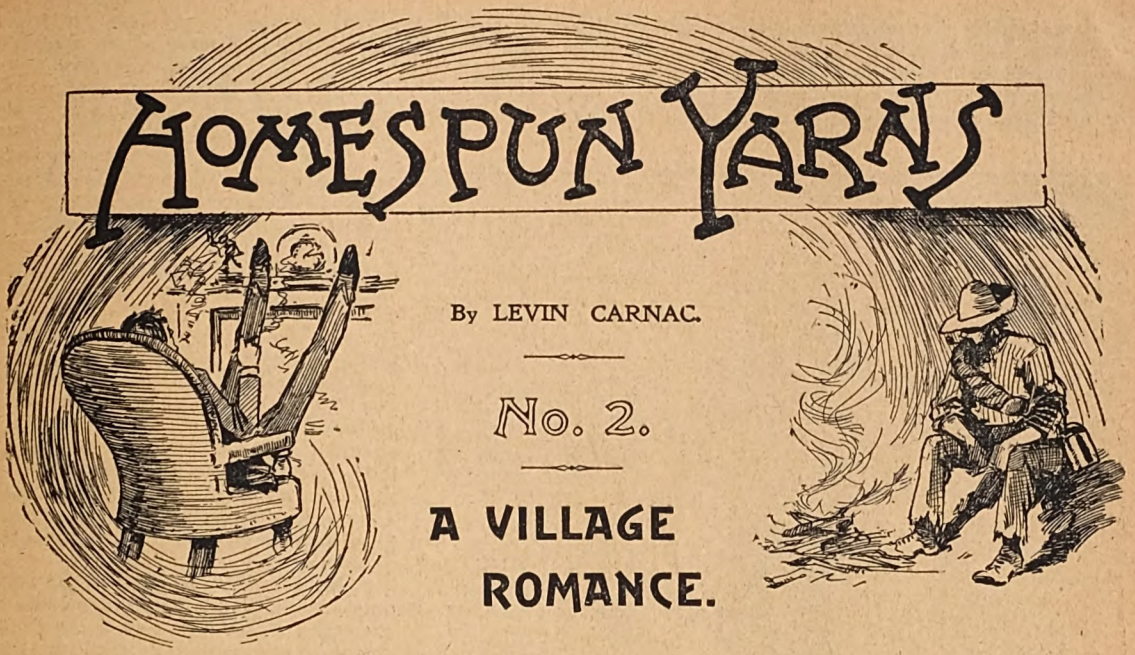
But as he passed that great, cold building, with its high walls and narrow, barred windows, he turned his head away with a shudder, and looked towards the river, sparkling in the bright September sun. He tottered on down the road, stopping every now and then to lean upon his stick while he took fresh breath, and so, by slow stages, he made his way out of the town and nearly half-a-mile along the field-path till he came to the shaky little foot-bridge which crossed the river just above the weir.

There had often been a talk about repairing the broken hand rail of the bridge, and many a one had said that somebody would be drowned through it before it was mended. So it happened that there was quite an outcry when old Binns Hedle's body was found down by the weir the next morning.

It was a sad business, they all said, but, after all, "t' owd mon's time was very nigh," as a gossip said to 'Lina on the day of the funeral over the cake and cheap wine, and perhaps she was right. Nobody missed 'Lina's father after a week or so, and that would not have been the case if some promising lad or lass, or the bread-winner of a family, had stumbled through the rickety hand-rail into the deep, dark water in which the poor old fellow who wasn't wanted in this world had found his way to the next.

G. H. P.

Digitized by Google



By LEVIN CARNAC.

No. 2.

A VILLAGE ROMANCE.

In the summer of '95, being weary for the time of foreign travel, I decided to spend the early weeks of the autumn in renewing my acquaintance with the pastoral beauties of the Western counties, which four hundred years ago were the Debatable Land of the Welsh border, and in due course I found myself located for a few days in a pretty, out-of-the-way little village, lying about half a day's walk from the spot where William of Longland sat in the olden time on the western slopes of the Cotswolds and dreamed the vision of Piers Ploughman.

It was while I was examining the old brasses and time-worn tombs of an ancient church that I made the acquaintance of the narrator of the tale which I am about to relate. He was the rector of the parish, and as fine a specimen of the English country parson as one would meet with in a long day's march.

Of course he was in love with the antiquities of his own church, and an interesting discussion of these, in which he did most of the talking, resulted in an improvement of our acquaintance, and a request that he should lunch with me at my inn and join me in my afternoon exploration of one of the neighbouring valleys.

He accepted, and during the meal our conversation turned on the somewhat well-worn topic of the relative merits of town and country life. When we got out into the fields, he took up the thread of our discussion again, replying to a statement that I had hazarded as to the lack of human interest in the life of isolated villages.

"I grant you," said he, "that in such a place as this, for instance, we lack the intense interest which springs from the complicated conditions of life in great towns, but we villagers are by no means without both tragedies and comedies, which, though played on a smaller stage and by fewer characters, are just as full of pathos as the dramas of town society. If you like I will tell you of one that was played out a few years ago in what is now my own parish. As it turned out it was all comedy, but it might easily have become a tragedy for all that."

"Nothing I should like better," I replied, and without further introduction he began the story which is set out here as he told it to me during that afternoon ramble.

"About ten years ago a young lady artist took up her quarters in the village down yonder for the purpose of studying rural scenery from nature, and after a while she found the time hang so heavily on her hands that, for lack of better diversion, she started a flirtation with an unworldly curate, who some two years before had come from Oxford to try his 'prentice hand on the villagers of Arden-on-Severn.

"He was an impressionable man of about thirty-three, younger than his years, fairly good-looking, and interesting withal. At least, so the fair artist seemed to find him, for she certainly allowed the affair to go beyond the limits of a mere casual flirtation. In fact, I am afraid I must say that either she was much more in earnest about it than he gave her any reason to be, or else she was making a most unjustifiable use of her opportunities for amusing herself at his expense.

"For his part I am able to say that he was perfectly heart-whole when she had done her worst. He had no thought of making love to anyone, and moreover she was by no means the sort of girl who would have attracted him under any circumstances. He had simply extended to her the usual courtesies demanded by the occasion; but these, whether for amusement or some more serious reason, she chose to exaggerate into the attentions of an undeclared lover.

"After a month or so of innocent dalliance on his part and what may have been serious enterprise on hers, he woke to the uncomfortable conviction that the young lady was beginning to look upon him as the lawful captive of her bow and spear, and, being in no wise disposed to regard himself as such, he gave her indirectly, but unmistakably, to understand that she had jumped to a conclusion which was by no means warranted by the circumstances of the case.

Digitized by Google

"She concealed what chagrin she might have felt with all the art of one who had graduated in the best society; but that she must have felt the failure of her little enterprise you will see by the time I have done my story. There must be a great deal of truth in that savage saying about 'a woman scorned,' or Miss Gray, as I may as well call her, would never have so far forgotten herself, as a lady and a Christian, as to seek the mean and unjust revenge that she tried to take for the slight that she fancied had been put upon her.

They tramped away over the wet field-paths.

"The day before she left the village, the then rector gave a sort of garden-party in the vicarage grounds to the Sunday-school children and their teachers. Among these were two maiden sisters, who were quite the Dorcases of the village, and between them and the curate a strong, healthy friendship had existed ever since their work had brought them together. The fact that they were neither very young, pretty, nor well off, made their friendship all the more attractive in the young parson's eyes.

"Nevertheless, two more sweetly, womanly women never existed, and how it came to pass that neither of them had ever married was a mystery to everyone but themselves. The younger of them, Dora, was, at the time I speak of, a month or so over thirty-two, and her sister was nearly five years older.

"Just as the garden party was breaking up, a sharp, sudden shower, such as we often have in the West, came on, and by some combination of chances the curate had to choose between offering the protection of his umbrella to Dora Lester or to Miss Gray. Without a moment's hesitation, he offered it to the elder lady and the older friend, and in doing so altered the whole course of his future life.

"As they tramped away over the wet field-paths towards Miss Dora's home she playfully rallied the curate—as such a good friend well might without offence—on the village gossip that had of late connected his name with that of the young lady artist from London. The curate, being perhaps still a little sore on the subject, answered, with a good deal more earnestness than was warranted by the circumstances:

"'My dear Miss Dora, I may as well say, once for all, that I have no more idea of marrying Miss Gray than I have of proposing to my landlady. In the first place, I am not in love with her, and in the second place, she would be about as impossible a clergyman's wife as one could very well conceive. When I marry—if I ever do—I shall seek someone who can join me in my work as well as in my home—someone like you, for instance, if there were any chance of your having me.'

"The last words were, of course, spoken in jest, for Miss Dora was such a very pronounced old maid in those days that the idea of their being taken in earnest never for a moment crossed her companion's mind. If he had had a little more experience of the ways and weaknesses of womankind he would have chosen his words more carefully, and understood better than he did the flutter of the little hand that was tucked under his arm.

"When Miss Gray reached home that evening there was shaping itself in the depths of her slighted soul as venomous a plot for the destruction of an innocent woman's piece of mind as feline malice ever conceived.

"She possessed another and a much more dangerous gift besides the power of counterfeiting nature on canvas. She could imitate almost any kind of handwriting with wonderful fidelity, and she decided to employ this contraband skill in playing what, by virtue of some curious moral squint, she seems to have regarded as merely a pungent practical joke on the curate and the old maid.

"The idea was probably suggested by a note from the former which she had received a week or two back about some sketches he had lent her. You would hardly believe that a lady, however jealous she might be, would do such a thing, and yet it is a fact that after an hour's careful practice she actually sat down and deliberately wrote a proposal of marriage to Dora Lester in an excellent imitation of the curate's handwriting.

Digitized by Google

"The next morning she drove off betimes to the station, calling at the post-office on her way and meeting there the curate, to whom she said good-bye with a cordiality that was almost tenderness. Then she went on her way, leaving behind her the elements of a very pretty little rural tragedy or comedy, as the Fates might decide to make it.

"Twenty-four hours later, the chief actor in it received a letter from Miss Dora, which first amazed and then saddened him beyond measure. It was quite a short note, and ran somewhat in this style:

"DEAR MR. MAXWELL,—Your letter has so completely taken my breath away that I am quite unable to answer it as soon as you ask me to. I had no notion that what you said on our walk last evening was meant for anything more than one of your jokes. As the matter is really such a serious one for both of us, don't you think it would be best to talk it quietly over before I say anything definite about it? If you agree with me you will find me at home all the evening.

"Always your friend, whatever my final answer may be,

"DORA LESTER.

"I will not attempt to describe the state of mind in which the hapless curate passed the greater part of the morning, for if I did I should only fail. Of course he saw the cruel trick that had been played on this unoffending woman and himself, and equally, of course, he was not long in guessing whose hand had done the mischief. Finally, as was usual with him in difficult situations, he decided to take a long stretch over the hills and fight the matter out with himself.

"When he came back doubt had given place to resolve, and the angry pain at his heart had been driven out by the great joy that comes so seldom into an earnest man's life.

"That evening there was no happier man and woman in all the West Country than Dora Lester and Frank Maxwell as they shook hands at Dora's garden-gate, and wished each other au revoir till the morrow.

"Did Miss Gray ever hear how well her little scheme succeeded? Well, yes, she did. Maxwell took his wife up to town the summer after they were married, and one day as they were having afternoon tea with a friend, who should walk in but the young lady to whose wickedness it was due that the best wife and mother on the country side did not waste her sweetness on the desert air of single blessedness. It is only common justice to Miss Gray to say that she received the news with an air of pleased surprise that was every whit as well counterfeited as the forgery that had so woefully failed in its aim."

"And now," said the rector of Arden, halting at the top of a green lane that led down to the most delightful of country parsonages, "you have made the acquaintance of Frank Maxwell already. Come in and have some tea, and I will introduce you to Mrs. Maxwell."

READY OCTOBER 14th.

ONE MILLION COPIES

OF

3D.

THE ROYAL MAGAZINE.

ORDER IT.

Digitized by Google

The Shepherd's Love Story.

A girl and a man were riding along Bauhinia Creek, on a station in Western Queensland.

Suddenly the girl leant forward upon the saddle, looked about her curiously, and pulled up her horse.

"Ugh! what a horribly desolate place—enough to give one the blues," said she, with a shudder.

It was a desolate scene. A dense mulga scrub had been growing there at one time, but now the ground was encumbered with leafless, gnarled mulga trees that had been felled to feed the sheep during the big drought of 1884, '85, '86. Herbage was now struggling to grow amidst the withered tree-trunks.

The foundations of an old woolshed, the remains of a horse-yard, the uprights of a shepherd's hut were there, and a dilapidated stake fence (which had inclosed a sheep-yard) had fallen in, amidst a luxuriant crop of horehound that was growing on the old sheep-camp.

An air of misery and a strange hush was about the place; even the birds seemed silent. A heap of rough logs lay piled up near to the old horse-yard.

"I'll try a jump over these logs!" said the girl gaily, as she was backing her horse. "I say, you go first and give me a lead, will you?"

To her surprise, the man quietly took her rein and led her horse carefully round the heap.

"Shouldn't spoil sport!" pouted the girl. "Why did you do that? It was mean of you. Why did you? Goodness me, you're in a brown study!"

The man was thinking deeply; he sighed, and nodded his head once or twice.

"W—what?" said he absently. "I beg your pardon. Oh, why did I lead your horse aside? Oh, I hate to see a woman jumping—it's dangerous."

"That wasn't it," said the girl shrewdly. "Tell me, or I'll go back and jump it half a dozen times."

The man's hand tightened its hold of the rein.

"No," said he, "I'll tell you."

* * * * * *

"Fifteen years ago," he began, "I was managing this station for the owners. In those days we had no paddocks, and, consequently, all the sheep had to be shepherded—dingoes were thick.

"We had about sixty shepherds, and now and then one would become insane, and cut his throat, or hang himself to the wall-plate of the hut.

"Poor beggars, not much wonder they did—living alone, and only seeing the ration carrier once a fortnight, and stray travellers passing.

"I was down in Brisbane on business about that time, and was staying at one of the big hotels. There were a lot of young fellows there from up North. They were living at the rate of two thousand a year—spending their money freely; cabs and theatres, suppers and champagne every night.

"There were about half a dozen of them, but one amongst them took my fancy. He was a tall, strapping young fellow, with a well-bred look about him—dark, crispy hair, humorous grey eyes, and the gayest voice I ever heard in my life—a voice in a thousand. He was in the highest spirits, just like a boy on a holiday, and you felt he was a fellow you could trust your life with.

"These fellows dined at the table next to mine, and one night they were joking about being hard up. They had been to the races during the day, and lost, I fancy.

"But they were just as merry, apparently, and the one with the gay voice kept them in a roar of laughter After a little while they all trooped out.

"I beckoned to the waiter.

"'Who is that gentleman that went out first?' said I.

"'Tall gent, sir? In evening dress, sir? Dark moustache, grey eyes, sir?'

"'Yes.'

"'Mr. Dolan—Jack Dolan—from up North; squatter, I fancy, sir. Very liberal gentleman, plenty of money, sir.'

"That night I saw my grey-eyed friend with a party of ladies and gentlemen at the theatre. He was paying a lot of attention to the girl he sat next to; she was very pretty, but there was something cruel-looking about her mouth that repelled me.

"'Who is the girl in the fluffy yellow get-up opposite?' said I to a friend.

"'Forget her name,' said he; 'she's engaged to young Dolan.'

"'Then I pity Dolan,' I thought.

"That night I was introduced to Dolan and his friends in the hotel bar, and after we'd had a good many bottles of wine, I found they were going the pace a bit too fast for me, so I left them.

Digitized by Google

"I went home next morning. A few months later I had to go down to Brisbane again. I wanted a lot of new shepherds to send up to the station.

"To my great surprise, Dolan was there still with his friends; but the gay tone of his voice hadn't the same old ring, and there was a line in his forehead that was not there before. I couldn't make him out. He was spending money as freely as ever.

"Next morning, early, was the time I had advertised for the shepherds to apply. I was sitting waiting for them to turn up. A knock came. 'Come in!' I shouted, and in strolled Dolan, smoking a cigar.

"'Good-morning,' said he.

"'Morning, Dolan. Where did you get to last night? Feel rather out of sorts this morning, eh? Come and have something?'

"'No thanks,' said he. 'I'm here on business. By to-day's paper I see that you want shepherds.'

"'Yes,' said I; 'do you know of any?'

"'Yes, one.'

"'Good man?'

"'Pretty fair—used to sheep.'

"'Old?'

"'No, a young man.'

"'Steady?'

"'Well, yes; an occasional spree.'

"'Got a good dog?'

"'Yes.'

"'All right,' said I. 'It's a pound a week and rations. Single hut. Where is the man to be seen?'

"'I'm the man,' said Dolan quietly.

"'Nonsense; you're joking.'

"'Never more serious,' said he, taking the ash carefully off his cigar. 'I want to get clean away—I'm at the end of my tether. I can't whine—it's my own fault.'

"'It's that girl's,' said I to myself.

"I'd have asked him, but it's a bad game asking too many questions in Queensland. I gave him the billet. He came up and lived quietly by himself, never saying what he'd been, nor bragging.

"After he had been shepherding a good while, the ration-carrier came and told me that he was getting to look miserable, so I rode out one day and told him to take a holiday for a month, which he did.

"When he came back he seemed worse than ever.

"'What is up with you, Dolan?' I said to him one day. 'Why don't you pull yourself together and get out of this back-country? What about the girl down below? Look here, I'll lend you some money, and help you to get a fair start. What's the good of wasting your life here?'

"'The girl is married,' said Dolan, 'months ago. No, thanks, I don't want any help. I'm as well off here as anywhere.'

"I saw he didn't like being questioned.

"One day I was riding home. There had been a great storm up the creek that day. I saw a black fellow coming towards me from the direction of Dolan's hut.

"'Look here, boss, I been alonga Dolan's yard. Dolan nowhere. Sheep all huddled up—not let out. Dolan gone, I tink.'

"'I'll discharge Dolan, see if I don't,' said I angrily; and I got an old shepherd to come with me, and we went to let the sheep out. True enough there were all the poor brutes of sheep yarded up, looking wretchedly ill.

I was vowing vengeance on Dolan; the crows were cawing noisily in the scrub, and there were some great brutes of eagle-hawks hovering about, when suddenly Dolan's dog came towards me, whining.

"I got off my horse and followed him. He led me to the bank of the creek. . . . There was poor Dolan lying dead. He had been struck by lightning. He had got his discharge right enough—from above.

"So the shepherd and I buried him close to the old horse-yard, where those logs are—that was his grave."

"Poor fellow," said the girl, when the man ceased. "Did you ever hear of the girl again—the one he was fond of?"

"I met her a year afterwards. She was with her husband, the man she threw poor Dolan over for—old enough to be her grandfather, and enormously rich.

"I got a fellow to introduce them to me, and I began talking to her. When I told her I was from the West, she asked me if I had ever met Jack Dolan.

"'Yes,' I said.

"'What was he doing?' she asked me, glancing at her husband cautiously.

"'He was a common shepherd,' I said.

"She went very pale.

"'Where is he now?' she said.

"'In the better land,' said I.

"'Is he dead?' she whispered. 'How did he die? I—I never heard.'

"'He was killed by lightning.'

"She caught her breath, and put her fan to her face.

"'A dreadful fate—a dreadful fate,' she said.

"'There are worse fates,' said I. 'He might have married a heartless woman,' and I looked her straight in the eyes, and she——

"Why, you are crying! Now, you know, that is foolish—it's years ago—you never knew the two people concerned. Poor Dolan! he's better off now, and as for the girl——"

"She was my sister," said the girl brokenly. "She died some years ago. She spoke of Jack Dolan when she was dying. She—she really loved him. Don't they say that those who love each other dearly become re-united in Heaven?"

But the man was silent.

W. Bush.

A PRIZE FOR ARTISTS.

The Editor of Short Stories offers a prize of £2 2s for the best set of six decorative head-pieces, corner-pieces, or tail-pieces suitable for reproduction in the paper. Competitors may send all head-pieces, or all tail-pieces, or all corner-pieces, or some of each. The head-pieces should contain a space for the title of the story.

The winner will not only receive a cheque for £2 2s., but will possibly have the opportunity of securing a considerable amount of further work in connection with the various publications issued from this office.

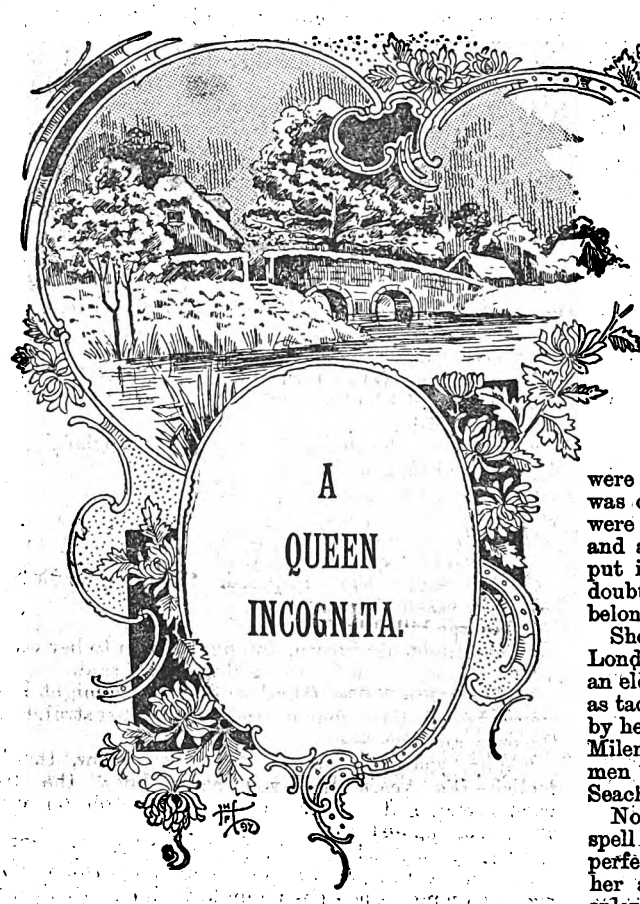
Style, shape, and size, are left entirely to the competitors.

Attempts should reach the Editor, marked "Decorative," by Monday, October 3rd.

Should the quality of the competition justify it, a number of consolation prizes will be awarded.

All attempts become the property of the Editor.

Digitized by Google



A QUEEN INCOGNITA.

ONE fine day in July a report ran like wildfire through the little town of Seachester that Fenton's Folly was taken—actually taken—and so late in the season, too. But the news was undoubtedly correct. An army of gardeners descended upon the grounds. The house was well and substantially furnished; but one van-load after another arrived of wonderful and beautiful articles.

Statuettes in carved ivory, in old Dresden china, or in antique bronze were set out upon the table and decorated the étagères. A number of books, chiefly French, in gay movable covers of silk or of velvet, an elaborate smoking service in wrought silver, and other costly adornments, made their appearance in the chief reception-rooms.

Of course, the quiet little seaside resort was thrown into a regular commotion by all these extraordinary proceedings. Who and what would the coming stranger or strangers prove to be? The arrival of a case of choice cigarettes from Roumania was set down as positive proof that there was to be at least one masculine individual amongst the new-comers, as were also the arrangements made for the accommodation of sundry dogs and horses.

And who on earth was the future tenant of Fenton's Folly—an artist? a foreign prince? a Yankee millionaire on his travels? Each and all of these conjectures were advanced in turn. And Mrs. Armstrong, the widow of a London surgeon, who had been a prominent personage in his profession, and was herself looked upon as one of the leaders of Seachester society, exclaimed enthusiastically while discussing the subject one day: "Suppose it should be one of the dear princes come down incognito to spend a little time on the coast." And really her supposition did not seem altogether improbable.

At last the riddle was solved—at least, so far as the sex and the number of persons that were coming to stay at the Folly were concerned. There was only one, and that one was a woman. The dogs were there—a superb Newfoundland, a black poodle, and a Dachshund—and the horses, six in number, duly put in an appearance, and the cigarettes were an undoubted fact; but all these masculine accessories belonged to a female owner.

She arrived late one evening by the last express from London, accompanied by a host of servants, including an elderly and inscrutable maid, stiff as a grenadier and as taciturn as the Sphinx. The lady's name was stated by her major-domo in making purchases to be Madame Milena; but that was too palpably an assumed cognomen to deceive even the unsophisticated denizens of Seachester.

Nobody caught a glimpse of her for several days. A spell of rainy weather, such as often mars the otherwise perfect beauty of an English summer, set in just after her arrival, and kept her within doors. Finally a splendid cloudless day, shining above a sea where the waves broke in lines of pearly foam not high enough nor strong enough to dismay an infant, lured the new-comer to make her first essay at sea-bathing.

Her début on the stage of Seachester life created a sensation. She drove down to her previously engaged cabin in the prettiest possible low pony-carriage, attended by her maid, and so wrapped up and veiled that nobody could even make a guess as to what she looked like. But when she emerged from her bath-house, ready equipped for her plunge in the sea, and the maid drew her peignoir of Turkish towelling from her shoulders, there stood revealed the loveliest woman by whom the sands at Seachester had been trodden for many a long day.

She was in the prime of life, apparently something over twenty-five, and was a radiant brunette, with magnificent large black eyes, a glowing peachy complexion, dazzling white teeth, and a host of dimples that came and went in a most bewitching way with her every word and smile. Her bathing-costume of dark crimson serge, though fashioned in the most decorous manner possible, with sleeves to the wrist, an ample skirt falling below the knee, and wide trousers, just giving a glimpse of a matchless foot and ankle, revealed the fact that her figure was of faultless symmetry.

She could swim like an otter, or like her own great Newfoundland, who stood on the shore whimpering dolefully, and only restrained by the chain in the firm grasp of the maid from plunging in to drag his adored mistress out of that treacherous water.

Digitized by Google

It must be confessed that Madame Milena's first appearance in public at Seachester awakened a vast amount of prejudice against her in the minds of the female society-leaders of the place. A vague idea that there was something wrong with the lady and her antecedents spread universally abroad like exhalation. In the first place she was a great deal too handsome in too striking and showy a style.

It was not proper, argued the British matrons in solemn conclave assembled, to have such big eyes and such a bright colour and such quantities of hair. Secondly, no woman who was really respectable would ever smoke; and though Admiral Brent ventured upon a mild remonstrance in the way of mentioning the well-known penchant of Russian ladies for cigarette-smoking, he was put down at once, mildly but firmly.

"Russian ladies? Horrid creatures that spoiled good tea by putting lemon in it, and that think their Czar is of more account than our glorious Queen. Why, the only daughter-in-law that ever gave our beloved Queen any trouble was the Duchess of Edinburgh; and no wonder, for she was a Russian princess."

So the old Admiral held his peace, and contented himself with casting an admiring eye on Madame Milena whenever he chanced to meet her.

But the real cause of the prejudice that existed in so virulent a form against the handsome tenant of Fenton's Folly was the mystery that surrounded her. Who was she? Where did she come from? What had brought her to Seachester? To none of these questions had any satisfactory response been given.

The lady kept herself to herself, neither forming acquaintances or receiving visits. She bathed daily in the ocean, she drove out every afternoon, either in her pony-carriage or in a landau, drawn by two superb black horses, and she was always accompanied by her dogs or else attended by her groom. Also, she made long excursions on horseback to all the interesting places in the environs. She showed herself to be a faultless horsewoman; and, as her exquisite figure was set off to full advantage by a riding-habit, whose fashion and fit betrayed the work of the best of the London artistes in that line, her appearance in it sufficed to embitter still farther the minds of the dames of Seachester against her. They one and all declared that Madame Milena was not, and could not be, a respectable person.

Of all these worthy matrons Mrs. Armstrong was probably the most uneasy and the most perturbed concerning the new-comer. Her eldest son, Frederick, who was just twenty-two, had manifested at once a most reprehensible tendency to admire the brilliant beauty of the obnoxious lady.

To be sure the infatuation was not likely to produce any serious effects. Frederick's divinity was as unapproachable as she was dazzling. All that he could do was to linger in the neighbourhood of Fenton's Folly watching for a chance to obtain a glimpse of her on her way to take her daily bath or her drives or rides. Occasionally he would hire a horse and follow her discreetly at a distance in the hope that something would happen—that her horse might run away, or her stirrup break, or some other trifling accident might occur, so that he might have a chance of approaching her, or, perhaps, even speaking to her.

Moreover, he commenced a portrait of her, which, as he was a young fellow of very real artistic talent, was not at all bad in the point of view of a likeness, though naturally defective as a work of art. All this aroused Mrs. Armstrong's dislike and irritation of feeling against Madame Milena to the very highest pitch, though the lady remained in complete unconsciousness of her young adorer's infatuation, and had never done anything to cause or encourage it except by being much more beautiful than most other women.

Everyone should Read
"M. A. P."
THE NEW SOCIETY PAPER.
Edited by T. P. O'CONNOR.
Every Thursday.
PRICE
ONE PENNY.

At last a paragraph in the well-known Society paper, Scraps and Scandals, which Mrs. Armstrong was in the habit of perusing weekly, gave that worthy lady's nerves a severe shock. It ran as follows:

"We have just learnt that Mademoiselle Morenski, the leading dancer at the Paris Grand Opera, is spending her vacation incognito at one of the most retired and healthful of our seaside resorts. The accomplished artiste has never completely recovered from the sprain she underwent by falling during the last rehearsals of Diana and Endymion, and she is trying what a season of total seclusion and repose will effect towards her restoration to health. As Mademoiselle Morenski is a Russian by birth, she is, as is customary with persons of that nation, a thorough linguist, and speaks English to perfection. We are happy to learn that she is rapidly recovering, and that her appearance at the Grand Opera will take place early in October."

"There, now," cried Mrs. Armstrong, stabbing with a fierce forefinger the paragraph in question as she thrust the paper literally under Frederick's nose. "We know at last who Madame Milena really is—a ballet-dancer. So, of course, she smokes cigarettes and drinks absinthe, and does all kind of horrid things. Frederick, I command you—now, do you hear?—I positively command you never so much as look at that dreadful creature again."

But, as fate would have it, Frederick was on that very day afforded his opportunity, long desired and watched for of rendering some service to the lady of his dreams. After taking her daily bath, Madame Milena, followed by her maid, and accompanied by her superb Newfoundland dog, strolled down to the pier, and, in compliance with the eager solicitations of her pet, she amused herself for some little time by throwing sticks into the sea for him to swim after and bring back to her.

Digitized by Google

Frederick Armstrong, hovering discreetly in the distance, looked on with intense interest, gaining fresh ideas for his unfinished portrait with every glance. Suddenly the dog, after seizing the piece of wood which his mistress had just thrown into the water for him, instead of swimming alertly back to land as usual with his prize, began to struggle and beat the water with his paws and to bark piteously, and gave other signs of distress. Evidently there was something wrong, and the animal was in danger of drowning.

"He's got caught in a tangle of seaweed, or else in a floating rope," remarked a bystander. "If he don't get loose soon it's all up with him."

"What! Prince—my dear Prince!" cried his mistress in wild agitation. "Will nobody save him for me?"

"There isn't any boat near at hand, ma'am," remarked the first speaker, "and it would take a good swimmer and a cool hand to go out there just for a dog. It's risky—that's what it is."

Madame Milena turned upon him, pale to her very lips, and with her great eyes all ablaze.

"Only a dog? I tell you, man, I have not many friends that I value as highly as I do Prince. Here, Anastasia, take my cloak—I'll swim out after him myself rather than stand here to see him perish."

But other help was at hand. Frederick Armstrong was an expert and fearless swimmer; so, only waiting to throw off his coat and to unlace and cast aside his shoes, he sprang straightway from the pier and hastened to Prince's assistance. He was just in time. The poor animal's anxious barks had already been exchanged for a series of feeble yelps, and the great curly head had more than once been submerged by the waves of the incoming tide when Frederick reached him. Seizing the dog by the collar he managed to drag him to a shelving part of the beach, whence it was easy to gain firm footing on dry land. The rescuer and the rescued were met by Madame Milena, who first covered her pet with caresses, and then turned and grasped Frederick's wet hand with enthusiastic gratitude.

"How can I ever thank you enough," she cried, "for saving my poor Prince for me? He was a present to me from the Prince of Wales, but I love him for his own sake as much as I value him for that of his donor. But I must not keep you standing here in your wet clothes. Hurry home, and, perhaps, some other time I shall be able to tell you how deeply I am obliged to you."

And, with a wave of her hand, the beauty hastened away, followed by Prince, whose drooping tail and ears betrayed the fact that he was rather discomfited by his adventure.

To describe the indignation wherewith Mrs. Armstrong heard of the incident of the Newfoundland's rescue is a task impossible to any ordinary pen. That her son—her son, the offspring of Dr. Archibald Armstrong, who would certainly have been knighted had he lived, and to whom there was once talk of an offer of a baronetcy, and whose mother had been one of the Greshams of Warwickshire—Mrs. Armstrong always prided herself greatly on her family—should have made himself conspicuous after that fashion by running such risks to save a mere dog, an animal belonging to a creature—a woman who was certainly an adventuress. It was simply unendurable. And the irate matron decided in her own mind that she would keep a good look-out in future over Master Frederick's movements.

That young gentleman, being none the worse for his dip in the sea, and all unconscious of the extra supervision of which he was the object, determined to put his adventure to profit by obtaining some extra studies and sketches for the portrait, the execution of which was absorbing all his time and thoughts. He had not, indeed, ventured to call upon Madame Milena, beyond stopping one day to inquire after the health and well-doing of the dog that he had saved. But between Prince and himself the friendliest possible relations had been established. The Newfoundland never failed to salute his preserver with a series of bounds and barks and ecstatic caresses, unless, indeed, he were in the company of his mistress, when his greeting would be confined to a vehement wagging of his great plume-like tail.

The young artist got in the way of stopping nearly every day at the garden gate to bring Prince a biscuit or a lump of sugar, and so established himself on a footing of intimacy with that jealous guardian of the premises.

He had found out the fact that Madame Milena was in the habit of taking her after-dinner coffee in the drawing-room, the long French windows of which opened on the garden, and were in fine weather always left wide open. With the room fully illuminated by the light of the great lamps Frederick was enabled, once established in the garden, to study at his leisure the beautiful original he was trying to reproduce on canvas as she sipped her coffee, and—alas and alas—enjoyed her after-dinner cigarette.

Seated on the roof of Prince's house, and with his canine friend nestling beside him, he spent evening after evening in sketching the fair features of the unapproachable beauty. The servants never frequented the gardens after nightfall; and if one of them chanced to come there the identity of Mr. Armstrong was well known to them as that of Prince's preserver, and so he was never molested or even questioned.

One pleasant evening in September Frederick, on arriving at his usual post, found that he would not be able to prosecute his artistic studies as usual. The radiant lady of his dreams was not alone. A very magnificent, though elderly gentleman, with grey hair and whiskers, commanding figure and a uniform blazing with gold embroideries, who had apparently been the guest of Madame Milena at dinner, was drinking coffee and sipping liqueur with her, on the evident footing of an old friend.

Digitized by Google

Frederick in vain tried to catch, as he had vainly done a dozen times before, the graceful line of the swan-like neck and the perfect poise of the stately head. For Madame Milena did not remain as usual quietly seated, but, absorbed as she was in talking with her guest, she changed her position a dozen times a minute, and the animation of her eyes, and the flashing brilliancy of her smile, set off as it was by her dazzling teeth, and her ever varying dimples, made her face a subject almost beyond portrayal.

Frederick was just about to throw down his pencil in despair and to start off for home when his wrist was caught in a sudden grasp. Prince started up and growled, and if the young artist had not interposed he would undoubtedly have flown at the intruder, who was no other than Mrs. Armstrong. She was in a state of vehement indignation, and was almost beside herself with excitement.

"So I have found you out at last, you wicked, infatuated boy," she panted. "This is the way you spend your evenings, is it? Oh, that your poor father were only alive to compel you to relinquish such demoralizing pursuits. But as to the creature that has ensnared you, I mean to give her a piece of my mind at once and thoroughly."

And off she started, unheeding Frederick's efforts to restrain her. Up the low steps leading from the garden to the drawing-room windows she went at full speed, followed by her sorely abashed son. In a moment they stood in the presence of Madame Milena. She rose from her seat, imposing and dignified, in her dress of rich lilac brocade, adorned with draperies of costly white lace. There were diamond roses shining in the glossy masses of her jet-black hair, and the slender hands that held the folds of a purple mantle, embroidered with gold that had just slipped from her shoulders, were ablaze with splendid rings. Her guest rose, too, and they both looked at Mrs. Armstrong in amazement.

"What is it that you want with me?" asked the lady.

"I come, madam, to reclaim my son," cried Mrs. Armstrong; "to set him free from the net of your fascinations. Oh, I know he has never spoken to you but once, and that was when he put his life in peril to pull your dog out of the water. But he thinks of nothing but you. He is spending his days in trying to paint your portrait, and every evening he lurks in your garden, at the serious risk of taking cold, just to get a glimpse of you and to make a pencil-sketch of you."

"Is this true?" asked the lady, turning upon Frederick the full effulgence of her great, dark eyes.

The words and glance drove Mrs. Armstrong quite out of her senses.

"True? Of course it is—every word of it. And what are you doing here in this quiet, respectable place, turning the head of a foolish boy by your looks and ways? I think you might better go back to where you belong without loss of time. We are not used to mysterious strangers at Seachester. And who are you, madam, anyhow, I should like to know? What is your name?"

The lady advanced a step or two towards the speaker with an indescribable stateliness of gesture. The diamonds in her hair flashed as though they formed a diadem, and the trailing purple cloak assumed the aspect of a royal mantle.

"My name is Anna Milena Elizabeth of Montenegro," she answered with dignity; "and I am the Queen of Moldavia."

Her grandiose-looking guest came forward and raised one of her hands respectfully to his lips.

"And I, General Count Milenko, of the bodyguard of King Charles of Roumania, sent by my gracious sovereign on a special mission to her Majesty, am here to attest to her identity and to protect her from further insult."

How Mrs. Armstrong got out of the drawing-room of Fenton's Folly she herself never exactly understood. Her son lingered behind her for a moment and hesitatingly addressed the Queen.

"May I crave your Majesty's pardon," he said, "for having intruded on your grounds and for having tried to paint your portrait? I did not know."

"You are forgiven," she replied, with one of her bewitching smiles. "But you must promise never to do so any more."

A few weeks later Scraps and Scandals contained the following paragraph:

"Queen Anna of Moldavia, who has been spending some weeks incognito at the seaside resort of Seachester, on the north coast, leaves England, we understand, in a day or two to join her royal consort, King Alexis, in Paris. He has been paying a visit to the King of Denmark, and the royal pair will proceed to Aix-les-Bains to join there Queen Anna's sister, the Grand Duchess Feodor of Russia, and their two little sons, the Princes Nicholas and Michael. Her Majesty's health having been severely shaken by the effects of an attack of influenza from which she suffered last winter her physicians prescribed for her a period of total repose and seclusion, as well as a prolonged course of sea-bathing. We are pleased to learn that the healthful breezes and the ocean baths of Seachester have completely restored the royal lady to health."

Two years later Frederick Armstrong's portrait of the Queen of Moldavia was one of the sensations of the Paris Salon, and won for the youthful artist the honours of a medal. The winsome sovereign, on the occasion of her many visits to Paris, had consented to give the painter, young and unknown though he was, a series of sittings, the result of which was that he achieved a masterpiece.

Poor Mrs. Armstrong has never been able to forgive herself for her hostile invasion of Fenton's Folly. But for that she might have been received at the Court of Moldavia with the cordiality due to the mother of the rescuer of Prince; she might have been able to stun her acquaintances and associates on her return to England by speaking in an off-hand manner of "my friend the Queen."

H. Clavers.

All Lovers of Good Fiction

Should read the new serial story just starting in "Home Notes," entitled: "THE HERMITS OF GRAY'S INN." It is written by G. B. Burgin, a writer whose work is pleasantly familiar to a large portion of the reading public. Among the popular stories he has published may be mentioned: "Old Man's Marriage," "Fortune's Football," "The Cattle Man." The story is of interest to men and women alike, and is of a very original character.

Order a copy of Home NOTES from your newsagent.

Digitized by Google

JOHN'S LITTLE SCHEME.

"Do you find the sofa pillow comfortable, dear? And does the shade keep the light from your poor, tired eyes? Have you heard about Mr. Dummer?—not old Mr. Dummer—he was his uncle; not Charles, but William. Charles married Mary Peters—but I'm afraid you're not interested, dear?"

"Oh, ah! Let me see. You said William married——"

"Oh, no!"

Silence, ominous but brief.

"John, the paper says that juvenile crime is on the increase. Well, I know that Dicky Smith stole Julia Welsh's apple the other Sunday, and right in prayer time, too. I don't feel as though I were doing half my duty—the children lack so much that we expect as a matter of course. Yet some of them are so bright. We were talking about postage stamps the other day, and Sammy——"

"Oh, yes, my dear! Quite true. And now, if you don't mind, I think I'll run out for a while. Bad plan, I dare say, to lie down in the evening. Be back in an hour or so."

"I'll have read the paper by that time, and I'll tell you all the news; that'll save your poor eyes and——"

But Chesley was out of earshot, whistling ruefully. If there were two things dear to his heart—beside his wife—they were an early and quiet perusal of the evening paper and a short refreshing nap after the day's office work.

He strolled along wistfully, gazing idly into shop windows, and noticing in one of them two or three phonographs, variously labelled, he sauntered in, dropped his coin in the slot and listened to "There's a good time coming."

"Great idea, isn't it, Chesley?' said someone, slapping him on the back. "Got one of my own; talk into it for an hour or so, typewriter comes in, turn it over to her, go fishing, come back, letters all written. Well, can't you say 'How d'you do,' to a fellow? Don't mind a slap on the back, I hope?" for Chesley was making for the door.

"Oh, no; that's all right. Fact is—just thought of something; see you later."

"Forgot to post his wife's letter, I suppose. Good fellow, Chesley; but frightfully fidgetty and offish since he married," soliloquised Jackson, turning to the phonograph for consolation.

The truth was that an idea had struck Chesley; a ravishing idea, full of delightful possibilities. Why not talk to his wife per phonograph instead of per se, when she wandered into the mazes of genealogy or upset his cherished nap with mistimed dissertations of philanthropy?

His conception was crude, but there were dazzling suggestions. Her talk, he reflected, ran largely in ruts Of course, the matter called for a certain amount of observation and careful averaging, while the phonographic replies must be, necessarily, of a general and non-committal nature—not that he need worry over that, however, since his share in the conversation was usually vague to the verge of incoherence.

Mrs. Chesley had no reason to complain of her husband's inattention for the next week. Indeed, she confided to one of her friends that "John really seemed to be getting interested in mission work, and to take an active interest in his relatives, too."

Meanwhile, Chesley was working out enough averages to qualify him for a census compiler. After carefully classifying his wife's remarks, he decided upon the following schedule:

Average length of remarks requiring assent, one minute and a half; requiring dissent, five and three-quarters; interjections, one per minute. These three divisions seemed likely to afford sufficient scope; it only remained to give them a certain qualified utterance, a cautious assent and yet a more cautious dissent—in snort to model them on the style that marks a good listener—and he was ready to interview the phonograph maker.

Digitized by Google

"Want an electrical attachment that will start and stop the cylinder at pleasure? And a megaphone that can be heard anywhere in an ordinary-sized room? Oh, yes; I can do it all right; send it home at the end of the week."

"Very well; the sooner the better," Chesley replied.

"Well, some folks have money they don't know what to do with," was all the phonograph maker said to his apprentice.

The phonograph and its attachments came home in due time. It was an easy matter to stow it away under the parlour sofa; the connections at the end of the slender wires could be held in one hand.

Chesley was cautious. He tried interjections to begin with, then isolated phrases; and, growing bolder, a number of remarks in the same strain. Thus he achieved comparative comfort. A nap, of course, was out of the question; but it was much not to be obliged to make verbal comments.

It is true that the phonograph would be a trifle hasty at times, and then again would lag, but that mattered little; his remarks had seldom been exactly placed. He even grew bold—or careless—enough to indulge in surreptitious dozes.

"My dear," remarked his wife one evening, "mamma writes me that her visit is unavoidably postponed."

"Yes?" queried the phonograph.

"I should think that you might show a little more sympathy, John. Dear mamma has not been here since last spring. I'm afraid she didn't enjoy her last visit."

"I hope so."

"Do you mean you hope she did or she didn't? I believe you're more than half asleep!" which was true. Indeed, at the prospect of postponement, John had slipped into tranquil slumber, and the phonograph was having all things its own way.

"I want to take mamma shopping when she does come, and I'd like you to go with us."

"Certainly."

"Why, John! How nice of you! You generally make such a frightful fuss about shopping. Why, it seems as if we were just married, to hear you say it. You used to enjoy it, then."

"Not at all."

"Oh, John! Well, you never made a bother about it, anyhow. That's something to your credit; though I don't think you need have been so f-frank about it—if we have been m-married four months and a-a half!"

"Just so, just so."

"And sometimes I think you don't lo-love me as m-much as you did then——"

"That's right."

"John Chesley! Then that horrid Pilkington woman has been at you again. She's forty if she's a day, and she bleaches her hair."

"Rather tasty, I think, my dear."

"John Chesley, I'm going straight back to mamma to-morrow morning——"

"You couldn't do better."

"And I shall apply at once for a judical separation——"

"Wish you all success, my dear!"

"Don't 'my dear' me, Mr. Chesley! I'm going to my room, and don't you dare come near me! Perhaps some day you'll know what a wife you've l-l-lost——"

"Don't worry about me; I'm all right."

No wonder that Mrs. Chesley slammed the door.

That woke Chesley up. His consciousness came back to him in a flash. The phonograph had betrayed him. He heard it still repeating its senseless chatter. He could stop that, at any rate.

Now, when one has eaten a hearty dinner, the return to consciousness after the ensuing nap does not always imply a return of the power of motion. Therefore the phonograph continued its one-sided conversation, and Chesley lay on the sofa helpless, anxious and perspiring. What had happened? Something very wrong by the way the door had slammed.

What would Kate do next? Would the fiend under the sofa go on or run down? The mischief! She was coming down stairs now. But—yes—hurrah! The terror was running down. If only——" And his wife opened the door.

"John, I didn't know—perhaps you were—talking in your sleep. It wasn't very nice of you"—the phonograph never spoke—"but if you'll only say something—"

A pause—oh, to be able to say one word. Buz-z-z—click! The phonograph takes its innings. "I'm—sorry—" Final gasp! Oh, excellent phonograph!

"That's all I want, John. There, I'll give you a k-kiss. Oh, I've been so m-m-miserable, John."

John takes his oldtime comfort in his nap and the newspaper, so he must have told Kate all about it. As for the phonograph, it went to a writer of realistic stories, who gained great praise for the fidelity of his dialogue.

B. Paget.

Digitized by Google

Football Players Competition!

OPEN TO EVERYBODY. £10 IN PRIZES. OPEN TO EVERYBODY.

Below will be found ten sets of words, each of which indicates the name of some well-known football player.

For example, "A young goose" signifies, of course, Gosling.

Ten names will appear each week for five weeks, making fifty names in all.

Keep all your lists by you until you are told to send them in.

To the person who succeeds in solving the greatest number we will give

A CRISP £5 NOTE.

TO THE NEXT, £2; TO THE NEXT, £2; AND TO THE NEXT, £1;

while consolation prizes will be awarded to the extent of twenty handsome volumes which competitors may select for themselves from the catalogue of books issued by this firm.

If you are weak in the names of football players, your brother, or cousin, or male friend will give you a helping hand.

SHORT STORIES "FOOTBALL PLAYERS" COUPON No. 3.

21. A wood.	21. .....
22. Mutilates.	22. .....
23. Corpulent.	23. .....
24. A meadow.	24. .....
25. Places of abode.	25. .....
26. A small dagger.	26. .....
27. Small.	27. .....
28. An underground room.	28. .....
29. A fish and part of a lamp.	29. .....
30. An ancient German tribe.	30. .....

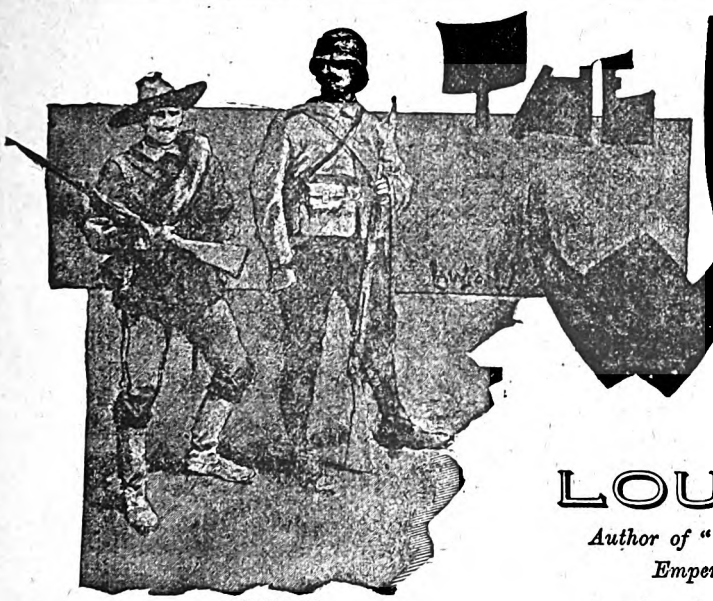
Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

HOW A BRITISH ARMY CORPS LANDED IN GERMANY.



THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

TIME 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

France and Germany declare war against Great Britain.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

An inventor secures an audience with the Prince of Wales and demonstrates to him the utility of a new weapon, with the result that steps are immediately taken to manufacture an enormous number of them.

The Hornet, a torpedo boat, commanded by Rodney, blows up the Suez Canal. Paris is in a state of fermentation owing to the repulse of the Allied fleet.

Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour's fleet gains a decisive victory over the Allies off the Rock of Gibraltar.

A representative of the New York World interviews Lord Salisbury on a matter that is not yet made public.

The British organise two expeditious, one to invade France, and one to invade Germany. The first army corps appears off Havre, and after a short bombardment which lasts till nightfall, the fleet withdraws, the troopships move northwards, and the soldiers are landed at a point opposite Bléville.

The French are routed and the British enter the city.

The representative of the Times succeeds in getting the news to the office two hours before it was received by the other papers, and an enormous sale of the Times is the result. The news of the victory is enthusiastically received in Parliament.

CHAPTER XV.

How Germany was Outwitted.

WHEN Sir Evelyn Wood was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the British forces in Germany, he evinced no misgivings as to the enormous task intrusted to his charge.

He reported himself in due course at the Horse Guards, and commenced to discuss the plan of campaign with the utmost coolness.

"You have not been long in making up your mind on your scheme of attack," observed Lord Wolseley.

"It has been thought out for at least five years," was the grave but startling reply.

Lord Wolseley looked at him in astonishment.

"Sir," explained the gallant General, "I have deemed it my duty to make myself acquainted with both the strength and the weakness of the defences of every first-class power in Europe. War bursts out when least expected, and—to speak without arrogance—I have had my plans for the invasion of every country on the Continent complete and pigeon-holed for years."

"Perhaps we had better examine your scheme in conjunction with the suggested operations prepared by the Intelligence Department," was Lord Wolseley's reply. "But your zeal is worthy of you."

Sir Evelyn showed that he appreciated his chief's kindly words.

"I have my plans, it is true," was his courteous answer, "but I have not the genius to foretell precisely how they will fall out."

It was a delicate compliment to the most brilliant quality of the Commander-in-Chief. Lord Wolseley smiled, for compliments are rare things in the mouth of Sir Evelyn Wood, and the two soldiers proceeded to examine minutely the proposed method of attack upon the German coast.

For three hours they were closeted together in private conference, and when Sir Evelyn rose to depart, Lord Wolseley shook him warmly by the hand.

"It is an audacious stroke that you propose," he said; "certainly one that the enemy will not expect."

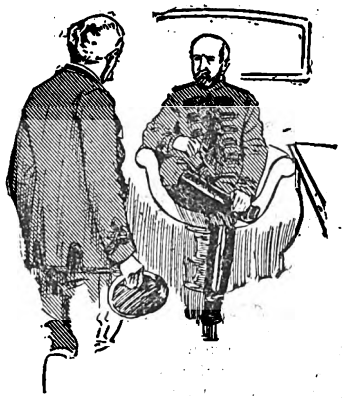
"That," Sir Evelyn replied, "is the chief claim to consideration."

The Commander-in-Chief nodded in agreement.

"It needs all the skill and daring of a brave and experienced officer," he observed quietly, "and we are fortunate in possessing such a man. The nothern defence of Germany is terribly complete. From Hamburg to Dantzic the coast bristles with the strongest fortresses in Europe. But I have confidence in your plan, despite its danger. God speed you."

"Where are the rest gone to?"

Digitized by Google



He summoned to him Colonel Sir W. Lockhart.

And Sir Evelyn Wood departed to attend to the preliminary arrangements for one of the most desperate ventures in the history of the war.

He was a soldier eminently fitted for such an enterprise. A skilful tactician and a finished master in the handling of troops or the judgment of a position, he was also singularly untrammelled by traditions. He was quick in invention and suffered no conventional axiom to stand in the way of a novel or daring manœuvre.

His coolness was as striking as his brilliancy. On one occasion, when in command of a body of troops in the Transvaal, he was approaching the lines alone in the early morning, when, not heeding the challenge of the sentry, he was fired at. The ball passed through his helmet.

Stepping up to the horrified soldier, who now recognised him, he observed calmly:

"Young man, next time you challenge, shout louder, and next time you shoot, aim lower."

It was this phlegmatic, yet resourceful soldier, who was intrusted with the attack upon the German Empire. And his scheme was extraordinary in its sheer daring.

About 200,000 men were detailed for service against Germany, together with a powerful fleet under the command of Sir Nowell Salmon, V.C.

The troops were formed of mixed battalions, for both the militia and the volunteers were drawn upon, and were massed at three great centres along the east coast. At Hull, the southern army corps, headed by the 1st and 2nd Battalions of the Coldstream Guards, the 2nd Battalions of the Buffs and the Royal Fusiliers, with the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Battalions of their attached militia and volunteers, formed a splendid brigade under the command of Lieutenant-General Guyon. The Northumberland Fusiliers, the York and Lancaster Regiment, the Yorkshire Regiment, and several northern battalions gathered at Newcastle, whilst the Seaforth Highlanders, together with the Connaught Rangers and their militia, were noticeable among the troops massed at Leith. Few in numbers, indeed, this army was for its purpose; but none could be finer in discipline, in record, or in reputation.

On Thursday morning a small but powerful fleet, under the command of Admiral Sir Nowell Salmon, left the Humber with half-a-dozen troopships and made its way in the direction of Tronning and the Kiel Canal. Scarcely had it reached the noble water-way that joins the Baltic and the North Sea, than, in the dusk of the evening, a strong contingent of warships, conveying an immense number of troopers, was noted by fishermen in the Kattegat steaming rapidly into the Baltic.

The most precise orders had been given to Sir Nowell Salmon. He was to attack the approaches of the Canal with as much fury as possible, and to keep up the fire without ceasing for three days. He was to make a feint of attempting to land troops; but against the actual accomplishment of this he was strictly warned.

"Why, I shall draw upon myself the entire German forces!" exclaimed the Admiral when Sir Evelyn Wood gave him his instructions.

"I trust so!" said the General significantly.

With these strange orders the fleet had steamed across the German Ocean, and in less than a day came in sight of the fortress which commands the entrance to the Canal. The project on which they were embarked seemed to everyone fantastic.

"Where are the rest gone to?" grumbled Captain Rowlett of the Northumberland. "Are we to waste ourselves on the impossible?"

"Don't be alarmed," the Admiral reassured him. "You need not flatter yourself there will be no fighting."

"But attacking the canal in this way with a dozen ships—what is our object?"

"What?" repeated Sir Nowell. "Why, to look like two dozen, and fight like two hundred. By George, if it is not a big enough job to persuade our friends the enemy that a few second-class cruisers are the entire British Navy, you must be hard to satisfy!"

"Ah!" said the commander more cheerfully, "if fighting will lead them to that conclusion, I'll guarantee they'll be perfectly convinced by nightfall."

And he went off contentedly to see that his ship was in proper trim.

Within two hours the British ships had opened fire upon the town of Tronning, and the banks of the canal for the first time in its history reverberated with the ceaseless sound of cannon.

As the day closed the authorities at Berlin received word that a strong detachment of the British Navy convoying many troopships, had appeared at the entrance of the Kiel Canal and that Tronning was in imminent danger of capture. The defensive works had not been completed, the strength of the town was slight, and the activity of the British guns had already made terrible havoc with the fortifications. One attempt had been made to land troops on the south side of the water, but it had failed owing to the gallantry of the German defence. But another was expected, and it was feared, might succeed.

Chancellor Caprivi laughed at the news.

"We must be thankful," he exclaimed, "that daring and stupidity are closely knit. The enemy is good enough to deliver herself into our hands. There is no ally more useful than over-confidence in the foe!"

Over-joyed at the ease of the task before them, the authorities at Berlin sent instructions to all their depots along the north coast. Their army in the locality was not great. Most of the troops were on the borders of France and many were still locked in the Mediterranean or on their way to distant colonies.

One or two of the fortresses along the Baltic had been drawn upon for the ill-fated expedition that had been swept under the waters of the English Channel. There was still, however, a strong force at various northern centres, and by rapid entrainment these were gathered together. On the following morning one hundred thousand men were stationed on the South side of the Kiel Canal, waiting to devour the doomed Englishmen as soon as they should venture to seek a footing.

Had the enemy possessed a fleet at this point the English position would have been hopeless. But, as it was, there was security, save in the event of the foolhardy experiment of landing. The fleet kept up a continual and terrible fire, but no attempt was made to come on shore.

Dragging up the guns.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile, with a clear day's start, the rest of the fleet, with its transports carrying 200,000 men, was, as we have seen, slipping along the friendly sea which opened a passage into the Baltic. It was a race against time. Everything depended upon the point they aimed at being reached before the enemy were aware of the ruse and could muster troops to meet them.

Nor was it a difficult task to maintain secrecy. Held alike by interest and ties of blood, Denmark had engaged itself to a neutrality that should by its very strictness favour an English invasion of Germany. The Government had pledged its word to permit no intelligence of British movements around Danish shores to pass the frontier.

Without a fleet in the seas, with only a stray gunboat or two lying in the harbours of Dantzic and Kiel, there could be no resistance by Germany to a strong advance. But with a secretly hostile neighbour, and opposed by skilled manœuvring and the stratagems of accomplished generals, there could not be even intelligence of what was going forward.

Shortly after dusk on the night when a powerful German army was concentrated at the entrance to the Kiel Canal, the British fleet had crossed the western bed of the Baltic, and, but for a haze over the sea, might have descried upon the horizon the lights of the town of Stralsund.

A small, irregular, and ugly place, with narrow, ill-paved streets and all the gloom of squalid decline, sole amongst its virtues Stralsund possessed a spacious harbour, into which vessels of fifteen feet draught might proceed safely, and with ample accommodation in its entrance channel for the biggest ships afloat. Across the straits lay the island of Rugen, and, mid-way, the tiny island of Danholm dotted the water, heavy with fortifications.

Stralsund lay amid marshes which could only be traversed by broad roads built upon reclaimed land, with occasional bridges across water spaces. Thus isolated, it seemed a spot which no man would dream of attacking. And so, indeed, the German generals had considered; for they had not hesitated to weaken its garrison by drafts taken to form the force that attempted to invade England, and still later for the army that menaced the little fleet at Tronning.

Its guns commanded the sea, its morasses and lakes cut off the foe by land. So secured, a handful of men, it was reasoned, should be enough to defy the world.

It was a strange place, Stralsund, with its island, its shallow harbours, its marshes, and its fortress, that Sir Evelyn Wood had decided to make his point of attack. Here he would set foot upon German soil.

The favouring darkness shrouded the fleet as it sped silently upon its way. The General knew that in six hours the fate of his daring swoop upon the German coast would be irrevocably determined.

His scheme was indeed audacious, but one element was in his favour. The depth of water enabled him to creep in close to the shore, and he felt confident that he would be able, before the enemy realised what had happened, to land a strong brigade of cavalry and two batteries of horse gunners upon the coast some five miles from the line of fortifications.

He summoned to him Colonel Sir S. W. Lockhart.

"Colonel Lockhart," he said, "we have reached the crucial point in a desperate adventure. All now depends upon individual courage. I have chosen you to command one of the finest brigades of cavalry that the British army could put under one man's charge. Upon your pluck and that of your men is staked the complete success of my plan of operations."

Colonel Lockhart flushed with pleasure.

"Stralsund," continued the General, "is a very strong place. It might appear impregnable. It has so appeared to the German commander. I will not deny its extraordinary advantages, but, Colonel, these very advantages may be applied to effect her ruin. It is to secure this that I am going to disembark your brigade. I will give you the Scots' Greys, the Carabineers, and the 1st and 2nd Life Guards. With them go D and E Batteries of the Horse Artillery. You will find, shortly after gaining the shore, that a strong, broad military road, built on the treacherous soil, leads to Stralsund. The town at its rear is connected by bridges with the solid country that stretches beyond the morass. These bridges make attack difficult from land.

"But they also make escape impossible if they are taken and a double fire is opened on the town."

"I comprehend your plan," assented the Brigadier.

"Halt!"

"Your duty, sir, is, at all hazards and at all sacrifices, to take possession of those bridges, to hold them, and then storm the town. If you do so, I will guarantee that an English Army Corps shall be on German soil to-morrow.

"Fail, and we are routed, expelled, disgraced. There is no alternative."

"If hard riding and indifference to consequences can effect your purpose, sir," replied the Colonel proudly, "you may rely upon the British cavalry doing so."

"I know it. I believe you," answered Sir Evelyn, a little affected. "Go: I shall open fire on Stralsund and upon the island. Under cover of my guns you will land and carry out your movement. Good-night. We will meet at Stralsund to-morrow."

Thus speaking, he dismissed him.

By this time the night had come, dark and perplexing, for great clouds rolled along the skies and swallowed up the young moon. Little more than five miles off lay the unconscious town with its empty harbour, whilst from the shore the melancholy wastes of humid earth stretched lonely and silent toward the gentle pasture lands of Mecklenburg. Stralsund seemed a town in a wilderness—the one secure spot rescued by adventurous man from surrounding horror.

The larger vessels steamed slowly on. Opposite the landing point the sea was alive with boats laden with a freight of men, horses, and guns. Amid such silence as was possible the sturdy craft bore to shore the gallant heroes who were to stake their lives upon the hazard of a chance.

As the third fleet of boats moved off, there came a deafening roar in front. The Royal Arthur had already opened fire upon Stralsund.

Roused so rudely from stagnant security, the town became conscious of an unexpected and deadly foe attacking her from her own waters. In a moment fortress and island were alive with soldiers dazed by consternation and bewilderment. And now answering booms declared the challenge accepted. England and Germany were engaged at last.

Amid the din and the terror and all the fury of this shock of arms, the brigade had landed upon foreign soil, unnoticed, unopposed. As the gunners of Stralsund were firing wildly out to sea, a swift and silent avalanche of gallant men were rushing down to destroy the only hope of succour from the mainland.

CHAPTER XVI.

A Desperate Ride.

It was with difficulty that the troops under the command of Brigadier Lockhart made their way over the stony beach to firm land.

Digitized by Google

The darkness of the night and the roar of the guns booming across the sea favoured the landing. The wind was now high, and the clouds that scuttled over the skies rendered the fitful light of the moon uncertain and confusing.

The cavalry made their way slowly over the shingly beach. Fortunately, it shelved but slightly, and the guns were dragged up without much delay; but Colonel Lockhart, when he gained the plateau, could not suppress a feeling of anxiety.

As far as the eye could reach through the gloom stretched the bare plain, without protection or shelter. The troops had been landed near Clausdorf, which lay in their rear.

Along the shore ran a narrow road, threading its slender way over shifting ground and dangerous stretches of marsh land until it reached the village of Prahn.

Here, Lockhart knew, the military road started, a broad, well-paved highway, suited alike for soldiers and artillery. Built with all the precision of a Roman street, without deviation of any sort, it gave a safe passage into Stralsund.

Unluckily, this road lay along the coast, and entered the town at a northern point. It was essential to strike off at some point midway, and proceed in a more southerly direction, in order to gain the Tribseer Damm. This chaussée linked Stralsund with the mainland, and was, from its very security, the safest road for the purpose of an unexpected attack upon the town.

It was clear that, to begin with, the movements of the brigade would be tedious and difficult. As the men clambered up to the rough bridle-path, they found that strict discipline would be impossible. The road was uneven, and on both sides lay the treacherous ground that threatened danger to those who were unfortunate enough to get entangled in it. To add to the peril, the horses were fresh and excited, after their long confinement, and could with difficulty be restrained within the inadequate space at command.

Only troops to whom discipline was an instinct could have taken their situation with anything like rapidity along so cramped a road. A good hour was occupied in forming the line and in dragging up the guns, for every step of the way had to be tested, and the deviation of an inch or two would have meant the overturning of a gun and a serious and confusing delay.

In front were the 1st and 2nd Life Guards and the Scots Greys. The artillery was placed in the centre with a Maxim strapped to every gun-carriage, and the Carabineers brought up the rear. They formed a brigade of about two thousand strong.

In the distance glimmered the lights of Stralsund; out to sea was the flare of the cannon; over the great sodden plain the British cavalry carefully threaded its way.

The German struck him violently on the head.

"Bah!" exclaimed Conway, of the 2nd Life Guards, to Riches, of the Greys, as they floundered for the sixth time in the dank ooze at the head of the column, "was ever such a cursed place before as Stralsund? I don't mind fighting, or dying, for that matter, but hang it if I think a cavalry officer should be called upon to get muddy!"

"Stral——," began Riches, but as he spoke his horse slipped over the ledge of the road and the animal's forefeet sank ten inches in the swamp. The lieutenant swore heartily as with some difficulty he got back to firm land again.

"Who ever heard of the beastly place before?" he exclaimed bitterly.

"Never mind!" responded Conway cheerfully. "Stralsund is in luck. After it's captured by us it will become famous. There are half-a-dozen places I know that have become quite prosperous on the strength of a British victory there."

"Do you know the town?"

"Stopped there a day by necessity," answered the other. "A miserable hole, bad hotels, infamous drains, vile cigars, extortionate charges. Fine old Rathhaus, though. Dates from the thirteenth century!"

"Good," grumbled his companion, "the next one will date from the twentieth."

"I don't know it——"

Conway was about to fling his gibe at the unconscious city when suddenly he pulled back his horse with a warning cry.

"Take care, for Heaven's sake!" he shouted.

Riches looked ahead, then pulled back his horse upon its haunches, held his sword over his head, and shouted "Halt!" with all his lung power.

"Great Heavens! What an escape!"

It was Riches who made this exclamation. Before him, stretching for a good half-mile, was a morass quivering as if with cruel desire. The road took a sudden bend to the right, and had not the two officers noted the fact in time they would have ridden into the quagmire to certain death, and the press of the cavalry behind would have driven scores of horsemen to follow them.

Even as it was, to check the movement of the brigade was no easy matter, for it lay far extended, and the rear, impatient of delay and ignorant of the cause, pressed forward and seriously embarrassed the van.

Conway and Riches, standing at the turning, saw the troops on, and remained to prevent disaster to those behind.

And thus slowly and with difficulty the brigade reached Prahn.

It was a small village, ill lit and almost deserted. But the eyes of the soldiers gleamed as they saw the broad high road that ran through it, wide, well-paved, and strong.

There was now no time to lose. Everything depended upon dispatch.

"Captain Lugard," hurriedly directed the Brigadier, "Take forty men and form a cordon round the village, and prevent anyone leaving it to give alarm. Follow us in ten minutes."

So saying, he gave orders for the brigade to form up in fours, and make at full gallop along the highway leading to the railway line, which lay to the south of Stralsund and gave excellent approach to the dam.

There were a few soldiers at Prahn. They had gone out from the barracks earlier in the day, and were drinking at the tavern there. As the English horsemen dashed by the Bierhaus, the horses' hoofs clattering on the stony street, and drawing fire as they struck the cobbles, some of the Germans turned sleepily out, half dazed by drink, and gazed in stupid wonderment.

But Captain Lugard seized their arms without further ado, and it was impossible for them, even if they had the sense, to give the alarm.

Across the road, and along by the low line of cottages that stretched to the north, the forty horsemen stood, ready to intercept any villager who might seek to make his way to Stralsund. The distance by road was very short, and the Captain guessed that the brigade would not only meet obstacles when they left the highway, but be delayed by narrow paths until they reached the railway. It was a question of minutes, and a fleet-footed messenger might, without difficulty, make his way to the town along the direct road and give timely warning.

Private Forsyth, of the Carabineers, was thinking this as he gazed out towards Stralsund and saw the marsh land that spread like a fetid desert to the sea. As he did so he started at observing a figure making its way rapidly along the insecure ground towards the town.

Digitized by Google

It was clearly a man who was acquainted with some secret passage through the morass, and had slipped through the line of soldiers with the hope of reaching the town in time to give the alarm. He was picking his path swiftly and with skill, and Forsyth's heart leapt when he realised that at such a rate the villager would be in Stralsund in twenty minutes. It was clear that the brigade would never get round to the southern chaussée before the enemy was apprised.

There was no time for deliberation, still less to report the affair and get orders. The carabineer was swift to act.

Leaping from his horse, he threw aside his cloak, unfastened his belt and cast it to the ground. Thus lightened he dashed off in the wake of the fugitive.

The mud sank beneath him as he made his first spring, but his feet were light, and to his joy he found that he could distinguish the footprints of the man he pursued. Keeping strictly in the track of these he sped over the swamp, making few slips, and always recovering his footing when he chanced to alight on treacherous ground. His pace was as rapid as the German's, despite his disadvantages; it was not in vain that he had gained prizes for running in the regimental sports.

Thus silently the two men sped over the morass, the German unconscious of his pursuer.

When he had gone a quarter of a mile the fugitive halted a moment on a jut of solid rock and looked anxiously round. Forsyth guessed that here was his chance, if he were to get one at all. The German had for a second or so missed the track. He was peering closely at the ground round him when suddenly he became aware that he was pursued. He restarted at once; but he plunged a little heavily, having evidently lost his bearings. That moment enabled Forsyth to make a spring upon him. The German turning smartly round, struck him violently on the head with a stick that he carried; but the trooper, half-stunned, yet intent on his purpose, had enough alertness to throw his arms round his opponent and drag him to the earth. A desperate struggle ensued, the German making frantic efforts to disentangle himself from the embrace.

This, indeed, he might have done. Forsyth's grip was losing its intensity, for his head swam and a strange faintness came over him.

In that supreme moment his thoughts turned to his home in Old England, and to the wife who was crying her eyes out, hoping against hope for the safe return of him she would never again see. There was but one alternative left him. He realised that it needed the sacrifice of his own life; and then, with that common heroism that shone as brightly in the British rank and file in that time of struggle and sacrifice, as in their officers, he gathered up all that remained of his strengh, and precipitated his assailant by sheer force into the morass.

With a ringing cheer they dashed over the dam.

The German cried out in his horror, but was helpless. There the two lay, still clinging to each other, sinking slowly into the frightful ooze, whilst the dank mud pressed up and up, and swallowed them in its greed, until there remained nothing but the quivering surface, without so much as a rift to mark the grave of the two brave men.

It was thus that Private Forsyth threw away his life for his country, without a witness, and with nothing to testify to his gallant deed.

Digitized by Google

Sir Evelyn Wood was gazing earnestly through his glasses.

Next day he was missed. His comrades wondered that they found no trace of his body; and then promptly forgot about him. A hero, unhonoured and unknown; he was a true type of that sublime courage which more than generalship or statecraft won for Britain her splendid victories against enormous odds.

Meanwhile Lockhart's brigade swept along the broad road at a furious rate. Riches felt the blood tingle in his veins at the exhilaration of the race through the bleak, chill country. In the hearts of officers and men alike there rose the joy of soldiership, the thrill of excitement and desire for battle.

About a mile and a half from the town they turned away into a lane hedged on both sides by young hawthorn, which shook its trembling dew as the brigade passed along. A belated countryman who was strolling homeward jumped terrified into the hedge as he heard the thundering clatter of the horses' hoofs and saw the cavalry fly past; nor did he venture forth again till daylight gave him courage and his wits returned.

Soon the brigade, dashing up the shelving embankment, gained the railway, and crossed it, rapidly reforming on the southern road that ran parallel with it. They sped along with reckless haste, each horseman with drawn sword, and the column in perfect order.

They could see the lights of the outer town twinkling on either side of them; but although the alarm was raised it was impossible to send the news on ahead, and when the Englishmen reached the station and had swept onwards beyond it, they found that there were no preparations to meet them.

The gates of the inner town were open, and the drawbridge by which entrance is gained to the fortifications had not been raised. The reason was obvious.

Over the chaussée there poured a disorderly multitude of men and women, terrified at the sudden descent of the British vessels, and making off as rapidly as possible to the station, whence they sought to fly inland.

There was not a moment's hesitation on the part of the cavalry. With a ringing cheer they dashed over the dam, and almost before the Germans were aware of their presence they had cut down the guard, seized the gate, entered the town, and possessed themselves of the defensive works. The Brigadier dispatched Colonel Olcott along the eastern road with Conway, who knew the town, and a strong detachment of the Greys, and after leaving a guard to keep the gate, flung himself at the head of the main body of his troops into the Neuer Markt.

He was careful also to send up a signal of three white rockets, thereby informing Sir Evelyn Wood that the first part of his mission had succeeded, and that he had gained an entrance into Stralsund.

It was fortunate he had left Captain Lugard behind. When the gallant officer felt himself justified in leaving Prahn—as impatient to share the glory of the attack as his men—he led his troop at a hard gallop along the route the main body had taken.

When he reached the railway he observed that a large signal-box stood beside the line. Happily inspired, he dismounted with a few of his men, forced the door open, and seized the signalman as he was busily engaged at the telegraph instrument, which was forthwith smashed.

A few minutes later he had wrecked the points of the railway, and thus had cut off communication by either medium with Berlin and the outlying country. Then, after an impetuous race, he entered the gates of the town and joined the attacking party.

By this time the Germans had recovered from the shock which this unexpected movement had caused. There was not a large force in Straslund, and most of the men were engaged at the batteries along the seashore. But Commander Schwiftzeit hastily got them together and hurried along the Ossenreyerstrasse in the direction of the Tribseer Damm.

His movement was a fatal one. The position of the British force was superb. As the Germans advanced along the broad street that entered the Neuer Markt, a terrible fire was opened by the British artillery, which was placed at the entrances of the three streets converging at this point. A deadly and resistent torrent of canister and Maxim bullets tore along, mowing down the Germans in horrible carnage.

Deprived of shelter, and open to a ceaseless fire, they had no alternative but to retreat as rapidly as they could.

But a new calamity now awaited them. When they had reached the Rathhaus, a second fire was opened upon them from Badenstrasse, which intersected their path at right angles. This came from Colonel Olcott's men. They had dashed along the eastern line, turned into the Eillerstrasse, and lay in wait for the enemy near the Nikolaikirche.

Thus raked by two converging fires the Germans fell in hundreds. Unable to withstand the fierceness of the attack, their ranks were thrown into pitiful confusion, and they fled in irrecoverable rout. Now was the time for the impatient cavalry.

"Trot! Gallop! Charge!" successively rang out the voice of Colonel Lockhart, and along the street the fine British horse dashed with impetuous force, decimating the flying foe, and driving them before their sabres to right and left in straggling and helpless fragments.

Only a few minutes had elapsed, so rapidly was the British attack concentrated and completed. The whole of the town remained in the hands of the invaders.

Nor did the Brigadier delay to make his victory complete.

Galloping along the Badenstrasse, the artillery took up their position in the right rear of the batteries which were even then firing at the British vessels.

Here the remainder of the Maxims were unstrapped and aligned. In a few seconds a deadly rain of bullets was pouring obliquely along the line of the fortifications, sweeping down the gunners and clearing the embrasures.

Standing on the bridge of the Royal Arthur, Sir Evelyn Wood was gazing earnestly through his glasses at the harbour and canal of Stralsund. He knew that the town had been taken. There remained but a little hard fighting before his brilliant and audacious attack would prove completely successful.

Suddenly a rocket darted up from the chief bastion, a rocket of red, which was twice repeated. And as suddenly the guns of the fleet became silent in their attack on the town.

A gleam of satisfaction lit up the commander-in-chief's eye, for what he had anticipated had occurred. A great shell whizzed through the air and fell, not upon a British vessel, but upon the fortifications of Danholm. Stralsund itself was engaged in a deadly attack on the island which defended it.

Poked his head through the ticket-window.

Digitized by Google

So far he had kept the fleet out of harm's way firing upon the opposing forts, but not approaching nearer than was absolutely necessary.

But now the ships steamed on ahead to north and westward of the island, and coming in close to shore opened a devastating fire upon its forts.

Meanwhile, under the cover of the battery at Stralsund, through the smoke and confusion, the transports made a rapid dash to the harbour.

Here in the spacious canal they rested in safety, and whilst the guns at Dänholm were contending desperately but in vain with those of the fleet, the British army quietly disembarked.

At dawn on the following morning the forts at Dänholm were crippled and useless. Stralsund was occupied by the British army, and 200,000 Englishmen lay encamped on German soil.

When the Royal Arthur steamed majestically into port a ringing cheer was sent up, which was repeated when the Commander-in-Chief met Admiral Fitzroy on the quay and took his hand in a fervent grasp. Soldiers and sailors alike were in a state of elation.

"Say, Bill," observed an A.B. reflectively to a mess-mate, removing a black pipe from his lips, "I've been a-studying these 'ere placards, and, as far as I can make it out, we're only about five hours' steam from Berlin."

Bill discharged a narcotic stream at the poster, and answered:

"Blest if them deluded Germans wouldn't be doing a good thing for themselves if they allowed us to go on comfortably by train. Lord, what trouble it would save us and them!"

The same notion had struck Midshipmen Napier and Chance of the Royal Arthur. They had prowled around the town after breakfast in search of diversion, and had made their way to the railway station.

Napier's face lighted with glee as he stepped up to the booking-office, where some terrified officials had ensconced themselves.

Poking his head through the ticket window and looking benevolently on a clerk who was crouching down by the fireside, he said in excellent German:

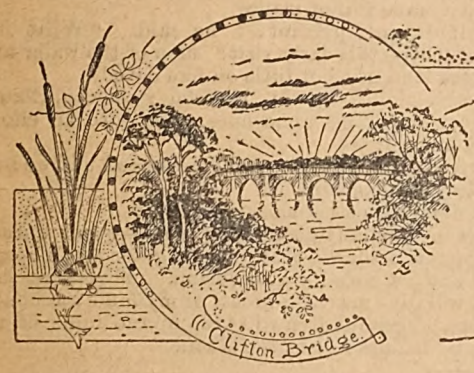
"Two hundred thousand first-class tickets to Berlin, please; not returns."

But no one offered to execute this magnificent order, and the middy turned away with a look of disgust.

"And they call themselves a commercial nation!" he exclaimed to Chance. "We offer to give 'em a ten per cent. dividend on the entire stock in five minutes and they refuse the favour!"

"Never mind," replied his brother middy laconically; "they'll probably be glad enough to book the return order in Berlin!"

(To be continued.)



The Champion of the Rhone.

I.

The fields were balmy with perfume.

The ripe hay, laid low by the stroke of the scythe, swooned under the devouring kiss of the sun, and over the warm meadows floated its expiring soul. Between sloping banks a little stream wended its lazy, rippling way, while, beneath, pebbles glistened in its transparent waters.

An interminable row of poplars, motionless in the still air, cast the only shadow over the universal sunshine of the fields.

The hum of insects accentuated with its murmur the silence of the fields, made drowsy by the heavy torpor of noonday.

In the thin, scant shelter of the hedges the mowers and haymakers slept a heavy sleep, their mouths open and their faces covered with perspiration. Greedily they enjoyed the rest before returning to their labour, which would last until sunset.

The summer sun was already at the height of its course and strength.

The fields spread out along the course of the brook until it lost itself in the great river, the Rhone, glittering like steel, made blue by the ardent reflections of the luminous sky.

Green banks bordered the stream, and willows hung low over the water, which, weary with having run so fast, cradled itself amidst their roots. The heavy trunks spread their luxuriant branches over the green grass, affording grateful shade.

In a lonely bay near the confluence of the little river, a boat rocked upon the water, and a clear, sweet voice kept time in song to the dull accompaniment of the sound of wet linen rubbed upon wood. At the end of the field a haymaker arose and gazed at the sun's rays in order to tell the hour, and, satisfied that there was still leisure at his command, he looked furtively towards the singer, who sang on in the sunshine like the locusts. He hastened to the stream, the throbs of his heart keeping time to the sound of the washing. A fresh breeze caressed his face as his mouth opened, and he called softly:

"Perrine."

The girl raised her eyes, and her song ceased, while

Digitized by Google

a flush of pleasure coloured her bare arms, her shoulders, and her face.

"Claude," she exclaimed anxiously, yet happily. Quickly her hands retied the loose strings of her gown.

"Oh, go," she implored. "Father landed this morning."

"I know, with Petrus Vallat."

"Yes, he has come for the fête."

Anger flamed in the eyes of the youth; he replied, between clenched teeth:

"And for the betrothal—is it not so? That's why I am in the way."

"Claude, Claude," said the young girl tearfully, "you make me afraid with your cruel words and wicked eyes."

"Do you dare to say that Petrus is not your suitor?"

Perrine shook her head: Claude still insisted.

"Then what is this Vallat doing here? He does not belong to this country."

"He is a friend of my father."

"Nonsense, I see clearly that a newcomer seeks the daughter of his patron, and you, Perrine Marnas, will forget me for this snob."

"My poor Claude, you know well that I love you, but my father holds in contempt all who till the ground and esteems only bargemen. Why must you be a farm hand?"

The haymaker became indignant.

"Why? Do you not know? My mother is infirm. She has only me to depend upon. Who would care for her during my voyages? Your father often remains away for weeks. A tiller of the soil, too, is worth more than a bargeman. What bread would Captain Marnas eat if there were no farmers?"

Perrine approached and laid her hands upon the shoulders of the youth.

"Yes, Claude, you have a good heart; you are a good son, and I would be happy to have you for my husband; but father is master of the house, as he is captain of his boat. Speak to him; try to convince him, and, above all, make haste, for you are right, he is too friendly with his new guest. He may have intentions respecting him, and it will be bad for us if he has decided. He would not yield, and would never reconsider a resolution once taken."

"Oh, if you love me! if you would but—" exclaimed Claude passionately, clasping the young girl in his arms.

She repulsed him rudely, saying:

"Never; understand, never will I oppose the wishes of my father."

"You do not love me," groaned the discouraged suitor. "You will not plead for me to him."

"Are you more courageous than I, you who are a man, and yet dare not confront him?"

"You say what is true," replied the young man, his cheeks flushing. He added, with determination: "I will speak to him to-morrow."

Perrine approved.

"Come at the hour of mass. I will burn a candle, and will pray for us both before the Virgin while you are with my father."

She offered her cheek for the kiss of the young man, and sent him back to his work.

Claude rejoined the haymakers, who had arisen from their nap. Sturdily he seized his scythe, and cut down the grass with great sweeps of the blade. With a furious effort he tried to assert his strength, to encourage the timidity of his soul by the power of his muscles.

II.

Saint-Pierre de Bœuf was awakened by the gay chime of its bells, the merry peals of which celebrated the votive fête of the country, which was held in repute among the population of the borders of the Rhone.

Already, on the threshold of his shop, the barber scraped his razor over the chins of his customers, seated in a row, which had been well lathered in advance by the apprentice.

On the bank two large oriflames, one red and the other blue, representing the two rival camps, flapped belligerently in the breeze and awakened interest in the jousts, the great attraction of the riverside fêtes.

On this day the tilts were eagerly expected. The bargemen of the Bœuf had challenged their celebrated rivals of Condrieu reinforced by famous jousters on the Rhône, from Lyons to Vienne. Amongst the last was the guest of Captain Marnas, Petrus Vallat Givordin.

The final call to mass tinkled from the bell when Claude Rollin, arrayed in his gala dress, crossed the square. He arrived in time to see Perrine enter the church bearing a large wax taper. The young girl smiled at her lover from afar, and the caress of her eyes strengthened his courage. The labourer drew himself up, and with a firm step, crossed the threshold of Captain Marnas' abode.

The boatman stared at the new arrival, and closed his lips with a smile full of malice.

"So it is you, peasant?" he said. "What has procured for me this early visit? Men of the water and men of the land mix but little on fête days."

Although chilled by this mocking reception, Claude Rollin controlled his annoyance, and, with an effort, declared himself.

"Master Marnas, Perrine and I are agreed, and we now lack only your good will."

The Captain whistled mockingly.

"Bless my soul, my good fellow, you are not queamish. The misfortune is that the daughter of Captain Marnas was not born for a landsman. I have no son; the girl will give me a son-in-law of my kind, an honest bargeman, whose children will keep up the fame of the family and maintain it on the Rhone."

"But——"

"That's enough; do not insist, peasant; Perrine is not in need of suitors. I have chosen one for her, a solid fellow, accustomed to the water, and of the sturdy race of Givors. It is Petrus Vallat, whom you will meet to-day at the games. Had you been one of us, you could have disputed the prize with him and become a suitor for my Perrine."

"You know, nevertheless, why I cultivate the ground?" retorted Rollin.

"Yes, you are a good son, I recognise the fact; but the slaves of the soil are not of our free race. One of my blood cannot become the wife and mother of tillers of the ground. I do not say this to insult you, my boy; but of this sort is the blood in my veins. Let us entertain no feeling of rancour, but do not be obstinate, for I will never recall my words."

Claude wished to reply, but Marnas took him by the shoulders and pushed him out of the door, which he closed and bolted.

Overcome by the rudeness of the Captain, with his head bowed and his heart bewildered, the discomfited lover found himself in the street. Unconsciously his footsteps guided him to the door of the church, where

Digitized by Google

Perrine vainly implored Heaven with prayers. There he hesitated. Then timidly he pushed open the door, fearing to make a noise. Softly he glided down the nave in the half light, wending his way to where Perrine knelt.

With the fervour of a child she prayed. Alas, alas, he thought, of what use were her prayers? Perrine herself had said, with truth, that Captain Marnas, having once made up his mind, never yielded. What had he come there for? Should he wait for his beloved, to trouble her soul with the avowal of their mutual unhappiness? Certainly it would be sweet to mingle their tears together, but his generosity and his pride forbade. What could he hope for? What could he expect? What should he do? With a last look he enveloped the kneeling girl with all the love of the past; then he retired as softly as he had come, without being seen by her. He walked with a firm step straight to his mother, the only one left him now to love. On his entrance she looked up at him.

"You are in trouble, my boy," she said, with pity and tenderness.

Claude could not reply, as his heart was too full. H tried to shake his head, but grief overcame him, and, falling upon his knees, he buried his face in the old woman's lap and sobbed:

"Mother."

The mother was silent. She had suspected the hope of her son and divined his unhappiness, but her hands caressed the forehead of Claude, seeking to calm his excitement and to heal the open wound by drawing him from his dream.

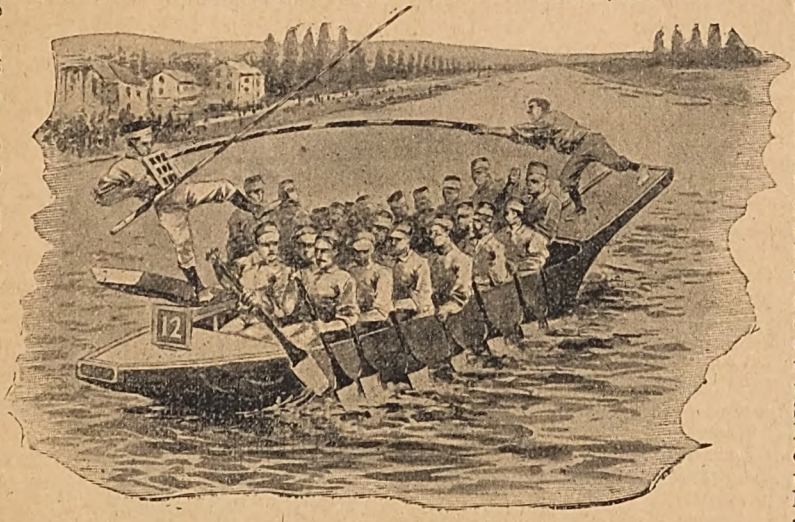
"Come," she said; "we will find another as beautiful but less proud, who will render you happy."

Claude raised his head and dried his tears.

"No, no!" he exclaimed; "it is finished; I will suffer no more. I will love only you."

He enfolded his old mother in his arms, and added, in a despairing embrace:

"You will be for me henceforth the only woman in the world."



Givordin . . . capsized into the water.

III.

A roar arose from the impatient crowd gathered in a mass upon the borders of the river.

"Here they come. Here they come."

Preceded by the local band, the two crews advanced. Through politeness, those of the country yielded precedence to the strangers, and followed in their wake. All were dressed in duck trousers, with caps ornamented by gold cords. They were distinguished only by their jerseys, red stripes being worn by the guests, blue by the local champions. These colours were reproduced in the paddles, a short, broad oar in the form of a spade, which the boatmen held in a firm grasp while marching.

Each crew took possession of its bark, while the first two jousters stood upon the siaupe, a platform erected at the stern of the boats. The champions wore wooden shields, destined to receive the shock from the lances, with which each was armed.

The drums beat.

The two barks reached the course; after having crossed each other, the rivals saluted with their lances. At the extremity of the arena limited by buoys, the boats halted, and then stopped, face to face.

At the command of the captains, with a single stroke, the paddles arose in a double flash of red and blue, and then fell, simultaneously cleaving the water, and the two barks moved, piloted in such fashion that they sailed side by side. The drums beat abruptly a charge, and the rowers increased their efforts. The barges set out to cross each other, and the rowers bent their heads as above them were lowered the lances. A double shock sounded upon the wooden shields, suspending, for an instant, the impetus of the barges. Then suddenly the red champion tottered and fell from his platform into the water with a great splash. The spectators thundered with bravos; the first tilt was to the glory of Saint Pierre de Bœuf. As the red champion swam rapidly to his bark, he was saluted with a mocking chant.

The tilts continued, sometimes in favour of one party, sometimes in favour of the other. The blues, however, had the advantage, and Saint-Pierre de Bœuf triumphed over the other champions of the Rhone.

But now on the siaupe appeared Petrus Vallat, equally strong and skilful, and, with him, fortune changed. Five times in succession his lance overthrew his opponent.

The people of Bœuf ceased their laughter and applause.

Before the skill of the Givordin the blues, discouraged, gave up the struggle.

Their best men having been overthrown and nearly drowned, already the reds began to mock at their vanquished rivals and to cry victory.

All at once a voice from the river bank shouted:

"The blues for ever. Give me the lance and shield."

Stupefied, the boatman saw Claude Rollin throw off his coat and present himself as the champion of Bœuf.

He had suffered too much while watching the success of this stranger, this Vallat, whom Marnas preferred to him, and upon whom Marnas would bestow his daughter. He wanted to avenge himself upon the man who was stealing his happiness, and to prove his courage to this disdainful boatman—to be for a day the king of his village.

Digitized by Google

The bargemen approached the bank and the captain of the blues questioned Claude.

"So you, a landman, want to joust?"

"A labourer's arm is as strong as a bargeman's."

"We know you are strong, but you are not experienced."

"My strength will suffice," and, with a great spring, Claude alighted upon the siaupe, buttoned on the shield and grasped the lance.

The crew looked at him doubtfully, but the youth showed such a fine physique, and the reds provoked the blues so much by their mocking laughter, that the captain decided in Claude's favour.

"Keep your eyes open, man, and hold yourself firmly," he said.

The two barges plied their oars. Upon the banks a profound silence reigned, broken now and then by the rumbling of drums. The rivals advanced towards each other, their eyes keenly watchful, and their lances lowered. Each touched at the same instant the other's shield. The men buttressed themselves and were not moved, although the lances became bent. Then the sound of snapping wood was heard, followed by a splash, as both combatants disappeared in the water.

As both men were overthrown and both lances were broken the tilt was drawn. As soon as the tilters could get out of the water, they again resumed their places for a fresh assault. Confidence returned to the natives, and they encouraged with their exclamations the youth of Bœuf, who, although not of their party, had held his own with the terrible man from Givors.

The bargemen shook their heads, undecided as to the issue of the combat. Claude was the stronger of the two, but Petrus was the more skilful. If, in the first bout, the landsman's lance had struck the middle of the shield, Vallet would have made his somersault; but Rollin did not strike with skill. Would he succeed better this time?

Much interested, Captain Marnas puffed at his pipe, not knowing that it had gone out, an indication, on his part, of grave pre-occupation. At length he uttered the words which conveyed the thought of all present:

"We must see the end."

Again the jousters charged. Claude feared only a ruse on his rival's part; but, while less experienced, he was the stronger, so he determined to rely upon that strength.

The barges touched, the lances pointed menacingly; the end of his staff lowered against his thigh, Petrus prepared, with all the weight of his body thrown forward, to strike an irresistable blow. But, suddenly, after a rapid glance, Claude removed his lance from its rest and thrust it with the full length of his arm, touching Vallat before the latter had met his adversary's shield. Claude's long arm seemed to lengthen, and the Givordin, deprived of his equilibrium by the vigorous thrust, capsized into the water.

A thousand bravos rent the air: "Vive Claude Rollin." Bœuf has triumphed.

Petrus swam to the shore, furious at the jests levelled at him by the crowd. When at last he stood face to face with Captain Marnas he growled:

"I shall have my revenge. You will see."

"Don't take the trouble, my young fellow," replied the Captain. "You can go home. My daughter can never marry a boatman that has been vanquished by a peasant."

Marnas turned his back upon the discomfited suitor and went straight to Claude, who was jumping from his boat.

"Give me your hand, man," said Marnas. "I abused you this morning: let us forget it. You are made of good stuff. All you need is to become a good bargeman. Take service on my boat and you shall have Perrine."

Claude, faithful to his trust, replied:

"And my mother?"

"You great gander," exclaimed the Captain, tapping him on the shoulder, "she will not need you. Don't you know that your mother will always be with Perrine when you and I are absent on the water?"

"Oh, Claude," cried Perrine, "how I shall spoil your mother!"

Touched and secretly flattered at the idea of leaving the soil for a life the desire for which he had sacrificed from a feeling of filial duty, Claude turned to his mother, who had just arrived at the spot, and said:

"Mother, I give you to Perrine."

"You see, Claude," said the young girl, "that you were wrong to be so sad in church. I saw you when I was praying to the good Virgin, and I knew that my prayers would be answered."

A. H. T.

"'OLD yer 'orse, sir?"

"He won't run away!"

"Run away? Not 'im. I didn't mean to 'old 'im still—I meant 'old 'im up."

MRS. UPJOHN: "Aren't you uneasy about that child's cough?"

Mrs. Highup: "Indeed I am. If it gets any worse she'll keep me awake the whole night."

"WHAT is the difference between your teas?"

Clerk: "In those of the first quality some bad tea is mixed with the good, and in those of the second quality some good is mixed with the bad."

MISS SPACER: "I suppose when a joke gets into an almanac it is supposed to be old?"

Mr. Scribbler: "Oh, no! a joke cannot really be called old until it gets into a Scotchman."

"I ALWAYS test my poems by reading them to my wife," said the youthful poet.

"I should think that was testing your wife rather than your poems," answered the candid friend.

"I FEEL like a shop with a bargain sale," groaned Tommy, as he approached from the direction of the pantry, the immediate surroundings of his mouth being a suspicious dark red.

"What's the matter, my dear?"

"Jam inside."

"I HAVE but one maxim for you," said a successful and wealthy merchant to a young man who went out of his employ to enter upon the study of a profession, "and that is, never try to save your shoe leather, but always be economical of the cloth that forms the seat of your trousers."

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

£60

TO BE GIVEN AWAY,

Among those taking part in the following

Free Cash Prize Competition

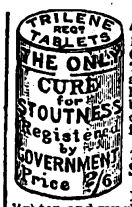
NO ENTRANCE FEE WHATEVER.

1st Prize £25. 2nd Prize £20.
3rd Prize £10. 4th Prize £5.

The above money prizes will be given away as an advertisement amongst the competitors who can rearrange the following twenty-four letters to represent the names of four well-known trades, selected by us.

TUBREHCKAREBROCEGRPARDER.

Send in your solution at once, and we will inform you if correct, and give you full details of the Competition with conditions and date of closing. If you cannot solve all four do as many as you can, as there are four prizes to compete for. No Solution can be received after October 17th, 1898.—Address: "COMPETITION" MANAGER, 117A SEVEN SISTERS ROAD, LONDON, N.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 3lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

HAVE YOU SEEN OUR CATALOGUE OF CHEAP CROCKERY? If not, please get a post-card, and send it to THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, and you will get it by return, together with particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

THIS IS THE PATTERN OF THE DINNER SERVICE.

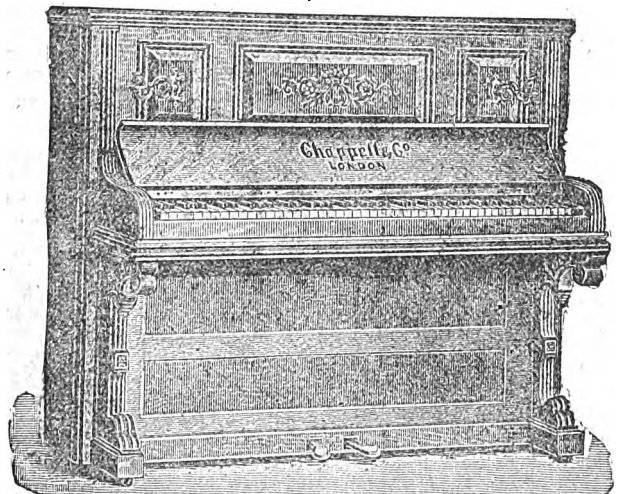
THOUSANDS SOLD ALL OVER THE WORLD.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, STAFFS.

CHAPPELL PIANOS.

Estd. 1808.



Estd. 1808.

Their latest creations of High-class English Pianos are unquestionably the finest that have ever been produced either by an English or Continental Maker.

Pianinos, 25 Gs. Full Cottages, 40 Gs. Upright Grands, 60 Gs. Horizontal Grands, 135 Gs.

HIRE OR INSTALMENT SYSTEM. ILLUSTRATED LISTS POST FREE.

CHAPPELL & CO. LIMITED, PIANOFORTE MANUFACTURERS, 50 NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

ON THE BEST AUTHORITY.

T. C. D.—There is no law in Ireland compelling cyclists to light up at all. In Scotland it is half-an-hour later than in England.

J. A.—It is a singular property of all animal bodies that the temperature of the blood remains practically the same, whether the air breathed be that of the Arctic regions or the tropics.

T.—Now that the Congo Railway is completed it is possible to go from Antwerp to Stanley Falls, in the very centre of Africa, in eleven days. The cost of travelling on some part of the new line is rather dear, looking at it from our point of view; the cost is 1s. 8d. per mile.

L. G. B.—The State training of children was in vogue among the ancient Persians, according to Xenophon. Their education was taken out of the parents' hands, and the State looked after the moral training of the children as it now looks after the intellectual training in this country.

MAYOR.—The rock or island on which the Eddystone Lighthouse stands is claimed as the smallest inhabited island in the world. It has a diameter of thirty feet. At high tide the island itself cannot be seen, the waves dashing against the base of the lighthouse. The inhabitants are, of course, the people in charge of the light.

BIRD.—The earliest bird to rise is usually supposed to be the lark, but a French scientist disputed this assertion some few years ago. As a result of long observation, he stated that the greenfinch was the first, and that it commenced business at 1.30 a.m. The blackcap was placed second by this gentleman, its time being one hour later than the greenfinch.

SPOTS.—The white spots on the finger nails are explained thus: Under the nail is a membrane to which the nail is attached. At times this connection is interrupted in places by knots or from other causes, and those parts of the nail accordingly become dry and opaque. The white patch at the base of the nail arises from its being newly formed; it has not yet assumed its proper nature and transparency.

A. G. asks: "Has the amputation of a limb any tendency to shorten life?"——Excluding the probability that the afflicted person may be more liable to accident, the answer must be given in the negative. The experience of the head of an old-established firm dealing in artificial limbs is directly opposed to the notion expressed in the question; he seems to be surprised at the longevity of the firm's customers.

G. K. — Of European powers, Great Britain has been more frequently at war during the last fifty years, the total amounting to no fewer than forty-one times.

CITY.—The oldest European city in the New World is Cumana. It was built by Diego Castellon, in 1521, and was originally named New Toledo. It stands at the mouth of the Manzanares, on the Gulf of Cariaco, an arm of the Carribean Sea. It was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake in 1853.

A CORRESPONDENT tells me of a curious mistake on a tombstone in the Cleeve Prior's Churchyard in Worcestershire. It states that a certain Sara Charlett departed this life in 1693, aged 309 years. Either the 0 or the 9 was cut by mistake. A verse that follows speaks of being taken away "in my flourishing age." Very flourishing, evidently.

H. J. took his annual holiday at Southsea this year, and he writes to ask me if I can tell him how the garrison station forts standing in the sea at Spithead obtain their supply of fresh water.——As a matter of fact, the supply is obtained from wells inside their own walls, which lie under the bed of the sea, and it is said that the water is exceedingly cool and pure.

P. E.—There are two versions of the discovery of the famous Mexican silver mine called Potosi. The Spanish official version is that an Indian named Gualca, having lighted a fire at night on the mountain side, found silver spread all round him in the morning. It had been melted by the heat. He reported it to the Spaniards in the hope of reward. Another account says that he discovered silver by accidentally pulling up a shrub. He kept the discovery a secret for some time, then told another Indian, who betrayed the fact to his Spanish master.

"WHY do people walk so badly?" asks a correspondent. "Even persons who are called 'graceful walkers' do not walk as they ought. Why is it?"——It is a fact that people of all countries walk badly. Their mistake consists in not having a proper regard for the centre of gravity of the body. This centre should be kept as nearly as possible at an even distance from the ground. Most of us waddle or lurch forward, thus alternately raising and lowering the centre of gravity, and throwing it first to one side and then the other. This increases the fatigue of walking. Care should be taken not to walk on the toes, the heels, or the side of the feet. The foot should be placed flat on the ground, and the ankle, knee, and hip joints should be made to move evenly and to do a fair share of the work.

H. H. asks: "Do animals suffer with seasickness?"——Certainly they do. All animals, when taken for a sea voyage, become tamer. Monkeys suffer greatly from mal-de-mer. Fowls and geese soon become thin, and cocks generally cease to crow. Song birds, too, are affected by the sea, and never sing during a voyage.

T. S.—There is a supposition that the Wettern Lake in Sweden is connected by an underground channel with the German Lake of Constance. This arises from the fact that exactly the same forms of animal and vegetable life are to be found in the two lakes. The Swedish lake was locally reputed to be of such depth as to deserve the appellation of "bottomless pit," but scientists have upset that idea.

D. S.—From old records we can see that Saturday half-holidays were an institution in England nine hundred years ago. King Edgar made an order that labour should cease at midday on Saturday and not be resumed until daylight on Monday. There is a law of King Canute—which does not appear to have been repealed—that says, "Let every Sunday's feast be held from Saturday's noon till Monday's dawn."

SPORTSMAN.—The drug used by the Chinese in catching fish is called coculus indicus, which is powdered and mixed with dough, and scattered broadcast over the water after the manner of sowing seed. The fish seize and devour it with avidity, and instantly become intoxicated, and turn up in hundreds on the top of the water. They are then gathered up and placed in vessels containing clean water.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Sept. 27th, if intended for the Issue on sale Oct. 11th, and dated Oct. 18th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A HOUSE FOR NOTHING

50 Guinea Piano, 150 55/- Watches, and Thousands of other Prizes given with Chancellor Soaps, which contain all the natural glycerine and prevent chapped hands Particulars with each bar. 2½d. and 3d. Cheap for Clothes. Best for Babies. Sample 2 Stmps. C. Chancellor & Co. London.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 stops, 3 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

Try MASON'S

KILLCORN

The only painless corn cure.

IT HAS NEVER BEEN KNOWN TO FAIL.

Thousands of Testimonials have been received from all grades of society.

READ THIS ONE. Painless Cure!

"Leeds, Mar. 17th.

"Dear Sir,—I had three most painful corns, which were PAINLESSLY REMOVED by using rather less than a bottle of KILLCORN. I now walk with the greatest ease.—Yours, O. H. CARR."

KILLCORN is sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., in bottles at 1s. each, or sent direct on receipt of value in stamps by the Proprietor,

3, Guildford Street, Leeds.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth.

Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged. The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE CO Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(REALLY GENUINE.)

IN PATENT AIR-TIGHT TINS.

¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.

INCLUDING TIN AND POSTAGE.

Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

LOOK OUT FOR

TWO IMPORTANT NOVELS

AND ASK FOR THEM AT THE LIBRARIES.

THE PHANTOM ARMY:

THE STORY OF A MAN AND A MYSTERY. By MAX PEMBERTON.
Author of "Queen of the Jesters," "Kronstadt," &c. Ready September 28th.

Price 6s.

THE ADVENTURES of CAPT. KETTLE

By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE (Author of "The Paradise Coal Boat," &c.) Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood. Ready October 5th.

Price 6s.

PUBLISHED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

Digitized by Google

'DOLLY' BLUE

Notice.—"DOLLY" Blue is neatly tied in a white bag to a small handle to hold by whilst using. It is the cheapest and best Laundry Blue in the market. "Dolly" Blue is sold by all Grocers and Oilmen at 1d. per bag.

"DOLLY" CREAM & TINTS.

"DOLLY" Cream Colour, for Tinting Curtains, Muslins, Laces, Silks, Blouses, etc., a Rich Cream Shade.
"DOLLY" Tints, manufactured in Six Shades—Pink, Terra Cotta, Old Gold, Heliotrope, Sea Green, and Canary Yellow—for Tinting Faded Ribbons, Laces, etc. Sold everywhere, 1d. per bag. Will wash out when required.

Sample Box, containing Seven Tints, post free for 8d.

W. EDGE & SONS LIMITED, BOLTON, LANCS.

Tincture of Halberis

DOSE: Five to Ten Drops in half a wineglassful of water.

A Specific Remedy for Biliousness, Liver Inaction, Heartburn, Indigestion, Acid Risings, Constipation, Headache, &c., &c. Prices: 1/1, 1/10, 2/8, and 4/9, post free.

GILBERT & HALL,
Homœopathic Chemists.
Bournemouth and Boscombe.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED: PUREST & BEST.

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

ZEBRA Grate Polish.

In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 509. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 1ST, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager. Telephone, No. 5 Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- Postal Order for 39/-

ONE MONTH'S TRIAL.

Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,

188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Road Kilburn.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Cos CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

10/6 BY PARCEL POST. 10/6

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES.

The "Alfosco" Half-Guinea Costumes are recommended by thousands of delighted customers, who acknowledge them to be GREATLY SUPERIOR in MAKE, STYLE, and VALUE, to any costumes they have ever seen at anything approaching the same prices.

Design No. 100. 10/6

Design No. 885. 10/6

Design No. 885.

Half-a-Guinea.

A Costume any lady can wear. Made in the world-renowned Specialite Serge—all colours. The bodice is shaped to the figure and very prettily designed. It has a pleated front, and trimmed with a frill of cloth carried over the shoulders, and large fancy buttons. The bodice and sleeves are lined. The skirt is cut full and fashionably. Costume complete, 10/6. Skirt alone, 5/6. This design is also made in the excellent Venetian Cloth for 13/6.

Buy direct from leading firm of London Costumiers.

Design No. 100. 10/6. Design No. 885. 10/6.

Design No. 100. Half-a-Guinea.

A Charming Costume made in the Allen Foster Specialite Serge. Unsurpassed for wear and durability. This attractive Costume has a tight-fitting Bodice, with full-pleated front and pretty lappels, trimmed braid and large buttons. The Skirt is well made and according to present fashion. Thousands of Testimonials. Costume Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6. This Costume made in our new Venetian Cloth will be 13/6. Thousands of Testimonials.

PATTERNS AND SKETCHES POST FREE.

Regular Stock Sizes of Costumes are 34, 36, and 38 inches round bust (under arms), the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 inches long in front. Large or Special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Each Costume securely packed, and sent by Parcel Post carriage paid, 6d. extra; skirt only, 5d. extra. Please mention Short Stories.

NEW SKETCH BOOK OF FASHIONS, ORDER FORMS AND PATTERNS, POST FREE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,

17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

DO YOU KNOW?

GIVES PERMANENT STIFFNESS, BRILLIANCY, AND BEAUTY TO ALL STARCHED ARTICLES.

IMPARTS ENAMEL-LIKE GLOSS TO MUSLINS, LACE, LINENS, &c., EQUAL TO NEW.

MAKES IRONING A PLEASURE.

SOLD IN PACKETS BY GROCERS, OILMEN, AND AT STORES EVERYWHERE.

By Special Appointment Makers to Her Majesty.

THE PATENT BORAX CO. LTD., LADYWOOD, BIRMINGHAM.

A REVOLUTION IN FOUNTAIN PENS.

HALF-SIZE OF THE PEN AT 5s.

Fine, Medium, or Broad Pointed nibs suitable for Shorthand or Longhand.

Why Pay 10/6 for a Pen When You Can Get the Same for 5/-

THE RELIANCE FOUNTAIN PEN has a 14-carat gold nib (Iridium tipped), an Improved double Ink Feed, and a fine chased Ebonite Holder.

WILL NOT GET OUT OF ORDER.

We claim this Pen to be the best ever offered.

"A stationer says: "This pen of yours writes very nicely; it will give everybody satisfaction."

Another: "The pen purchased from you has given every satisfaction: I find it far better value than the 10/6 pens.

We send this pen, complete in box, with filler and directions, post free for 5/-

A Large size, holding an Extra Supply of Ink, post free for 7/6.

A great Saving of Time—always have your own Pen and Ink with you.

:o:

EVERY PEN GUARANTEED.

You should not hesitate, but order at once.

THE RELIANCE PEN CO. LTD.,
26 IVY LANE,
PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

REMEMBER, A 10/6 FOUNTAIN PEN FOR 5/-

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE.

Medically approved for Red Noses, 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp.

LEES RAY,
SPECIALIST,
SOUTH CASTLE ST.,
LIVERPOOL.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates Free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), free. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Company, 186 Euston Road, London.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). Mgr., H. Myers.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 6d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 509.

ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending

October 1st, 1898.

THOSE WHO FOUGHT AT OMDURMAN.

No. 1.—Trooper of the 21st Lancers.

All rights reserved.]

A BRAVE COWARD.

A STORY OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

THE call to arms had gone forth—Fort Sumter had fallen, the Union was attacked. State after state seceded.

The President called for volunteers, and the loyal North generously responded to the cry.

Among the first to enlist for the war was John Allen.

He was an only child, and his father a prosperous merchant.

Filled with patriotism and enthusiasm, the young fellow soon succeeded in filling with his spirit enough young men of his district to organise a company, of which he was elected captain.

Possessing a slight knowledge of military tactics and drill, he soon had his company in such shape that when the national capital was threatened, the company was at once mustered into the service and ordered to meet the enemy.

Digitized by Google

Thus hurried to the front without rest or proper nourishment, with no knowledge of their arms, it is no wonder that in the general panic that seized their brigade, the company should share in the nameless fear like the rest and hastily retreat.

"Now, not a word, Pettis."

The young commander, filled with mortification and grief at the first engagement of his comrades, and himself possessing a cool head, tried his utmost to make his men stand.

With uplifted sword, with entreaty and command, invocation and pleadings and blows, he manfully tried to lead or beat them back.

But they would not heed, and carried him with them in the crush to the rear.

It was while thus engaged, that the general officer commanding the brigade came up, and seeing a young captain going to the rear, halted for an instant—long enough to inquire the number of the company and regiment and his name.

The day after the retreat, Allen was placed under arrest, and a few days later brought before a summary court-martial, and tried for cowardice in the face of the foe.

It was useless for him to protest; his men would not testify in his behalf, for that would be owning to the fact of their own cowardice, and Allen's explanations were not listened to against the statement of the brigadier-general and his staff officers.

So he fell a victim, as many others did in the early part of the war, to the ambitious ignorance of a general officer as unskilful and unused to war as himself.

He was dismissed the service of the United States and his name struck off the rolls.

The blow was an awful one, but to a man of such noble and honourable instincts as Allen, it was more than terrible. At first the thought of his disgrace so maddened him that he would have taken his life; but there was not a drop of coward's blood in his nature, and when the first transports of grief and despair were over, he resolved not to go home, but to seek some western State and there enlist again, and if he could not rise, he at least could die a brave man's death on the field of battle.

Should he rise, it would be by wiping out the fearful stigma, and until that was done the old folks at home or his many friends there, should not know of his whereabouts.

Of all famous troops in Sheridan's cavalry command in the army of Virginia, there was none that stood higher or had a more brilliant record than the troop of Captain Henry Pettis, of the Third Brigade, of the Fifth Division.

Pettis himself, through the four years of war, had had a wonderful record of service.

Enlisting as a private in an Indiana cavalry regiment, he had successfully risen through the lower grades by brave and heroic acts on the battlefield, as well as by uncomplaining and faithful duty in the camp, on the march, or on picket

When one of the company officers fell on the field, he was promoted second lieutenant.

And later it was Sheridan himself, who, noting the wondrous bravery of the man and his untiring energy, promoted him a captain and assigned him a few days later to his own troop—the one with which he had won so many laurels.

His men worshipped him, for there was no danger too great for him, no hardship or trial of which he did not bear the hardest part, and yet with them he was always the quiet, straightforward, and courteous gentleman, though shy and reserved.

Time after time had he been complimented in general orders.

In the little lull preceding the famous raid round Dinwiddie Court House, Sheridan had a number of recruits sent down to his army, and seven of these were assigned to Pettis' troop.

Among these seven was one man whom the sergeant had occasion to reprove several times the first week for gross carelessness and even worse. Finding this of no use, he reported the man, whose name was Cook, to the captain. Pettis mildly rebuked him and sent him back, thinking that sufficient, but he did not notice the gleam of cunning recognition in Cook's eyes as he slunk away.

The next day the sergeant brought him again before the captain on the charge of maltreating his horse. This was too much, and Captain Pettis ordered him to be confined in the guards' tents and sentenced to do extra patrol work.

After three days' punishment, he was released, and for a time was well behaved, but it was noticed that he was exceedingly curious regarding his captain. He asked many questions as to where he had come from, when he had first joined, his various engagements and victories, and made every now and then slighting allusions to the effect that he might tell something, if he was so disposed, to the captain's discredit. The men paid no attention to this the first time it was remarked, but on his repeating the offence they warned him in tones not to be misunderstood that his life was not worth a pinch of earth if he repeated it.

He then behaved himself well, till the regiment was ordered with the entire corps again in the field. The day before starting, towards evening, the sergeant reported that Cook was missing, and also his horse and accoutrements. The manner in which he had left made it certain that he had deserted.

But the next day he was brought into the lines, having been captured by the guard.

He was taken to Captain Pettis' tent for examination, and on being accused of his great crime, he turned angrily on his captain and said:

"You had better look to yourself, Captain Pettis, as you are called. I know when you went under another name. If I am treated fair, I'll say nothing, but if not, then I'll drive you out of the army."

"What do you mean, Cook? Do not add to your crime by insolence to your superior officer. Had you done your duty, you would not be in this trouble, and your best course now, is to answer the questions put to you, truthfully and quietly."

He then dismissed him; but the man's remark preyed on him, till the next day, when he became busy again, chasing up the Confederates on the last great rounding-up movement.

The series of fighting marches and resulting victories which daily ensued, drove everything else out of his mind, and as Cook had been left behind for trial the incident regarding him was forgotten for the time being.

Digitized by Google

The surrender of Appomattox followed, and brought with it the sure prospect of peace, and officers and soldiers alike were looking forward eagerly to the time when their services would be no longer needed, when one day the colonel commanding the regiment sent for Pettis.

On the latter's reaching the tent, he said to him:

"Captain, did you not have a man in that last batch of recruits named Cook, who deserted just before we started out round Dinwiddie?"

"Yes, sir, but he was recaptured and afterwards left behind for trial," replied Pettis.

"Well, the scoundrel, in order to save his hide, has written a very serious letter against you. In fact, he wrote to me before we started out on this last trip, but I paid no attention to it, knowing it was but a lie. But when he came up before his court for trial, he made charges against you which took the form of a letter written to the Secretary of War. The letter has been referred here, through military channels, and I am ordered to investigate it and report.

"Now you read it, and then, as I know the thing is an outrageous lie, you needn't answer me at all, but leave it here on my desk. No, don't say a word. Good-bye for a few minutes," and the kind-hearted warrior left the tent alone to Pettis.

With a sinking heart the young captain took the letter, and, as he feared, it was there stated by the writer—Cook—that he recognised in Pettis the same Captain John Allen, who nearly four years before had been dismissed the army on the charge of cowardice.

At last the fear that had smouldered so long had broken out. The honours and duties thrust upon him by arduous service had driven it out of his mind for a time, but it now came back with a tenfold strength. All his splendid record, his daring and courage, his endurance and duty performed in the face of dangers and trials that many other brave men shrank from, were as nothing in the face of this old stigma.

He shook his hands.

To be sure, his colonel had told him to leave the letter on the desk, paying no attention to it, and he—the Colonel—would state over his signature that it was a lie.

But would not that be making him share his crime?

The chance was open to him to escape obloquy; and not only the honours now possessed but the much greater ones in store for him would be his.

The temptation was strong upon him. He knew he was no coward—all his comrades during four years knew it. Why then should a mistake, a horrible stigma that was undeserved, cling to him?

While thus pondering, the Colonel entered, and going up to him, looking him square in the eyes, and holding his hand, said:

"Now, not a word, Pettis. We know what that letter contains, and, also, that notwithstanding any facts the writer of it may have, that he is a rascal, and you have the record of being the bravest and best captain in this corps. Any man that dares gainsay that, will have to answer me personally for it. It is all right, old man, and I understand that you are slated for a colonelcy yourself and will get your regiment in a few days."

The Colonel cut the buttons and shoulder straps from the condemned man's uniform.

And shaking Pettis' hand heartily, he half tried to push him out of the tent, that he might endorse the letter as a lie.

But the honour of a man, sans peur et sans reproche would not permit Pettis to allow his generous colonel to write a lie.

All the best instincts of his nature rose at once, and turning quickly, he said, with pale face and blazing eyes:

"But, Colonel, the letter is true! I was tried and dismissed for cowardice. I am not a coward, you know, but I was tried as such, and I have no right to my present place."

With eyes blazing as though in the thickest struggle of the battlefield, and with form trembling with anger, the Colonel said, in stern, set tones:

"Harry Pettis, I say again, that any man who says that you are a coward, who says that you are anything but the bravest and best captain in this regiment, lies like a fiend and will have to answer to me personally for it. Don't I know you, boy? Did I not see you go into the hottest angle at Spottsylvania with three hundred men and come back with forty? Don't I know that were you to go from us, half our strength would go? No, sir, I say the thing is an infamous lie, and I will not believe it!"

Excited beyond himself, the Colonel strode up and down his tent, shaking with an anger that only strong men, used to controlling their most violent feelings on the battlefield, ever can give vent to.

Poor Pettis took his colonel's hand, and as the tears silently rolled down his cheeks he told him the entire story.

It was some time ere the colonel could recover his composure sufficiently to listen and judge impassionately, but when he had learnt every particular of Pettis' or Allen's life, he shook his hands and told him to go back to his tent, and rest assured that he would have the stigma removed.

As Pettis went out, he sat down and wrote a long endorsement, stating all the facts connected with the former service, and then the splendid record of Pettis in his present one. He was not content with merely sending this, but himself took it to the brigade commander, and had a long talk with him. The result was, that the endorsement was strengthened by a stronger one from the brigade commander, then another by the division commander, and when it reached the glorious young Custer—a major-general in command of the corps—he endorsed it and took it to Sheridan, who did the same, nailing the coward statement as a lie, and recommending Pettis for a colonelcy.

Digitized by Google

A few weeks more had passed by, and then came the surrender of Appomattox. During the days of extreme toil and danger preceding, Pettis had risen to the command of a battalion, and was a full major. His former daring had been eclipsed by the phenomenal trials and scenes he had passed through.

It did seem as though he possessed a charmed life, and that Death was unable to reach him. Wounded slightly more than once, he was never incapacitated from command. It was well known that he had not only been recommended for a colonelcy, but for the rank of brigadier-general.

It was in these early spring days, when the balmy air and opening buds gave promise of the coming of peace, and when men so lately antagonised now seemed to fraternise with each other, that the dreaded blow came, and with it the most dramatic incident of the war.

One afternoon, a spectator of the Union lines would have seen a long line of men, an entire brigade of cavalry, turned out as though for a review. Soon, general officers appeared, and then from one of the regiments an adjutant stepped forth. A moment afterward an officer, a major—Pettis—appeared, dismounted, with an officer on either side of him. He had no sword with him.

On his appearance, the adjutant read a long communication from the Secretary of War—the stern and merciless Stanton—whose mind once made up, whether right or wrong, was never known to change, and on whom no recommendations for mercy ever made an impression, however worthy the object.

The order stated that Captain John Allen, of the 24th Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, having been dismissed the service of the United States for cowardice, and incapacitated from ever holding office again in the United States service, and having enlisted in the Indiana cavalry volunteer regiment, was dismissed the service. His name was to be struck off the rolls, and in the presence of his brigade his buttons and shoulder straps were to be taken off, and he then to be drummed out from the Union lines to the tune of the "Rogue's March."

An awful sentence for a brave and innocent man. The men, on hearing it read, did not quite understand, and they listened and watched in breathless silence. But when the colonel of the regiment, with his own hands, cut the buttons and shoulder straps from the condemned man's uniform, and instead of throwing them on the ground and grinding them in the dirt, carefully gave one to each officer of Pettis' regiment, as a keepsake, took one himself and gave one to the brigade commander; and as each officer received his, and kissed it and rolled it carefully in paper and placed it in his pocket, it was more than human nature could stand, and a series of sobs and mighty groans went up along the entire lines.

Their favourite a coward! What then must they be? Was this the way the country rewarded honourable and dangerous service in its behalf?

They could not understand, and when the next moment the brigade commander rode up, and then came the division commander, and the young and fearless Custer, and, dismounting, they shook Pettis' hand, while tears rolled down many a cheek, the men would no longer be restrained, but with one simultaneous movement broke ranks, and with cries and sobs crowded round the poor major, demanding to go with him. If he was to leave them they would go also.

The drums and fifes struck up the "Rogue's March," but it was not to march time, but to the slow solemn movement of a condemned criminal, the disgraced man left the camp, with Custer holding his right arm, and the Colonel the left, and followed by a train of officers and all the men of the brigade. When the boat was reached on the river's edge, and officers and men could go no further, Custer again told him to be of good cheer, and he would yet be righted.

Pettis, or Allen, left the camp, never to return. Representations of the strongest character, endorsed by Custer, Sheridan, and the mighty Grant himself, were sent forward, but that they were delayed so long in the War Office that they did not reach the executive mansion till after Lincoln's assassination.

And then came the hurry and bustle of reconstruction, and the great War Secretary, who soon afterwards felt the great remorse of heartless actions, was relieved from the office. Officers of volunteers were mustered out of service, and the great leaders of the war went to different spheres.

A disgraced man, with no recommendations from his war service, forgotten by the greater men, and lost sight of by the comrades of the battlefield, Allen went to his home disguised, and stayed there but a few days.

His father had died over his beloved boy, in the middle days of war, and his old mother, although still believing in him, had given him up for dead.

His story was to her a blessed reward for all the days of watching and believing in his honour.

* * * * *

Allen is still living, and is honoured in civic capacities in which he has served.

Under an assumed name, he has won honour and is now winning wealth. He is surrounded by a loving, beautiful wife and happy, healthful children, every one of whom knows his story, and is resolved that his and their name—their rightful name—shall be vindicated, and the blot removed from their father's record. His life is so full of rest and happiness in his work and friends, and especially his beloved family, that he is content to forget the past and to look forward with anticipation to the future, while he enjoys the happiness of the present.

J. Rogersson.

Digitized by Google

HIS OLD LOVE.

Years ago I was teaching in a country school, and fell in love with one of my pupils. I was eighteen at that time.

Her name was Mildred Colton, and at first I considered her very uninteresting. She was fifteen, and shy, blushed often and without apparent provocation, and frequently failed in lessons which I was sure she knew. This latter hindrance to her progress was what first interested me in her. Her habit of embarrassment must be removed; to effect the desired result, I must gain her confidence.

As I lived at her father's house, there was no lack of opportunities. And then she used to walk to and from school with me, along a wooded lane. The school was more than a mile distant, and we carried our dinners with us. I sometimes wondered why she remained at school so long.

It did not take me long to discover that Mildred's hair was not red, but pure golden, and in our walks I used to gaze in mute admiration whenever the sun came out and glorified it. I also definitely ascertained that her face was a perfect oval; that her chin was not too pointed or receding; that her eyes were not too light in colour, but just light enough; and I would have sworn that there was not a freckle on her innocent young face.

At the end of a year I went to London to read law under the protecting wing of a rich relative, who was to do wonders for me. I should come back some day, I knew; in fact, I told Mildred so, standing by a great oak tree at the turning of the lane where I bade her good-bye.

We made no pledges, for pledges seemed so superfluous.

The sun came shining down upon her hair, and so transformed it into amber with its rays, that I stood back a pace and watched her with strangely reverent joy, soon banished by the sadness of the parting kiss, when she cried a little, and I gulped down something that seemed rising in my throat, pulled my hat over my eyes, and strolled away with her image photographed on my heart.

Years went by, and still I carried that picture in my heart; a dainty little picture, the cherry lips just parted, the eyes filled with a tender, loving light, the sunlight shedding a halo about the golden hair.

I could see it best in the dark alone, with its background of wood and meadow, of giant oaks and lovely wild flowers, of green grass, and little, winding brooks.

Do you wonder that, when my moustache finally arrived, and I, grown stronger and taller, was said to have a handsome and striking appearance, and society in my London home looked on me kindly and approvingly, nevertheless, my affections remained proof against temptation? Or that when my law practice grew, and I accumulated money, and fond mammas and bewitching daughters beset me, the picture remained the same, and I was true to it.

I did not write; it was part of our understanding that I should not. I was to come back when my fortune was secured—come back to claim her for my own, while all the neighbours would be surprised at our happy little romance.

It was a beautiful June day when I alighted from the train at Worden, five miles distant from the old schoolhouse.

I was not known at Worden—it was not "our" station.

No one should be made aware of my identity until I had divulged it to Mildred.

Oddly enough, for the first time, the possibility of change having taken place during my absence occurred to me.

Of the unalterable condition of the supreme fact which was responsible for my return, however, there could be no shadow of doubt.

At the end of half an hour, I stopped in front of a farmhouse, with the double object of definitely ascertaining my whereabouts and making inquiries concerning the Coltons.

"Well, ye won't find any of the Coltons in the old village now," said the young farmer. "Which one of 'em in particular did you want to see; or did you expect to find all of 'em there?"

"All of them, of course," I answered. "First there's Old Joseph——"

"Well, I should think you had been away somewhere! Why, man, Old Joseph's been dead these seven years!"

Then he told me what had become of each one except Mildred.

I braced myself for the worst.

Was she dead, or dead to me—married? The suspense was horrible.

As if to aggravate it, his wife appeared at the door—a great, stout, unlovely woman, her skirts bedraggled, her fiery hair flying over her face and down her back in unkempt tangles; a dirty, squalling babe in her arms, and two other equally unprepossessing children peering through the doorway.

Then turning to me the man said:

"This is my wife, Millie Colton as used to be. What'd ye say your name was, sir?"

* * * * *

Here I am back among my books again. As I am alone in my office, I take from my private receptacle a lock of hair which I had kept for years, and I see that it is red, violently red, and has been all the time.

That her chin was peaked and receding, and her laugh a very silly giggle, and her eyes were a whitish grey. Strange, but I can even remember freckles now!

J. C. Burrough.

Digitized by Google

HOMESPUN YARNS.

By LEVIN CARNAC.

III.—DURING HER MAJESTY'S PLEASURE.

One of the most interesting men I ever met was a gentleman of very manifest culture and education who represented himself to me on our mutual introduction as a retired physician, late of Her Majesty's Criminal Lunatic Asylum at Broadmoor. I got into conversation with him during a slow but very comfortable passage from Antwerp to London in the once popular but now almost forgotten Baron Osy.

The course of our talk somehow turned on the then comparatively new theories which in the present day are tending to reduce all phases of crime to mere manifestations of more or less obscure mental disease. My companion held these views somewhat strongly, though in a modified form, and from the grasp of the subject that he displayed he was evidently well qualified to form an opinion on it.

When he told me of his profession, which I had already guessed, he went on to give me a detailed description of a case within his own experience, which he held to bear out his view of the origin of crime in disease.

A few years back from the time he told me the story, a young doctor, who had crowned a brilliant academic career by taking the M.D. degree of London with distinguished honours, bought a prosperous practice in one of the Metropolitan suburbs, and began his professional life under what seemed to be the brightest possible auspices.

After a year of hard work, during which he won golden opinions from his patients, he took a month's holiday on the Continent, and came back with a very pretty, foreign-looking wife, whom he proceeded to introduce to his rapidly widening circle of acquaintances through the usual medium of a series of "at homes."

For the first year or so the young doctor and his wife lived in an unbroken dream of mutual confidence and affection, which seemed to be finally perfected when their baby boy came to draw them closer than ever together with his clinging little hands.

This child was the only one that came to them, and by the time he was a little over twelve months old his idolising father had terribly good reason to be thankful that he remained alone in the nursery.

Early in the third year of their married life the husband began to miss more or less valuable little trifles from the house, and one or two servants were dismissed on the unproved suspicion of dishonesty. To do this went strongly against the strict notions of their puzzled master, who made the manner of their going as easy as he could for them in consideration of lack of actual proof of their supposed guilt. At last, however, a housemaid was accused point-blank by the doctor's wife of stealing a very valuable lace shawl, and on a search being challenged by the girl the shawl was found in her box covered by a false bottom made of pasted newspapers.

It was useless for the housemaid to protest her innocence in the face of such circumstantial proof as this, and she was dismissed on the spot without a character.

After this the thefts ceased for a few weeks, and then a gold watch and chain, worth together over £50, vanished out of the doctor's dressing-room one night while he was away at a case to which he had been called up. It was in its case when he went out. Of that he was quite positive. When he came back he glanced to where it always stood to see how long he had been out, and it was gone.

His wife was still asleep, as he had left her when he went out, and he was forced to the conclusion that the thief must have stolen through the bedroom into the dressing-room where the watch was, and back again without waking her. He said nothing about his loss then, but lay down and passed the balance of the night racking his brain to discover some clue to the mysterious series of thefts of which he was being made the victim. By the morning he had got no farther than a resolution to keep his own counsel on the subject of his latest loss.

Three or four days passed and there was no mention of the stolen watch. On the fourth morning he heard his wife tidying up his dressing-room, as she had been accustomed to do ever since their marriage. She could not possibly fail to notice that the watch was missing from its usual place, and as she came out the doctor felt sure that she would say something that would oblige him to tell her that it had followed the rest of the vanished valuables. To his unutterable astonishment, she made no allusion whatever to the fact that it was gone.

From surprise to suspicion was but a step, and horrible and unheard of as the suspicion seemed, it fastened instantly on his puzzled, agitated mind with a force that made it impossible to shake it off.

That morning he went through his consulting-room work like an automaton. His well-drilled intellect did what was demanded of it with no apparent direction from his will, and all the while his mind was busy with a hundred forgotten little incidents which cropped up now to strengthen the dreadful fear that was driving him mad. Seen with his present mental vision, every one of the robberies appeared to have some trifling detail that connected his wife with it, and then at last came a flash of memory that fused these crowding details into one fatally coherent whole.

He remembered that on the night the watch was stolen the bedroom door was locked on the inside, and that he had sprung the catch of the outer door of his dressing-room, as he had got into the habit of doing since the thefts had commenced. It was thus impossible that anyone but his wife could have been in the room during his absence.

So, in an agony of mind, he passed the first two hours of his working day, and at length the last patient was seen, and the time came for him to go on his rounds.

Digitized by Google

She threw herself on the floor at his feet.

He put on his hat and coat and gloves, and, for the first time since his marriage, left the house without saying good-bye to his wife.

As he walked down the drive to his carriage, he met the postman, and asked him if he had any letters for him.

"Yes, sir, here's a registered packet that has come back through the Dead Letter Office owing to the party having gone away. But I believe it's addressed to Mrs. Morton."

"Never mind, I know what it is. Give it to me. It will be all right."

The wretched man took the heavy package, and slipped it into his pocket. Then he signed the receipt, and went on to his carriage. As soon as the door of the brougham was closed he took out the packet and opened it. It contained, as he expected, his watch and chain, and a letter in his wife's handwriting, to which, with almost inconceivable folly or hardihood, she had added her name and address. The letter was written to her mother, who was evidently intended to pass the stolen watch on to some man who appeared to have some influence or claim on his wife.

How he got through that day Dr. Morton never knew, but by the time he got home his course of action was decided upon. He called his wife into his study, showed her the watch and the letter, and asked her to convince him that she was not a thief if she could.

For all answer she threw herself on the floor at his feet, and sobbed out a half-intelligible appeal for mercy and forgiveness.

"Mercy you shall have, but forgiveness for such a mean and despicable sin as this is impossible, so don't waste tears and words in asking it. If you can tell me anything that will make it less in my eyes, for Heaven's sake do so at once!"

Then she raised herself from the floor unaided, for he would not touch her, and standing before him told the story of her guilt. She was the daughter of a convicted gentleman-thief. Her mother had lied when she told him that her father was dead. He was in prison when Morton wooed and won his beautiful, tainted wife, and now he was free, and she had stolen from her husband at his bidding because he had bidden her, and because something evil in her nature had made her find a vile and stealthy pleasure in her sin. She felt it in her blood, and she could sometimes almost do murder that successful theft might come of it.

That was all—at first sobbed out in broken sentences, and at last spoken dry-eyed and hard-voiced with the frozen calmness of despair—but it was enough to spread the rest of Morton's life like a desert before him. He gave the miserable woman who must still bear his name all the money he had in the house—nearly £200—and bade her begone, refusing even to let her see her child again before she went.

As soon as the door had closed behind her, he went up to the nursery and abruptly ordered the nurse to leave the room and locked her out. The next morning he had disappeared, and the baby was found lying dead in its cot. There was an inquest, and the verdict was death in convulsions, owing to lack of proper attendance and care.

Three days later the father gave himself up to the police and told the whole story, saying in conclusion that he had watched the child die in convulsions rather than save it to grow up and enter upon its inevitable heritage of sin and shame. He was tried and found guilty of manslaughter, but as the jury were of opinion that when he let the child die his mind was affected by the discovery of his wife's guilt, he was sent to Broadmoor during Her Majesty's pleasure.

A few weeks ago he was discharged after nearly five years' detention, and he has just been over to Paris to see his father-in-law guillotined for the murder of the woman who was once his wife.

As the story progressed, the manner of the narrator led me first to the suspicion and then to the conviction that the narrator was telling his own life history.

Digitized by Google

A Guiltless Accomplice.

"So you don't believe that a man can be an accomplice in a crime, and yet innocent of any criminal intention? Well, I was such an accomplice once, and, if you haven't anything better to do than listen, I'll tell you the story."

We agreed nem. con. There were five of us in the smoking-room of the Pullman car of the 3.40 express from St. Pancras to Manchester, and the speaker was a nattily-dressed, clean-shaven old gentleman with whom one would no more have associated anything criminal than one would have accused a bishop of burglary.

The conversation had turned on a recent and very celebrated case, in connection with which those who sympathised with the accused had got up a petition for her release from prison on the plea of hysteria-neurosis and non-responsibility.

We had exhausted the subject, and everyone, of course, retained his own opinion. Thus we had come to a standstill, and were quite ready for a new departure.

This was the story of the old gentleman in the corner seat:

"Twenty-five years ago I was cashier in the head office of one of the oldest banking firms in the Eastern Counties. The bank was owned by two brothers, whom, for the purpose of story-telling, I will call Melville, and their nephew, Reginald Matheson, who was the junior partner in the concern. He had inherited his share in the business from his mother; and, as he had little, if any, turn for commerce or finance, his uncles just let him draw his share of the profits, and treated him more as a sleeping partner than anything else.

"So far as we knew him, he was a quiet, studious, gentlemanly young fellow, with a strong bent towards out-of-the-way, and what were then considered rather uncanny, branches of science. In fact, we in the office always used to say that he was much better fitted for a medical or scientific career, than for business. I can't say that he was popular with any of us. There was something about him which no one could understand—a sort of mental magnetism which impelled to obedience to his most trivial wishes, and yet repelled just as strongly anything like affection or even friendliness.

"He used to spend about eight months of every year in the town where the bank was situated, occupying rooms of his own, and coming every morning to the office for two or three hours; and though he only seemed to play at banking, as it appeared to us, yet he once or twice astonished me by the knowledge he had somehow managed to gain of the details of the business.

"How he spent the other four months of the year no one, not even his uncles, seemed to have much idea. He used to disappear towards the end of August, and come back to spend Christmas at home. The general opinion was that he employed his holidays wandering about the Continent, for the few letters that were received from him nearly always bore a foreign post-mark.

"It was just before he went away for one of these holidays twenty-five years ago next August, that I had occasion to take a rough balance of the books in view of a considerable loan which the bank was about to make to a large firm in Ipswich, and when I came to compare our capital on paper with the cash and securities in the strong-room, I was horrified to find a discrepancy of over £5,000. It was in vain that I pored over ledgers and day-books and cash-books, searching hopelessly for the error which I knew I should never find. Turn which way I would I was faced by the dreadful fact that over £5,000 was missing, and that I had not the slightest idea where it had gone to. Night after night I stayed late at the office, hoping against hope that I might be able to solve the terrible mystery before my duty to my employers compelled me to place the matter before them.

"At eleven o'clock on the fifth night of my vigil I had made up my mind to give up the task and formally acquaint the partners with their loss the next morning, when the door of my little private office opened and Mr. Reginald walked in.

"'Why, what's the matter, Johnson?' he said, coming round and looking over my shoulder, 'Have you got book-keeping on the brain or are you so busy over that affair of the Ipswich people?'

"He was one of my employers, and he would have to know the truth within a few hours. I felt that it was useless to keep the secret any longer, and so I turned in my chair and, looking him straight in the face, said, as steadily as I could:

"'The Ipswich affair is all right, Mr. Reginald, but either I am mad or something else is very wrong. There is over £5,000 difference, on the wrong side, between the books and the assets of the bank, and to-morrow I shall have to tell your uncles that I am utterly unable to account for the loss.'

"As I spoke he fixed his dark eyes on mine, and for several minutes looked steadily into them without saying a word. As each moment passed I felt a strange influence creeping over me, paralysing my intellect and numbing my senses as though some strong opiate was working upon my brain. Then, suddenly, my intellect grew clear again, but the will power to direct it was gone. Like one who hears a voice in a dream I heard him say:

Digitized by Google

"'Five thousand pounds gone and you, the chief cashier, cannot account for it! Nonsense, man! You must be dreaming. Let me see the books.'

"Like an automaton I turned the pages over for him, pointing out the various entries, and comparing them with the memoranda which showed the actual cash and securities in hand.

"He examined them all attentively, and then he said, in a voice that seemed quite strange to me:

"'It's not the cash and securities that are wrong, but your entries. How can you have been so stupid? Look here, and here, and here!'

"As he spoke, he fluttered the leaves over before me and put his finger on item after item, which he declared to be wrong, but which I knew to be right, for I had verified them again and again. Yet so impotent was my will that I could not contradict him in any particular. Then he said decisively:

"'These must be altered, Johnson, or you will get into a very serious scrape. You are responsible for these things, and embezzlement is a nasty charge even for an innocent cashier to meet. You must alter these entries at once.'

"I heard the disgraceful imputation without feeling the slightest impulse to repel it, and said helplessly:

"'I cannot alter them; the alterations would be detected at once. To-morrow I shall be ruined and a felon. Heaven help me!'

"The words were not mine, and yet I uttered them with my own lips, though I could have choked myself for saying them.

"As I bent forward and covered my face with my hands, the fiend in human shape who stood at my side laid his hand on my shoulder, and said in a kind, gentle voice:

"'Come, Johnson, don't despair over a little matter like this. Granted that you have made a few clerical mistakes which you don't think you can rectify. As it happens, I can help you out of the difficulty, and as I should be very sorry to see any harm come to an old and faithful servant of the bank like you, I'll do it and we'll say no more about it. Give me the books.'

"I got up and gave him my chair. As he sat down he took a key out of his waistcoat pocket, and said: 'Go and get the sherry out of the cupboard in my room. I should like a glass, and I don't think a drop would do you any harm.'

"I took the key and got the wine, much as an obedient dog might have fetched a stick for his master. When I got back, Mr. Reginald poured out a couple of glasses and gave me one. As I drank it he fixed his eyes on me again, and said: 'Sleep!' and there and then I slept as quietly as a child might have done.

"I woke feeling his hand on my brow, and hearing him say:

"'Now come and correct the books; you will find it easy enough.'

"Following the motion of his hand, I sat down in my chair again, and once more scanned the long columns. To my astonishment I found that several large items had disappeared as utterly as though they had never been written in.

"'I don't think you will find any difficulty in putting the balances all right now, Johnson. You see you have only to write in these amounts as they really ought to be; run the alterations carefully through all the books, and the matter is at an end. It's a most fortunate thing that I happened to look in to-night. There would have been a most awful row in the morning, and goodness only knows what might have come of it if my uncles had taken a hard view of the matter. However, it's all right now, and when you have made the corrections you can go home and sleep with a quiet mind.'

"As a machine obeys the directing hand of man, so did I obey the master-mind that had taken possession of my will. Without question or remonstrance, I, whose very religion had, till then, been commercial rectitude, deliberately falsified the books in my charge to conceal a crime that I had not committed. With the skill born of long practice, I wrote in the false entries, so that the keenest eye could not have detected the huge fraud that lay concealed beneath their orderly coherence.

"When the dreadful task was at length completed, and I rose from my chair, Mr. Reginald laid his hands on my shoulders, and, looking hard into my eyes, said:

"'Now, Johnson, listen to me. Henceforth, you and I have only one will between us, and that is mine. Take my advice, and obey the impulses which will affect you in future without hesitation. They will come from me, no matter whether I am near or far, and to resist or disobey them would involve you in confusion that would infallibly be disastrous to you, while they would not affect me. Follow them, and all will be well with you; disobey them, and you be hopelessly ruined. Now be off to bed, and bear in mind what I have told you.'

"I said 'Good-night,' mechanically, and went home like one who walks in a dream. I was unmarried, and so there was no one to notice any peculiarity in my manner, and when I got to bed I fell at once into a deep sleep which lasted until my usual hour of waking.

"The next day the partners went through the books and decided to grant the Ipswich loan. Everything appeared perfectly regular, even to me, and such was my state of mind that the doings of the past night were as something that belonged to another life and had no connection with the affairs of this.

"A couple of days later, Mr. Reginald drew a handsome cheque and departed on his usual holiday.

"From the night of his departure until his return I led an existence of which no novelist ever depicted the equal. As I would not believe the story myself if the terrible experience were not my own, of course I cannot find fault with any of you gentlemen if you find yourselves unable to take it as fact. It was a double life, made up of the most hideously contrasting opposites that could well be conceived. During the day I was a sober, steady-going man of business, doing my allotted work with the regularity of a machine, and having no thought outside my office and my books. But as soon as I laid my head on my pillow I drifted into a land of dreams, where I seemed to lead the life of a lost spirit wandering without rest over the earth.

"I travelled night after night through splendid cities which I had never seen with my waking eyes, but which nevertheless seemed strangely familiar to me, and in each one I repeated the delirium of unholy dissipation that I had gone through in the one I had just left. I spent hours in gambling-halls, gorgeous with lights and decorations, and thronged with pale men in evening-dress and hectic women splendidly attired and glittering with jewellery. I saw great sums of money won and lost with a laugh that had no pleasure in it.

Digitized by Google

"Every now and then would come intervals of delicious languor and rest, passed in paradises of flowers fanned by cool sea-breezes and warmed by everlasting sunshine. Then the scene would change again, and I would see men and women selling their souls for money and pleasure, and tempting each other to destruction for a few hours of fierce enjoyment.

"After a while I became aware of another presence mingling constantly in the fast succeeding scenes, and this took the shape of a young and beautiful woman, who seemed to be constantly seeking to draw my master-spirit from the revels to the rest, and more often than not succeeded. Then at last came the awakening.

"The last night of my dream-purgatory was spent in a gambling-den in a city that I had come to know as Paris. The scene stands as vividly before me now as it did the morning I woke from the dream in which I saw it. For the ten hours that I slept, Reginald Matheson the quiet, studious youth of his English life, sat over a long, green-covered table marked into divisions with chalk lines, and staked handful after handful of notes and gold on the cards as they were turned up by the dealer. The luck seemed dead against him, and at last everything was gone. Then the banker gave him a piece of blue paper, and he signed that, and staked again, and lost.

"As I woke I could hear ringing in my ears the words: 'I will discharge my debt in a week from now.'

"The next night was a blank, and the next I stayed late at the office, partly because I had some work to do, and partly because I dreaded to go back to my terrible dreamland.

"A little before twelve o'clock I was putting my books away when I heard the private door of the bank open, and a moment later I saw Mr. Reginald walk into my office where the safe was, and take a bunch of keys out of his pocket. He looked at me for an instant, and said:

"'Mind! you have not seen me here. Not a word about this!'

"As he spoke he put his key into the safe-lock, and pulled the door open. The next moment I heard a heavy tread in the outer office, and a policeman ran into the room.

"The next thing that I remember was hearing a shot fired, a groan, and a heavy fall, and feeling a pistol forced into my hand. Then I must have fainted, for I remember nothing until I woke the next morning in a cell in the police-station.

"The next day I was brought up before the magistrates at Chelmsford with Reginald Matheson charged with complicity in the murder of the policeman, who had been found shot through the heart the night before in my office.

Not to make my story too long, I may say that we were both committed for trial to the sessions, and there found guilty of murder.

"The day before the one fixed for our execution at Chelmsford, the door of my cell opened, and the woman of my dreams came in, and said without any word of introduction: 'You are guiltless and shall be free. Reggie and I are guilty, and we shall pay the penalty, but not as these people think. Good-bye; you will be free to-morrow.'

"The words of my strange visitor proved true, for the next morning, instead of being summoned to execution, I was told that my fellow-prisoner had committed suicide in the night, leaving a confession in writing that detailed the whole story of his crimes, and explained how he had made me his innocent accomplice in them from the first fraud on the bank to the murder of the policeman who had followed him on his last clandestine visit.

"Twenty-four hours later came, from the Home Office, the formal order for my release, and then I learnt that my mysterious visitor had been found dead in bed the same morning that Reginald Matheson baulked the hangman in his cell.

"How was it done? Well, the post-mortems showed that they both died of morphia poisoning, and the warder in attendance said at the inquest that, as the woman kissed Matheson for the last time before leaving him, she said:

"'We have lived and loved, whatever the price, and this kiss shall be sweeter death than the law would give.'

"The warder took this for romance, but found it to be deadly reality when he opened the cell in the morning."

EDWARD MOORE.

GENTLEMAN (indignantly): "You praised your kitchen coal up to the skies, and said it was most economical. Why, it won't burn at all!"

Coal Dealer (coolly): "Well, what could you have more economical than that?"

"REGINALD," she said, to a wealthy young dandy who had been paying his attentions to her. "I would like to ask you one very serious question."

"What is it, my dear?" he replied.

"Would you object to marry mamma if I refused you? You see, we really don't want to lose you."

THE reporter had just come in from a murder case. It was a rainy day, and he had to cross a ploughed field on foot.

"I see," observed the chief editor, looking with much displeasure at his large and muddy boots, "you have brought the scene of the murder with you."

"Yes," answered the reporter apologetically, "I've got to have some ground for my story, you know."

The Rose of Judah.

THIS is the title of a new serial story by Mr. George Griffith, which starts in Pearson's Weekly published on Saturday, October 1st.

It will be an excursion into a field which so far he has not yet trodden, notwithstanding the wide range of subjects covered by his novels.

The scene will be laid in Babylon just at the crisis of the Assyrian Empire's fate, and, talking broadly, deals with the love of Belshazzar, the Prince Regent, for Miriam, the daughter of Mishael, who herself is already in love with Belzan, Captain of the King's Guard.

There is plenty of fighting and exciting incident in the story, and no reader of Short Stories should fail to get a copy of Pearson's Weekly dated October 8th (published on Saturday, October 1st).

If the first instalment does not appeal to you, then you need not continue, and no harm will be done. But I'm sure you will like it!

Digitized by Google

READY OCTOBER 14th.

ONE MILLION COPIES

OF

3D.

THE ROYAL MAGAZINE.

ORDER IT TO-DAY.

THE Readers of Short Stories will have observed the above announcement in our recent issues, and will, no doubt, have formed the very proper conclusion that THE ROYAL MAGAZINE would be issued from these offices. In that they are right, and the time has come when we can talk to them about it.

Some of our Readers may know that an attempt has recently been made to start a Threepenny Magazine and has failed. There is at present no Magazine in this country to be obtained at Threepence. On October 14th there will be a Threepenny Magazine in the shape of THE ROYAL—a Magazine that can, and will, be sold by every bookstall clerk and newsvendor in the country at one price only, and that price Threepence.

There will not be a bookstall clerk or newsagent in the whole of the Kingdom who is not selling THE ROYAL MAGAZINE on October 14th.

A Threepenny Magazine can be made to pay if it is intelligently managed, and provided it obtains a colossal circulation. We can undertake this management, but to our readers we must appeal for the colossal circulation.

We are printing One Million Copies of No. 1, knowing we shall sell them. We want to print and sell two millions. There is only one way in which we can do that. If every reader of our papers will order a copy at once, sending in the order form to his newsman to-day, and will see that he obtains his copy or copies on the 14th, it means there will not be a copy obtainable throughout the length and breadth of the Kingdom on the 15th. Then we can start re-printing right away to get the other million ready.

But if you keep your order back for days and weeks you won't give us time to reprint before No. 2 is upon us.

One million is a big order, a very big order, for No. 1 of a magazine. Yet we who have made and seen this Magazine know we shall sell every single copy.

We want to sell them in one day.

Please give this Order Form to your regular newsman at once.

ORDER FORM.

Please keep me ..... copies of THE ROYAL MAGAZINE on October 14th.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

A STUPID HERO.

THIS hot afternoon, two young men had secured the coveted table in the balconied alcove off the dining-room of the Hotel Centra in Rio de Janeiro.

The month was March, when the sun is fierce and the yellow fever is in its deadliest activity, but the Rua do Ouvidor beneath the balcony was crowded with an excited multitude.

Rio is Brazil, and the Ouvidor is Rio, though to foreign eyes it is only an alley that runs through the heart of the city. The principal hotels, shops, and newspaper offices wall it with low, plastered buildings. Before every door an upward slanting staff supports the green flag of Brazil. From even a short perspective the flags on either side seem to intermingle, and the little balconies become hardly a handshake apart.

Usually, the tide of Brazilian life oozes gently up and down this narrow channel, but the multitude these two young men looked down upon swept by furiously. News had just arrived that the Bahian rebel general, Consulheiro, had again driven back the government troops, and Rio had immediately lighted one of its customary after-dinner revolutions.

But neither of the young men in the balcony was paying much attention to the feverish scene beneath them. Both had their watches on the table and both were looking earnestly at pictures in the backs of them.

"Sure, and my wife is the sweetest girl in the world, bar none," broke forth little Captain Bryan, who commanded a British tramp steamer anchored in the harbour and loaded with coal, which the gas company refused to land just yet, preferring to pay demurrage to the certainty of having the excited government seize it as soon as it was taken from the protection of the English flag. Yet the young captain smiled brightly, looking down at the picture in his watch. Even his blue eyes smiled.

"She would be crazy if she knew the old Fairfax was likely to be cooped up a month longer in this hornet's nest, with yellow fever as a steady business, and a revolution as a relaxation. Molly's my sweetheart yet, Bob, old boy, though we have been spliced three years. It's the first cruise she has missed, but, of course, I couldn't bring her to Rio in the month of March. She loves me and I love her, and it isn't right for her to be longing in Liverpool and me roasting in Rio, making a bargain for you to write her all about it if I join the other captains in the cemetery."

Glancing down at the table, he caught sight of the laughing, girlish face in his watch. His indignant mood vanished, and he smiled back at her once more.

Robert Morris, big and muscular, the pride of the British athletic world, nodded gravely when Captain Bryan ceased. But he did not raise his eyes from the picture in the back of his own watch. It was that of a young woman, not a girl, whose marvellous beauty spoke of regal strength, of self-command, and inherent force. The pose of the shapely head, the wide-open eyes, the delicately firm chin all told the same proud story. But there was an indescribable something about the mouth that was pathetic, as if she had a heartache and would not own up to it. Bob Morris' steady eye showed only tenderness, however, as he looked down at this beauty framed in gold.

"My wife is my sweetheart, too," said he, "but I am not hers. I love her with all my might, but she does not love me. I do not blame her, you know. She has been very good to me and will always be as true as steel, but she is a brilliant, strong-natured woman, and must be true to herself first of all. How could it be expected, captain, that she would love a stupid fellow like me? Though I am in Rio and she is in London, the separation is not wrong, as is yours from your wife. Yellow Jack might scoop me in and not do a bad day's work. Still, if I go first, you must write to her about it. As for this revolution, it promises sport. Viva Monarchy!"

Digitized by Google

"Shut up roaring 'Viva Monarchy,'" said Bryan, pointing significantly at the crowd below, now howling towards the plaster building where the monarchic newspaper had its office. "What can an honest man fight for in a country where they combine orange and green in one flag? You are already mixed up too much in this revolution as it is. Now let's take down the addresses."

So the little Irishman wrote in his note-book the address of Mrs. Robert Morris, of London, while the big Englishman wrote in his that of Mrs. Jerry Bryan, of Liverpool. Both men were silent for a few moments. Then Bryan said solemnly:

"It's a bargain: if I go, you will write to my wife, and if you go, I write to yours."

"It's a bargain," repeated Morris. The young men shook hands hard across the table. They smoked in thoughtful silence for a while.

"Bob," said the Captain impulsively, "if you should happen to write to Molly, tell her how much I loved her; promise me that."

"If I should, which I think very improbable," answered Morris gently, "I will surely tell her."

"And—and, Bob, me boy," Bryan stammered with a delicate sympathy which made him fear to hurt the big heart of his comrade, "if I should chance to write to your wife, shall I tell her how much you loved her?"

"Yes," answered Morris quietly, "I should like to have her know it."

"Didn't you ever tell her yourself?" Bryan demanded in open-eyed astonishment.

"No, I never did. She must have seen it, of course, but I have tried to do the real thing, and keep from annoying her as much as possible," replied Morris, his face flushing. "It's been hard sometimes."

The warm-hearted little Irishman stared into the quiet, strong face of his big companion.

"Robert Morris," he said, his brogue coming out strongly, "Ye are a fool."

"Let me tell you about it, and then you will understand," pleaded Morris. He shut the hand which lay listlessly on the table, until the knuckles grew white.

"Grace Lawrence and I were brought up together. Her father was my guardian. I am rich, you know. She ruled me imperiously, though she was the younger by several years. I went to college and floundered about in my usual clumsy way until I got my eyes opened.

"Grace grew to be the proud, beautiful woman of this portrait. Many men were ruled by her, strong talented men to whom I could not hold a candle. I soon saw the absurdity of thinking that such a woman could ever love Bob Morris. I made up my mind that if I really loved her, I would show it by thinking first and always of her happiness; so I never annoyed her by telling of a love she could not return, but took the place of a 'big brother' she so generously made for me. I could not help having a heartache once in a while, for I wanted to take her in my arms and hold her close, if only for a moment. But I didn't."

Bryan's lips moved as if repeating his former observation, but he said nothing.

"Everything went wrong when old Mr. Lawrence died, though I tried to make it go right. I must have been stupid in some way. Mr. Lawrence's estate was in such a bad way that Grace, heart-broken over the loss of her father, was left with almost nothing. I was arranging with the lawyers to have a lot of my money transferred to her as if her father had left it, when she found it out.

"One night she came into the library where I was looking over the legal papers. She was all in black, very slender and girlish. Her face was pale and her eyes were misty, as if she had been crying. She came quietly up behind me and put her hands on my shoulder.

"'Bob,' she said softly, 'dear old Bob, I know all about it. It must not be.'

"I had planned a story to tell her, but it all went out of my stupid head. I just thought of how frail and sad she looked, and how horrible it would be if she had to face harsh things.

"'Oh, Grace,' I cried out in consternation, 'it must be. You wouldn't be as hard on me as that. Remember, I am your big brother, and it would drive me wild to think of your giving up things. What are those lawyers thinking of to let you know?'

"She smiled at me, and settled down on the arm of the big leather chair. 'No, Bob, you are the noblest man I know, but you are not really my brother in the eyes of the world.' She took up one of the legal papers and began to tear it into small pieces. I marched about the study thinking hard, but bewildered. I knew how determined Grace was, and how proudly she faced the world. What with blind fright for her, and the strength of my love and her sitting there resolutely tearing up a fortune I quite lost my head.

"'Grace, dear,' I said, still marching up and down, 'you don't love me, of course, but I am your big brother, you know, and I am going to ask if you love anybody else.'

"'No, Bob,' she said quietly, 'I don't love anybody else.' The torn paper was falling from her hands in little white showers.

"'You won't let me take care of you as your brother,' I plunged on, 'could you let me watch over you as your husband? You don't love anyone else, and you trust me. I would care for you very tenderly, and would try not to bore or bother you. It would make me very happy, dear, to feel that I should always have the right to protect you.'

"She never looked up, and the white bits of paper still fluttered down.

"'Would it really make you happy?' she asked me.

"Her head hung down, and her voice sounded as if she were crying.

"'Of course, it would,' I said indignantly.

Digitized by Google

"'Then you shall be my big husband,' she answered softly, and almost ran out of the study."

"Didn't you kiss her?" demanded Bryan.

"Why, no," Bob answered.

Bryan actually snorted with disgust.

"Of course," went on Bob, "I saw she was marrying me out of the goodness of her generous heart. During the two months that intervened between then and our marriage, I mapped out a set of rules for myself. I vowed to watch over her as tenderly and unobtrusively as I could, but I would not force my love upon her, as if looking for a reward.

"We were married very quietly, it being so soon after her father's death. Although I tried to give Grace everything she wanted and kept a tight rein on my longings, I soon felt that she was miserable with me. It was no use, Captain, I could not help seeing that she found even the light ties that bound her to me irksome. So I fixed it with my lawyers that they should attend carefully to all her wishes, and I am here. It seemed the only way to make her happier. I am a mistake, and a mistake should be rubbed out."

The young man stopped abruptly.

"That's all," he said, nervously lighting a fresh cigar, but not looking at Bryan.

"Bob Morris," repeated Bryan gently, "ye are a double-dyed fool, and I am going out to Tijuca to write some letters. You had better come out, too, and get a whiff of mountain air. It is positively suicidal for you to stay down here in the heart of the city. I don't see how you have escaped Yellow Jack so long."

"I'll walk up as far as the Bonde with you, but I have arranged for that old rebel, Theopolo and some of his friends to meet me at my little house to-night," answered Morris, summoning the waiter by a violent hiss.

It was not a long walk to the square, where the mule cars for Tijuca had their station, but Captain Bryan complained of being tired before they reached the place.

"This infernal sun gives me a headache and pains in my back," he said fretfully, as he climbed on the car. But when the mules galloped away, he turned and waved his hand gaily to Morris.

After an hour's ride in the shaky tramcar, the mountains which girt Rio so closely tower straight up. The captain hissed at the driver and stopped the tram at the gateway to a tropical garden. The air was filled with music of fountains. Slender palms rose high. Bamboo hedges arched the walks. Orange trees bent under their burden of fruit. Ferns grew rank and tall.

Somewhat back from the road, surrounded by palms, the low square structure of a fine old Brazilian mansion, now "Hotel Tijuca," shone white against the verdure of the mountains. Bryan walked slowly up the avenue under the palms and entered a great hall open on three sides. He flung himself down in a chair amid a group of sea captains who made this hotel their headquarters.

They were sitting silent and moody. Yellow fever was their sole topic of conversation. Dread of it showed itself on their anxious faces. Usually, Bryan was full of scornful raillery of this timid colony, but this evening he sat silent, too, wondering what made his head ache so terribly.

"I think I'll go to my room and write some letters. My head feels bad. It's this great heat," said Bryan at last. Several captains hastily moved away from him as he rose. Bryan's merry scorn returned for an instant.

"Lumsley, my boy," he said in mock solicitude, "I see the whites of your eyes are of a yellow tinge."

Lumsley gasped in sudden terror, and rushed away for his favourite medicine, while Bryan went to his letters.

Several times the blinding headache forced him to stop writing, but at last he had finished. Ringing his bell, he gave the servant two letters, telling him to post them at once. One letter was directed to Mrs. Jerry Bryan, Liverpool. The other was to Mrs. Robert Morris, London.

"Dear little Molly! Stupid old Bob!" he murmured, his bright smile coming back for an instant. Then he put his hand over his eyes and groped his way to the bed. "I am so tired, so tired," he cried wearily.

Towards the evening of the next day, Bob Morris, cool and careless in his snowy duck suit, sauntered down the Ouvidor, passed into Rua Primo do Março, had a glance into the Globo, and finally arrived at Charlie Hues', the ship chandler's where the English and American captains congregated each day.

"Hasn't Captain Bryan come down?" Morris asked of Captain Lumsley, who sat by himself in a corner, rinsing his mouth out from time to time with vinegar.

"Down," repeated Lumsley dismally, "I should say he was down. Down with the worst kind of Yellow Jack at our hotel. He ought to have known better than to bring it there."

Without a reply, Morris wrenched open the door to the little room where Dr. King, the physician, had his office.

"Come with me at once, doctor," Morris cried. "Poor Jerry Bryan is down with the fever at Tijuca."

They found him delirious, rolling his head about on the pillow, and muttering incoherently. Bob knelt beside the bed, almost crying in the tenderness of his big heart. The moaning stopped, and Bryan groped about till he got his arms round Bob's neck. The hand was cold and moist. The handsome face was cadaverous and leaden. It wore the look of dread that comes to those that are stricken by the most fatal kind of yellow fever.

"Oh, doctor," cried Bob, looking up and asking no questions. He knew he must soon write to Mrs. Bryan of Liverpool.

All that night Bob sat by the edge of the bed and cared for Bryan with the tenderness of a woman. In his delirium he talked always of "Molly, dear little Molly." He was on the bridge of the Fairfax, bringing the steamer into Liverpool.

"Sure, and the mate can take her now, Mr. Pilot. I must run below and get a shave before I go ashore. Molly will be waiting at the dock, and will want to rub her cheek against mine when she kisses me," he cried out, with a faint return of his old buoyancy.

Towards morning he grew fretful. He moaned over and over again: "I want my sweetheart, I want my sweetheart." But when the day was dawning, grey and misty, Bryan came to himself and knew that his head was on Bob's shoulder.

"Thank you—old chap," he said very faintly, "when the time comes to write to Molly go to England yourself. Don't be a fool any longer. I've done the best I could for you. My—my watch, Bob."

The watch lay on the table close by, and Bob reached it without changing his position. Bryan fumbled at the case, then looked appealingly at Bob. Divining what he wanted, Bob opened the back to the picture of the laughing girl.

Digitized by Google

"My sweetheart," Bryan whispered lovingly. He raised the case to his lips with faltering hands. He made as if he would kiss it, but the blood suddenly gushed from his nose and mouth, dimming the lustre of the gold, blotting out the laughing face of the girl.

So they buried him in the English cemetery, and Robert Morris, having ordered a handsome stone to mark the grave, sat down with a heavy heart to write to Mrs. Jerry Bryan of Liverpool.

Two months passed by, and Bob, fortified against a fresh remonstrance from the consul, marched up the narrow stairs to the consulate for his letters, a mail steamer having arrived that day. He found Mr. Lance, the consul, pacing up and down the outer office, evidently much disturbed.

When Morris came in, he rushed up to him and shook hands excitedly. "Just sent my man to look you up," he cried. "Most important communication! Most extraordinary, by Jove!"

"Look here," said Bob suspiciously, "what's up? Got a new argument why I should leave this charming spot?"

"I have that," replied Lance, beaming all over. "Bet you ten to one it fetches you this time. Most extraordinary, 'pon my honour! Wonderful! Marvellous! Here, come into my private office."

He pushed Morris into the doorway, but instead of following, he shut the door with a bang and began to stamp up and down the outer office, whistling "Home, Sweet Home."

Morris drew in his breath sharply, and stood motionless, staring at his wife, who stretched out her arms to him. All the old hauteur was gone. Her eyes were soft and shining. The light of a great love transfigured her face with indescribable tenderness.

"Oh, Bob," she cried with a dry sob, "oh, my husband! I love you so!"

Morris was too much amazed to move, but the beautiful woman came to him. She crept into his strong arms, pressing close to him, lifting her lips to his. Morris put his arms about her, crushing her fiercely, and began to tremble.

"Dearest, dearest," he said in glad amazement, "I never knew, I never guessed. Why didn't you tell me you loved me?"

"How could I, stupid, when you never asked me?" she returned, burrowing her face into his coat. "Oh, Bob, my heart has been so sore. I thought you married me just because you pitied me. When you went away, I was sure that you were tired of me and too generous to tell me. I've had a heartache for years and years, hungering for your love. I never would have known the dear truth if Captain Bryan had not written to me, telling how great was your love, and how you had come to this dreadful place because you thought I wanted freedom, and that you were surely going to die of yellow fever or be shot, if I was too proud to tell you I wanted you above all things.

"I was the happiest woman in the world over that letter, even though he said you were a big-hearted fool. But I was filled with dread, too, lest I should lose you just when I could let myself love you.

"So I came all alone on the first steamer that left for Rio, not even bringing my maid.

"The voyage seemed an age, but now I have found you, I don't care for anything else, and I am never going to leave you again, never. But you haven't said you love me, Bob. Say it. I want to hear you say it!"

"I love you with all my might. I have always loved you," Bob said, with such tender solemnity that Grace looked up in his face a little awe-struck.

Two days later, they stood on the deck of the mail packet, watching the grim fort Santa Cruiz sink low on the horizon.

"I have only one regret," she said, moving closer to him, "I wish I had seen Captain Bryan to thank him. Is he in Rio, or has he sailed away to some other port?"

"He has sailed away to some other port," he answered gently. ARTHUR DENHAM.

THERE was a rule in an old Debating Society which might be advantageously recommended to the House of Commons.

"That any gentleman wishing to speak the whole evening should have a room to himself."

IT is stated by "One who has been there," that at the telegraph offices of various Californian towns and cities they have forms on which is printed, "Please send me return ticket and six dollars. I'm busted." All the sender has to do is to fill in the address and signature. The receiving clerk stamps in the name of the place and date.

YOUNG Mrs. Codling (to her papa): "Oh, papa, what does the word 'contract' mean?"

Papa: "It means to make smaller, my dear. For instance heat expands and cold contracts."

Mrs. Codling: "Then it's all right. Harry told me he was contracting some heavy debts, and I was so nervous till you explained it."

A WOMAN called at a book-shop the other day, and said she would like to take a look at some "chromos," as she wanted to find something to please her son, who had worked on the farm all the summer and should be rewarded.

"Anything religious?" asked the clerk, as he ran over a lot of chromos and engravings.

"Well, no; not exactly religious," she answered. "Some of it might be solemn like, but down in the corner there ought to be a dog fight, or a man falling off a barn, or somethin' to interest the young mind."

A PRIZE FOR ARTISTS.

THE Editor of Short Stories offers a prize of £2 2s for the best set of six decorative head-pieces, corner-pieces, or tail-pieces suitable for reproduction in the paper. Competitors may send all head-pieces, or all tail-pieces, or all corner-pieces, or some of each. The head-pieces should contain a space for the title of the story.

The winner will not only receive a cheque for £2 2s., but will possibly have the opportunity of securing a considerable amount of further work in connection with the various publications issued from this office.

Style, shape, and size, are left entirely to the competitors.

Attempts should reach the Editor, marked "Decorative," by Monday, October 3rd.

Should the quality of the competition justify it, a number of consolation prizes will be awarded.

All attempts become the property of the Editor.

Digitized by Google

MARGARET DANVERS stepped into the train at Edinburgh one stormy March evening, and the eyes of every person were riveted upon her. She looked the model of a fashionable beauty. She was the only woman in the carriage, and before she had fairly settled herself comfortably, all the men had mentally pronounced their opinion of her looks and style.

Her attendant, a florid man of middle age, received the slight degree of attention justified by his seeming an adjunct of the moment. As he left her he put into her hands a bunch of costly roses, which she received with a smile, and laid upon the rack the instant he was gone.

She was, in a way, a public character; but, as it happened, no one was really acquainted with her, and before long even those most deeply interested in her appearance yielded to the apathy peculiar to sleeping cars, and subsided into their newspapers or rugs.

Margaret amused herself in dreamily watching the flying snow. Too used to travelling to even look about her, she yielded to the prevailing somnambulistic influence just enough to dream without sleeping.

At first there was in her mind a confusion of events —past, present, and to come. Incidents of no importance mingled with greater ones, and her reflections became mixed with little fanciful suggestions of things long since forgotten, or rather, voluntarily put out of mind. She tried to think of her career, to recall her triumphs, and to dwell upon the possibilities of her future. She told herself that music was her life, all that she had to do with was the beautiful and the divine in art, and that the everyday existence she had struggled to rise above was henceforth nothing more than an unpleasant memory.

At twenty-eight she was her own mistress, earning an independent income through the use of her beautiful voice. The teaching days and the drudgery of the class-room had passed, and as a concert singer she was favourably known in more than one city noted for its critical taste. After a successful winter in Scotland, she was now upon her way to fulfil an engagement in London, which promised more than anything in which she had been engaged. She was in the heyday of her powers, admired, in radiant health, conscious of her beauty and talent, and entirely satisfied with life.

What did it mean that, as she looked from the window with a proud smile upon her lips, some tantalising thoughts should obtrude themselves, and the mind so entirely self-poised should feel, for the first time for years, the weakening influence of some emotional fancies? It was her boast that she was never lonely, never sad, that her whole heart was in her work.

"Never saw a promise of a worse storm," said a man near her to his companion. "Shouldn't wonder if the line is blocked a little ahead."

"Comes from the north-east," suggested the other. "If necessary, they'll put on another locomotive. We're bound to get through at any rate in this train; that's one comfort."

By nine o'clock Margaret, enveloped in a downy wrapper of dark red, lay courting sleep in her berth. Over her was spread the fur ulster, none too warm above the blankets, even for her warm blood, for the whiffs of icy air found their way every now and then into the compartment. Everything was quiet, save her thoughts, which began to utter themselves with loud, importunate voices, as if answering some call from without, independent of her control.

"I have, happily, been able to say all my life that I didn't know what nerves were," said Margaret to herself, "but I begin to think that from some inexplicable cause I am nervous."

"Richard Allen!"

She started as if the words had been spoken in her ear. Swiftly memory flew back ten years, and she saw herself standing bare-headed at the gate of her father's house in the Highlands, where her childhood had been passed; and beside her, bending tenderly to catch her lightest word, the form of her first lover, then a poor, obscure young lieutenant in the army.

Digitized by Google

With an indifference scarce tinged with pity, since it hardly occurred to her in those days that men could really feel, she had met his pleading affection with an enthusiastic outburst of her ambition to lead the artist's life, to spend her energies in self-development, and show what a woman wholly devoted to an intellectual and artistic career might become. She had no feeling for him above regard; no feeling for anyone, for anything but art.

"You must not think that I am deficient in womanly sensibility," she had said to him, with one of those soft glances, of the meaning and effect of which she was entirely unconscious. "But some women must remain spinsters, you know, and I think I am meant to be one of the sisterhood."

"You do not know yourself. The day will come when ambition will seem nothing to you; when the homely things, the real things, will assume their true value in your eyes, and a 'career' will seem a mere artificiality that has nothing to do with what is best and sweetest in life."

The words had passed her by as an idle phrase, evoked by disappointment. And she and Richard Allen had parted.

She had lived for ambition, and the world had been kind to her, after she had proved her mettle. She had not lacked lovers, but she had never loved. Her strong will, which had determinedly mapped out an existence entirely free from sentiment, had carried her through every affair triumphantly and untouched.

The woman turned restlessly in her berth, wondering why such thoughts should come to her now to interfere with her peace. She was good: she was ashamed of nothing in her past; she was living a high, free, independent life, the life for a woman of intellect and energy to lead. Thank Heaven, she was not an emotional creature! Sentiment had been trained out of her. After midnight she lost consciousness, and passed a few hours in fitful slumber. It was cruel that she should have to dream of Richard Allen; dream that they were together in an open boat, drifting out to sea, and that his arms were about her, his eyes looking into hers. And she cared for nothing, thought of nothing but that he held her close—how strangely sweet it was!

A jar, a shock, a sudden stop, as if the train had run against a wall of rock, and Margaret tried to rise, but fell back with a cry. A fall through space—what was it? Oh! where was she? Had the train fallen down an embankment?

After a minute she realised that she had been thrown from her berth across the car; there was a sharp pain in her left arm, and a weight upon her side. A falling lamp had struck her, and for some cause she could not rise; her leg must be broken. There was a terrible confusion, much talking, and half-a-dozen people bending over her pityingly and asking questions.

"What has happened? Is anybody killed?" she asked.

Several persons answered at once. They had run into a goods train. The driver of their own was killed; no one else. Many were hurt. Could she bear to be moved?

"I must," she returned, setting her lips, for agonising pains began to shoot through her foot, and the mere thought of being touched was suffering.

"Fortunately, we are near a village; there are houses near."

It was the conductor who spoke now, and he at once took charge. She was lifted carefully, wrapped in blankets and carried out. Their car had sustained less damage than any other, being in the rear, and there was no difficulty in getting out.

"If she could stand to be taken over there," said someone, pointing to a house some distance away, "she'd be more comfortable."

"If she could bear being taken over to the doctor's house," said the persistent first speaker.

"I can stand it," she interposed; "take me there quickly."

They improvised a sort of litter of mattresses, and carried her across a field in the open country. The dawn was just breaking, and the pale moon was slowly fading out of view before the great coming light. The air was clear, cold, crisp; and though there had evidently been a heavy storm during the night, it had cleared completely, and the first ray of sunlight glittered upon the banks of frozen snow.

The house before which they stopped was a plain, two-storied structure, which seemed, at first sight, peculiarly barren-looking. Clean white curtains hung in straight, scant folds at the windows. The door had been drab in colour, but the paint had been so assiduously scrubbed that one now took its presence on trust. There was a brass knocker and a rush door-mat, on which lay a large black cat with bristling white whiskers.

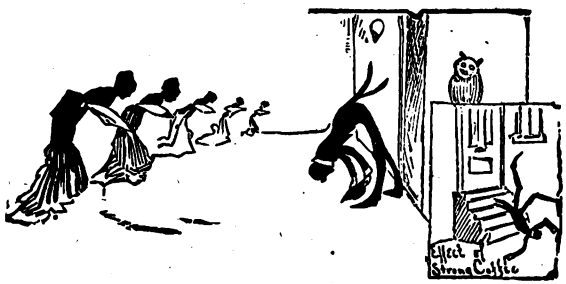
The door was opened by a severe-looking servant girl, whose starched cap and apron suggested careful housekeeping, as her suspicious countenance suggested inhospitality. She made no objections to admitting them, however, and Margaret was carefully deposited upon a couch in the sitting-room, to wait the coming of the doctor, who, the maid said, had just left the house to go to the scene of the accident.

"We'll send him back to you, ma'am, right off," one of the men assured her. "You ought to be 'tended to first."

"Not if others are suffering and need him more," said Margaret faintly.

The ungenial-looking servant proved herself to be not deficient in skill, even though sympathy was in a measure lacking. She made her guest as comfortable as she could. The shoe was cut from the swollen ankle, which was bathed and bandaged, and the hurts upon her shoulder and side were pronounced to be only bruises which "the doctor would make right." And then

Digitized by Google



Margaret was left to herself, while the girl went to make the inevitable "cup of tea," which was to set everything straight.

At first she lay perfectly still, seeing nothing, and caring for nothing, her mind full of vexation and impatience over an accident which must delay the fulfilment of her engagement. It did not occur to her that it might have been worse; anything was bad enough.

After awhile her eyes began to wander idly around the room. It seemed half parlour, half study. There was a book-case well filled; some good engravings on the walls; a few easy-chairs covered with raw silk of a dull hue, much worn; and a writing-table between the windows, half covered with books and magazines.

There was something agreeable to her taste in the air of the room. She could imagine it the abode of a man whose very poverty could never become squalid. The great open stove shone brightly, and the hearth was scrupulously clean. Upon the mantle-piece were a bronze clock and a pair of fine vases, dainty in tone and finish; they were the sole womanly touches about the place. Noting these details half indifferently, she lay back again and closed her eyes.

When she opened them again, they happened to glance directly over to a corner of the room which had before been dim, but was now illuminated by a shaft of sunlight. A carved bracket hung there, and on the shelf lay a singular-looking little instrument, shaped like a dagger, of Moorish device, the handle inlaid with gold, left rough and unpolished.

When Margaret saw this small object, she gave a little cry and tried to rise; but finding that impossible, she dropped back upon her pillows as though she had been shot, her eyes fixed upon the little instrument with a look of recognition that was half pleasure, half alarm. What strange trick was fate about to play her? How could this thing be possible?

There was a noise, the front door opened, and someone came along the hall with a firm, measured step. Margaret's heart, that well-regulated organ, beat to suffocation. She hardly dared listen or look. She threw her arm up over her forehead, nearly concealing her face. Someone entered the room and paused beside her. A well-remembered voice, graver, deeper than of yore, yet with a cheery ring in it, said:

"Let me see what I can do to help you, madam."

A chair was drawn up to the side of the couch, a gentle hand took her own. Her pulse was beating furiously; the hand was held rather long, as if something perplexed him. She felt searching eyes bent upon her face and suddenly threw down her arm. The doctor drew back, his face paling, and the two looked at each other for a minute in silence. She spoke first, putting out her hand timidly.

"Richard, don't you remember me?"

"Remember you? As if I were likely ever to forget you, Margaret."

She softly touched his empty left sleeve, pinned over his breast, two tears standing in her eyes.

"At Tel-el-Kebir," he said. "I have got over minding it. Don't grieve."

"You left the army?"

"Yes, years ago. I studied medicine, was invited here by an old friend to become his assistant, and shortly afterwards he died. That is all."

"You never—never——"

"Yes, I married."

The words were an unexpected stab. Margaret gasped, amazed that she should care. Her face suddenly became suffused with colour, and she turned it away.

"She only lived a year, Margaret," said the doctor, bending down to study the fair flushed face, suddenly pain-smitten.

"My arm!" said Margaret, drawing his attention to the lesser hurt.

He was the doctor again at once, and for the next half-hour all professional gravity, and as impersonal as the sphinx; yet the woman felt through every nerve, like a musical vibration, the thrill of his firm, warm fingers, the scrutiny of his eyes. He was changed, worn through suffering rather than years; his face lined, his hair grown grey, with nothing young about him but his eyes, which sparkled with a cheeriness and brightness no grief could dim, for they mirrored a mind above all personal considerations, concerned with those large, loving interests belonging to humanity.

The woman felt the presence of this spirit, as if something beautiful and good had settled down softly beside her, and mutely besought her attention from herself and her narrow world. She struggled against it, yet it was like a shaft of genial sun heat entering suddenly some frozen glen. She felt, in a heart purposely hardened against such influences, a stir, a thaw; ice was breaking, and the long-stilled waters of human affection began to flow in gentle currents, inspiring a sensation of delight that astonished and abashed her.

The doctor came and went quietly, her eyes following him. When he intercepted the look she blushed like a school girl. Too busy all the day to give her more than necessary attention, he yet lost nothing that passed, and she had a sense which was oddly pleasant that he understood something of what was passing in her mind.

The coals burnt red in the open stove; a little tea-table was set in the middle of the room, and in the easiest chair in the house, piled with all the available cushions, the doctor placed Margaret, taking his position opposite her. The girl brought in supper, which was well cooked and served with a scrupulous cleanliness that almost atoned for the absence of a more dainty service.

The doctor's face shone with satisfaction; but his manner, although genial, was ceremonious. Margaret felt that, in the few feet intervening between them, there lay years of care and grief and disappointment. She felt a yearning to bridge the chasm, to draw nearer to him, even though she herself had to take the hard steps towards understanding.

Thought the woman: "Does he love me still?" And thought the man: "Is she tired of the world, and could she learn to love me now?"

But they spoke of music; of the routine of a soldier's life; of what they had seen, what they had read. Not a word of what they felt.

Digitized by Google

A few hours later the doctor stood in his bare little soldier's bedroom, and looked in his glass. For five minutes he studied himself, and then he turned away, resolved to let no new hope spring up in his heart.

But Margaret slept to dream of him; woke through the night thinking of him, as she could not have thought in the olden days, when he wooed her in the confidence of his fresh, hopeful youth.

There was no hotel in the village, and the few scattered houses were crowded with the wounded passengers, lying there till well enough to proceed with their journey.

Margaret was not sorry that there was no other place for her than the refuge she had been taken to.

In time her shy looks wrought upon the doctor, and his stern resolution wavered. He found himself sounding her preferences and attachments, with the unconfessed design of extracting some unguarded word that might indicate a change in her old convictions. This caused him to betray to the eager girl all he wished to conceal, and she wished to know. She had telegraphed to London that she would be there in a few days. She was now free from pain, and able to put her foot to the ground. The doctor persisted in helping her from her couch to the chair, and back again.

"But I can walk alone now," she objected.

"We must be careful. Not until to-morrow." She protested with greater earnestness. "True, I have but one arm," he said, with the first accent of bitterness she had heard from him.

Her lips parted to give utterance to a sudden rush of words, but she only looked at him with eyes so eloquent that he answered the look.

"Margaret, do you care? Dear, I have always loved you; I love you now. Can you care?"

She drooped her head on his shoulder, but said nothing. The doctor held her close for a minute, and then, leaving her, began to walk up and down the room.

"It is impossible!"

"It may be impossible," murmured Margaret, with a little blush, "but—it is true."

"It is cruel in me to ask it, dear. You are young, beautiful, brilliant—with success at your feet, and I——"

She put up her hand imploringly. It was caught and held.

"And I am poor, obscure, and—and old," he finished, his eyes upon her face.

"I have come to you, Richard. It seems strange to me. I cannot explain it, but it seems as if everything the world has to offer me is nothing beside——"

"Beside my love?" He bent on one knee beside her chair and put her hand to his lips.

"I want to share your life," she said; and a new expression grew upon her face—a high, devoted look, which was half-heroic, all womanly. "I want to learn something of the great things, the true things."

"You have had greater things than I can give you. Think of all you are leaving."

She made a gesture of renunciation. "It does not seem much to leave—for you."

"Ah, my darling, I am afraid you will regret it! The work-a-day world will be a trial to you. And mine is a veritable work-a-day world."

He kept his eyes on her face, half-dreading to see her shrink away. But what woman is not won by an appearance of self-renunciation? Richard could not have let her go now; at the last instant he would have snatched her to his breast had she drawn away. But the misgiving that rushed over him so fiercely was a real one, a sensible one: he felt it profoundly, and tried to read in her eyes a shadow of this coming regret. But her eyes were clear, loving, radiant. She pressed herself against his breast, and gave him the great gift of her life and her future. Would the shadow ever come?

The moon looked softly into the room an hour later, and finding the lovers in that delicious dream which once in a lifetime comes to most men and women, drew over her face a grey cloud-veil and let them to dream on.

MARY COOMBE.

HER FATHER: "Is he a man of any means?"
She: "Certainly; he means to marry me."

THE armless artist was married recently, and signed the wedding contract with her feet. That was an au-toe-graph with a vengeance.

"YOU are fined 10s.," said the magistrate to Jaysmith, arrested for drunkenness.

"Why, your honour," protested Jaysmith, "you only fined me 5s. last time. I understood the necessities of life were going to be cheaper under this Government."

PHYSICIAN: "You cannot possibly follow your profession more than five or six years longer. I have known it a long time."

Star Actor (wrathfully): "Then you ought to have told me before this. You have cheated me out of several farewell seasons."

IT has been satisfactorily demonstrated, that when a man steps on a bar of soap which has been left on the top step, it will start down stairs with him, and though having much the best start will yet be overtaken and passed by him before it gets half-way down. This sounds like an Eastern allegory; but every married man knows it is true.

A FORLORN Irishman, reduced to the last stage of poverty and destitution, as the last resource made inquiry at a marine store as follows:

"D'ye buy rags and bones here?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"Then, be jabers," says Pat, "ye may put me on the scales."

ARCHIE: "My children manifest too early in life a tendency to put away money, and I am exceedingly worried over it."

Sandiman: "Why, that is an excellent trait, and I don't see any reason why you should be worried."

Archie: "But I am. The baby swallowed a threepenny bit this morning."

THE advertisement manager of a newly-started journal wrote to a large firm in the following terms:

"We notice your advertisement in the Quicksilver, which we will insert for twenty-five per cent. less than they charge."

The reply was:

"The Quicksilver inserts our advertisement for nothing. We will trouble you for a cheque for the difference."

Digitized by Google

Football Players Competition!

OPEN TO EVERYBODY. £10 IN PRIZES. OPEN TO EVERYBODY.

Below will be found ten sets of words, each of which indicates the name of some well-known football player.

For example, "A young goose" signifies, of course, Gosling.

Ten names will appear each week for five weeks, making fifty names in all.

Keep all your lists by you until you are told to send them in.

To the person who succeeds in solving the greatest number we will give

A CRISP £5 NOTE.

TO THE NEXT, £2; TO THE NEXT, £2; AND TO THE NEXT, £1;

while consolation prizes will be awarded to the extent of twenty handsome volumes which competitors may select for themselves from the catalogue of books issued by this firm.

If you are weak in the names of football players, your brother, or cousin, or male friend will give you a helping hand.

SHORT STORIES "FOOTBALL PLAYERS" COUPON No. 4.

31.	Daubs with mud.	31. .....
32.	An overseer.	32. .....
33.	A big collection of trees.	33. .....
34.	A flour factory and part of a key.	34. .....
35.	A workman.	35. .....
36.	Red sandal wood.	36. .....
37.	Trees.	37. .....
38.	A game at cards.	38. .....
39.	Flags.	39. .....
40.	"Enlarge, Mac!"	40. .....

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

"LITTLE BROTHER."

Miss Stanley was a pink and white English girl, tall and shapely.

The Mexican girls, who ordered out their carriages if they had merely a few yards to go, used to look upon her with amazement as she tramped down their steep streets with a fine, swinging, heel-and-toe gait.

She was picking her way one day among the vendors in the plaza, stopping once in a while to give some whining beggar or tattered monstrosity a centavo, when she felt her skirt pulled.

Looking, she saw a tiny hand held out, and a childish voice piped the usual formula for alms.

The little creature was no taller than a child of four.

But the face! It was old and withered. The eyes were sunken and so old!

Miss Stanley pulled back the bonnet—the hair was grey.

"A dwarf," she thought, with a little feeling of repulsion. "How old are you?"

"Fifty-four," piped up the wee thing.

She said her name was Rosita.

Rosita, it appeared, did nearly anything for a living, begging preferably, although that is a somewhat overcrowded profession in Mexico.

Sometimes she sold chickens or vegetables on commission.

She had another source of income, being a pensioner on the bounty of a young man—a centavo a week—but she confessed sadly he made her jump for the coin, and if he held his arm out straight she might jump in vain, she could not reach it.

"The brute!" said Miss Stanley.

Rosita did not know the meaning, but she looked up, pleased.

That was good, the English lady was taking an interest in her, for the expletive sounded profane, and profanity from a feminine source indicated strong emotion, which she construed favourably.

The poor in Mexico are always hungry, and Miss Stanley, knowing this failing, took Rosita to a little one-room restaurant. The menu was confined strictly to Mexican dishes.

Miss Stanley noticed that Rosita put half her dinner on one side. When she came to a dulce of some tropic fruit, boiled in syrup of cane sugar, her little wrinkled eyes looked wistful.

"How can I take some to my little brother?" she asked.

Miss Stanley asked another question:

"Is this food you have put away, for your brother?"

"Yes," answered Rosita, in her squeaky voice, "I take care of him. We are alone, and I work for him. He is locked in the room, now see," and she held up the massive key peculiar to the Mexican doors.

"Why is he locked in?" asked Miss Stanley, as she directed the waiter to put the dinner in a couple of jars for Rosita to take to her brother.

"He has fights with the children in the street, and I am afraid some one will get hurt," she answered.

Miss Stanley watched her trot away, laden with the dinner for her brother—so little and so old and pitifully thin. It was not until she reached home that Miss Stanley remembered she had not asked how old the "little brother" was.

She often met Rosita after that, sometimes in the Jardin, where the roses nodded overhead and violets bloomed under foot, and the band played softly and sweetly as Mexican bands do. Rosita would dart into the inner circle, where the quality walked under the trees or sat on the iron benches. Miss Stanley could seldom resist the little, dirty, badly-worked square of drawn work held out by the tiny hand.

Sometimes in the plaza, where the vendors called their various fruits and vegetables with long-drawn, wailing cries, Miss Stanley would suddenly hear at her elbow the shrill squeak of Rosita as she praised the virtues of an attenuated hen.

Digitized by Google

"Very plump!—take it—weigh it in your hand—it is heavy," she would insist, holding up the unattractive bundle of feathers.

Constance Stanley had no father or mother, and living with a brother who was endeavouring to effect the drainage of the richest silver-mine in the world, wandered unchecked through the crowded, narrow streets of the old town, with a young servant girl for her only safeguard.

She had often longed to explore a dark street that plunged downwards from the paved and civilised one.

It was damp and murky.

A staircase of stone, with crumbling adobe walls, two and three stories high.

Across the street's narrow width fluttered strings of washing.

The women with their red petticoats and blue hooded cloaks, made bright patches of colour.

The men loafed about lean and ragged.

It reminded her of Naples.

The doorways swarmed with babies and dogs—poverty always marching side by side with those innocents.

Down she went.

The street made an abrupt turn.

At the corner she was startled by seeing protruding from a hole cut in a squalid doorway, several long black fingers.

They were withdrawn, and she saw as she passed the door two bloodshot eyes peering out like beast's eyes.

"Nina! Heaven has sent you, and see what gain will be yours!"

Turning, Miss Stanley beheld Rosita at her heel. She had a plate to sell—a coarse, ironstone china plate, chipped and cracked.

There was a look of intense anxiety on her old face, and her wee hands shook as she drew her treasure forth from under her cloak.

The plate was worthless, and Constance, breaking the fact gently to the dwarf, was astonished to see the tears gather and fall over her shrivelled cheeks.

"For two days, senorita, I have not dared unlock that door," and she nodded toward the mean portal where the eyes had shone and the fingers protruded restlessly. "'Little brother' has had nothing to eat, except the few biscuits which the poor round here could give, and many of these go hungry from the sun's coming up until the sun's going down."

Constance sent her servant and Rosita to the Plaza for some cooked food, and, while she waited, she talked in the doorways with Pepita and Lola and Juana.

They told her how Rosita worked and starved for her brother.

"How old is he?" asked Constance.

"No one knows," they said.

"Is he a child or is he big enough to work for her?" she asked impatiently.

"Ah! he is big, but also he is mad. See, that is José now who glares from a hole in the door."

Miss Stanley listened to them with that rapt attention we all give the tales of the insane.

He dug deep holes in the earthen floor, burrowing like an animal; sometimes he escaped in that way and then there was fear in that narrow street, and the police, after a desperate fight, would drag him shrieking back to the one poor room Rosita called home.

She had always put food through the door to him before venturing to open it.

Once, for a long time, he had not menaced the peace of the street.

That was when he killed the watchman.

Constance looked very lovely at the dance.

A policeman had teased him as he peered from the hole in the door, much as people tease a hyena snarling in a cage.

The mad have memories, for José, one night when the moon was big, crept softly about the dark room, and, finding the key Rosita's small cunning had hidden, opened the door, crept again softly up to the street to a doorway, where was sleeping a sereno, his head on his knees.

The police have a day and a night duty, but one cannot expect a madman to know everything. So it was an innocent man who had his neck wrung as the cook does a chicken's.

They found him asleep by the dead sereno, and although too polite in the "Land of the Noonday Sun" to manacle or chain, they took the precaution to tie with stout rope José's slumbering bulk before six of the largest policemen would venture to carry him to the prison. José's kind of people are treated with deference in Mexico. So, after some time, the man was sent back for the dwarf to feed and care for, and Rosita's face took on more wrinkles each day.

By the time Rosita returned with the food, Constance, who understood Spanish very well, had heard much of the "little brother."

Digitized by Google

She declined to look through the peep hole at him ravening over his dinner like a wild beast. Followed by Rosita's wordy gratitude, she climbed to the top of the street and there met Mr. Dysart, whom she had met at the Governor's ball.

Constance looked very lovely at the dance, in a simple gown of white silk. Mr. Dysart completely lost his head over her; as he had a lot of possessions in Ireland, among them a rich father and an ancient and honorable ancestry, he could afford to do so.

He was thinking of her as she had looked the night before, when suddenly she appeared, with her servant, coming up from a street dark and deep, like a well, for already it was getting dusk.

On the strength of having been at college with her brother, he began with true manly irascibility to take her to task for her imprudence. But Miss Constance tightened up her soft, haughty mouth, and giving him the rear curve of a tweed shoulder to study, led him a chase home.

When they reached the house, Dick, in a smoking-jacket, lounged out from the sala to insist that "Tony, old boy," should take tea with them.

Which he did.

That was the first difference between the brother and sister.

Dick and Tony were great chums, and every night they conversed about pumping out the mine or riding to hounds. But Constance detested Tony, and, contrary to her usual reticence, said so.

She tramped round the disreputable and filthy streets twice as much as before, for she knew it annoyed him. Sometimes she would see him following, and she resented his espionage.

"Why don't you like Tony?" Dick would ask. "You know my theory, Connie, that a man like Dysart makes the best husband."

"Oh, Dick! who is talking about husbands? I think that a man who is utterly doggy or horsey and takes Browning to be an authority on pink eye or glanders is a very poor companion. To quote your 'dear Tony,' 'We don't run in the same class!'"

Dick gave a contemptuous snort. This was one day at luncheon, and Constance, instead of the good cry she pined for, took a walk. She had not seen Rosita for some time, and she turned her steps towards what Mr. Dysart called "those cutthroat dens."

She had never seen the street so deserted. All were taking a siesta, even the dogs. As she reached the sharp corner she heard a thin little shriek full of appeal. She recognised Rosita's voice, and ran with her maid at her side into the low, open doorway she had before so shudderingly avoided.

There, snapping his teeth and rolling his bloodshot eyes, was Rosita's "little brother," tied with strong ropes to an iron pin in the wall; but his arms were free, and he stood naked to the waist, a giant in size.

He had secured the key and had almost pulled the staple from the wall, but Rosita was clinging to his arm and calling for help. To and fro he swung her as a wolf might a rabbit.

He had the key in his black, cruel hands, and he brought it down on her upturned face. Then again, as Constance rushed forward with a scream, the key fell with a crunch on the little, old, grey head.

At that moment the pin gave way, for adobe walls are not strong. Constance turned with her hands thrown out wildly.

Over Rosita's body the madman tripped with a crash to the earth floor; just as he fell, he caught Constance's gown in his grasp.

She fell with him, and, falling, knew the room had filled with a clatter-crowd, and that Tony Dysart loomed above all.

Constance, with the help of her maid, got out in the street, where she listened, with beating heart, to the cries, oaths and scuffling going inside.

There was one predominating, awful groan—then a sinister silence.

A moment of sickening uncertainty for that unemotional young Englishwoman, and Tony Dysart appeared, panting, his clothes torn, and bloodstains on his face and hands.

He walked firmly enough to give Constance a helping arm up the stairs.

He said Rosita was dead, and he thought the "little brother" would die also, for, while he was struggling with him a policeman had crept up and struck him over the head with a heavy, iron bar.

"Here we are at home," she said, as they stopped before the carved doors. "Come in. Dick will want to see you. He can thank you better than I."

"No one can thank me like you can," Tony replied. "And I must go to the hotel. This arm of mine pains a little. No, not broken," he answered, trying to smile, "but 'little brother' wrenched it a trifle."

Constance, however, would not accept his easy assurance that it was all right. "You must come in, Dick will want you."

"Do you want me, though?"

She did not answer that; but, as she let the knocker fall, turned with tears in her eyes.

"Will you come, Tony?"

"I will come," he insisted, "if you want me."

The big doors swung open.

"I want you," she said slowly.

And the doors clanged behind them.

JESSICA PALMERSTON.

A RAILWAY Washing Company has been talked of. The clothes are to be boiled under the copper of the engine, and mangled under the wheels of the luggage train.

SHE (disappointedly): "The ring is—is pretty, but the pearls are so very, very small."

He (airily): "Yes, I told them it was for the smallest hand in the city."

WIFE (who wants him to buy it): "I saw such a duck of a bonnet to-day."

Husband (not to be caught): "Yes, and like other ducks, it has got a pretty big bill to it, I suppose."

DOLLY: "Flowter, you are something of a sailor I believe?"

Flowter: "Something."

"Then tell me what is the usual binding for a ship's log book."

"Well, it is often homeward bound."

MRS. NOOLYWED: "Oh, ma, George is upstairs in a fearful temper, and all because I asked him to lend me his new razor a moment."

Mother: "The wretch! What did you want it for, dear?"

Mrs. Noolywed: "Just to open a sardine tin with."

Digitized by Google

WHAT AMERICA THINKS OF THE WAR.

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

Time 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

France and Germany declare war against Great Britain.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

An inventor secures an audience with the Prince of Wales and demonstrates to him the utility of a new weapon, with the result that steps are immediately taken to manufacture an enormous number of them.

The Hornet, a torpedo boat, commanded by Rodney, blows up the Suez Canal. Paris is in a state of fermentation owing to the repulse of the Allied fleet.

Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour's fleet gains a decisive victory over the Allies off the Rock of Gibraltar.

A representative of the New York World interviews Lord Salisbury on a matter that is not yet made public.

The British organise two expeditions, one to invade France, and one to invade Germany. The first army corps appears off Havre, and after a short bombardment which lasts till nightfall, the fleet withdraws, the troopships move northwards, and the soldiers are landed at a point opposite Bleville.

The French are routed and the British enter the city.

On receiving news of Lord Roberts's successes in France, Sir Evelyn Wood sets sail with his expedition for Germany. A small but powerful fleet under Sir Nowell Salmon engages the attention of the enemy at the mouth of the Kiel Canal. Meanwhile, the main body of troops arrive with a large escort in sight of Stralsund. A brigade of cavalry under Colonel Lockhart attacks and captures the town from the rear. The next morning 200,000 English troops lay encamped on German soil.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Divided States.

France was the honoured ally of the States. No treaty held them to a common union, but from the remote time when America had claimed from Britain her independence, France had given aid to the sister republic and had fought for the establishment of a new and powerful nation.

True, Americans were of English blood. Our history and our literature were theirs. They spoke a common tongue. The ties of kinship held the mother country and her giant colony in a bond that could not lightly be broken. But were these elements sufficient in themselves to keep alive the flame of mutual sympathy? Time would doubtless show.

When the American schoolmaster sought to inflame his pupil with pride in his country's greatness, or with the fervour of patriotic feeling, it was to this one great national effort that he turned for example. The Englishman was the enemy—England's unjust laws the offence. It was the red coat who figured in the history books, in the drama, in fable and in story, as the representative of what was hostile, proud, and arrogant; he it was who was invader and destroyer. It was in victory over him that national virtue first became manifest and the nation itself first founded. And through all these troublous times the American schoolboy learnt that whilst England was the foe, it was France who was the friend.

And when, triumphant and secure, the American Republic had shown what marvellous resources there lay in its sturdy strength, and had become, in an incredibly short space of time, one of the chief Powers of the world, it was France who sent congratulations and a gift. The colossal statute of Liberty, which dominated the harbour of New York, seemed to be an everlasting memorial of the deadly struggle with Britain, and of the generous aid which an equally young republic had sent across the waters.

One of them approached Mr. Rockefeller.

Every reason that history could give tended to attach the sympathy of America to France. And that country expected it, awaited it, was certain of it.

Early in May a full meeting of the American House of Representatives mustered at the Capitol. A strange rumour had spread in the morning that an important announcement was to be made, and there was little difficulty in guessing its subject.

No wonder, therefore, that of the 356 delegates, 330 were present at the opening of the House.

Digitized by Google

Prayer was solemnly pronounced amid the ill-concealed and impatient movement of the expectant throng. The Speaker then rose and informed the profoundly silent House that he had received that day from the President of the Republic a Message, which it was his duty to read to the assembled delegates of the United States.

In clear tones and measured utterance he proceeded to read it out.

After rehearsing the principles laid down by previous American statesmen as those which should govern the international policy of the States, the President declared that there was no consideration which could draw America into European complications except the instinct of self-defence.

It was her plain duty to remain neutral.

"I have carefully considered with the Secretary for State," he went on, "the circumstances which have led to the war between Great Britain and her neighbours, and we can see no reason why the United States should be expected to interfere and compel the three nations to submit to her arbitration."

Cheers greeted this announcement. But it was noticed that the French and German ambassadors, who were both present, turned angrily to each other and exchanged a glance of mutual disdain.

But the chief point in the Message lay in its final words:

"When, however, the war is concluded and terms of peace are being arranged, it will become the duty of the United States, as protector of the western continent, to insist upon a hearing. The fate of Canada cannot be without concern to us. It will be imperatively necessary to warn off any encroaching power who may hold before itself the hope of securing a foothold in America. No European government can be permitted to take possession of Canada.

"What then is to become of the Dominion? Stretching as she does between the two great territories that form the United States, it is clear that geographical fitness must decide the question. America has a logical claim to Canada. The pacific policy we have pursued of grouping under one great banner all the scattered territories of this continent will here once more be justified.

"In a word, the United States will take Canada unto herself, and inaugurate within it a new era of peace and prosperity which that unfortunate and misled province so sadly needs."

There was much cheering as the Message came to a close, and eager voices claimed a hearing. It was true that there were some protests, some remonstrances, from moderate men. But the war spirit aflame in the youthful nation, that had scarce learnt the bitter lessons of statecraft, was too strong, and the President was acclaimed as the "iron hero of American progress."

Additional point was given to the discussion by the declaration of a prominent member that "when the United States had given the blessings of her protection and her government to all the territory of North and South America, it would become her glorious mission to establish the principles of arbitration amongst the nations of Europe, and force them to voluntarily accept impartial tribunals in all disputes arising between them."

There was much excitement in the American Press on the following morning, and cartoons of a character insulting to Great Britain were not lacking. Only one important journal assumed a calm and temperate tone.

The New York World, in a somewhat caustic article, warned the American people that if they were "too eager to secure more stars, they should not forget that they might have to take the stripes also."

But in Canada public indignation knew no bounds. Never was the loyalty of the Dominion so much needed, never so vigorously shown.

During the next few days—maddened by the contemptuous allusions of the President to the fate of the great English colony, a large number of volunteers assembled on the frontiers, and declared their intention of stamping out any overt acts of violence which American freebooters might make.

Everywhere young and active men came forward keen and ready to enlist their services for war either at home or abroad.

A large number of volunteers assembled on the frontiers.

One of the Quebec papers called loudly to the Canadian people to prepare themselves for invasion.

"Let the United States," it said, "come with its thirty ships and its 30,000 men. We shall flick them off like flies. Canada is strong in her defences—but in her loyalty and courage invincible."

And it was quite obvious that for the purposes of the war, Canada could prove of the greatest service to England. Her active militia alone numbered 40,000 men; of reserves she had no less than 1,100,000. Through active drill, and a preparation that, for the last two years—in view of a possible enemy by no means European—had been unremitting and exacting, this splendid army was in magnificent condition, trained in all the necessary evolutions of war, accustomed to rapid marching, excellent marksmen, and habituated to discipline.

It is not, therefore, without a genuine and well-founded feeling of self-assurance that Canada flung back the menaces of the United States, and clamoured to be permitted to pour her sons into the trenches in France and Germany.

But excited as American politicians were, madness of quite a different kind reigned in Wall Street.

The Message of the President had come as a thunderclap to the rich speculators and stockholders of New York. European war was bad enough; and already the commercial world was shaken to its foundations. But his open menace to England convulsed the market, and a terrible panic set in.

Men hurried to and fro in wild tumult, and violent words clashed in angry debates. The great leaders of finance were gathered in their strength, and, though silent, showed by flushed cheek and nervous movement their anxious concern in the news continually flashed along the cable.

On 'Change a small knot of Germans—disregarded and shunned—scowled upon the scene, looking half threatening, half amazed.

One of them, a rich broker named Dumpfstadt, approached Mr. Rockefeller, who, pale and erect, stood near the rostrum.

"Zis is von great hullaboo," he forcibly exclaimed. "Is not ze Vaterland goot frents to your beeb'e? Vy you ze Englischen thus so vid unfairness sympathise vid? Are de Deutsch here not also citizens of ze starred stripes?"

Rockefeller turned on him a quick look of disgust.

"Go away and learn English, you German blackguard," he said, "if you want to talk with me, and come back in a year."

"You lofe nicht fair play," stammered the German.

"Fair-play!" exclaimed Rockefeller. "Look here, you fool. I am not a man of sentiment; I have little time to feel for my own country, let alone for others. But do you German thieves know what it is you are trying to do? I am a business man, and I speak in a business way. The fortunes of America are bound up with those of England.

Digitized by Google

If England is beaten in this war, there will be universal ruin throughout the States. She is our best customer, she carries our goods, our money is invested in her stock. What do we care if France or Germany are buried in your petty ocean? We, the business men of New York, cannot afford that England should be beaten."

"What the French army wants is a man able to command it."

"You are von brafe man," sneered the German. "And vot will you do?"

"Do?" Here Rockefeller moved forward as though he intended to reduce the German nation by one person at least. "I will show you what we will do. Gentlemen," he exclaimed to the interested group that had gathered round, "listen to me. Our fortunes are at stake. We cannot let the English nation suffer defeat. Do not let us be led away by sentiment. We must save our possessions. I for one am not going to be beggared for jingo patriotism. This rascal asks us, the merchants of New York, what we can do. My reply is this: I will purchase ten million dollars' worth of the New British stock."

At his words a cheer was raised, and the excitement grew. Then Mr. Morgan, after shaking Rockefeller by the hand, mounted the rostrum and made an earnest speech, calling on them all to support the finances of England.

"I add my own ten millions," he declared. "Let us send England our money. It will be the best investment we have ever made. Our gold will keep her armies in the field and give them victory, and we shall save our falling interests throughout the world. Timid and blind is he who will not give a little to save much." There was a tumult of applause, and in a moment the two financiers had headed a list with forty millions of dollars. In half an hour two hundred millions had been subscribed. And that night a cablegram informed the English Chancellor that no less than forty millions sterling was on its way to take up a corresponding amount of the newly-created stock.

Indeed, the position of England from the mercantile point of view was exceedingly happy.

War depends on conditions that seem remote, and lie far below the surface. It is a question of money, food, and a thousand other things, and many a battle is won in the kitchen or in the counting-house. Everything conspired to make England strong where her enemies were weak. Her Consols were taken up with avidity by thousands of people whose stake in her security was too great to be left to fate. Rothschild, and the principal bankers, had thrown their money into the war chest. These men had to make up their minds from very self-interest—in a struggle that must be so terrible in its consequences—on which side they were prepared to throw in their lot, and the independence of England was realised to be a matter of first consequence, a primary condition to the security of investments.

But it was at this moment more clearly than ever that England realised the wisdom of her free-trade policy and reaped its benefits. Into her ports, corn, meal, farm produce, and all the necessities of life were poured. Germany and France paid heavily for their taxed goods; and, even then, being in a state of blockade, got little by them. The previous year had been a very prosperous one, and, denied her markets on the Continent, American produce fell in price and was bought at low terms by Great Britain.

Whilst England was getting her supplies with regularity and cheapness, France and Germany got theirs with difficulty and at a preposterous charge. Already those countries felt the pinch of need which the sudden stoppage of their import trade created.

They had not prepared for such an unexpected turn of events. Confident in their success they had sought no unusual loan and made no preparation to receive an unimpeded flow of food. But now, their navies beaten, their coasts blockaded, their merchantmen caught in a snare, America unable to reach them, or reaching them with scant supplies at a high rate, they reeled beneath a blow that already was telling hard upon them.

To protect her commerce the United States was determined. And if the best and safest market was England there was need of a strong fleet in the Atlantic to maintain the security of her merchantmen which plied across laden with the stores of a rich and bounteous harvest.

Admiral Mahan was selected to command the American fleet. A skilled strategian, a brave officer, a man of resource, he was an ideal choice for a mission so delicate.

There was in him also the yearning for active service which is inevitable in a true sailor, and he accepted his office with eagerness. But the President of the United States, in the course of an interview with him, damped his ardour, as the chief citizen had given some thought to the effect of his Message.

"We are strictly neutral, Admiral Mahan," he said. "Your duty is a difficult one; it is open to temptations. America has need of a man of cool judgment and strict restraint."

"It may be that there will also be need of a little gunpowder," replied the Admiral. "I shall be bound to reply to any hostile overture."

The President smiled.

"Let me clearly understand," said the Admiral; "am I right in reading your Message that I must avoid any complications with Great Britain?"

President McKinley paused for a moment before he answered: "It is your duty to protect the commerce of the United States. You must act as your judgment directs in the performance of your mission."

Admiral Mahan retired with a very clear view of the Presidential sympathies. And they in no way agreed with his own.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Les Rois D'Yvetot.

The tide of battle had hardly surged back from Havre leaving bare, in ghastly detail, the ruin and misery of the fight, ere there came to Paris realistic accounts of the bombardment of Tronning, followed by the wholly unexpected capture of Stralsund.

The representatives of France and Germany now knew that the "war of extermination" was not to be a triumphal march through the ruins of the British empire. It was rather to partake of the character ascribed to it by their determined and resolute foe—a struggle for life between England and her assailants.

So far the game lay with England.

It was clearly their policy not to play longer into her hands by allowing their troops and ships to be encountered by practically equal forces, when the admittedly superior fighting qualities of British soldiers and sailors never left the issue in doubt for a moment.

France had lost a very large number of men, and her navy had been placed hors de combat, save the proportion of French vessels among the fleet of cruisers which had escaped through the Straits of Gibraltar. True, she still had many ships scattered about the globe in various stations, but the cable-cutting tactics adopted at the outbreak of hostilities were reacting with singular effect upon the allies.

Digitized by Google

It was now their turn to be isolated so far as submarine telegraphy was concerned, whilst Great Britain was actively engaged in restoring her communications throughout the world.

Such news as reached the allies concerning the progress of external events was not reassuring.

A small expedition sent off to capture Cape Town had been annihilated en route by a rapid concentration of the British ships on the South and West African stations, whilst the arms and munitions of war on board had gone far towards equipping a strong force of colonial volunteers hastening to the assistance of the Old Country.

start of me, I hope to catch them before they have succeeded in doing much damage.

"If, on my return, I find that you have permitted the slightest wrong to the lives or property of any of Her Majesty's subjects in Japan, I will knock your newly-built kingdom into ruins about your ears."

Little as the Japanese liked this form of address they had the good sense to [illegible] nds until they saw how the cat jumped, and [illegible] Mikado made amends to England by affo[illegible]g her very material assistance in the concluding operations of the war.

Paris was still confident.

Cavalry swept to the front in superb style.

The British Admiral in the Far East, too, had encountered and beaten the French squadron in those waters.

This was known to the allies, but they did not know that Vice-Admiral Sir E. F. Fremantle had discovered, on the dead body of the French commander, letters which made clear to him the scope of the Russian enterprise resulting in the dispatch of the Japanese fleet to Australia.

This fleet was nominally a portion of the allied forces, but Sir Edward Fremantle swept aside diplomatic formalities, and roundly accused the Mikado of being a party to a base and treacherous action.

"Take notice," he wrote to him "that I am fully cognisant of your designs. Although your ships, with their German and French commanders, have got nearly a week's Orders were sent to the fleet of cruisers at Brest not to attempt an engagement with the English ships off Havre, but to steal off quietly to harass British commerce on the Atlantic, finally delivering an attack on Newfoundland and Canada.

"At sea England is supreme," said M. Hanotaux; "on land she is at our mercy."

Bolder spirits urged a series of assaults on Havre, but it was felt that France might thus meet England's wishes and spend her strength upon a single point, even then doubtful of attainment.

Rouen, therefore, was selected as the place where France would concentrate her forces. Here she would assemble an army of 600,000 men, and would make no move until she felt that the British army could be hopelessly and finally crushed.

Digitized by Google

The Fourth Army Corps, commanded by General Mercier, was posted at Yvetot as a Corps d'Observation, and behind this formidable barrier France quietly gathered her tremendous resources in men and war material.

It was no part of Lord Robert's plan to quietly allow the French to consolidate themselves under the conditions they found most advantageous.

Without delay he gave orders for 100,000 men to be ready to march on the following morning, each regiment carrying three days' field rations, and the Commissariat to keep up the supply thereafter. The remainder of his force was charged with the maintenance of the line of communication, whilst the 200,000 men then arriving in strong detachments from England, were to be forwarded to Beuzeville, Bolbec, and Lillebonne, small towns lying in the rear of Yvetot, as quickly as possible.

"Voila les rois d'Yvetot."

In every case the territorial classification of regiments was strictly followed in the distribution of troops. Consequently, brigades were not only exceptionally strong, but worked wonderfully well together, considering that experienced battalions were mixed up with raw levies.

For the purpose of illustration, it will suffice if the composition of one brigade, the 10th, be analysed.

It took its number from that of its regimental district, and the nucleus was the 2nd Battalion of the Lincolnshire Regiment, commanded by Lieut-Colonel H. C. Huntley, who now held the field rank of Brigadier-General. The other battalions in the brigade were the 3rd and 4th Militia Battalions and the 1st and 2nd Volunteer Battalions of the Lincolns. Major F. R. Lowth took local command of the line Battalion, and the C.O.'s of the other battalions were respectively Viscount Oxenbridge, Earl Brownlow, Colonel J. G. Williams, and Colonel R. G. Ellison. As additional levies began to put in an appearance from the Auxiliary Army they were added to the militia and volunteer battalions, and as soon as the strength of a battalion assumed unwieldy proportions it was split up into two and renumbered.

In some cases, such as the Royal Fusiliers or the 60th Rifles, where the recruiting ground was exceptionally populous, a single regiment grew from its army strength of 850 into a brigade of 5,000, and finally into a division of 20,000.

Yet its efficiency as a tactical unit never became seriously impaired, and it was simply astonishing to see the manner in which men hitherto unused to arms quietly took their places in the ranks.

To send forth untrained men in a mass to take part in field operations would have been to court immediate and wholesale disaster, but to fit them into the component parts of an already complete and excellent organisation was a very different matter.

In actual military experience the raw levies of England soon equalled the reserves of both France and Germany; in every other soldierly quality they were vastly superior.

* * * * *

Yvetot stands nearly midway between Havre and Rouen, being about thirty miles distant from either, though perchance the balance of a mile or so would be in favour of the former.

It is a quaint little place, and would never have been heard of if Béranger had not dealt with its magnates much as Alphonse Daudet has immortalised the leaders of society in Tarascon.

On the west of the town the road leading to Motteville runs for nearly a mile by the side of a series of limestone quarries. Many generations of lime burners have cut deeply into the face of the curious ridge which terminates the elevated plateau at this point, and the extreme boundary of the quarries is marked by a mill, the Moulin des Rochers, whose whirling arms are visible for many miles round.

Early in the week, the main body of the British army being then distant some six miles from Yvetot (it must be remembered that thus far a double line of railway, with several branch lines, was in their hands), the Commander-in-Chief ordered a strong cavalry reconnaissance, supported by two batteries of Horse Artillery, to be pushed to the farthest possible limit in order to ascertain the disposition of the enemy.

General Massy, to whom this duty was intrusted, found that the French commander was strongly posted in Yvetot itself, whilst the bulk of his command lay behind the town on the road to Rouen, and also towards the south so as to command the line of the Seine.

Lord Roberts received this intelligence with a smile.

"What the French army wants is a man able to command it," was his comment, and Harington, who had accompanied General Massy during the reconnaissance, thought that he understood the Chief's remark.

A general advance was at once ordered, with the result that by midday the skirmishers thrown out by the French were being steadily driven back to the support of their guns.

Although sixty batteries of horse and field artillery accompanied the attacking force, only six of them came into action at first. For some unaccountable reason the rest had vanished.

Thirty-six guns against two hundred are but poor odds, and General Mercier, who early became aware of his vast predominance in artillery, resolved to turn the circumstance to account, and forthwith brought his entire force into action.

His orders from Paris were to remain strictly upon the defensive, but here was a chance of sweeping the English straight into the sea. It was too good to be refused.

This time there was none of the overcrowding and impetuous haste of the French advance at Blèville.

Cavalry swept to the front in superb style, and by half-past twelve the British forces were more hotly engaged than they had been at any time during the battle in the environs of Havre.

Curiously enough Lord Roberts paid little heed to the details of the French advance.

"They are doing exactly what I want them to do," he exclaimed rather sharply to a member of his staff who earnestly called his attention to the dense columns of troops which made up the enemy's centre and right.

Ever and anon did his glasses sweep the ridge culminating at the Moulin des Rochers at the head of the quarries, a line of country which completely flanked the French position and dominated it in a remarkable manner. The quarries themselves were fifty feet in height, and the land sloped away gently towards the Seine from the road along their base.

Matters momentarily became more serious, and the Duke of York had it in his mind to tell the Commander-in-Chief that his staff were of opinion that something should be done, and done quickly, if a disaster were to be averted, when Lord Roberts cried, with a keen note of relief in his voice:

"At last!" Then turning to his aides he said: "Lose no time in telling divisional commanders to press the attack home on Yvetot. The right of the line is to extend slightly and endeavour to force the enemy into the main road to Rouen."

The troops had complete confidence in their general, and were delighted when the order came to continue the advance, which had now been delayed some time.

Digitized by Google

Almost at the same moment the French became aware that they were subjected to the most murderous artillery fire that an army of any considerable size had ever been called upon to encounter.

Over 300 British guns were in position on the ridge behind the quarries, whence, perfectly secure themselves from attack, or even effective reply from the French artillery, they poured a tornado of shrapnel upon the dense masses of the enemy.

A large number of Maxim guns which were strapped to the limbers were also brought into action, and played a deluge of bullets, like spray from some gigantic garden hose, upon the French line, sweeping pitilessly over an area of a mile and a half in length by a mile in depth.

The French loss was heavy enough in all conscience, but even worse than this was the knowledge that their commander had been completely hoodwinked into bringing about an engagement under conditions thoroughly suited to the convenience of the enemy.

"Voilà les rois d'Yvetot," said a lieutenant of chasseurs, pointing to the British gunners after he had picked up his heavy brass helmet, which a spent Maxim bullet had knocked off his head.

"The situation is quite ludicrous," replied the sous-officier to whom the remark was addressed. "These English evidently regard our generals as half their army. Ah! I expected as much," he continued, as orders came along the line for a rapid retreat on the Rouen Road.

Meanwhile General Mercier, after taking the best possible arrangements for quitting an untenable position, called for Commandant Bertholde, the head of the Intelligence Department of his staff, and said, with the quiet anger of despair in his voice: "I thought you told me that a flank approach by the Moulin des Rochers was impossible for either cavalry or artillery."

The officer he addressed flushed deeply as he replied: "I stake my life that no French guns could have got there under similar conditions. What has happened is simply miraculous."

"Next time, Commandant Bertholde," said the general, "I pray you remember that where a man can lodge his foot the English can lodge a cannon. You had better save yourself and use the knowledge," and he pointed contemptuously towards Rouen.

The officer addressed was too regretful to resent his superior's insulting tone.

"And you, mon général?" he inquired.

"My place is with the rear guard," replied General Mercier. In other words, he was resolved to sacrifice his life.

But circumstances were too much for him. During a charge by the 17th Lancers his sword arm was rendered useless. A trooper of the 6th Dragoons seized his horse's bridle, and, notwithstanding the general's protestations, galloped his charger off the field.

A trooper of the 6th Dragoons seized his horse's bridle.

The "miracle" which the French staff officer had announced, was the crossing by the English artillery division of a deep and rocky ravine which ran across the plateau behind the ridge, carrying a small stream from the heights some miles away right into the town of Yvetot.

Fortunately, Lord Roberts had allowed Major-General Nairne an extra hour to execute the movement with the guns, and when the leading batteries were brought to a halt by this formidable obstacle, the resourceful soldier in charge of the division did for a moment experience a very unpleasant tingle of cold perspiration.

He knew that the entire army would be in very serious straits if he were materially delayed in getting into action, and for a few seconds he thought to retrieve the disaster by hurrying back to the left wing, and doing the best he could in that direction.

Crossing difficult nullahs was no new thing for him, but with 300 guns it was a very different matter to manipulating a single battery.

Whilst he was thus tortured with doubt, his eye lighted upon a large hay-mew, with strong uprights and corrugated iron roof, standing on the opposite hill, and he at once resolved upon a desperate expedient.

"That is the high road to Paris."

In two places the ravine was practicable up to the verge of the rocky stream itself, and he forthwith gave orders that the hay-mew was to be demolished and two bridges constructed with its material, some gun carriages being also utilised if necessary.

Hundreds of gunners were set to this work, whilst an equally large number of men laboured with pick and shovel to secure reasonably safe tracks for the guns up and down the rugged sides of the ravine. In three-quarters of an hour the bridges were pronounced effective, and in the same space of time the whole of the guns were ranged up on the further side.

By galloping furiously the remaining half-mile they were able to unlimber just fifteen minutes after their appointed time, but Lord Roberts afterwards confessed that those fifteen minutes took more out of him than the whole march from Kabul to Kandahar.

"Quo Fas et Gloria ducunt," is the second motto of the Royal Regiment of Artillery, and surely duty and glory never led them through a more difficult place than they encountered during the battle of Yvetot.

"A' thocht tae see a fecht the day," observed the sergeant in the 42nd, whom we met at Blèville, mopping his head as the Black Watch halted on the western outskirts of Yvetot, and a third cavalry brigade swept past in hot pursuit of the enemy.

"D'ye no ca' this a fecht?" said a stalwart youngster, who was carefully wiping his bayonet with a handful of grass.

"Fecht!" was the scornful reply. "A've seen warse todo in the Trongate mony a Saturday nicht. They're puir bodies the French."

Calming down to a more reasonable state of mind, the sergeant subsequently admitted that few troops outside the Black Watch could have withstood the fire of the guns under similar circumstances.

"The Seaforths," he added, "wad hae tried, but A've aye had me doots o' the McKenzies."

It was well for him that the Seaforth Highlanders were not within earshot, or he would have had a first-rate Trongate row on hand at the earliest opportunity, and the invincible 42nd might have met its match.

After the terrible rout that followed, the 4th Army Corps was of no further value. It was cut into shreds. The

Digitized by Google

British cavalry and artillery did not cease the pursuit for many miles, driving the disorderly rabble of men before them along the roads and bye-ways towards Motteville and Pavilly.

Just beyond Yvetot the main road to Rouen turns sharply to the right and then continues in undeviating line until it is lost amidst the distant foliage of the fertile table-land of the Pays de Caux.

Two minor thoroughfares spring from the same point, where Harington stood awhile to watch the pursuit about a quarter to two o'clock.

"I never thought I should be here again under such conditions," he said to a brother-officer who, like himself was engaged on staff duty.

"So I should suppose," said the other. "But why do you say it?"

"Do you know what you are looking at?"

"No. Not particularly."

"That is the high road to Paris."

CHAPTER XIX.

Russia to the Rescue.

On the day following the battle of Yvetot volatile Paris strove hard to maintain her new reputation for steadfast purpose, and made pretence to smile at this fresh misfortune.

But in the theatres the comedy seemed to have lost its abandonment and the tragic stage was neglected. There was a tremor in the mirth of this gay people. Already the dread thought—as yet unspoken—came to their minds and leaped frantically in their hearts that the sound of cannon was once more almost at their gates, and that the City of Pleasure—that gay and lovely haunt of all the nations—was threatened.

There had been hurried meetings at the Elysée, and pale crowds of stricken citizens waited from hour to hour at its doors to glean intelligence of what new and final effort the Government would make to rid French soil of the invaders.

Now the menace sounded loudly in their ears, there was no longer idle exultation or the wild caprice of sterile enthusiasm. The heart of the brave nation was stirred and there burned the fire of martial ardour, the patriot eagerness for action. This all-pervading flame consumed in a moment the frail superficial egotism that disguised the real courage of the French people.

And what were those wild rumours that flew through the city and brought crowds to the Champs Elysées—crowds at once indignant and desperate? What means those frequent hurryings of messengers between the President's house and the German Embassy? Was it true, this strange story, that there had flashed along the railway wires the imperative order that traffic should stand aside and the lines be cleared for an express train that was to hurry over Europe, bound—who knew where?

Loud clamouring thundered the impatience of the people. News—news—any news was better than none at all.

"Are we to do nothing?" shouted one. "Are we to sit here and welcome the English pig to our city?"

"An ill thing it will be," muttered another, "if we are kept in the dark."

"Cheer up, neighbours," exclaimed a horsedealer who stood by. "Our generals have genius and——"

"A genius for getting shot, that's about all," was the retort. "I hope you have a good stock in your stables, Mercier. We shall need horse ragout before long, I'm thinking, if there are many more delays."

And thus the crowd continued, in muffled remonstrance or more strident anger, to call upon their Ministers of State to be up and doing.

It was imperative that the restlessness of the city should be alleviated, and by nightfall an official notice in Le Journal gave the welcome intelligence that a decisive step had been taken by the governments of France and Germany.

"It has been arranged," ran this announcement, "that the old and tried ally of France, the great nation of Russia, shall be asked to take her proper part in the humiliation of the insolent foe. The three great empires of Europe are together in this supreme struggle, and before the armies of Russia, Germany, and France the haughty domain of England will fall shattered at the first blow."

There was much rejoicing in Paris.

What could be more magnificent than this, which would practically unite all Europe against Great Britain? And Russia. The friend and ally of France, the nation which had done her the honour to borrow her money and accept her hospitality; was not Russia, with her foot upon India, with her armies uncountable, and her fleets, which might sweep unquestioned through the Baltic and break into the charmed waters of the North Sea, a power irresistible and invincible?

As the train steamed out of the railway station, bearing the emissaries of France and Germany, the popular excitement and enthusiasm were extraordinary. M. Hanotaux was bodily lifted from his carriage and carried into the saloon that lay waiting for him and his brother diplomats. The air rang with the shouts and plaudits of an intoxicated people.

But the journey to Russia was not one of unmixed pleasure. M. Hanotaux and M. de Visne, who represented the Republic, and Count Caprivi and General Dumpf, who acted on behalf of Germany, were ill at ease.

Their first bold strokes at England had failed disastrously. Two armies and two fleets had been destroyed. But, worse than this in the eye of honour, the English soldier had set his foot upon both dominions. Paris itself was threatened, Stralsund had been seized. Nearly half a million men—bold, confident, desperate—with no one knew how many more preparing to follow them, menaced the existence of the two empires.

"I am not sure that we are right," said Caprivi gloomily, "in calling in Russia. She is acting now as ever the part of the fox. We do the fighting, but it is she who will carry off the booty."

"Nothing easier than to retract," replied Hanotaux with a sneer. "You have an army of four millions, I believe. It is twenty to one."

Caprivi ground his teeth.

"There's no need of cheap satire," he declared. "You know as well as I do that the German reserves are strong enough to conquer the world France and Germany together have an army of over seven millions of men. What foe can possibly be an object of dread?"

"Well?"

"You know perfectly well the danger. Germany is united, of course, but——"

"But," Hanotaux took up the sentence, "you are not a free people. There is no need for concealment," he continued, seeing Caprivi eager to retort. "Let us face the facts steadily. Your Emperor has been engaged in killing individual freedom. He has established a tyranny worse than that of the Tsar of Russia. If you had to call upon your shopkeepers and citizens you would stand in hourly danger of a social rising that would depose your Emperor and destroy your capital. You dare not, in a war unprovoked as this, call on your reserves."

"And you?" hotly interposed General Dumpf.

"We are, I admit, in much the same predicament. We have, gentlemen, been labouring under a terrible mistake. Let us admit it frankly. Our huge armies and magnificent reserves, forced into service, are not available, as the mere statist would tell us, for purposes of war. Let the French Government call upon the French people—after a blunder so ghastly as to make the step necessary—and there will be a third revolution. No Cabinet could stand the shock. As for Germany, a collection of states with their jealousies and vanities and selfish interests, you cannot expect that your conscripts will rush to arms when you have trodden upon them, denied them free speech and free religion and public rights. It is in a moment of national agony like this that national defects are most apparent."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,
62, Theobald's Road, London.
Opposite Bedford Row. (Est. 1850.)
Parcel free from observation

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

£60

TO BE GIVEN AWAY,

Among those taking part in the following

Free Cash Prize Competition

NO ENTRANCE FEE WHATEVER.

1st Prize £25. 2nd Prize £20.
3rd Prize £10. 4th Prize £5.

The above money prizes will be given away as an advertisement amongst the competitors who can rearrange the following twenty-four letters to represent the names of four well-known trades, selected by us.

TUBREHCKAREBROCEGRPARDER.

Send in your solution at once, and we will inform you if correct, and give you full details of the Competition with conditions and date of closing. If you cannot solve all four do as many as you can, as there are four prizes to compete for. No Solution can be received after October 17th, 1898.—Address: "COMPETITION" MANAGER, 117A SEVEN SISTERS ROAD, LONDON, N.

THE BEST HAIR DYE

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vesicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

YOU AND I.

L. T.—Taking a holiday does not necessarily mean lazying about. It depends upon what you have been doing, and your temperament. Some persons are as incapable of remaining idle as others are of prolonged work. Lord Macaulay once took a six weeks' holiday, during which time he learnt the Dutch language. You must not regard your friend as a duffer because he went botanising nearly all day while you lay on your back in a field.

M.—Although the mushroom's life is measured by hours, it flourishes long enough for an insect to hang its egg on the edge of the "umbrella," and for that egg to become an insect ready to colonise another mushroom.

F. W.—So far as I know, Russia is the only country in which applause in theatres is strictly forbidden.

Scorcher anxiously inquires whether fast or slow riding is most injurious to pneumatic tyres.——Undoubtedly fast riding will wear out your bicycle tyres more quickly than slow riding; the reason being that the impact with which it comes into contact with small, sharp obstacles on the road will be much greater. These small obstacles — chips of stones, thorns, etc.—are to be found scattered over every road, and, when travelling fast, the cover of a tyre, and often the inner tube, will be pierced by a number of them, which, were it travelling slowly, it would pass over, the force with which it strikes them not being sufficient to make them perforate the tyres.

Scotty.—No part of a tree can be removed from the grounds of Holyrood Palace without the permission of the Queen. One, dating from the reign of Queen Mary, was recently blown down, and before the gardeners could touch it, a photograph had to be forwarded to the Queen, who formally ordered its removal.

Amicus Veritatas has failed to convince a sceptical friend of his that there are fishes of the perch species that climb trees. He appeals to us to bear him out in this statement, feeling sure that what we have to say will bear weight with his friend.——We are indeed flattered by the confidence you put in our opinion. On consulting our books of reference, we find that there are indeed a species of the perch called the "climbing perch," which voluntarily leaves the failing streams, ascends the banks, and proceeds over dry land towards some spot where its unerring instinct warns it that water is yet to be found. No record is made, however, of these tree-climbing fish. Probably, hearing of the climbing perch, you took it for granted that trees were meant.

Q. D. asks: "What sort of a knot is the 'Staffordshire knot?'"——Queen Elizabeth is said to have promised his life to a prisoner lying under sentence of death in the old Castle of Stafford if he could devise a knot that would hang three men at once. The reward sharpened his wits, and he accomplished the invention of a triple knot, simple enough, yet into which three men's necks could be inserted separately.

T. N. D. wants to know why both heat and cold make one sleepy.——If the temperature be lowered beyond a certain point, the small vessels underlying the skin contract, and the general circulation of the body is impeded. The respiratory organs are especially affected, and move so slowly that the blood is not properly aërated, and the circulation of blood to the brain becomes slow and meagre. This necessarily produces sleep. Heat tends to cause sleep by inducing a feeling of comfort, which is a condition favourable to somnolence. If the heat is excessive, the system becomes languid; slight exertion wearies the body, and sleep naturally follows.

Salamander asks: "Which two nations of importance have been friendly for the greatest length of time?"——England and Germany. There may have been differences of opinion and sometimes strained relationships, which, however, have been smoothed over by diplomatic intercourse, but throughout the long and warlike history of these two great nations, there has never yet been any open warfare.

W. H.—The main, or high sea, begins at low water mark, and our Courts of Admiralty have jurisdiction there. Between the high and the low water marks those Courts divide jurisdiction with the common law courts; that is, when the sea is out the exposed ground is under common law, but the other Courts have power when the tide is in. The limit of territorial waters has been fixed at three miles, which was the utmost distance to which a cannon-ball could reach when the law was made. Within that limit international law recognises national or local law.

Artist.—Prussian blue paint is made from the ashes of the burnt hoofs of horses.

P. N.—About five years ago an engineer of Hamburg proposed to convey passengers by pneumatic tube, in the same way as letters are sent. I haven't heard anything of the scheme since. Only three persons were to be conveyed at one time. The "carriage" was a tube 42in. in diameter and 6ft. long, lighted by electricity and supplied with air in a patent reservoir. The speed was to be ninety miles an hour.

Portrait.—The representations of our monarchs on the coins of their time cannot be relied upon as likenesses. We read that the portrait of George III. on the first half-crown of his reign represented him with a neck like that of a gladiator; that did not please the King, so an alteration was made, but "still there was no likeness." Yet it was adopted.

M. C., like the majority of us, has some superstition remaining in his composition. His weakness in that direction is that Friday is a bad day in his family; but the recent battle in the Soudan has upset his pet idea. "I have a brother in the Sirdar's army," he writes, "and I have been dreading that the battle might take place on Friday, for I felt sure that he would be killed if engaged on that day. But he wasn't. I shall begin to think that there is something wrong in my idea."——I should think so. Sir Herbert Kitchener is evidently not affected in that way; he has twice met and defeated the Dervishes during the past few months, and each time on Friday. The battle at Atbara was won in the early hours of Good Friday. The head of a City firm once told me that the best appointment he ever held was obtained on Friday.

Sleep.—Yes, there are animals which sleep through the summer, for the same reason as others sleep all through the winter. Æstivation, as it is called, is not so well-known to us as its opposite. In the tropical regions, when the sun dries up the pools and makes it difficult for slow-moving animals to find sustenance, they compromise with Nature and go to sleep till the troublous time is over.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Back blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 4th, if intended for the Issue on sale Oct. 18th, and dated Oct. 22nd. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

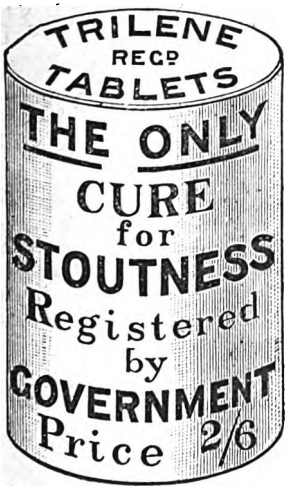
Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

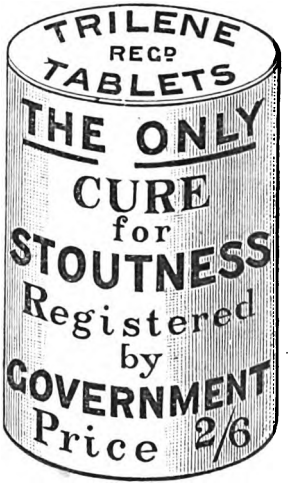
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

Miss S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

Mrs. F. HARPER, 61 Portland Crescent, Leeds, writes: "My doctor persuaded me to try a box, and I find they have done my breathing a lot of good and I can get about much better. My doctor did not wish his name mentioned, but they have done him good personally."

A. BROWN, of 25 Edwin Street, High Pallion, Sunderland, says: "You have no idea what a most wonderful effect the Tablets had. I am a great deal thinner, and better in health."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Rischolme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity.

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

L. LUDDRINGTON, "Sunnyside," Station Road, Sidcup, says: "I have benefited greatly, and have lost a stone."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Miss A. ATKINS, 329 Southdown Road, Liverpool, writes: "I lost nearly a stone from taking one box."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

Mrs. JAMES SMITH, of Cowell Terrace, Soham, says: "Your 2s. 6d. box of Tablets reduced my weight 12lb."

Mrs. WOODS, 447 Cowbridge Road, Canton, Cardiff, says: "Tablets have a most marked effect, and I shall take every opportunity to make known the wonders of your remedy."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

"Miss HUMPHREYS, of Claremont Buildings, Shrewsbury, has lost 1st. in weight already, and thinks the Tablets deserve every success."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess G. FURSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Miss J. GUISE, 3 North End, Croydon, says: "I cannot speak too highly of the Tablets; I was stout all my life until a few weeks ago, when I first began your treatment. I was surprised to find they acted so admirably. I am now getting quite a slender figure, besides being better in health."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

ALL PRIZES IN FORMER COMPETITIONS HAVE BEEN TAKEN UP; EIGHT MACHINES NOT BEING CLAIMED IN TIME WERE PASSED ON.

"We have examined the A.B. Cycles, and find them well-made, high-class machines. The firm are thoroughly straightforward."—Cycling, August 6th, 1893.

"Knowing the method on which the A.B. Cycle Company's business is done, we can honestly recommend the firm."—Athletic Record, September 3rd, 1898.

100 BICYCLE PRIZES.

SEND ANSWERS EARLY.

Make up the best sentence you can out of twelve words, the first letter of each word commencing with a letter of "LAST TEN YEARS" in proper order. Thus: "*L*ike *A*ll *S*ubstantial *T*hings *T*hey *E*ndure *N*umberless *Y*ears, *E*arning A *R*oyal *S*tatus." If you like you can make two or more sentences, provided you comply with the above conditions, so that no more than twelve words are used in all.

AN ABSOLUTELY FREE COMPETITION.

We ask you to buy nothing before allowing you to participate in the Prizes. Neither after you have won a prize (if you are fortunate enough to do so) do we compel you to purchase any accessories. You pay nothing to enter, and even if you receive one of our regret notices—and we make no secret of the fact that hundreds are unsuccessful—you are only out of pocket for the cost of two penny stamps, which the Post Office gets the benefit of. Thus we can truthfully assert of this thoroughly genuine Competition that it is ABSOLUTELY FREE TO ALL.

ALL MACHINES GUARANTEED FOR TWELVE MONTHS.

REMEMBER, IT ONLY COSTS A POSTAGE STAMP TO TRY.

First Prize, £23 A.B. Safety, fitted with A.B. tyres.

The following ladies and gentlemen are amongst the number of persons who have recently received free bicycles, each of whom have signed a Solemn Declaration that he or she is in no way connected either directly or indirectly with this firm. We will forfeit £1,000 if this statement is incorrect. A few Free Cycle Winners: Mr. Geo. A. Haynes, 9 Windsor Street, Barrow-in-Furness; Miss Mary Page-Henderson, 8 Lexham Gardens, Kensington, W.; Mr. A. Merrilees, Harvay, Orkney; Mr. Arthur J. Woolnough, 29 Thomson Street, Govan, Glasgow; Mrs. Maria Fraser, Haglefort, Shinrone, Ireland; Mr. Robert Hughes, Llanidan, Anglesey, North Wales; Mr. L. Horne, 101 London Road, Oldham; etc.

Second Class (9 prizes) £23 Cycle for £9
Third Class (12 prizes) £23 Cycle for £10
Fourth Class (15 prizes) £23 Cycle for £11
Fifth Class (18 prizes) £23 Cycle for £12
Sixth Class (20 prizes) £23 Cycle for £13
Consolation (25 prizes) £23 Cycle for £14

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE.—COMPETITION IS NOW OPEN and closes Monday, October 17th, 1898. Results will be declared as soon as possible, although it may be a fortnight afterwards before all replies are posted.

Winners of prizes must clear them within a week or ten days, otherwise machines unclaimed will be passed on to the next in rotation. Prizes may be considerably increased in all or any one class. Unless stamp (not a stamped envelope, as our catalogue is a large [outward] size) is enclosed for postage of Catalogue and Result of Competition, the Company will not guarantee to inform competitors of their success. Prize-winners need not purchase any accessories with their machines, unless they so desire. As the majority of the competitors may not be able to call and inspect the machines, we guarantee to refund the full amount paid for a Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, or for one of our Consolation Prizes if the owner is not perfectly satisfied with it on arrival. We cannot give any money or other prizes in lieu of cycles, and consequently cannot enter into any discussion relating thereto. One solution only allowed to each competitor. Disregard of this regulation renders any prize liable to forfeiture.

£100

We offer this Reward to any lady or gentleman able to prove that we have ever in the whole course of our existence sold our cheapest machines under £15 cash either to any ordinary customer, agent, dealer or shipper. We do not allow a shilling extra discount beyond the 34 per cent. off the catalogue price to anyone, and even if we had an order for one hundred of our lowest priced machines we should refuse to supply them unless we were paid £1,500.

Mark letters "SHORT STORIES" on top corner of envelope, and address to the Managing Director,

A.B. CYCLE CO. LTD., 59 & 60 CHANCERY LANE, HOLBORN, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 510. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 8TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

DR. TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

CAN BE TESTED FREE.

All Men and Women who have to be exposed to the bleak uncertainty of our trying climate should fortify themselves before they face their daily toil with Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and they can then brave cold in winter and heat in summer with equanimity. The writer speaks from personal experience and from observation of beneficial effects on others. Tea opens the pores and temporarily excites, coffee stimulates the action of the heart, while Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa gives strength, stamina, and builds up and strengthens the lung tissues. It is indeed a wonderful food beverage. Nothing has ever been discovered that can approach it in giving lightness of heart, joy of life, fleetness of foot, and that general feeling of comfort which only comes from a full capacity to enjoy every pleasure — moral, intellectual and physical.

Address (a postcard will do), but mention this paper,
60, 61 & 62, Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THEY CANNOT BE BOUGHT IN A SHOP!

THE John Noble HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Promptly SENT BY PARCELS POST, carefully packed direct from the LARGEST FIRM of COSTUMIERS in the WORLD, and Originators of HALF-GUINEA COSTUME.

THREE GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes are supplied in the following two good durable Cloths: I. JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, wealthy and weather-resisting; II. JOHN NOBLE COSTUME COATING, smooth surfaced, and of lighter weight.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE, together with the new 84-pp. Illustrated Dress and Drapery Catalogue. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloths (6yd. 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage, 8d. 7/6

Colours of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

The Three Sizes in Stock are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arm-). Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other size can be specially made to measure 1/6 extra.

MODEL 904.

An excellent new design, consisting of well-made and carefully finished Chesterfield full-width 10/6 Coat and Tailor Skirt, in the latest style. Price complete Costume, 10/6; carriage, 6d. Or Skirt alone for 5/6; carriage, 6d. Supplied also in Covert Coating for 13/6, or in New Mixture Suiting for 18/-.

THE NEW SACQUE COSTUME.

MODEL 976. ☛

A very smart Tailor-made and carefully finished Sacque Coat and full wide Tailor Skirt in the latest mode. 15/- Price complete, 15/-. Safely packed in box, and sent carriage paid for 1/- extra.

IT SPEAKS VOLUMES

for the excellence of the Brook Street Mills' productions that although during the past quarter-century many firms have tried to imitate them, none have succeeded in producing a garment at anything near the same price in any way worthy to rank in the same class as THE FAMOUS JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUME.

THE FAMOUS JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS.

Made in strong Serge with saddle top, full sleeves, and pocket.

21	24	27	30 in.
1/6	2/-	2/6	3/- ea.
33	36	39	42 in.
3/6	4/-	4/6	5/- ea.

Lengths are from top of Neckband to edge of Skirt in front. Carriage, 4d. extra.

WOOLLEN KNITTED CAPS.

(as sketch), 1s. All shades.

MODEL 978.

Well-made and prettily trimmed bodice and Full Wide Tailor Skirt. 10/6 Price Complete, 10/6; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d. Supplied also in Covert Coating for 13/6, and in New Mixture Suiting for 18/-.

Mourning Orders sent off in 12 hours.

NEW AUTUMN & WINTER DRESS FABRICS.

A BOX OF 1,000 PATTERNS in the New Colourings and Weaves (prices from 4½d. to 5/6 per yard) lent to select from, and sent carriage paid.

Bankers:

"London and Midland" Bank, Limited.

Kindly name SHORT STORIES when ordering from JOHN NOBLE Ltd., Brook Street Mills, MANCHESTER.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 25 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 stops, 3 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,

Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

THOSE WHO FOUGHT AT OMDURMAN.

No. 2.—The Seaforth Highlanders.

No. 510.

ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending October 8th, 1898.

How He Missed His Chance.

"You are working too hard, old man," said Jack Bingham's friends, one after another, as they saw his ruddy cheeks turn pale, his springy, elastic tread become dull and dragging, and heard less and less often his cheery if not exactly tuneful whistle.

But to all their good advice and earnest protests Jack turned a deaf ear, and kept steadily at work.

None of his friends properly appreciated Jack's unusual devotion to work, for none of them knew its incentive—that he was in love.

She was a dainty little thing, always admired by men, and rather looked down upon and at the same time envied by her own sex, at home the pet of her parents, and in society an imperious and exacting young belle.

Jack worked early and late, steadily and hopefully, to secure that competence which he knew would be necessary to support her in the comfort to which she was accustomed. The copy he turned out was good in spite of its volume; his regular salary from his paper was increased, together with his duties; and his income from outside work reached a respectable figure.

Still, the money did not come fast enough to suit the impatient lover, who thereupon began to worry and fret. Now the man who works with his brain sixteen hours a day, and worries and frets in addition, has not a long career of usefulness before him, be his motives what they may.

Jack's eyes gave way first. Specks and blurs floated in them, and through them jumped pains that drew his head down on his folded arms in spite of himself. His feet and hands grew heavy, as if his blood had turned to lead. Presently the pain that gnawed at the back of his eyeballs refused to yield even to sleep. Then Jack grew afraid, but did not let his fear keep him from his work.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

He was not sure of himself in those days, and adopted the precaution of reading over aloud whatever of importance he had written. One day it came about that as he read his tongue seemed suddenly swollen and useless, and he could not utter the words his mind framed. He turned to his typewriter and placed, as he thought, the heading he desired on the article he had written but could not read.

When the foreman in the composing room saw "The Love of Ethel" introducing a column on the Far East, he laughed at first, and then, remembering Jack's looks of late, grew grave.

Soon the managing editor came, and Jack was led away to a cab, babbling thickly about Ethel, his work and the money he had saved—money that proved of great value in the long months that followed. For Jack was an orphan, his friends were careless, happy-go-lucky Bohemians, and brain fever is an illness that demands the most skilful of physicians and the most careful of nurses.

So when Jack came to himself again, very pale and thin and quiet, he knew that his precious store must be drained low.

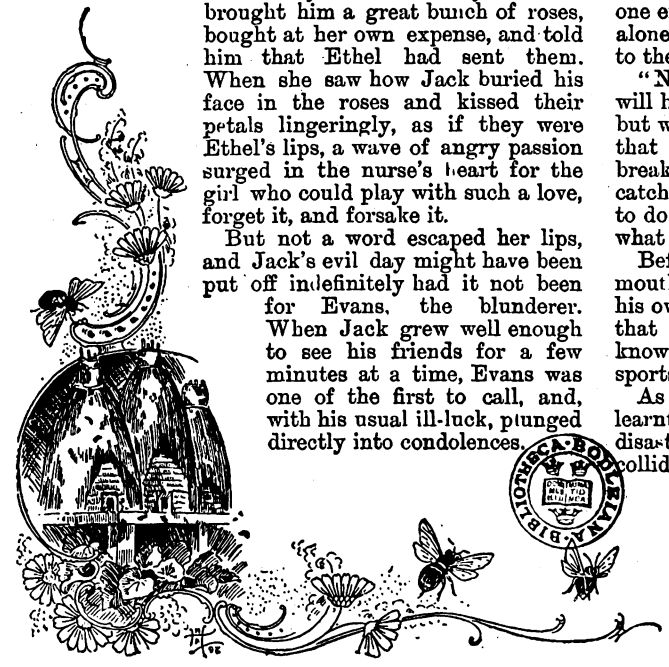
That troubled him little, however, compared with his torturing doubt of Ethel. Why did he not hear from her? Why did not she come to him now that he was so much better? The kindly doctor had noticed Jack's trouble; by a quiet inquiry had discovered what probably lay at the bottom of it, and so had an answer ready for Jack when the latter screwed up his courage to ask for Ethel.

She had been as ill as he, they told him, and like him was now slowly but surely recovering. And Jack must not worry about her in the least, for the doctor would bring him news from her every day.

So Jack kept obediently quiet among his pillows, listening intently for the doctor's footsteps, and flushing like a girl when the news was good, as, somehow, it always was.

One day the brown-eyed nurse brought him a great bunch of roses, bought at her own expense, and told him that Ethel had sent them. When she saw how Jack buried his face in the roses and kissed their petals lingeringly, as if they were Ethel's lips, a wave of angry passion surged in the nurse's heart for the girl who could play with such a love, forget it, and forsake it.

But not a word escaped her lips, and Jack's evil day might have been put off indefinitely had it not been for Evans, the blunderer. When Jack grew well enough to see his friends for a few minutes at a time, Evans was one of the first to call, and, with his usual ill-luck, plunged directly into condolences.



Jack did not quite understand at first, but Evans, floundering ahead, soon made it clear to the invalid that Ethel had not been ill; but that, on the contrary, while the issue of his illness had been still doubtful, she had thrown him over and had announced her engagement to another.

After that Jack went back into the valley of the shadow and knocked at the very gates of death. But the doctor and the nurse, working desperately together, pulled him away and led him back to life. Whereat he was not so grateful as he ought to have been.

And when he found he must get well, whether he would or no, he announced that he was going back to work at once. The doctor remonstrated, commanded, begged, in vain, and the pleadings of the nurse had no effect.

Back he crept to his old haunts, a thin, pale ghost of his former self. The young fellows who were doing his work looked at him with pity.

His old desk had long since been in the possession of another, but the proprietor, when Jack asked for a place, gave orders at once that he should be employed at whatever he was able to do.

But banquets and balls, receptions and races, lectures, sermons and interviews, quickly cloyed the appetite of the newspaper man who had been used to the strong meat of journalism for his daily diet.

"Give me something with blood in it," Jack said to the chief one day. "I'm tired of this woman's work. When I was on earth before they were not afraid to send me out after big stories once in a while."

"It's for you we're afraid and not for the story, Jack, and you know it," expostulated the chief. "Everyone believes that no man on the paper can work up a sensation with you. But you are not strong yet for a rough job, Jack. Look in the glass and see for yourself. Just take it easy for a while longer, old man, and trust us to work you hard enough by-and-by to make up."

The "story with blood in it" came sooner than anyone expected. The very next day Jack chanced to be alone in the reporters' room when the sub-editor came to the door and cast a worried glance round.

"No one else here, Jack?" he asked. "Then you will have to go. I hate to send you, for it's a hard trip, but we'll help you all we can. They have just wired that there's a big smash at Ketterton Junction. A breakdown train will go out in ten minutes. You must catch it, wire in a first story for an extra, and then plan to do the introduction for the later editions. You know what to do better than I can tell you."

Before the last words were out of the sub-editor's mouth Jack was half way down the stairs, pulling on his overcoat as he went. His nerves were tingling with that subtle elation of conflict which newspaper men know as well as do soldiers on the verge of battle and sportsmen in sight of big game.

As the train rushed along through the night Jack learnt all that the railway men could tell him of the disaster. An extra goods and a through express had collided on a curved embankment which skirted the banks of a river.

The scene Jack looked upon that winter's night was as fascinating in its weird horror as was that of summer in its vivid colouring. Out of a clouded sky the moon struggled in vain to pierce the heavy, snow-laden darkness.

Upon the line, and tumbled on either side, engines and cars were piled in huge, formless

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

Digitized by Google

heaps. Stifled shrieks and screams sounded from the depths of the black masses. Here and there the gleaming lanterns darted like will-o'-the-wisps, frequently converging upon one point, where lay a torch-guarded row of the dead.

Suddenly, while Jack strained his eyes to pierce the gloom, a little tongue of flame leapt into the darkness.

"The wreckage is on fire!" cried the railway man at his side, and there came as if in answer from the chaos a shrill cry of torture.

The fire, leaping from point to point, licked greedily at the dry wood of the splintered coaches, and again the piercing shriek made Jack shiver in spite of himself.

Clambering over the débris in the direction from which the screams seemed to come, he found, almost at the bottom of the great pile, a woman, saved from instant death by a freak of fate, but pinned down and cramped until movement was impossible. She had swooned at the crash of the collision, apparently, and had been brought back to consciousness by the heat of the advancing flames.

One glance and Jack knew the face.

"Ethel!"

He started as he uttered the name, and the woman shrank back even towards death at the sound of his voice. In a moment the weakness passed, and he attacked the imprisoning pile. Help came from all directions, and slowly a way of escape was opened.

But the flames swept swiftly on, scorching the girl's delicate flesh, charring her golden hair, and dragging from her shrieks of pain that tore the hearts of those who heard them. Jack's feverish strength increased with each recurring cry, and he pulled and lifted with a power that amazed his helpers and himself.

At last he reached her, held her in his arms for a single moment, then passed her back to willing hands. On the instant a piece of iron, its supports burnt away, dropped from the over-hanging pile and struck him on the shoulder.

They thought he was dead when, senseless, he was rescued. But presently, in an improvised farmhouse hospital, he came back to consciousness to find a flood of pale gold hair covering his face, to feel the warm kisses of full lips on his bloodless ones, and to hear a sweet voice says:

"Jack! My Jack! It is Ethel. Don't you know me?"

If Jack had been physically stronger, perhaps, the barriers, which long months of bitter contempt had raised, would not have been so easily swept away. But as it was he whispered: "My darling," and raised one arm weakly to fold about her neck.

Afterwards he was very glad that he did, for the truth came out little by little; he learnt that the fault was not Ethel's but her matchmaking mamma's, and that in the girl's own heart he had never been supplanted.

It was some months later when Jack returned, hale and hearty, with new hope in his soul, to his work, that the sub-editor said:

"Too bad you had to miss your chance at the Ketterton accident, old man."

"Chance? What chance?" asked Jack, bewildered.

"Why, don't you remember that you were the only newspaper man on the spot? If you hadn't got knocked out we should have had the scoop of the year."

"By Jove! That's so," said Jack regretfully. "And I had quite forgotten it."

H. T. P.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

THERE MAY BE ONE FOR YOU!

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☛ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

In many cases sovereigns must have been awarded to people who are not readers of our paper.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 1 distribution must reach us by October 10th, addressed to

The Sovereign Editor,
"Short Stories" Office,
Henrietta Street,
London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately. You may not apply in more than one competition on the same post-card.

NOTE.—A similar competition in which 50 sovereigns are given away is appearing weekly in HOME NOTES.

Digitized by Google

A Perfect Revelation.

Out of Pessimism, by Rejection; that was the moral pedigree of Mr. Magdalen, cynic.

The pessimism began in his stomach, and ended by settling in his mind; a one-time badly digested dinner eventually turned the channel of his thoughts into a misanthropic course.

As for the rejection, that was of the kind that consists of a pretty girl carefully leading a man into a trap, and then just as carefully turning her back upon him.

It is only fair, in the case of Mr. Magdalen, to mention that the number of his rejections had been quite formidable—due, most probably, to the film that his vanity was for ever drawing over his clearer judgment. A wounded vanity is not infrequently the beginning of cynicism.

But however all that may be, the fact remained that Mr. Magdalen, at the time that concerns this narrative, was very much at variance with the world, and tired of all that therein was.

Perhaps his dinner had again done him the impoliteness to disagree with him; perhaps another pretty girl had just opened her eyes in delightfully feigned astonishment, murmured:

"Oh, Mr. Magdalen, I am so sorry!" and left him once more disconsolate; certain it is that he went to his rooms, on this particular evening, and, confidently addressing the pictures on the walls, spoke aloud concerning many things that oppressed him.

"Bah! I'm sick of it all. Oh, the hideous hollowness of the whole fabric of civilisation! Lies, sham, and hypocrisy everywhere; everyone must be believed a scoundrel until the opposite is proved; circle lies within circle of conventions, of rules and regulations, making a man a mere machine. This is not living; there is no freedom of action in all this. At every opening one is hampered; social usage, good form and fetishes of that sort are guarding every portal that leads to free will and naturalness. And what good does it all do? H'm! it's done me a sweet lot of good, I must say! No, the thing for me to do is to cut the whole shooting-match, to pull up sticks and depart for wilds—somewhere out of the world."

Mr. Magdalen was really very much in earnest. The very next morning he walked to the house of his friend, Major Fewsleer, and said to that gentleman:

"Old man, do me a favour. I'm heartily sick of this part of the world and I want air. You've got lots of it out on the Texas prairies. I want some of it. In other words, give me a letter to your foreman on the T-Square ranch, telling him I'm coming down for my health, or any other stuff like that you can think of. As a matter of fact, I'm going because I'm sick of this. What do you think?"

"I think," said the Major sententiously, "that you're more kinds of an italicised fool than there are in the dictionary. What the Tom, Dick, and Harry do you want to go and frizzle in that beastly sun for, with no one to speak to but cowboys whose talk is all cattle?"

"Major," said Mr. Magdalen a trifle wearily, "you mean well, I know; but everything you say only makes me long to get down there. Why, man, nobody to speak to is just what I'm yearning for, and nothing to look at will make eyes as good as new again. Come now, will you do me this favour, or won't you? Because——"

"Oh, well, if you put it that way," said the Major deprecatingly, and promptly sat down and wrote the letter needed.

Thus it came about that in due course of time, there appeared at the T-Square ranch a young man with a tired expression on his face and a letter in his hand. Presently he was rid of both, and was a cowboy like the rest. The freedom that the prairies seemed to promise filled him with a buoyancy of spirit that he had not known for many a long day, and the absence of all that had been galling him in the world he had left was also soothing to his soul.

Among the other cowboys he was accounted, when that happened at all, as a somewhat morose character, which opinion was due to the caustic remarks he occasionally let fall concerning the world of manners and customs. Whenever he spoke of Texas, it was with unbounded enthusiasm.

The one thing that somewhat annoyed him about the T-Square was the presence of the foreman's daughter. He had come down here especially to get away from all that sort of thing; and now one of the first things that he found was a gipsy-like little beauty who spoke Spanish and English in charming alternation, and rode like an Amazon.

However, she was practically a savage, he thought to himself in consolation, and didn't really count. Her father, Mr. Eslington, had grown old on the T-Square; he had married, so Magdalen seemed to have heard, a Mexican or Spaniard, and Miss Mamie had presumably never seen anything but the prairies, and was just about as wild as the cactus growing thereabouts. On consideration of which, Mr. Magdalen smoothed away his first displeasure by the assurance that she didn't count at all.

He rarely saw the girl; and when he did, she was galloping along with her hair streaming out behind her like some wild thing, or else was humming some

Digitized by Google

Mexican song or other that he didn't understand and didn't want to.

Magdalen had contracted the habit, after work, of taking solitary rides; it was in the course of one of these that a curious thing happened to him.

He was galloping at full speed across the open prairie, his hat far back on his head, and his eyes fixed on the horizon.

That was what brought him to grief—that gazing out into the wide world, and riding meanwhile into a prairie-dog's dug-out. The pony stumbled, fell on his knees, and Mr. Magdalen went whirling off over the animal's ears.

When he tried to move, he found there was something the matter with his ankle. The pony had got up again, and was standing still, grazing; but Mr. Magdalen was lying on the ground groaning and muttering unpleasant things.

As the moments went by, it became more and more evident to him that he certainly was in a fix. He couldn't move without hideous pain, and the boys of the ranch wouldn't miss him for hours to come. He wondered what had happened.

And while he was yet wondering, his pony pricked up its ears, whinnied, and turned to greet Miss Mamie's pony, which just then galloped up, its fair rider in the saddle. In an instant she had dismounted and was by Magdalen's side.

"My ankle's twisted, I believe," he said apologetically. He was glad someone had come, but he would have preferred anyone else.

"Yes," said Miss Mamie, after a hasty examination, ', and it's a tollably bad twist too. Yo' cain't walk at all, what? I'll have to——"

Then, before he could even have time for astonishment, Magdalen found himself being carried in this girl's arms, and presently being placed in his saddle. "And now," said Miss Mamie, breathing a trifle hard, "if we rides home moderate, 'spect you can stand it till we get to th' house."

"How shall I ever thank you?" began Magdalen; but she interrupted him with a "Don't!" And he could do nothing but continue to wonder and to gaze furtively at this magnificent young creature riding by his side.

It seemed to him now that he had hitherto been curiously blind in the matter of this girl's evident beauty; and it occurred to him, in a swift flash, that here was a girl so different from those away in England, so untrammelled and free, so unsullied by the knowledge of conventions, as to be a perfect revelation, an unsuspected delight.

In the days after his accident, when he lay on a couch in the ranch-house, he turned this new idea over and over in his mind, fed it with frequent glimpses of Miss Mamie, as she flitted to and fro through the house, and finally came to the conclusion that it was a pretty good idea.

Miss Mamie's eyes as he looked at them when she brought him some of those mysterious compounds especially intended for convalescents, seemed to him to become daily more fair, and daily he increased in wonderment at his former blindness. Why, she was a very prairie-flower, a rara avis, an unspoiled child of nature, a beauty blushing unseen in the desert. Why should she not be the one in all the world to prove the oruth of his firm belief, that good was to be found only tutside civilisation?

And so it came about that Mr. Magdalen, cynic, fell in love with Miss Mamie Eslington completely, unreservedly. Everything about her was a delight to him, from her hair, free to the breezes, to her queer Western speech.

As for her, she allowed him to make love to her without doing much herself beyond appearing to like it. There was a mysterious twinkle in her eyes all the while, that to the disinterested observer would have been named humour, though to Magdalen it was love-light.

Mr. Magdalen at length came to the conclusion that he wanted Mamie to be his wife. The many rides they had taken together, the long talks they had had, consisting chiefly of language on the part of Magdalen, and smiling silence on Mamie's side, had made him more and more aware of the many beauties of her nature. Occasionally he had been startled by sudden lapses from her prairie dialect into perfectly pure English; but she had always reverted just as suddenly, and he had forgotten the thing.

So it happened that, as they rode together one beautiful salmon-tinted even, Magdalen leant over and said swiftly, passionately, to the girl beside him:

"Miss Mamie, I can't keep on seeing you this way, day after day, without telling you—telling you that I—I love you. Perhaps you've seen it; girls usually do, I believe. But I must tell you. And I want you to be my wife, Mamie. Won't you?"

"Well!" said Mamie, "but I'm—I'm skeered! I 'spose I'd better ask—" Then she broke into a musical burst of merriment. "There," she said, relapsing suddenly into wonderfully pure English and holding out her pretty hand to Magdalen, "take it, you silly boy. Yes, of course I've known it all along, and I'll confess I tried to trap you; only," and she hung her head and blushed so prettily that Magdalen, through all his astonishment, wanted to kiss her, "only—I got caught myself. You see, papa got a private letter from Major Fewsleer, advising him of your real reason for coming out here, and of course papa couldn't keep it from me. And so I——"

Magdalen was kissing her hand rapturously. Then he caught his breath sharply and gasped: "But you—you talk so—so differently!"

"Yes, you blind cynic; of course I do. What do you suppose I was educated and lived in England for, if I can't speak English?"

"Oh!" gasped Magdalen, "and I thought——"

"Yes; pity, isn't it? But you've no chance to escape now. You thought you were finding a flower untouched by the contamination of civilisation, and now you see you weren't, you dear boy. Isn't civilisation a little good, after all?"

She was leaning towards him; the enchantment of her voice and her eyes came to him like a flood; her beautiful hair was lifted by a passing zephyr until it curled before him like a promise of Heaven; and then, as he pressed his lips upon hers, he murmured:

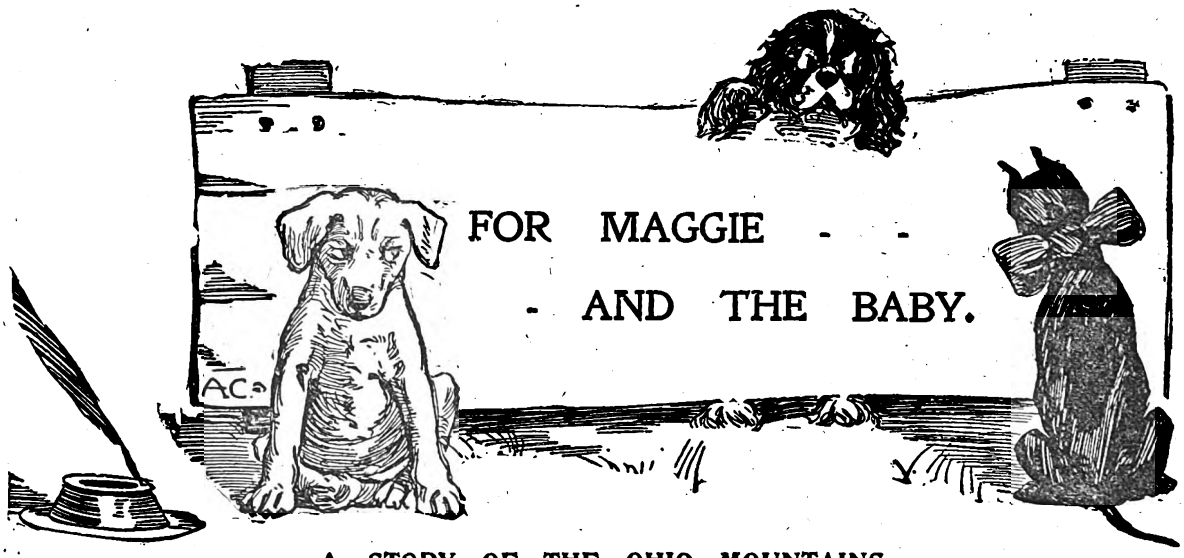
"Civilisation is beautiful—if you say so, you little witch!"

Before they reached the ranch again, many more things had occurred which proved that a woman's little finger can twist resolutions that have been years in building. Magdalen had agreed to take her back to civilisation and become once more a sociable animal. Finally, the little witch said very roguishly:

"And as I am to take your heart back to civilisation, don't you think you had better leave your cynicism out here on the prairies?"

And from the fervour of his assent it is reasonable to believe that he did. WALTER WALTERS.

Digitized by Google



A STORY OF THE OHIO MOUNTAINS.

He came up the mountain road at nightfall trudging forward wearily, and coughing now and then a heavy, hollow cough that told its own story.

There were only two houses on the mesa, stretching shaggy and sombre from the base of the mountains to the valley below.

Two unpainted, red-wood dwellings, with their clumps of trailing pepper trees and tattered bananas, mere specks of civilisation against a stern background and mountain sides.

The traveller stopped before one of them, bowing awkwardly as the master of the house came out.

"Mr. Brand, I believe?"

Brand looked keenly into the stranger's face.

Not a bad face, certainly; sallow and drawn with suffering, one of those hopelessly pathetic faces, barely saved from the grotesque by a pair of dull, wistful eyes.

Not that James Brand saw anything either grotesque or pathetic about the man.

"Another sickly-looking stranger outside, Barbara, wants to try the air up here. Can you keep him? Or perhaps Mrs. Fox will give him a berth."

Mrs. Brand shook her head in wifely meditation.

"No, Mrs. Fox can't, that's certain. She has an asthma and two bronchitises there now. What's the matter with him, Jim?"

The stranger's hoarse, resonant cough answered.

"Keep him? To be sure. You might know I'd keep him, Jim; the night air's no place for a man with a cough like that. Bring him into the kitchen."

The new-comer spread his bony hands over Mrs. Brand's cheery fire, and the soft, dull eyes followed her movements wistfully.

His name was Brice. He had been in a mill explosion and had had a narrow escape. He had been ordered to try a change of air, and later he would look out for a job.

In answer to the question whether he was married, he pulled out a small black case.

Brand took the little rusty affair in his hands reverently. A woman's face—not grand nor fair even—some bits of tawdry finery making its plainness plainer, and beside it a round-eyed boy plumped into a high chair, with two little feet sticking out sturdily. Mrs. Brand looked over her husband's shoulder with kindly curiosity.

"Yes, that's Maggie and the boy," fighting the conscious pride in his voice like one who tries to wear his honours meekly. He took the well-worn case again, gazing into the two faces an instant with helpless yearning, and returned it to its place. The way he handled it was a caress, fastening the little brass hook with scrupulous care.

"I'll be sendin' for 'em when I git a little better o' this cough."

A very quiet, unobtrusive guest Mrs Brand found the man Brice; talking little save in a sudden gush of confidence, and always of his wife and child; choosing a quiet corner of the kitchen in the chilly nights, where he watched his hostess' quick movements with wistful admiration.

"Try hunting, Brice. The doctor says it's healthy."

And Brice tried hunting as Brand advised. Taking the gun from its crotch over the door after breakfast, and wandering for hours in the yellow, wine-like air of the mesa, he came in at noon and nightfall always empty-handed, yet no one derided his failure. There was something about the man that smothered derision.

Mrs. Brand had always an encouraging word for the weary-looking hunter. "Greasewood's bad for huntin'. Jim says it don't pay to look for quail in the brush when he does fetch 'em down."

"Like enough, ma'am. I've had a good many shots at the little wild things, but they turn their heads so innocent like. A man as has been blowed up once ain't much at separatin' families. I s'pose it ain't the shootin' by itself that's healthy, but the air——"

Whether the doctors were right or whether it was the mingled resin and honey of the sage and chaparral, no one cared to ask. Certain it is that the bothering cough yielded a little and the bent form grew a trifle more erect. He followed Brand from the table one morning, stopping outside, his face full of patient eagerness.

"I'm gettin' strong, neighbour. There's odd jobs you could gi' me. I'd be slow, perhaps, but seems as if anything 'ud be better 'n this continual doin' nothing."

Digitized by Google

"Fox and I was sayin' yesterday we'd like to put another man on the ditch," replied Brand. "It'll be easy work for a week till we strike the rock again. Then there's the greasewood. It's always on hand. You might take it slow when you was able. We'll find you jobs enough, man."

The scarred, colourless face brightened.

And so Price went to work on the ditch, gently at first, spared from the heaviest work by strong arms and rough kindliness.

And, ere long, another rude dwelling went up on the mesa, the blue smoke from its fireside curling slowly towards the pine-plumed mountain tops.

Brice had asked permission to build it, as he would have a little cash left after paying Mrs. Brand, and he hoped to settle there. The building fund, scant enough at best, was unexpectedly swelled by a sudden and obstinate attack of forgetfulness which seized good Mrs. Brand.

"No, Brice, you haven't made me any extra work, and I'm sure you've paid your way twice over, bringin' in wood and grindin' coffee and the like."

One day Brice came to Brand with a letter and a motley collection of coins—the savings from his wages. He wanted the money and letter sent to his wife, so that she could come and take up her quarters with him. And every day after that he was asking how long it would be before she arrived.

The southern winter blossomed royally. Bees held high carnival in the nodding spikes of the white sage, and now and then a breath of perfume from the orange groves in the valley came to mingle with the wild mountain odours. Brice worked every moment with feverish earnestness, and the pile of gnarled roots on the clearing grew steadily larger. With all her loveliness, Nature failed to woo him. What was the exquisite languor of those days to him but so many hours of patient waiting? The dull, hungry eyes saw nothing of the lavish beauty about them, looking through it all with restless yearning to the direction where he knew that a train, with its dust and dirt and noisome breath crawled over miles of alkali, or hung from dizzy heights.

"To-morrow's the third, neighbour, I expect she'll be here now, direckly."

"That's a fact; what a rattler time is." The days had not been long to Brand. "We'll go in to-morrow, and if they don't come, you can stay and watch the trains awhile. She won't know you, Brice, you've picked up so."

"I think Maggie will know me if she comes."

But she did not come. Brand returned the following night alone, having left Brice at cheap lodgings near the station. Numberless passers-by must have noticed the patient watcher of the incoming trains, the homely pathos of his face deepening day by day. The dull eyes growing a shade duller, and the awkward form a trifle more stooped with each succeeding disappointment. It was two weeks before he reappeared again on the mesa, walking wearily like a man under a load.

"I'm a'raid there's something wrong, ma'am. I come out to see if your husband would write me a letter."

So Brand wrote a letter to Brice's former employer, making the minutest inquiries regarding Mrs. Brice, and giving every possible direction concerning her residence. Then Brice fell back into the old groove, working feverishly in spite of Mrs. Brand's kindly warnings. "I can't stop, ma'am; doin' nothin' 'ud kill me."

The answer came at last, a business-like epistle addressed to Brand. Mrs. Brice had left about the time designated. Several of her neighbours remembered that a stranger, a well-dressed man, had been at the house for nearly a week before her departure, and the two had gone away together. The writer regretted his inability to give further information, and closed with kindly inquiries concerning his former employee's health and earnest commendation of him to Mr. Brand.

"I stood and watched."

Brand read the letter aloud. Brice listened without a word, then he got up heavily, staggering a little as he crossed the door, and went out into the yellow sunlight. There was the long, sun-kissed slope, the huge pile of twisted roots, the rude shanty with its clambering vines. The humming of bees in the sage went on drowsily. Life, infinitely shrunken, was life still. A more cultured grief might have swooned or cried out. This man knew no such refuge; even the poor relief of indignation was denied him. None of the thousand wild impulses that come to men smitten like him flitted across his clouded brain. He only knew to take up his burden and go dumbly on.

No one spoke of the blow that had fallen upon him. The sympathy that met him came in the warmer clasp of hard hands and the softening of rough voices, none the worse certainly for its quietness.

Happily, it all came to an end one afternoon. Brice was at work on the ditch again, preferring the cheerful companionship of Brand and Bert Fox to his own thoughts, and Mrs. Brand was alone in the kitchen. Two shadows fell across the worn threshold, and a weak, questioning voice brought the good woman to her door instantly.

"Good-day to you, ma'am. Is there a man named Brice livin' here anywhere?"

It was a woman's voice, a woman with some bits of tawdry ornament about her, and a round eyed boy clinging bashfully to her skirts. Mrs. Brand brought them into the house, urging the stranger to rest a bit and get her breath.

Digitized by Google

"Thank you, ma'am: I'd like to be movin' on. Do you know if he's well—the man Brice? We're his wife an' boy."

The woman told her story presently, when Mrs. Brand had induced her to wait there until the man came home—told it with no unnecessary words, and her listener made no comment.

"My brother came a week before we was leavin', an' helped us off an' come part of the way. He had been doin' well, and he gave me some money. I was took ill on the road—I don't remember just where—an' they left me at a town with a woman named Dixon. She took care o' me. I was out o' my head a long time, an' when I came to I told 'em to write to Brice, an' they did, an' I suppose they took the name of the place frum the ticket. I was weak for a long time, an' they kep' a writin' and no word come, an' then I recollected about the town on the ticket—and then I couldn't think o' the place I'd sent the letters to before, an' the thinkin' worrited me, an' the doctor said I mustn't try. So I just waited, an' when I got to the town I kep' askin' for a man named Brand, till one day somebody told me."

Mrs. Brand told her husband about it that evening.

"I just took the two of 'em up to the shanty, and opened the door, and you'd a cried to see how pleased she was with everything. And I told her to kindle a fire and I'd fetch up a bit of supper. And when I'd carried it up and left it, I just come back and stood and watched till I saw Brice coming home. He was walking slow, as if his feet was a dead weight, and when he took hold of the door he stopped a minute, lookin' over the valley kind o' wishful an' hopeless. She heard him come, for she opened the door, and I turned round and came in. 'Barbara Brand,' says I, 'you've seen enough. If God wants to look at that I suppose He has a right to; nobody else has, that's certain.'"

Adam Heath.

Louis Hammond, who made himself famous catching counterfeiters for the Government, now manages an agency of his own. He is a stout and jovial person, with round eyes that beam through gold-rimmed glasses.

To the presence of this personage was ushered in, about one o'clock of a May afternoon, a young man of a rather commonplace appearance, dressed as well as need be, and seemingly about as intelligent as the average citizen.

"If you can spare a few minutes," he said, "I'd like to tell you about a queer thing that has just happened to me. I think, perhaps, you'd like to do something about it."

Hammond nodded, and bade him be seated.

"My name is George Weyland," the visitor said. "I work at a builder's near here. At twelve to-day I went over to Reid's billiard rooms and played a game with a friend. I took off my coat because it was warm in there, and after the game I put on another fellow's coat by mistake.

"He was playing at the next table to mine, and I had hung my coat on the next peg to his. When I got the coat on it felt awkward, and, to make sure that it was mine, I pulled some papers out of the inside breast pocket as I was walking towards the door. They weren't my papers, and I was just about to put them back when my eye fell on a folded sheet of letter paper, on which a name was written over and over again. The name was Henry Stanhope."

"Well?" said the detective, as Weyland paused.

"Of course you know Stanhope."

"Everybody does," responded Hammond. "The man who inherited old James Stanhope's money cuts too large a figure, even in this city, to remain altogether unknown."

"I was reminded of old Stanhope's money," continued Weyland, "when I saw that sheet of paper, and I'll tell you why. The name, as written on the top of that sheet, was a real signature, and all the others were imitations. I saw it at a glance. When Stanhope signs his name he makes a peculiar twist in the tail of the p. The imitator was trying to learn that in particular."

"How much time did you spend in studying that paper?" asked Hammond.

"About half a minute," was the reply. "Then I put it back where it came from, and went back and changed coats again. Just as I hung up the wrong coat the other fellow noticed it. He didn't seem to care. He put his coat on and started away, having finished his game. When he was half way to the door he took that batch of papers out of his breast pocket, and when his eye lit on the one I mentioned, he started, and turned quickly to look at me. I pretended not to see him. Then he put the paper back into his pocket and went on. Naturally I followed him. He and the fellow that he'd been playing with went over to the 'Bagdad' and ordered lunch in the small dining room. I came here at once," he continued. "I have heard more or less about you, of course. It struck me that perhaps you might recognise this fellow as a thief if you took a look at him. You know all the forgers, and this certainly looks like a forgery plot."

Digitized by Google

There was a peculiar smile on the detective's face.

"What did this fellow look like?"

"About my height," was the reply; "perhaps thirty years old; large-featured face, long, brown moustache."

"We'll take a look at him," said Hammond, with a peculiar, faint chuckle. "I was just going over there to lunch myself."

On the way Hammond continued to smile more and more broadly. Just as they were entering Hammond asked:

"Did anyone in the billiard room know this fellow?"

"I—I really didn't have time to inquire," said Weyland, blushing.

The two men were still in the dining room when Weyland and the detective entered. Presently the smile which Hammond had worn since they left the office became a silent but particularly joyous laugh.

"By the way," said Hammond at last, "I recognise your friend. He is Henry Stanhope."

"I think the lunches ought to be paid for by me," Weyland said good-naturedly, but Hammond wouldn't hear of it, and he forced the young man to partake of a very excellent repast. When it was finished they parted on the best of terms.

Weyland walked slowly away from the "Bagdad." He felt angry and ashamed, yet he was not ready to admit that he had been absurd.

"If Hammond could only have seen that sheet of paper," he said to himself over and over again. "It was an attempt to copy a signature. Of course, Stanhope can't forge his own name."

Urged by an impulse not altogether blind, but rather the product of a deep conviction, Weyland wended his way towards Stanhope's office. He passed upon the way a tall, gaunt man of fifty, who panted painfully, and laid his hand upon his breast, wherein the seeds of death were ripening fast. The next moment Weyland was in the hall of Stanhope's office.

"I have a note," he said to a clerk who came leisurely forward, "for Mr. Henry Stanhope, but it is not for the head of this firm. Is there anybody else here of the same name, or do you know of anyone?"

"Never heard of anybody else of that name," was the reply.

"Perhaps it's for me," said a voice, and Weyland turned to see the man whom he had passed just a short distance from the office.

The young man's heart leaped in his bosom.

"I expect it's for you," he said. "Come out into the hall and I'll give it to you, and also a message."

Two days later, at about the hour of his first appearance there, Weyland called upon Detective Hammond.

"I have found my forger," said he calmly.

"Have you, indeed?" rejoined the detective cheerily. "I'm delighted to hear it. Who is he?"

"Henry Stanhope!" replied Weyland firmly. "The man that we saw yesterday is a distant cousin of the same name, whose claim to a slice of old James Stanhope's property under his very peculiar will has never been properly adjusted. Young Stanhope, or his lawyer for him, drew up an agreement for his cousin to sign. It was a fraud, and the cousin wouldn't sign it. If he had he would have given up £40,000 for about £1,000. So young Stanhope proposed to sign it himself."

"Rather dangerous, wasn't it?" queried Hammond. "Of course, it would have been forgery."

"He wouldn't have been alive to do it," replied Weyland. "His days are numbered. He is far gone with consumption. Stanhope intended to produce the paper only after his cousin's death."

"How did you learn this?" demanded the detective.

"From Stanhope himself," said Weyland quietly.

"The dickens you did! I'd like to know how."

For answer, Weyland detailed his meeting with the claimant, and told how he had struggled to gain the man's confidence, and had succeeded. Then, together, they had called upon Stanhope, and asked for the agreement, saying that the claimant was ready to sign it. As Stanhope had already forged the signature, he could not produce the document, and he lacked the news to claim that his cousin had already signed it.

"Then," said Weyland, "I accused him of the thing point blank. I told him of the paper that I had seen in his pocket. I said I would have him arrested on the spot with the papers in his pocket, and I asked him incidentally if he had noticed you and me at lunch in the same room with him after the incident. At the mention of your name he trembled. From that moment he treated me as one of your staff, and, to make a long story short, before we left him he had executed an agreement by which his cousin got his rights."

* * * * * *

"Have you seen her?"

"I saw her last evening," replied Weyland blushing. "She is a very charming girl."

"And the property is considerable," said Hammond, smiling. "A very pretty romance it would make. And so," he added, "young Stanhope thought you were one of my men?"

"It was on his own responsibility. I didn't tell him so."

"Would you like to be?" asked Hammond.

"I would indeed."

"Then it is settled," said the veteran detective, "provided we can agree upon a stipend."

And he beamed upon the young man in his most cheery and amiable fashion.

ERNEST RICHMOND.

AUNTIE: "A penny for your thoughts."

Little Nephew: "I was thinking that if I kept quiet and pretended to be thinking you'd wonder what I was thinking about, and say just what you did. Hand over the penny!"

THE Bishop of Wurzburg once asked a sprightly little shepherd boy:

"What are you doing here, my lad?"

"Tending swine."

"How much do you get?"

"One florin a week."

"I am also a shepherd," continued the Bishop, "but I get much more pay."

"Then I suppose you have more swine under your care," innocently replied the boy.

Digitized by Google

THE HONEST POSTMAN.

"A wild day, Marcaille," said the postmistress to the letter-carrier, who had just come in.

"Wild indeed, Madame Lefevre," replied Marcaille.

As he spoke he shook out his old cloak all wet with the rain, while the postmistress sorted the letters.

"There! that is done," she said. "But warm yourself before you start out."

Marcaille threw down his leather bag, black and shiny in spots, and came close to the roaring stove.

He was a little, wiry, tough-looking man. His face browned by sun and wind, was as wrinkled as an old apple.

His nose was a little too red, his eyes sparkled, his mouth was smiling; it was a good face that called forth friendly words and cordial hand-grasps. His moustache had a military ferocity, and on his blue blouse, with its red collar, a worn scrap of yellow and green ribbon told all his past:

Drawn in the draft, seven years of service, re-enlisted, petty officer, wounded at Alma, wounded at Solferino, honourably discharged.

Then Marcaille had been given the place of postman on the Champagnole route—four hundred francs a year, pension of one hundred francs, making a total income of five hundred francs.

And for ten years, for five hundred francs, Marcaille made twice a day, morning and evening, his round:

Cize, Pillemoine, le Vaudioux, Châtelnuef, Maisonneuve and Siane, a circuit of seven leagues in all weathers.

With his five hundred francs he took care of a wife and four children; the eldest was six.

But Marcaille had acquired the bad habit of a little "taste," as he called it.

In every village he had old acquaintances, almost friends.

In every house he found, in exchange for the letter he brought, a glass of wine that seemed to him to put strength into his heart and his legs. His nose grew a little redder; it even happened once that he lost a letter; not a very important one, fortunately, but it might have taught him a lesson.

"Here they are, Marcaille," said Madame Lefevre; "two letters for Cize, one for Pillemonie, one for le Vaudieux—nothing for Châtelneuf."

"That's good," said Marcaille. That "nothing for Châtelneuf" spared him a league and a half of rough walking.

"For Siane," went on Madame Lefevre, "pay attention! A registered letter!"

"It is not the first."

"No, but——" and Madame held up a great envelope bristling with stamps and notices, besides which spread out, like blots of blood, five enormous red seals.

"That's nothing worth caring for," said Marcaille laughing. "Who is it?"

"For monsieur the Mayor."

"Well, it will go through his hands, never fear."

"Not more than through yours," said Madame.

"No, but more of it will stick to his."

With this philosophic reflection, Marcaille dropped the letter into his leather bag, which he buckled carefully. He put on his cloak and opened the door.

"And above all," cried Madame after him, "don't begin Easter time too soon!"

"Don't be afraid!" and Marcaille was in a moment out of sight.

The cold pinched sharply; the piercing wind blew up little whirlpools of rain. Marcaille jogged along briskly, muttering:

"Not much Easter! A mouthful for six and a glass of water! But, after all, there are those who have nothing."

"Hullo, Marcaille!" cried suddenly a rough voice.

Marcaille turned.

"A glass of wine?" said the voice.

Digitized by Google

"Hum!" grumbled Marcaille to himself; "attention, registered letter!" Then, aloud, "I'm late now; no, thank you!"

The window of the "Pineapple" public-house, which had opened, closed again, and Marcaille, proud of the victory over himself, went whistling out of the village. In the branches the wind whistled with its plaintive or menacing modulations, and its vague accompaniment to Marcaille's whistling.

"This rascally sack," he grumbled. "How heavy it is! I would have done better, after all, to stop at the Pineaapple. One glass of white wine is no killing matter. Yes, but then when a fellow takes one he takes two, and then away he goes! Brrrr! I was warmer than this in Africa. I can't feel my hands at all."

Marcaille stopped, put down his bag, and beat vigorously upon his sides with both arms. He drew in a long breath of icy air, and exhaled it with a breath that was much like a sigh, and trudged on again. Five minutes after he was at Cize and ringing at the door of the fine big house of the ironmaster.

"It is Father Marcaille."

"Hullo, Marcaille!"

"Have you got some letters?"

The children swarmed round him. He came up the outside steps, and the dancing youngsters pulled and pushed him to the door of the drawing-room. There, even as he let himself be pushed along, Marcaille thought:

"Attention, old fellow, registered letter."

Around him were happy voices and bursts of laughter. In the middle of the room the ironmaster and his wife were amusing the children in the warm and fragrant atmosphere, before a crackling fire, while outside the wind rattled the windows and whistled down the chimneys.

"A glass of wine, Marcaille?" said the friendly mistress of the house.

Marcaille gulped down a great sigh. Then he said: "Thank you, madame; not to-day."

This was indeed courage! To refuse a glass of wine in such weather, when he had still three good leagues up the mountain before him. But how light he felt when he proudly resumed his journey. He felt light, but his bag felt heavier than ever, never had it weighed so upon his shoulders.

"This rascally bag!" he grumbled. "It is that letter. What can be in it? if it should be bank-notes, judged by the weight, there should be a fortune. This rascally bag!"

Marcaille stopped. Decidedly this wouldn't do. The strap cut into his shoulder; he took off his cloak, changed it to the other shoulder and started off again. But things seemed no better. The road always seemed less long when he had had a glass of wine, at the "Pineapple," or elsewhere.

The cold, which he seldom noticed, made him shiver and groan. And then the wind whistling through the trees sounded so doleful.

And still grumbling: "The rascally bag!" and whistling at intervals, he went down towards Pillemoine. Below him stretched the valley, lost in the shadow; dotted here and there with lights, for the night was almost black. But he knew every village and every house, and in the blackness he recognized far away the house of the ironmaster, with every window lighted up, The joyous scene passed again before his eyes—the flaming fire, the cake on beautiful plates, the children dancing around their smiling parents.

"Yes, yes," murmured Marcaille. "There are some lucky people in the world. They have money, all they want, and with money one can do anything. Just get a little and its like a snowball; it rolls up bigger and bigger. Some have all, and others have none. There they are by the fire, and I'm out here in the rain. And what they spend for their amusement to-night I couldn't earn in a year. And yet they say God is just!"

Why did these ideas come to him?

He had never envied anyone. Why, then, did he stop and gaze fiercely at the lights shining below him.

He shook himself together.

"Forward, Marcaille!" he cried, "forward march!"

But the wind whistled and moaned in the pine-trees like a crying baby, and Marcaille, passing in thought from the ironmaster's house to his own, saw his four little ones gathered round their mother, by a scanty fire of faggots; he saw them searching in the cupboard for a forgotten bread-crust; he saw them going to sleep, all four on the same little wretched straw mattress. Oh poverty, poverty, it is hard! And to think that right here, in this bag——

"Registered letter!" he thought. "If it should be bank-bills! Imbecile! It is for the Mayor. It comes from the prefecture. It is probably only papers, and they register it and put on those big seals for a grand effect. Yes, but—if it should be bank-bills!"

He stopped short, perspiring, his forehead damp, and said suddenly, aloud, breaking the sombre silence:

"Well, and what then? If it should be bank-bills, what is that to you?"

His face flushed red at the thought that had crossed his mind.

"I haven't drunk anything, either," he murmured, with a shudder.

He entered Pillemoine.

At the door of a peasant's house he knocked.

A window opened.

"Oh! It is Marcaille. Come in!"

He went in.

"What ails you," asked the man. "You're pale. Have a glass of wine."

"No, no, thanks," said Marcaille, in a dull voice.

In rebuckling his bag he had felt the registered letter brush the tips of his finers.

The man had taken a glass; he held the bottle, all ready to pour.

"No," repeated Marcaille. And without another word he hurried out.

The ends of his fingers seemed to burn at the remembrance of the red seals.

Bank-bills, as many as there were there, how many things one could buy with them. A good house, like the ironmaster's, warm clothes, flannels! And what dinners! Rich—with what was in that letter one would be rich.

He began to whistle, but his breath failed him, and he felt his legs trembled beneath him. Without intending to, without wishing to, he had unbuckled the bag, he had taken out the letter, and in the half-light reflected from the snow he saw, like drops of blood, the five great red seals.

"Am I going mad?" he cried. "I have drunk nothing!"

He stood up at his full height, staring at the letter.

"I am an honest man," he said.

Then he put the letter back in his bag with an angry

Digitized by Google

gesture, and marched on with a measured step, striking with his heel and counting as he used to do in the regiment when the march was long: "One, two; one, two."

The regiment! Ah! how far away it was at that time. How poor they seemed to him now, the brave joys of the soldier, which had made his heart beat for fourteen years. What a fool he was to enlist! Fighting in the field, hard fare in the camp, suffering in the ambulance. His medal! Great things, indeed. A bit of ribbon on his blouse. How much better he would have done to start out, like his brother, to seek his fortune.

"It was by this road he went," thought Marcaille, as he started across the great road to Geneva, whose white length to his right stretched along by the forest of Siane, "by this road."

That long white road, he had only to travel along it—and he stopped.

"The frontier," he thought, "is quite near. Ten leagues, what is that? Taking time to go for the wife and children one could be there by to-morrow morning. And once there, one is safe. The Mayor is not expecting this letter. If people missed us to-morrow, they would think something had happened to me in the night, that I had fallen into a hole or something, and that my wife was looking for me. Suspect me? Oh, no! Marcaille is an honest man, an honest man!"

The sweat stood on his brow.

Panting with eyes fixed on that white line which lost itself in the night, he repeated in a low voice:

"An honest man"

His hand slipped under his cloak, unbuckled the leather bag, and trembled as it touched the five red seals.

"Yes, but if I were wrong," he murmured; "if there were only papers in it."

Quickly he took the letter and felt it carefully to find out its secrets.

But the envelope was thick and hard, the paper crackled under his fingers with a little dry noise that sounded formidably loud, while the night wind whistled in his ears:

"Thief! thief! thief!"

"Who said Marcaille was a thief?" he cried, with a fierce gesture.

Then, seeing he was all alone, he came to himself and fell at the side of the road, crouching, his head in his hands, and murmuring:

"This is frightful! But I have drunk nothing."

Slowly he reopened the leather bag and slipped in the letter; slowly he rose; slowly still he crossed the road.

It seemed as if an implacable, invisible hand held him fast to the spot from which he would have hurried away.

The road to Siane was straight before him; a half-hour more and he should have finished his round, the letter would be given to the Mayor, and he would be safe.

"Come, Marcaille," he cried, "on with you!"

But no: he remained motionless on that fatal road that led to the frontier. And for the third time, carried away by irresistible temptation, he drew from the bag the registered letter, saying:

"I must know what is in it."

Very carefully with the point of his knife he raised one corner of the envelope enough to slip in his finger, and draw up one of the papers it contained. The task was a delicate one; he must go slowly, very slowly, in order to tear nothing. If it were only papers!

The night wind whistled in his ears: "Thief! thief! thief!"

But he did not hear it. He thought only of one thing: to know what was in that letter. He had only one fear, of not succeeding or of deceiving himself. At last he got hold of a corner of the enclosure. He took a match lit it, and by its light saw a bank-note.

It was really bank-notes. His head swam. The envelope was heavy, the sum must be enormous. He was about to tear it open to count it, but again he stopped.

"Let me see, let me see," he thought, "I need not hurry. I must plan out everything. I will tell Genevieve that we are going away. She will begin to ask questions. She will want to know everything. Bah! I will make up a story. I will tell her—but she will not believe me. Would she consent? Yes, yes, she must. To be rich, isn't that before everything? Are there not hundreds and thousands whom all the world bows down to who began just this way? Not to be caught, that is all. We will put the babies into the little cart. By daybreak we will be at the frontier. The gendarmes know me—don't they know that Marcaille is an honest man?"

He laughed convulsively as he said this, and again he heard the wind whistling in his ears:

"Thief! thief! thief!"

He folded the registered letter, and instead of replacing it in the leather bag, slipped it into his pocket.

It was his.

Then, with a strident voice, he cried out:

"Forward, Marcaille, forward. You are a rich man."

But he had hardly taken a step forward when his voice died in his throat.

Behind him, on the road he had just left, he heard voices clear and piercing.

It was like the indistinct murmur of a crowd.

Marcaille shivered.

Was he already suspected? Had his trouble betrayed him? Was he pursued?

He listened attentively.

The bells of the church at Vaudioux commenced to strike, slowly at first, then louder, calling to mass the good people of Châtelneuf, of Maisonneuve, and of Pillemoine.

Marcaille trembled with convulsive shivers.

Every stroke of the bell sounded in his ears and in his heart, and seemed to buzz in his head.

Then suddenly he burst into tears and buried his face in his hands.

"Oh, misery," he cried, "I had drunk nothing."

Reason came back to him, and with it a realisation of his incomplete crime.

And it was no longer the wind, it was the voices of his wife and children, it was the pealing of that bell, that had accused him.

"Thief!" replied the sombre depths of the forest.

Terrified, he tried to leave the voices behind him by running faster and still faster. And then a dizziness seized him. He knew not why he ran. Someone was after him, that was all. But who? His conscience or the gendarmes, he knew not which. Where was the danger? Everywhere.

In the shadows, to the right and to the left, he saw everywhere vague forms which followed him; the branches bent low over his head like arms to stop him. Wildly he ran along, the blood throbbing in his temples; then suddenly fell heavily in a dead faint.

Digitized by Google

When he came to himself he was lying before the fire in his own room. Genevieve and the children were kneeling and crying beside him. He did not see them. The people of Siane, who, coming from the mass, had found him, were there also. He did not see them.

"The letter? the letter?" he cried.

With one bound he sprang to the leather bag which had been thrown on the ground in the corner.

It was empty!

"The letter! the letter!" he cried.

Then remembered, and drawing from his pocket the big envelope with the five red seals—still unbroken—he rushed out like a madman, straight to the Mayor's.

"A registered letter!" he cried.

"Oh, indeed!" said the Mayor, laughing. "What a state you are in. One would think you had come to ask pardon for a condemned criminal."

"Well they might," said Marcaille. "But take the letter first. It is a little soiled—I fell down—I——"

His lie strangled him.

"A drop too much," said the Mayor.

"No, I had drunk nothing," said Marcaille quietly, "and it is just for that reason that I have brought you my resignation."

The Mayor had broken the seals, examined the bank-notes and glanced over the accompanying letter.

"Your resignation?" said he. "Well, I should think so—I can understand that."

"Ah! you know——"

"I know you are rich, my good fellow."

Was this a joke, or had the Mayor in some way looked into his conscience and read the whole story?

Marcaille became pale at the thought.

"Rich?" he murmured.

"Why, yes, there is no doubt about that. This letter tells me of the death of your brother, Jean Marcaille, who died at Toulouse, where he resided, on the eighth of this present month. According to his last wishes, all he possessed has been disposed of by Michael Dulac, notary of that city, who sends to me the amount of twenty-four thousand francs, which I am instructed to hand over to you."

"Ah!" said Marcaille, overwhelmed, as he took mechanically into his hand the big envelope that the Mayor offered him: "Jean is dead, and I am rich!"

Then, after a moment of silence:

"It makes no difference," he murmured, so low that the Mayor could not hear him; "I should have been a thief just the same!"

Then, turning, he added, loud enough this time:

"But I am still an honest man, thank God!"

"No one ever doubted it, Marcaille," said the Mayor. "But take my advice and be more careful. A glass of wine too much goes to your head, and you might fare worse another time."

"You are right, sir," said Marcaille, and he went off whistling, with his head in the air.

Was Marcaille an honest man?

I should say so! T. E. H.

"My sister has lost her voice and we've tried every doctor in town."

"That so? Then try her with a mouse."

"Pa, is it right to call a man born in Poland a Pole?"

"Of course, my child."

"Well, then, if a man is born in Holland, is he a hole?"

3 Pence

will give you immediate possession on October 14th of THE ROYAL MAGAZINE, if you will only take the precaution to order to-day the copies you require.

It will be such a remarkable publication for threepence that the publishers fully expect to have orders for two million copies of

No. 1.

3 Pence

will give you a magazine containing eighteen separate articles and no fewer than two hundred and thirty-five illustrations.

Put on your hat now, if you are a man; put on your bonnet now, if you are a woman, and go and order the first number of the

ROYAL MAGAZINE.

Have you started "The Rose of Judah" in PEARSON'S WEEKLY yet? If not, why not?

The story is by Mr. George Griffith, author of "Briton or Boer," "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc., etc. It is indeed a splendid story!

Digitized by Google

HOMESPUN YARNS.

By Levin Carnac.

IV.—OLD MARK'S ENGINE-GHOST.

A FEW years ago I was one of a party of half a dozen tourists who had got off the cars at Denver to spend a day or so looking round the famous mines whose deep shafts have swallowed up so many fortunes and so many lives, repaying the former with interest, but demanding unceasing toll of the latter in exchange for the silver treasures that they yield up.

Our guide was a typical miner of the old style, a sort of remnant of the roaring times of '49, when men had only just begun to suspect that these rugged hills and rocky valleys contained the millions that have been taken out of them since then. He knew everything about a mine, from the lowest gallery to the top of the engine-house shaft, and he was as full of mine-lore as the Comstock was of paying one.

When our day's sight-seeing was over, two or three of us who wanted to get the many fragments of anecdote dropped by our guide during the day spun into something like a connected yarn, coaxed the old man away into the smoking room of a small hotel, and informed him that whisky and cigars were duty free as long as he could contrive to stick to the truth and make it interesting to us. To which he solemnly replied:

"Gents, so far as square-toed true experiences of these mines goes, it's only the weakness of human natur' as would stop me reelin' 'em off as long as the tangle-foot held out; but I think as its gettin' a bit late, and as you've got to be on board early in the mornin', I can fix you up with one that'll give you something to dream about when you get to sleep. It's as true as gospel, too, so far as my knowledge of the matter goes.

"About five years ago we had a minder up yonder, on the Belcher, who was as curious a cuss as you'd meet with in a day's prospectin'. Though he was gettin' on in years, he was as smart and keen and plucky as any man on the mines, but he was superstitious from his boots to his hair, and that's what let him out at last, poor old chap.

"Old Mark was solid on everything but spooks, but about them he was a hopeless crank. He believed that his shaft was haunted, and that there could be ghosts working in engines just the same as round corpses, and graveyards, and old houses. I don't take much stock of them things myself, never having been a very heavy drinker, but Old Mark went his pile on them, and if any of you gents ever writes down what I'm tellin' you now, you can call this story, 'Old Mark's Engine-Ghost,' for that's just about what it comes to.

"One day I'd stopped by his engine-house to swap lies with him for a spell, when all of a sudden he held up his hand, and said to me in a sacred sort of whisper:

"'Sam, d'ye hear that?'

"'Hear what?' says I, going to the mouth of the shaft and peering down.

"'That holler, groanin', wailin' sorter noise among the ingines; that sound means death to someone down the mine at this moment.' As Mark said this, I saw his face grow white all in an instant, and his voice was just nowhere. He'd hardly got the words out of his mouth, when they rang up from the 2,000 foot level to hoist the cage. Mark gripped the lever, and sent the great reel spinning round, keeping his eye fixed on the indicator all the while and not making a sound.

"The hand pointed to the top level, when I heard, plain enough this time, a long, wailing scream come out of the machinery, just as though someone was being crunched up in it. Mark heard it too, and I saw his hand slip from the brake-lever for an instant. The cage shot up like lightning, and, before he could get the brake on again, jammed bang into the sheaves. The wire cable tautened under the strain for a moment, and then snapped like a thread. The cage dropped back to the shaft's mouth, and, as it fell, three of the chaps leapt out clear on to the timbers and saved themselves, the other two slipped on the slimy edge, and the dull 'thump, thump,' of their bodies, as they knocked from side to side of the shaft going down, stopped in my ears for a week after.

"That was Mark's last turn at that engine for many a long day. When an engineer lets his cage touch the sheaves he doesn't need to be told to go. He gets, without pay or notice; and not so long ago he thought himself lucky to get clear without any lead in his body. He was out of work for some weeks after that, living mostly on charity.

"Sometimes when he'd get hold of you and begin pitching his queer fancies the levelest headed man'd turn a bit queer over them, he seemed to believe them all so earnestly. He used to tell the boys as how engines is really living things, and get ill and low and merry and strong, and wants feeding and physicking just like other animals. And then he used to tell us about what he called the mysteries of the low levels down yonder in the dark, and how he'd seen doomed miners followed about the galleries by shadows which wasn't cast by any mortal light, and pointed at by the flames of their own lamps, until they got blasted into bits with a charge going off wrong, or were caved in and starved to death, or else got smashed up falling down the shaft like he had sent those poor fellows the day he went off his head.

"After a bit, people got to see that he was quite harmless, and someone gave him a job down below, and then he got worse and worse. 'Most every day when he came up from his shift he'd have some new horror to tell about that he had seen down in the levels.

"All this time, Old Mark was getting more and more down in the mouth. You see, he'd been the best engineer on the mine, and he'd lost his reputation. That worked on his mind, and made him so miserable, that a Chinee might have pitied him.

"One night, when he was off-shift, he turned into the South Consolidated engine-house, and sat, as he was very fond of doing, watching the machinery. All of a sudden, he caught the engineer by the arm, and said:

Digitized by Google

Stood like a graven image, waiting for the cage to come up.

'Tom, I hear the death-moan in the wheels. Keep your ears open, something's going to happen soon.'

"The engineer was just going to order him out of the machine-house, when the signal for the quick hoist sent him to the lever, and a moment later the steel rope was flashing over the wheel like a streak of lightning. Presently a puff of smoke drifted up the throat of the shaft, and then came a shower of sparks. The mine was on fire.

"As the cage came clashing up to the landing-stage a crowd of half-naked men, blistered and choking, staggered off and reeled into the dressing-room. The cage was hardly empty before the signal to lower rang out, and it plunged back into the depths as though it had been dropped. Before it reached the bottom a big black cloud of smoke rolled up the shaft, and then came a sheet of flame that licked round the dry timbers and set them blazing like so much match-wood.

"Now came the signal to hoist again, and remember that the engineer hadn't only to bring the cage to the top. He had to stop it being smashed against the sheaves the same as Mark smashed it the day he went wrong. Well, just as that signal rang, a lump of timber fell and knocked Tom, the engineer, senseless. A dozen of us jumped for the lever, but Old Mark was there first, and, as he gripped it, he straightened up and looked a good two inches taller for the moment. A sort of instinct made us fall back, and then another rush of flame sent us staggering out of the engine-house.

"For a good two minutes Old Mark stood there in the flame and smoke waiting for the cage to come up. That hand of his on the hot lever held a dozen men's lives in its grasp, and there was no trembling about it now. Over that shaft-mouth, now belching out fire and smoke in clouds, he stood like a graven image, watching for the cage to come up.

"At last it came rattling up to the surface, and as it touched the level Mark jammed the lever hard down and stopped her true to an inch. Then with a cheer we jumped in and began dragging the fainting men out of the burning engine-house. We had got twelve men out alive, though badly burnt, and then with a crash and a roar of flame and smoke the whole shebang caved in and buried poor Old Mark and two others under a couple of tons of blazing timbers.

"Three days afterwards we dug them out, and there was the old man's charred body lying by the engine, with the right hand still gripping the lever.

"The next day three thousand men walked bare-headed after Mark Haverley's coffin, and nary man cussed aloud for a good week after.

"Ah, well, gentlemen," said our guide, as he tossed the last thimbleful down, "Old Mark was a curious sort o' chap with his spectres and engine-ghosts, but there was good leather in the man for all that."

Old Gentleman: "It is folly to talk of marriage for years yet. My daughter is a mere child. She knows nothing about the world, and could not manage servants."

Mr. Slimpurse: "Oh! that needn't make the slightest difference. We shan't have any."

Philanthropist: "Why are you crying so, my child?'

Little Girl: "Please, sir, me mudder sent me wid sixpence fer to git bread wid, an' I lost it in that there dark alle way. I'll be licked terrible."

Philanthropist; "Well, well, my poor child; dry your tears. Here is a match. Perhaps you will be able to find it."

Digitized by Google

LOVE'S MADNESS

"Since you wish to know who I am," said Signor Cornelio, "let us go back, if not exactly to the deluge, at all events to the Norman invaders of Sicily.

"The expeditions of that race, you are aware, were noted for a certain violence and ferocity. Now my grandsire drew a genealogical tree proving my descent on the female side from a valiant knight and companion in arms of Robert Guiscard; and despite the mingling of Sicilian and Spanish blood with that of my ancestor, I remain a Norman; that is to say, restless, choleric and with a touch of the brigand.

"Without boasting, I may claim to have been the worst scholar in the college of Palermo. Rod and solitary confinement instead of taming, only irritated me the more. I lived like a pirate with masters and schoolmates, with one exception only, one pupil for whom I cherished a brotherly friendship.

"Pippino Castri was a gentle, yielding child, always the youngest and best boy in his class. His superior intelligence excited jealousy among his fellows, who gave him so many blows and used him so roughly that I commiserated his weak lot and took him under my protection, by which defence of the weak I redeemed somewhat my own bad conduct.

"College days ended, I was sent to the University of Catania, where I again met Pippino.

"Consistent with my past, I there fell out with the faculty, was insolent at examinations, and failed to obtain a degree, while my friend brilliantly completed his course.

"We returned together to Palermo; he a lawyer, and I professionless. But genuine Sicilian blood and Norman corsair instincts tingled in my veins, and I pitied my wise friend who sought to employ his talents in our island and keep close to shore like the barques that go to Cefalu.

"About that time a little Zingara on La Marina examined the palm of my hand and predicted that I should die dressed in all my clothes. Often recalling her prediction, I can declare that its non-fulfilment hitherto has been through no fault of mine.

"My father died when I was quite young, leaving me more than sufficient for the perpetration of many a madness; while my mother, re-marrying, let me shift for myself pretty much. To appease my vagabond cravings I planned a voyage to Malta and the African coast.

"Choosing three companions whose tastes were similar to my own and who would permit me to be their master, I hired a trading craft for a month, and with provisions, arms, and plenty of money, a high old time we had of it.

"After frolicking in Malta, Tripoli, and Tunis, one morning we landed on the island of Zerbi, without knowing where we were. In our efforts to make ourselves understood we wandered about till we came to a fountain where some damsels were drawing water.

"At sight of us the whole bevy of them fled. Hoping to hunt partridges or hares, we had brought our fowling pieces with us, and now I proposed to pursue a prettier kind of game.

"Away ran the maids up a steep path leading to their village on the hilltop; but one of them, less nimble than her mates, beholding us gain upon her, began to utter shrill cries, while the others spread the alarm through the village.

"A score of women presently came forth armed with pitchforks and staves, and vociferously threatened us; but one gun shot, sent twenty feet over their heads, completely routed them, so that we chased them into the very centre of the fig-tree planted in the village square, where, like a conqueror, I established my head-quarters for the time being.

"An old man, familiar with a few Italian words, was commissioned to parley with us; but I assumed so arrogant an air that he soon went off grumbling. Some young Arab men, being now come from the fields, produced their rifles and a volley from a housetop sent my hat off my head. For safety we were obliged to break into a house, where we held them at bay for a while.

"Finally, after peppering a couple of them with shot, we forced them to raise the siege and permit us to retreat to the beach to the vocal strains of the grand march in Verdi's opera of 'I Lombardi.'

Digitized by Google

"Unluckily, as our boat was pushing off from shore, a bullet from the hilltop struck me in the shoulder, and I returned to Palermo suffering greatly from the wound and uneasy as to the consequences of our escapade. Pippino Castri established himself at my pillow, lavish in his attentions and eloquent in his protests against my conduct.

"Reminding me of the Zingara's prophecy, he extorted from me a promise, easily obtained from a man weakened by bleedings and a diet of herb tea, that I would be wiser in future. Meanwhile, the Zerbi islanders made no fuss, deeming probably that no justice was to be obtained from dogs of Christians; and the adventure rather added lustre to my reputation.

"I spare you the recital of many subsequent follies. My fortune, under such sorry management as mine was, ere long required to recuperate; for one morning my overseer announced to me that, if I continued to draw from my coffer without reckoning, the day would soon come when I should be penniless. Determined to curtail my expenses, I sold my horses and carriage, and shouldering my gun, set forth to hunt in the mountains.

"Going afoot, living on what game I brought down, and roughing it in peasants' huts, I always slept well, because I was always thoroughly tired when night arrived. On my return to Palermo I had a chance to purchase a yacht at a moderate outlay, and presently became a mariner and fisherman of notable proficiency.

"Tunny, spada (swordfish) and lacerto (a kind of mackerel) had no more dangerous foe than I was. Absorbed in such occupations, I led an active and healthy life until a fatal meeting upset it all.

"It was in the spring of 18—. A merchant of Trapini, grown rich in the sulphur business, sold his mines to an English company and came to Palermo to enjoy his wealth. He had a handsome wife and one daughter, eighteen, or rather an angel of grace and loveliness. Her image is graven in lines of fire on my heart.

"Black as a raven's wing was her hair, her Niobe-like eyes were veiled by long lashes, her nose was delicate and straight, her mouth was set with pearl, and so gentle and sweet a face was hers that all other countenances seemed but masks in comparison.

"It was one Sunday in the Duomo that I first met the peerless maiden, with whom on the instant I fell in love. Her father, Don Massimo, was a good though somewhat avaricious man, whose wife's fondness for spending induced him to commit extravagances that his natural niggardliness did not warrant. Late arrivals in the capital, the family were eager to enter society, so that I easily obtained an introduction.

"Then I took the ladies out sailing in my yacht, and gained the good graces of the father by allowing myself to lose a few pieces at divers games of cards. And wisely did I act in presenting myself betimes; for as soon as the daughter was seen at the concerts in the public gardens, her beauty attracted attention and suitors came forward in great number.

"One evening in the walks of La Flora I seized the opportunity to say a few words about love. She listened with her head to one side, toying with a magnolia blossom. All at once she seemed to comprehend, and raising her large eyes, she gazed curiously at me.

"'Why, do you really love me, Signor Cornelio?' she inquired.

"Encouraged by the question, I frankly vowed my sentiments.

"'Oh, so much the better,' she exclaimed, with artless joy. 'It must be so amusing to be loved by a man like you. I hope at least that you are in earnest, and that you will not love only in words.'

"'Put me to the proof,' replied I. 'Must I conquer the entire island of Zerbi? Must I go to China? Must I descend amid the flames of a volcano? Command me, dispose of your slave, and never fear that I shall be daunted by any obstacle or any danger.'

"Such language, with its corsair-like tone, appeared to interest her.

"'No,' quoth she, smiling, 'you shall not descend into the flames of a volcano, unless I throw my handkerchief therein. We shall see how you divine and forestall my wishes. Do not conceal from yourself that others have expressed their love in choicer terms than you; but attentive deeds will touch me more deeply, and for them I shall give you credit. Among indications of a veritable passion there is only one that I dread and regard with horror—jealousy. Terrible examples are given of it. If you would inspire me with something gentler than fright, do not be jealous, Signor Cornelio. On this condition I may be able to love you some day.'

"'I will use every effort to comply therewith,' I replied, 'but if you do not mean to make a hopeless suitor of me you must grant me a fair place in your heart, so that my own may remain closed to jealousy. The preservative against this ugly evil is confidence. Promise me to be frank and loyal.'

"'I agree,' said Aurelia in a serious tone; 'there shall be no falsehood between us. As to the preference you desire, here, to begin with, is a little token. Were anyone to ask me for this flower, I should refuse to part with it; receive it as a pledge of friendship; but do not show it to anybody, for it has been seen in my hand.'

"I pressed the magnolia to my lips, and with precious carefulness placed it in my pocket.

"'Come, sir knight,' said the young lady, 'what are you going to achieve in my service?'

"'Anything that may please you,' I replied. 'My Norman ancestor and his comrade, Robert Guiscard, unhappily chased the Saracens from this land, or else I should propose to meet them in single combat.

"Here Don Massimo and his wife interrupted our conversation; but enough had been said to send me home burning with the first fever of love and hope.

"On the very next day Aurelia expressed in my hearing a desire for some Indian figs. This fruit, though abundant late in the summer, would not be in the Palermo market for a month yet. I set out for Noto, where the cactus is more forward than in this part of the island, and the dozen Indian figs that I triumphantly brought back with me were worth such smiles as I would not have surrendered for a treasure.

"Many an opportunity did I find to render Aurelia a service; but when I urged her to authorise me to demand her hand of her parents, she would answer in a scared way, 'Not yet.'

"One evening, amid a flutter of society's butterflies, Aurelia took extreme pleasure in listening to a description of the Monday balls at the Academy in Naples. The dandy who was engrossing my sweetheart's attention had noticed at one of those balls a parure composed of blue feathers at the base of the jay's wing. I conjectured that a fancy for a similar adornment was lurking in Aurelia's mind, and the caprice must be satisfied under penalty of forfeiting all the fruit of my past services.

"So I scoured the mountains in every direction, even the zone of Etna called La Nemorosa, and at the expiration of a month returned with a supply of blue jay plumage. I expected to be greeted as though I had snatched a duplicate of the Holy Tunic from the infidels but, alas! I was hardly thanked and my gift thrown into a corner.

Digitized by Google

"While I was off in the woods killing the poor birds, certain newcomers had been making themselves agreeable in the house of Don Massimo; among others I there met my old schoolmate, Pippino Castri. Although his Narcissus-like visage attracted the women, it never occurred to me that my dearest friend could become my rival, and to avoid such a danger I promised myself to make him the confidant of my love affairs.

"All Palermo, socially speaking, was just then preparing for the festival at Piana dei Greci—a religious ceremony according to the Greek ritual, to be followed by dancing and other amusements. The population of Piana, composed of Albanians, was to dress up in the national costume. Not until the night before the fête would Don Massimo, after much coaxing, consent to attend.

"Everybody present wished to make one of the party, and as all could not go in one carriage, I proposed hiring a hackney coach. But Don Massimo objected and said that the second-rate carriage should be harnessed up. In wealthy Palermiton households two conveyances are kept, one for display and for making calls; the other, old and faded, used at night, and drawn by sorry nags that one is not afraid to keep waiting at the doors of palaces and theatres. These vehicles are, generally speaking, antiquated berlins, and Don Massimo's, with its threadbare, velvet, broad body, and tarnished gilding, had in days of yore swayed beneath the weight of a cardinal or of some Spanish governor.

"As honorary coachman I was commissioned to drive the folks in this worthy vehicle. The elderly people took the calash, while the young members of the party piled into the old carriage.

"From my high driver's seat I could see them attack their luncheon with shouts and laughter; then they sung, and I recognised Aurelia's voice and a clapping of little hands when Pippino recited a rigmarole of rhymes.

"On reaching Piana, I remarked an unaccountable liveliness in the maiden's glances, and for the first time the serpent of jealousy stung my heart. Impatiently watching for an opportunity to get Aurelia by herself, I saw her at last drop behind the company on the way to the Greek church.

"When I approached her, she said eagerly: 'I must speak with you. You look for an explanation and you shall have it; for every minute's delay makes the matter worse. Arm yourself with courage, my good Cornelio, and remember I have not seriously engaged myself to you. After all the proofs of love received from you it is cruel, I confess; but it cannot be helped. Only now do I see clearly into my heart; I can never cherish any other sentiment for you than friendship.'

"'Why, what has happened?' I asked, trembling.

"'Simply this: I had many admirers in Trapini, who were exhaustless in praise of my beauty; they wearied me and I departed for Palermo with no regrets. While in this mood I heard of your expedition to Zerbi, and pleased with your audacity, I persuaded myself that a love expressed by deeds would amuse me far more than all the fine talk in the world. But my heart remained untouched, and now I have found out what power there is in language.

"'For there is language and language, my good Cornelio. One day when least expecting such a thing, while you were roaming over Etna, I received a sealed missive, containing, what do you suppose? A piece of verse of thirty-two stanzas all in praise of me, and all so pretty I could not tell which I preferred.

"'Ah, what think you of this new way of speaking? when was ever such speech addressed to a woman before?'

"'A hundred million times!' replied I wrathfully.

"'Spite leads you astray; I can understand and forgive you,' continued Aurelia; 'but how, tell me, could these thirty-two stanzas create such a dizziness of delight, so that at last I shut my eyes while a flaming sword seemed whirling before me? Nor must you imagine that I am called Aurelia—no, but Chloris. The poet knew that I should pierce the veil of mystery. But was ever woman called Chloris before when her name was Aurelia?'

"'Oh, often,' I answered. 'In France such fiddle-faddles are known as Chloris bouquets.'

"'Oh, then it would have been unpardonable in me,' cried Aurelia, 'if I had not pierced the veil. How ingenious though, in the gentle rhymer! Now, tell me in good faith, unless blind or crazy, could I do else than love him? So, my good Cornelio, you will, you see, act wisely in not thinking of me any more. Poetry, which I offended, has reasserted its rights.'

"'Well, I must say you are cool about it, you ungrateful, frivolous girl! Do you believe it will be an easy matter to forget you?'

"'Yes, to a generous, devoted heart such as yours! Besides, your sacrifice will mean the happiness of an amiable youth whose merits I have heard you extol.'

"'I will crush him,' I exclaimed, stamping my foot. 'I will crush the viper, that little traitor, Pippino.'

"'Alas! this is what I so dreaded, jealousy, vengeance! To crush his best friend! Oh, heart of bronze! And me, too, he will kill, no doubt. Ah, my good Cornelio, must one die for so light a fault?'

"Stifled by her sobs, Aurelia could say no more, and as I saw that a nervous attack was coming on, I took her hands and said: 'Be calm. I will kill no one.'

"Instantly her tears ceased to flow. 'Do you grant me life,' she asked, 'and Pippino also? Will you swear it?'

"'Yes.'

"'Oh, then I am happy!'

"'But I am not going to sacrifice myself to a young man's whim. I shall question Pippino, and woe be to him if he does not love you!'

"Before entering the church, I beckoned to Pippino to follow me. When he came near, he could not endure the look I gave him, and when I informed him how matters now stood between me and Aurelia, he exclaimed:

"'Ah, wretched me, what have I done! Why did you not confide in your friend, Cornelio? What shall we do?'

"Then, after a moment's silence, he added:

"'I am the one to suffer. I will go away from Sicily, and live in Naples, or rather die there; for if I give up Aurelia, my friend, I must die.'

"His unexpected resignation disarmed me.

"'Do not doubt, Pippino,' I replied, 'that I would let you go and die, were I the preferred lover; but the sad privilege of self-sacrifice belongs to me now.'

"My friend caught me round the neck, clasped me to his breast, and lavished the tenderest epithets on me, and when I had once more declared my renunciation, he ran off to be with the fair one, while I, regardless where I walked, made my way back to Palermo.

Digitized by Google

"I had thought I had courage to consummate the sacrifice, and had sincerely believed myself a hero; but soon jealousy clutched me by the throat, all my fine sentiments vanished, my friend became my rival again, Aurelia a perfidious wretch, and their happiness an unendurable outrage.

"Ominous pictures rose up before me; I imagined I had surprised the lovers in low murmured, intimate converse, I was preparing to stab them, when Aurelia's beauty unnerved me and I turned the blade against myself. That night I paced my chamber in delirious rage. Weariness and daylight calmed me somewhat, and I was about to throw myself on my bed and endeavour to fall asleep when Pippino entered.

"He stretched out his arms and called me his generous friend; but I abruptly interrupted him.

"'Keep your praises to yourself,' said I, 'they are out of place. I really cannot bring myself to renounce Aurelia. An end must be made of one or the other of us. Let us seek some means of meeting on an equal footing, for I would not take advantage of you.'

"Pippino had taken a few fencing lessons. I handed him a foil and bade him be on his guard; but he had not the strength to defend himself, and I dealt him three blows that he could not parry.

"In the handling of firearms I had even greater superiority. A duel was impossible. I bethought me of another expedient.

"Pippino being a good swimmer, I proposed that we should take a small boat, go outside the harbour, and capsize it in the offing, two miles from the shore.

"'Madman!' he ejaculated, 'if you heard me call in fainting tones for help, would you be so cruel as to let me perish? No, you would not. You would forget all about women, love and jealousy, and turn back to save the friend who loves you, and whom you aided and protected all through his childhood. Go to! A sanguinary and wicked combat is not what we require to end our difficulty; a nobler strife shall be ours, from which the vanquisher may come forth without remorse. If, as you say, it is true that you cannot give up Aurelia, then take her; I surrender her to you!'

"'Alas!' I returned, 'she does not love me.'

"'Well, will she love you any the more after you have killed me? If you must lose your sweetheart, at any rate keep your friend.'

"'Yes, I will keep him,' I cried, embracing Pippino; 'yes, I will preserve this friendship of childhood's days and it shall repay me for my sacrifice. Away with women and love! I brave them, I defy them, I anathematise them!

"'Get married, my dear boy! Wed the delightful, amicable, fickle creature whom Heaven has thrown in our way to tempt us to slay each other. The result of it all will be to render us sublime.

"'Aurelia is yours; and may I die at once if ever I again dispute your claim to her! I shall now look on her with a brow of marble and a breast of brass; for this heart of mine is at least master of itself, strong as a lion's and great as Cæsar's.'

"San Cornelia, my patron saint, is my witness that I spoke thus with the best faith in the world: while the praises, tears, and grateful expressions of my friend confirmed me in my magnanimous resolution, corroborated by vows which would render a reversion to my previous way of thinking impossible unless I chose to be a pitiful turncoat.

"Still, although self-denial is a very grand virtue, it is difficult for a man of my stamp to practise.

"After Pippino's departure, Aurelia's father paid me a visit, to reproach me for deserting his party on the previous evening. He, Don Massimo, had occupied my seat on the return, but had not proved so satisfactory a coachman as I. The ladies having taken a fancy to such country rides, a trip to Santa Flavia had been arranged for the following day, and they depended on me to drive the team—this was the command and prayer of Aurelia.

"Profoundly convinced of the change in my feelings, I deemed that no harm could result from an acceptance of the invitation. A stoic's slumbers were mine that night, and I awoke next morning well satisfied with myself, never suspecting that the pleasure of seeing Aurelia once more had aught to do with my good humour.

"At eight o'clock I went to Don Massimo's, where I found the whole party in readiness to start. Aurelia welcomed me with smiles, and held out her hand, which I pressed with emotion.

"The calash dashed on ahead, and I whipped up the horses of the old carriage. At Santa Flavia Don Massimo produced a card of admission to the villa of the Marquis Artale, where the concierge permitted us, unwatched, to wander at will through the gardens.

"Merrily the day glided by, and I felt a freedom of mind that gave me the loftiest opinion of my courage. We were to dine on our return to Palermo; but, as a concession to appetite, we had brought a lunch with us, and while discussing it Don Massimo unluckily offered me some Marsala wine from his own vineyard. I drank three-quarters of a bottle, and at once felt my reason take flight as utterly as though a magician had corked it within a phial.

"A jealous man's madness is like a tiger's; but if to it you add the intoxication of wine, you will transform yourself into a brute like Nebuchadnezzar, nor is there any extravagance or even crime whereof a corsair-like nature such as mine is not capable.

"When I beheld Aurelia approach her lover and whisper in his ear, a frenzy took possession of my brain, and I ran like a raving lunatic across the flower beds, and, opening my knife, threw it from a great distance at the trees, with that sureness of aim which never deserts a Sicilian.

"I cannot say what other signs of dementia I manifested in that terrible outburst of passion. I had lost all consciousness of where I was when I heard voices calling to me from afar. Day was declining, and the party were waiting for me in order to return to Palermo.

Digitized by Google

"What remains to be told does me little credit, but the lash of shame will perhaps serve me in lieu of penance.

"Pippino and Aurelia got into the old carriage together. The route practicable for carriages and hewn into the rock, wound down the steep hill from the Marquis Artale's residence. Don Massimo's coachman carefully held in the calash horses and descended at a moderate speed, beholding in dismay my usually pacific team dash ahead of him at a gallop.

"Thinking of the pleasure of the lovers sitting together in that antiquated affair, I felt my dizziness increase.

"A fury seemed to fly through the air with arms extended over my head, suggesting to me the infernal though of overturning the vehicle.

"Arrived at a perilous curve, well known to me, I drove so near to the edge of the road that one of the wheels was in the air. Away went the carriage, down twenty feet of embankment; I felt the wind caused by the momentum of the fall; I heard something like a thunderclap echo through my brain, and then all was a blank!

"When I regained consciousness I was listening to the trickle of a little stream. It was the blood flowing from my arm into a basin. I was at home in my bed, with a hole in my temple and a broken collarbone. The surgeon, seeing me unclose my eyes, felt relieved and assured of my recovery; but what suffering I was compelled to endure

"For three months I lay on my back, motionless as a statue on a tomb, and bound fast as if in a vice by some twenty-five yards of bandages.

"Ixion on his wheel could not have experienced greater torture.

"There is a god for the lovers, but none for the jealous.

"Pippino and Aurelia had clasped each other in their fall, and thus the catastrophe procured them the sweetness of a tender embrace; while nobody was hurt except me.

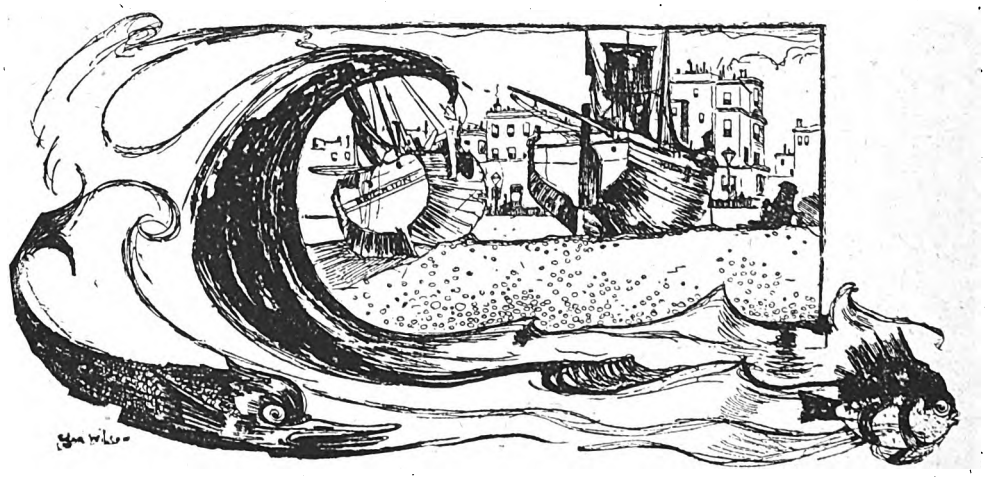
"Nothing sooner cures one of love's madness or jealousy than a cavity in one's skull and a fractured clavicle. Before I was convalescent, my friend and Aurelia were betrothed, and my first venture out of doors took me, limping, to the church of Santa Zita, in order to witness, with neither rancour or grief, the wedding of Pippino and Aurelia.

"Shortly thereafter Pippino had to practise in the law court at Messina, and took his bride along with him. Don Massimo, also, left Palermo not long afterwards, and went to live with his daughter.

"As for me, since that woeful adventure, I have endeavoured to be philosophical, and I do my best to live and amuse myself. Having discovered the danger of loving one woman, I now deem it wiser to love all womankind!"

Five years later Signor Cornelio, having hurried off to Messina to take part in the insurrection and bombardment that occurred at that time, with gun on shoulder and at the head of the detachment of troops of which he had been placed in command, was killed by the explosion of a shell; and thus the Zingara's prediction came true at last.

J. P. L.



Digitized by Google

Football Players Competition!

OPEN TO EVERYBODY. £10 IN PRIZES. OPEN TO EVERYBODY.

Below will be found ten sets of words, each of which indicates the name of some well-known football player.

For example, "A young goose" signifies, of course, Gosling.

PIN ALL YOUR SHEETS TOGETHER AT THE TOP LEFT-HAND CORNER, PLACE THEM IN AN ENVELOPE MARKED "PLAYERS," AND POST TO REACH THIS OFFICE BY MONDAY, OCTOBER 10th.

To the person who succeeds in solving the greatest number we will give

A CRISP £5 NOTE.

TO THE NEXT, £2; TO THE NEXT, £2; AND TO THE NEXT, £1;

while consolation prizes will be awarded to the extent of twenty handsome volumes which competitors may select for themselves from the catalogue of books issued by this firm. In the event a tie, the prize will go to the sender of the neatest set of solutions.

If you are weak in the names of football players, your brother, or cousin, or male friend will give you a helping hand.

SHORT STORIES "FOOTBALL PLAYERS" COUPON No. 5.

41.	A room for cooking.	41. .....
42.	A sore.	42. .....
43.	Conceited pedal extremity.	43. .....
44.	Plead.	44. .....
45.	An ancient warrior.	45. .....
46.	A fish.	46. .....
47.	A drink.	47. .....
48.	A greater quantity of ground.	48. .....
49.	You.	49. .....
50.	Unpaid.	50. .....

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

What Might Have Been.

A SKETCH FROM LIFE.

This adventure happened to me last year. I had just taken my seat in a corner of an empty compartment in the train, and had closed the door, with the hope of remaining alone, when it was suddenly reopened, and I heard a voice say:

"Be careful, sir, the step is very high."

Another voice replied: "Don't be afraid, Lawrence, I will hold tight."

Then a head appeared covered with a round hat, and two hands, grasping each side of the door, slowly hoisted a large body whose feet made a noise on the step like that of a cane striking the ground. When the man had drawn his body into the compartment, I noticed the painted ends of two wooden legs.

A head appeared behind this traveller, and I heard its owner ask:

"Are you comfortable, sir?"

"Yes, my boy."

"Then here are your bundles and your crutches."

And a servant, who had the air of an old soldier, got in, bearing in his arms a lot of packages done up in black and-yellow paper, carefully tied, and placed them one after the other in the network rack above his masters head. Then he said:

"There, sir, that is all. There are five bundles; the sweetmeats, the doll, the drum, the gun and the patés de foie gras."

"That's all right, my boy."

"A pleasant journey, sir."

"Thank you, Lawrence."

The servant stepped down, closed the door and went away, while I observed my neighbour. He was perhaps thirty-five years old, although his hair was nearly white. He was decorated, wore a moustache, and had that pursy obesity of strong and vigorous men whom an infirmity obliges to remain inactive. He wiped his brow, puffed, and looking me straight in the face, said:

"Does smoking disturb you, sir?"

"Not at all," I replied.

I knew that eye, voice and face; but where and when had I seen them? I had certainly met this man, spoken to him and shaken his hand. It was long, long ago, lost in that haze where the mind seems to obscurely seek and pursue its souvenirs, like fleeting phantoms, without being able to grasp them.

My fellow traveller now began to examine me with the tenacity and fixity of a man who recollects slightly. Tired by this steady contact, our eyes turned away; then, after a few seconds, attracted by the obscure but persistent action of the memory, they again met, and I remarked:

"Really, instead of looking at each other stealthily for an hour, would it not be better to try and recall where we have met?"

"You are quite right," replied my neighbour, with good grace.

"My name is Henry Bonclair," I added.

He hesitated for a few seconds: then, with a vagueness of eye and voice which generally accompanies great tension of mind, he said:

"Ah, yes! I met you at the Poncels, before the Egyptian war, a dozen years ago."

"Exactly. Ah! Ah! you are Lieutenant Somers?"

"Yes; I was even Captain Somers until the day when I lost my feet—both of them at a single stroke from a passing shell."

We looked at each other anew, now that we were acquainted.

I remembered perfectly well having seen this man when he was a fine-looking, slender fellow, who led the cotillons with a nimble and graceful enthusiasm. But behind this figure there still floated something that I could not grasp—some story that I had known and forgotten—one of those stories to which one lends short attention, and which leave only an imperceptible impression on the mind. There was love in it. I recalled the peculiar sensation from the depths of my memory but nothing more.

Little by little, however, the shadows cleared away, and the face of a young girl rose before my eyes. Then her name, Miss Mandal, flashed upon my mind Now I remembered everything. It was in fact a love-story, but an ordinary one. This young girl loved this young man when I met them, and people spoke of their coming marriage.

I raised my eyes to the rack where all those bundles were trembling with the motion of the train, and the servant's voice returned to me as though he had just finished speaking. He had said:

"There sir, that is all. There are five bundles; the sweetmeats, the doll, the drum, the gun and the patés de foie gras."

In a second a romance was composed and unrolled in my mind. It resembled all the romances which one so often reads, in which the young man or the young woman marries his or her choice after overcoming all obstacles. So this officer, mutilated during the war, had again found after the campaign the young girl who was pledged to him, and keeping her engagement, she had married him.

Digitized by Google

I considered that to be beautiful but simple, just as we judge to be simple all the heroic actions in books and at the theatre. When we read or listen at these schools of magnanimity, we always feel that we should have sacrificed ourselves with an enthusiastic pleasure and a magnificent impulse. But we are always in a bad humour on the following day when a wretched friend comes to borrow money.

Suddenly, another supposition, less poetic and more realistic, replaced the first one. Perhaps the officer had been married before the war, before this frightful accident that had cut off his feet, and his wife had been obliged, grieved and resigned, to receive, care for, console and sustain this husband who had started off strong and handsome, but now returned, after having lost his feet, a frightful wreck, condemned to inactivity, impotent anger and fatal obesity.

Was he happy, or wretched? I was seized with an irresistible desire to know his history, or at least the principal points of it, which would permit me to divine what he could not or would not tell me.

I talked with him while thinking at the same time. We had exchanged a few commonplace remarks, and as I raised my eyes to the rack, I thought to myself: "So he has three children; the sweetmeats are for his wife, the doll for his little girl, the drum and gun for his sons, and the patés de foie gras for himself."

Suddenly I asked him: "You are a father?"

"No," he replied.

I felt confused, as though I had committed an impropriety and continued:

"I beg your pardon. I thought you were, on hearing your servant speak of playthings. We often hear without listening, and draw conclusions, in spite of ourselves."

He smiled and murmured: "No, I am not even married. I stopped at the preliminaries."

I pretended to remember all at once. "Ah, that's true; you were engaged when I knew you—to Miss Mandal, I believe?"

"Yes, sir, your memory is excellent."

I was excessively audacious, and added: "I also have a vague idea of having heard that Miss Mandal married Mr.—Mr.——"

"Mr. Johnson," he interrupted, in a calm tone.

"Yes, that's it. I remember, even, to have heard about your wound."

I looked at him intently, and he blushed. His full, puffy face, already purple from the constant afflux of blood, became still more highly coloured. He replied with the animation and sudden ardour of a man who pleads a case lost in advance in his mind and heart, but who wishes to win it before public opinion:

"People are wrong in coupling Mrs. Johnson's name with mine. When I returned from Egypt—without my feet, alas!—I could never have accepted her offer to become my wife. Was such a thing possible? When a woman marries it is not to make a parade of generosity; it is to live every day, every hour, every minute and every second by the side of a man; and if he is deformed, as I am, she condemns herself, in marrying him, to suffering that will last unto death. Oh, I understand and admire all the sacrifices and devotion when they have a limit; but I do not admit that a woman should renounce an existence which she hopes will prove happy, and abandon all her joys and dreams for the sake of satisfying the admiration of the gallery. Do you believe that a man can induce a woman to tolerate what he himself cannot bear? And, besides, do you think that my wooden feet are attractive?"

Captain Somers became silent. What could I say to him? I felt he was right. Could I blame her, scorn her, or even admit that she was wrong? No. However, the dénouement, which conformed to the rule, to the average, to truth and probability, did not satisfy my poetic appetite. These heroic stumps called for a noble sacrifice that was wanting, and I experienced a profound disappointment.

"Has Mrs. Johnson any children?" I asked him suddenly.

"Yes; a daughter and two sons. These toys are for them. She and her husband have been very kind to me."

The train shortly after entered King's Cross. I was about to offer my arm to help the mutilated officer to alight, when two hands were stretched towards him through the open door.

"Good afternoon, Captain."

"Ah! good afternoon, Johnson."

Behind the man was a woman smiling radiantly and throwing her "good afternoon" with her gloved fingers. A little girl by her side jumped with joy, and two youngsters looked with eager eyes at the drum and gun that their father was taking down from the rack.

When the disabled man was upon the platform, all the children kissed him. Then the crowd started off, the little girl holding in her hand the varnished support of the crutch, as she would have been able to hold, in walking at his side, the thumb of her big friend.

G. H. W.

If a girl knows she is pretty it is not because any other girl told her so.

Teacher: "Mary? And what is your last name?"

Young Woman: "I can't tell just yet, but the chances are that it will be Smith."

Fair Visitor: "How can you tell an optimist from a pessimist?"

The Artist: "The one says: 'That's good,' and the other: 'That's not bad'!"

Bank Teller: "This cheque, madam, isn't filled in."

Madam: "Isn't what?"

Bank Teller: "It has your husband's name signed to it, but it does not state how much money you want."

Madam: "Oh, is that all? Well, I'll take all there is."

"Papa," said Johnny, to his paternal ancestor, "did you know that some insects could be decapitated without being hurt in the least by the operation?"

Papa: "No, Johnny, I did not know anything of the kind, and you needn't spring any such yarns on me."

Johnny: "There's no yarn about it, papa. I've often seen bee-headed insects flying about"

"Is it possible, sir," said the visitor, as he looked at a specimen in the museum of the Scientific Association, "that this is a petrification?"

"Yes, sir," replied the custodian, with pardonable pride, "that is a genuine petrified ham."

"Is it for sale?" demanded the visitor excitedly. "If it is, I want it. I don't care a bit what it costs?"

(You have guessed correctly. He was the proprietor of a railway refreshment bar.)

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

TIME 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

France and Germany declare war against Great Britain.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

An inventor secures an audience with the Prince of Wales and demonstrates to him the utility of a new weapon, with the result that steps are immediately taken to manufacture an enormous number of them.

The Hornet, a torpedo boat, commanded by Rodney, blows up the Suez Canal. Paris is in a state of fermentation owing to the repulse of the Allied fleet.

Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour's fleet gains a decisive victory over the Allies off the Rock of Gibraltar.

A representative of the New York World interviews Lord Salisbury on a matter that is not yet made public.

The British organise two expeditions, one to invade France, and one to invade Germany. The first army corps appears off Havre, and after a short bombardment which lasts till nightfall, the fleet withdraws, the troopships move northwards, and the soldiers are landed at a point opposite Bléville.

The French are routed and the British enter the city.

On receiving news of Lord Roberts' successes in France, Sir Evelyn Wood sets sail with his expedition for Germany. A small but powerful fleet under Sir Nowell Salmon engages the attention of the enemy at the mouth of the Kiel Canal. Meanwhile, the main body of troops arrive with a large escort in sight of Stralsund. A brigade of cavalry under Colonel Lockhart attacks and captures the town from the rear. The next morning 200,000 Englishmen lay encamped on German soil.

The United States meanwhile remains neutral, but contemplates the ultimate annexation of Canada. The merchants of New York purchase £40,000,000 worth of the newly-created stock. Admiral Mahan commands the United States Fleet to maintain the security of her merchantmen.

The British win the battle of Les Rois d'Yvetot; the allies fall back on Russian aid, and their leaders set out by special train to interview the Tsar.

CHAPTER XIX. (continued).

CAPRIVI was silent for a moment or two and then remarked with emphasis:

"You are right in the main. We should have crushed England at once. We forgot that every Englishman is a soldier by instinct and by inheritance. Give Britain a moment to breathe in and the earth swarms with her armies, the seas teem with her fleets."

"Still, there is a limit," interposed Dumpf sagaciously.

"A limit!" laughed Hanotaux. "Annihilate one army and there are two in its place."

"True!" quietly put in Caprivi. "You will remember that it was the raw levies of Surrey that won the day at Waterloo!"

The two Frenchmen turned pale with anger at the remark, and the German General interposed quickly:

"Let there be no quarrelling," he said. "We are friends and allies now, and the task before us is not an easy one. We must, for our own credit, do everything to prevent the necessity of calling out the Reserves. That would be an ignominy not to be endured. Russia has given her word; she will now give her armies. It may cost us something; but there is no looking back. England must be crushed now, or for ever dominate the earth."

The four ambassadors were treated with grave ceremony at Petersburg. The phlegmatic Russians, never eager to welcome a defeated ally, regarded them with a coldness which the French statesmen observed with much misgiving. There were no rapturous crowds to acclaim them, only a few casual bystanders gathered on the corners of the streets to gaze curiously into the carriage. The Russian capital was indifference itself.

The audience given at the Royal Palace was one of the strangest in history. Three of the most powerful nations in the world were meeting in conference, and their one object was the destruction of the great people who had taught each the art of government.

They met in the Tsar's private study. It was an impressive spectacle.

The young Tsar, filled with a sense of the divine right of monarchy, possessed of the madness of autocracy which blindly believed in the inspiration of its mission, received the French and German legatees with a chill, imperial dignity.

On his right sat General Gourko, the only statesman admitted into the imperial confidence. The Tsar's impetuous, often arrogant temper was balanced by the shrewd, calculating genius of a diplomat who had no illusions, and weighed his men as the analyst weighs the ingredients of a poison.

With infinite skill and sagacity M. Hanotaux unfolded the designs of the united powers and sought to show the necessity for Russia's intervention.

Digitized by Google

"We have the enemy in our grasp," he argued. "There are two British armies landed upon the Continent. One of them is hemmed in a few hundred miles from Paris. The other is hopelessly inclosed in the defences of Stralsund. We are millions to their thousands. Our victory is a matter of days. But——"

"But you come to Petersburg!" drily interposed Gourko.

"We come, it is true, but why? Your Majesty, the position is simple. We can defeat the enemy. But that is not enough. If England is to be crushed, she must be crushed at once, and not only on our shores, but on her own. Every day makes shorter the distance that separates her from her colonies. These Saxons have the brute instinct of the family. Give them a month and we shall have the Canadian, the African, the Australian, and the Indian fighting side by side in Europe. If it were only needed to beat England, it is done. What can half a million avail against seven millions? But much more is needed. England must be overwhelmed, invaded, blotted out, and that at once. We must be in London in a fortnight. Otherwise we shall not be fighting a country but a whole hemisphere!"

The Tsar turned full on the speaker.

"Are your millions not enough for this?" he asked.

"What?" exclaimed the Tsar.

"Your Majesty," answered Count Caprivi, "it is, you are aware, dangerous at all times to call up the whole fighting strength of a nation; but under such conditions, after—well let me frankly say it, after failure which should have been success, it might be disastrous. A nation roused to action is a terrible force that may strike we know not where!"

"Your meaning is clear," said the Tsar with a certain proud scorn. "Your democracy, it appears, knows how to dance and play, but it clearly is still a child. You, M. Hanotaux, are afraid of this great infant you have called to life. He plays in his nursery now with rattles and nine-pins; but at times it is crowns and portfolios and even heads that he plays with. And you, Count, are afraid to arm your loyal burghers for fear that gunpowder will teach them the secret of freedom."

"No, sire," replied Caprivi with dignity. "We are prepared to do our part as Heaven may will. But is it fair that the burden should fall upon two nations who have no less to gain than you? Russia will not decline the responsibility which her profit demands from her."

"What?" exclaimed the Tsar, suddenly rising, and hot with passion. "Do you deem that Russia stands in aid of Europe to secure whatever her heart is set on? What are France and Germany to the splendid empire which is mine, an empire unmeasurable and irresistible, filling the two continents with its acres, sending forth its tendrils to every country, and slowly and silently absorbing the earth? France plays with her toy constitutions, sets up her sham ministries day after day, calls herself republic or monarchy as the whim seizes her, aye, and sends ridiculous trinkets to Sandy Hook, monuments of Europe's folly to America's madness. And Germany? She whines and pules for land like a fretful invalid, with a ruler who pipes and paints and chatters and stalks, as if kingship were a huckstering, a mere jack-of-all-trades. Russia is the sole, the great representative of the one lasting idea that the world can never forget—the idea of imperial sway, of autocracy, of divine rulership. She stands aside and apart from all nations. She needs them not. Some day they shall become part of her. The hour of the Slav is upon you; you feel it even now and stand abashed. Talk not to me of Russia's fear of Britain or of the world itself."

Gourko, who had listened gravely and with respect, here quickly interposed.

"Russia has no need of alliances," he said. "But if you ask for help, she is not therefore deaf."

"General," exclaimed de Visne, "you will remember that you are committed. Your hand is set to the league of Europe."

"In part," replied the General. "We are inactive. If we interpose and rescue you from your unfortunate position what compensation do you propose?"

"Compensation!" cried Caprivi. "You have already India!"

"We have India as fee for inactivity."

"But it is the biggest prize of all!"

"And well earned, surely. Had we moved there might have been no need of a storming of Stralsund. If we are to send our armies and our ships we shall need some other price."

"And that is——"

"Gentlemen," said Gourko impressively, "we claim Turkey and Asia Minor."

The four delegates looked at one another in hopeless astonishment. Russia, grasping in all she did, had outwitted them. Already the brunt of the war and all its horrors had fallen upon France and Germany. And now Russia demanded the two most coveted territories that earth still held out to tempt a nation's vanity.

There was a hurried consultation. The Tsar and Gourko sat apart, cold, impassive, inflexible. The game was theirs. They knew too well the pitiful dilemma of the suppliants to their favour. When M. Hanotaux sullenly announced acquiescence in the monstrous terms proposed, barely a smile broke the rigid calmness of Gourko's impenetrable face.

"And what would you have us do?" he asked.

Count Caprivi urged the necessity of breaking up the English navy.

"Destroy the fleet at Stralsund," he said, "and we shall have crippled her strongest arm and caught the English army in a snare. Both Stralsund and Havre demand relief. Break through the blockade, sink the enemies' ships' and we are free to decimate the land forces and make unopposed for British territory."

M. Hanotaux agreed with this advice.

Gourko whispered in his Sovereign's ear. The Tsar nodded assent and the General observed:

"That may be well as a matter for your own relief. But we have a larger duty before us. We must cripple England. What avail the fleets at Stralsund and Havre? They are impotent to do further harm. You can cut to pieces without difficulty the rash, adventurous men who have landed on your shores."

"Pardon me," interposed Hanotaux, "the destruction of the English navy is the first consideration. Leave that alone and no matter what is done we have not yet begun."

"His Majesty thinks otherwise," coldly replied Gourko. "He is of opinion that our best course is to invade England now that she is unguarded and destitute of her men. Let us seize the island and the fleet can be decimated by degrees. You will never advance a step in the war till you have set foot upon British soil."

The envoys were not of his opinion; but after some deliberation the crafty Gourko had wrung from them an admission that his plan was the wiser.

For an hour the General and the envoys deliberated over the details of this new and terrible movement in the war, and then, with gracious condescension, the Tsar dismissed his visitors.

When they had left the apartment, General Gourko smiled grimly.

"And these are their statesmen!" he exclaimed.

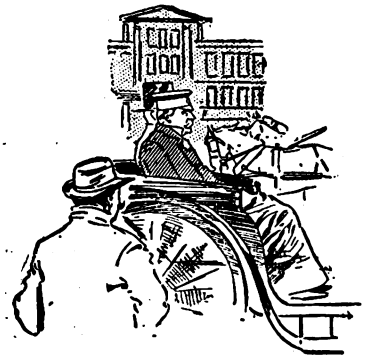
"General," was the Tsar's reply, "Heaven fights for Holy Russia. Her future expands, resistless. This war is but as an instrument for her omnipotence."

"The way is clear," said Gourko. "With your permission,

Digitized by Google

sire, I will see that a message of sympathy is telegraphed to London. It is essential that there should be no suspicion of the part we shall so soon be playing."

The Tsar turned upon his general a scornful glance.



The envoys drove back to their hotel.

"General Gourko," he said imperiously. "We are not hucksters. Russia has no need of lies. It is humiliating enough if she needs to keep back the truth; to speak the lie is unworthy of her ruler and of one whom her ruler trusts."

Gourko smiled at this rebuke, retired, and sent the telegram.

The envoys drove back to their hotel half mollified, half jubilant. Caprivi, more than his companions, was moody and silent.

As the carriage was turning into the courtyard, an oath suddenly escaped him, and the others, looking upon him, saw his face dark with rage.

"Dupes!" he cried. "Dupes! Fools that we are. I see it plainly enough!"

"What do you mean?" cried Hanotaux.

"What do I mean? Do you not see? We asked the Tsar to destroy the English fleet. Any fool can see it is our one hope of safety. And instead he insists upon slipping by and landing on English soil."

"Well?"

"Is it so inscrutable, this perfidious purpose? They can do nothing if they land; England's citizens are still there. Can a few ships hope to master an Imperial island? No: they know full well that the move is only a blind."

"For what?" demanded de Visne.

"Gourko wants to alarm England by threatening her shores. He hopes thereby to force her to send for her Indian army. That arm of hers, the strongest military arm in the world, once on the high seas, and Russia can march across the boundary and take possession of India!"

"And we——?"

"Bah! We, indeed! Russia does not care a rap for us. She leaves us to invasion, to sieges, to blockade, to all the burden of the war. She is simply looking out for herself. She will seize her own booty and leave us to pay the bill!"

CHAPTER XX.

The German Emperor.

Sir Evelyn Wood had successfully accomplished the difficult task committed to him.

A powerful English army had landed at Stralsund, and now occupied one of the strongest positions upon the sea-coast of Germany.

It was true the English General had only 200,000 men, against whom were ranged the entire military forces of Germany. Although for the present the huge army of the "Fatherland" was variously engaged, part of it being occupied in northern France and part still waiting with impatience upon the shores of the Mediterranean at Marseilles till their imprisoned transports might be able to get past the steel fence at Gibraltar and carry them to the agreeable task of dealing a blow at Great Britain herself, there was yet available for immediate purposes a large and well-trained force, which, in point of numbers, seemed likely to overwhelm the brave captors of Stralsund.

Before twelve hours had elapsed nearly 400,000 men, gathered from the Capital, from Dantzic, from the Kiel Canal, and from the various military depots of the North, had made their way by rail to Grimmen, a town not twenty-five miles distant from Stralsund, and there prepared to crush the adventurous foe either by a decisive onslaught or by the painful agony of a determined siege.

One enormous advantage Sir Evelyn Wood possessed. The position he occupied was such as a general might have prayed for.

Behind him lay the marsh-bound city with its invulnerable sea walls. In the land-locked channel beyond rode the splendid fleet that had so superbly silenced the guns of Rugen.

Three lines of railway ran out from his base. That to his right ran beneath the Schleswig-Holstein Peninsula towards Lübeck and Hamburg; that to his left to Stettin; whilst due south a third made direct to the German capital.

Stationed at the convergence of these three railways, it was clear that the General could throw out his army in large and distinct masses for a considerable distance, and yet keep in rapid commnication with every section.

Whilst Sir Evelyn was inspecting the outlying district in the direct front, having for its centre the line to Berlin, he pointed out to those members of his staff nearest to him the natural advantages of his position.

"Whatever the odds against us," he observed, "we should be invulnerable."

"So long as we stay here, sir," assented one of his officers.

"Do not look forward to an excursion into Germany yet awhile," responded the General with a grim smile. "Our duty is clear. We must cling to Stralsund with desperation. With 200,000 men not even Napoleon, with Wellington as chief of the staff, could march into a hostile country teeming with gigantic armies. No; we cannot afford to indulge in the mere vain glory of fanatical heroism. Our men have need of self-restraint as well as courage here."

"Then you intend to keep at Stralsund?"

"Yes. In two days or less we shall be surrounded by an immense army, through which it will be impossible to cut our way. But luckily we have a strong position. I will establish my lines on those low hills, which are, I should calculate, about four miles away. With this spacious plain as my base, with three miles of railways, with a strong fortress at my back, it will not be difficult to remain here as long as our stores last."

"And thus keep the Germans engaged?"

"Exactly," responded the General. "It is our part to hold stoutly to Stralsund and keep at us one or more of the German Army Corps. We shall thus prevent a massing of the two nations in France, and Lord Robert's task will be so much the lighter. Don't be afraid that there will be no fighting. We shall have to be troublesome, but we must not hazard a fixed engagement. We must wait in patience till we can go forward."

The officer looked at his general in surprise.

"Wait?" he asked. "For what?"

"Wait," was the laconic reply, "till Canada and South Africa and Australia come swimming down the Baltic."

And with these words he turned his horse's head and rode back to his quarters. Within a very few hours the first rough entrenchment of the English army was perfected. Soldier and sailor, working side by side, with cheerful song and unfailing jest, accomplished miracles. Stralsund was once more herself, and her guns gleamed more cruelly than ever over the blue water.

Four miles distant from the outskirts of the town ran a low ridge of hills. Through deep cuttings the three railways burrowed their way east, south, and west, opening a passage to all Germany. Where these cuttings lay, Sir Evelyn Wood took up his main positions, throwing up earthworks which hourly became more formidable, and whence the British guns swept for miles the whole of the shelterless plain that spread to the south. In the delta formed by this line of forts and the town of Stralsund the army lay encamped, sheltered by the sloping hills no less than by the guns.

Digitized by Google

Of ammunition and supplies there was abundance. Hour after hour the ships gave up their wealth of stores, and it was quite clear that Sir Evelyn would be able, with ease, to maintain himself and his army in position for at least a month or six weeks.

It was not long before the strength of his defence was afforded an opportunity for proof.

On the day after the landing of the British, the German Army Corps assembled at Grimmen, was already overwhelming in its strength, and a determined effort was made by the Germans to drive home a reconnaissance in force.

At first the General in command thought to pierce through the British lines by the mere vehemence of his assault. A desperate attack was made upon their position, but the plan was folly itself. The English guns swept down the advancing foe with fearful precision, and the plain lay littered with the dead before the assailants could deal a single effective blow.

Twice was this wild course followed, with only repeated havoc and butchery. It became clear to the German General that it was a case of investment and not of isolated attack.

He next sought to tempt the English to a sortie, and on one occasion, after a bitter and apparently well-meant assault along the whole line of front open to him, he withdrew his right wing so rapidly as to give the idea of a precipitate flight.

Sir Evelyn Wood smiled.

"We will give them all they will care for in the way of attack," he observed, "but we will choose our own time and method."

Thus for three days the British lay at Stralsund, secure yet unable to move, whilst intermittent fighting and occasional assault filled up the burden of the hours.

Throwing up earthworks.

It was then that the German Emperor realised that he himself was needed. The sacred Fatherland was soiled by the print of a hostile foot, and yet no visible earthquake had occurred. Only the print became larger and larger, and its toe threatened to stretch to his own Palace under the lindens.

He had good cause to be mortified. No sooner had the false intelligence of the landing of the invaders on the English coast reached him, than with impetuous enthusiasm he sent the following telegram:

To General Von Bremen, Worthing. Your success is only what your Emperor expected. You shall name your reward when you enter London.

Next day the telegram was returned to him, as the continental cables had not been destroyed. The postmaster at Worthing was not without his sense of humour. His endorsement was:

Returned, address not known, neither of him or any other German general. Try English Channel.

This was not pleasant, but the German Emperor was not to be easily dispirited. He felt that the hour had come when he should prove himself the saviour of his country, and he laid aside with reluctance the composition of an epic and the music of a comic opera on which he was engaged.

He was closeted with Herr Pimpelnick, a poet of some renown, when the news of the capture of Stralsund arrived.

The poet handed him a few verses, which the Emperor had given him to correct. They flamed with patriotism.

William looked at the paper with some perplexity.

"It does not seem quite the same," he declared.

"Your Majesty," replied Pimpelnick. "I have merely ventured to alter one or two expressions."

"But the rhymes?"

"Yes, sire; I made a few changes in the metre, and gave just a touch or two to the scansion. One or two lines you will see I have left out, and I have added——"

"Impertinent!" exclaimed the Emperor. "Have you dared to tamper with your sovereign's poetry?"

"Pardon, sire," stammered the trembling Pimpelnick; "but by the laws of prosody——"

"Laws of prosody!" fiercely interrupted the Emperor, "Do you think that the Emperor William is bound by laws as other men? I make laws, not follow them."

He might have done many unpleasant things to the poor poet had not his Chamberlain created a diversion by bringing the disastrous news of Stralsund.

William was courageous enough, but his sense of proportion was distinctly weak.

His first act was to order 4,500,000 copies of his last patriotic song to be printed and distributed to his soldiers.

He also ordered that it should be sung with regularity each day. And sung it might have been, only that no tune could be found or devised to fit the eccentric vagaries of the words.

Next he issued a proclamation to his people in magniloquent language, in which the whole pomp and sublimity of the Teutonic tongue displayed itself.

"My people," it began, "your Emperor at last calls upon your patriotism. Your devotion to him and your respect for the God of your religion alike bid you go forth to battle for your native land. It will be some consolation to you to feel that you are not only fighting for your country, for your household hearths, for your children, and for yourselves, but that you are also fighting for your Emperor. He will be watchful and untiring, and his presence shall cheer and his wisdom direct his subjects in their holy quarrel.

"England has dared to invade our Fatherland. She alone is responsible for the terrible crime of a murderous war.

"She has incited the nations to revolt by her selfishness and the cold heartlessness of her pusillanimous prosperity. Every colony she has planted in the savage world has been a blow at peace.

"And now she throws off the mask. She resents the punishment the nations would inflict upon her for her insolence, and dares to set foot upon our beloved soil.

"But she has reckoned without the German Emperor and the German people. Let us go forth to eject the impious foe.

"Your Emperor's voice calls upon you. The supreme hour of Germany's great destiny has come."

This proclamation was read with much interest by the good people of Germany.

The general feeling was to laugh at the English army corps which had managed to slip into Stralsund. It was caught neatly in a trap. But a few days were needed, and the foe could be outnumbered ten to one.

And yet there was not lacking an undercurrent of revolt. The liberal spirit, so often crushed and maimed by the new Imperialism, looked with fear and loathing on this unholy conspiracy against the one nation which stood before the world as a champion of freedom. There came, too, the conviction that another triumph of militarism would be the last fatal blow to the hopes of German liberty. Let the united powers trample upon Great Britain and Imperialism would become a despotism, unveiled and unassailable.

Beneath the loyal shout that rang through the columns of a handcuffed Press there was, therefore, an ominous muttering.

Digitized by Google

For four days the English guns had snarled down from the slopes round Stralsund on the German army, and twice had a definite onset of the enemy been turned to rout and confusion, when the Emperor reached the seat of war.

William looked at the paper with some perplexity.

He immediately sent for General Von Bremen, who was in command—a Von Bremen of a somewhat more chastened spirit and a milder demeanour since his return in a battered ship from the fight at Worthing—and informed him that the direction of affairs would in future be his—William's.

"I will inspect the position at once," he said. "On my return I will meet the General officers. See that they are assembled in two hours' time."

"At headquarters, sire?" asked the General.

"No. I observed a school house on my way here. Let them assemble there."

So saying he rode away.

The prospect was not encouraging. The English lines lay round Stralsund in the form of a huge semi-circle. On either side the morass pushed out its deadly slime. A chain of batteries which swept the whole field of action presented an inseparable barrier.

The German army was arranged in three divisions. Each was over 100,000 strong, and was possessed of ample artillery. But the position they occupied was most unfortunate. The low ground that spread its monotonous plain towards New Brandenburg afforded no point of vantage for a blockade. William saw that following the tactics of a siege they might remain there for ever, so long as the English fleet held the Baltic and threw supplies into the town of Stralsund.

He rode thoughtfully back, without a word to his escort, and reaching the school-room dismounted and entered.

There was something ludicrous in the spectacle that greeted his eye—had he but realised it. On forms and benches where little Deutscher boys were wont to grapple with the intricacies of the German language, sat old and grizzled veterans, officers who had spent a stormy apprenticeship in the great war of 1871, generals of experience and long-proved skill.

But the Emperor was not a man of humour. He did not even blush when he stood in front of the little group and said abruptly:

"Generals, I have had you assembled here that you might learn my conclusions upon the problem that is set before you. I propose to give you a brief lecture upon the science of attack. I shall be glad if you will make notes of the more important points I shall raise."

So saying, he picked up a piece of chalk and began to draw—somewhat rudely—upon the blackboard a representation of the disposition of the forces.

The generals listened respectfully. The Emperor waxed warm. It was a peculiarity of his discourse that "what was true was not new, and what was new was not true." He elaborated his scheme. His generals, it is true, had learnt it from the French Campaign, they had learnt it from Napoleon the Great, they had even seen it discussed in books, pamphlets, and in the Berlin War Gazette. But they said nothing of this.

They only looked impressed, astonished, convinced.

"Thus you will see, Generals," the Emperor was continuing, "that the most certain line of attack is to hurl your strength full upon the enemy's centre. You will lose many men, the loss may be disastrous. But you will find that the tactic is certain of success in the end. Divide the foe into two parts without inter-communication, decimate his centre, and——"

At this moment he was interrupted by the arrival of a messenger, breathless and excited.

The Emperor turned angrily upon him.

"Your Majesty," exclaimed the new-comer, "the enemy have made a sortie. They have advanced upon us and are now in full attack."

"Where are they attacking?" the Emperor eagerly asked.

"They are attacking our centre, Sire!" was the response, and the dead silence of the group as it was gazing upon the hieroglyphics on the blackboard changed to sudden excitement.

The lecture was not brought to a close in the schoolroom. There was, instead, a complete and more convincing demonstration outside!

CHAPTER XXI.

The German Emperor Gets a Lesson.

The day had dawned cold and grey, and a faint mist, heavy with the fetid air of the surrounding marshes, enveloped the plain of Stralsund.

Both armies lay concealed in its treacherous embrace, and the English outposts, doubly alert, sought anxiously to catch the ominous sounds which might betoken the enemy's advance. But the guns on either side were silent, and there prevailed that horrible stillness which, pregnant with catastrophe and destruction, broods over a brief pause in the stress of battle.

Admiral Fitzroy and Sir Evelyn Wood had spent the forenoon in close discussion of the situation.

"I fear," said the General gravely, "that I ought not to accept your proposal that the fleet should remain in the harbour of Stralsund. It is, of course, for you to decide, but you will doubtless be of much more assistance to the English forces elsewhere."

"Candidly," replied the Admiral, "I do not care to leave you here. Our situation generally is, I know, full of the most terrible difficulties, and we have to violate almost every law of military science. But still, the fleet gone, you are alone, penned in an awkward country by an army that is practically inexhaustible. What can you do? How can you hope to break through? With us behind you, there is a certain path of escape; but if we go, you are not only menaced by decimation in front, you have also the danger of a hostile fleet entering the roads and turning its guns upon you."

Sir Evelyn shook his head:

"My own duty, Fitzroy, is, it seems to me, clear. I hope you will see it from the same point of view. There is not, and cannot be, escape for my army."

"No escape?"

"No. We must either hold our ground or be destroyed. It is not a case where we can talk of retreat. If we hold out we gain time. We may do considerable havoc. We at least keep a huge army corps from mischief elsewhere. But how can we retreat? Retreat can only mean that we throw up the game: it means England invaded. Do not forget that we have got to a desperate issue. We cannot indulge now in the luxury of territorial manœuvres. The fate of England must be settled here and now. If we are to be crushed, let it be on German soil. We will at least die fighting. But we must, whatever happens, remain. I shall cling to Stralsund till my last man is shot. There is nothing else to be done."

"If you are determined," replied the Admiral reluctantly, "I will say no more. It is a terrible case where a sailor has to turn calmly out to sea whilst the soldier is fighting for his life. I don't like it, and it goes against the grain."

Digitized by Google

"Fitzroy," said the General earnestly, "this war will see many changes, and God knows what the end will be. But we will at least not think of ourselves, only of old England. You do not know how she may need you. You cannot tell what new enemies will spring up to attack her. You cannot know what peril she may be in now. Let us part, old fellow. You know I shall do my best here. I'm not going to throw up the game without making the enemy pay more dearly for it than they care. We can only die for the old land, anyhow. And here I shall stay with all the pluck and pride of England to help me. If we win, we shall meet again. If not—well, I don't know that you or I or any one here—no, not the least amongst my men, will care a jot to keep on living. You know what I mean, Fitzroy. It is a true case of death or glory."

The Admiral pressed the General's hand.

"After all, you are right," he said. "I guess there's a task like yours for me somewhere, and I hope so. It will be some consolation to be in the thick of it."

A faint smile passed over the grave face of Sir Evelyn.

"We won't talk too much of dying," he said. "My army here is a pretty tough problem for the enemy, after all. Don't be astonished if the day of miracles returns. Two hundred thousand Englishmen! My dear Fitzroy, there's victory in the very phrase!"

And the two men, passing swiftly into matters of detail, concluded their arrangements. Two days later Admiral Fitzroy was to steam out to sea and make for the English Channel. A cruiser alone would remain in the harbour for purposes of communication.

And General Wood, with the sea at his back and countless foes in front, alone in a hostile country, cut off on all sides from deliverance, was to make his stand—a long, stubborn, desperate stand, and defy the united armies of the German Empire.

When the Admiral left him the General gave a few brief orders to his staff, and then entered the train—consisting of the engine and a single carriage—which stood on the Berlin railway, and was kept in readiness night and day for rapid journeys to the advance lines.

There was a curious expression upon his face, one that betokened both anxiety and elation.

The fact was that he had resolved upon an audacious move which the enemy least expected. Sir Evelyn Wood knew his Livy, and had not studied the strategic subtleties of Fabius in vain.

He realised that the strongest defence he could make was one judiciously blended with attack. He could not hope to put to rout the enormous army before him, but he could at least attempt to undermine its moral strength.

To give repeated blows to the enemy, to rush out when opportunity favoured, and sting them where they showed weakness, and always to retire as soon as he had made them smart, giving them no opportunity for leisure battle, was a policy which he knew would do more to make his position secure than the most desperate resistance upon his own lines. It was his intention to break down the confidence of the foe, to create a sense of uneasiness, and to goad them into rash retaliation. Sir Evelyn Wood was a master of tactics, and knew the galling power of swift, destructive sorties followed by brilliant retreats.

During the morning many picked regiments had been drafted from the three wings of the British Army into a magnificent division, which now rested on the seaward slopes of the centre of the line of fortifications. They formed a Reconnaissance Corps which, for experience pluck, and discipline, could undoubtedly not be equalled outside the English ranks.

Conspicuous amongst these favoured troops were the 2nd Life Guards, commanded by the Earl of Dundonald, the 1st Dragoons, under Lieutenant-Colonel Tomkinson, the Seaforth Highlanders, the Royal Irish Regiment, and the 2nd Battalion of the Buffs. The Reconnaissance Corps, was commanded by that brilliant officer, Lieutenant-General Keith Fraser, who had relinquished his position as Inspector-General of Cavalry for service in the field.

Cavalry and infantry were supported by six batteries of Horse gunners. Thoroughly equipped in every department, the corps was eminently suited to the dangerous task before it. A smart attack, swift manœuvring, a rapid and effective blow, and a hurried and orderly retreat—this programme was one which troops, trained to the last degree of perfection, and to whom concerted action had become an instinct, were likely to carry out with the utmost success.

With hearts beating high, and envied by every other soldier in the army, the Reconnaissance Corps moved down the outer slope through the faint mist and made rapidly over the plain. This human projectile, hurled when least expected, was falling upon the centre of the German army at the very moment when the young Emperor was lecturing his generals upon the art of attack and upon the specific virtue of the Napoleonic method.

The Admiral pressed the General's hand.

In all, there were not less than 3,000 sabres, and 18,000 infantry, a body large enough for inflicting a severe blow, and yet not too unwieldly for the purposes of rapid movement and a speedy retreat.

Barely had the alarm been raised, and the unsuspecting army apprised of this new danger, than a severe fire from all arms of the British forces poured into the German centre and with a dash the corps was upon them.

A slight disorder appeared in the enemy's ranks. It had not occurred to the commander to anticipate an attack. He regarded the Englishmen as so much quarry, held fast in a difficult position, waiting—it might be for a day or two—to be quietly annihilated.

Before therefore the enemy had time to reply, or to put themselves in a position to receive the onset of the English soldiers, a destructive fire had committed enormous damage, and Teuton complacency had a first and severe experience of the quality of the Saxon mettle.

In a few moments, however, the Germans had recovered themselves, and prepared to give a terrible response to the attentions of the gallant English corps. A heavy fire was opened from the batteries; but owing to the mist which still prevailed, and to the extended character of the English lines, the damage done was little, and much wild firing resulted in a waste of ammunition rather than in any effective injury.

General Fraser handled his men with consummate skill. A rapid change of front confused the German gunners, who had to guess as far as possible the position of the attacking forces.

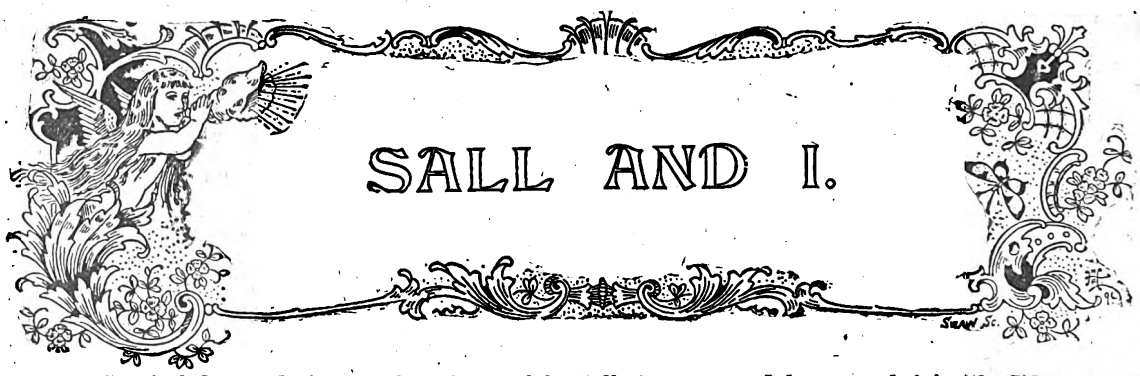
With all the ingenuity of scientific calculation, the British Commander directed his fire upon the huge target that lay at his mercy and never halted a moment to await the reply which might be made.

In a brief time the English infantry came into close conflict with the advanced troops of the enemy. There was a shout of triumph as, with merciless aim and unwavering force, the Seaforth threw themselves upon the startled 2nd Berlin regiment, and, after a brief moment of indecision, hurled it back upon the main body.

It was at this instant that the Emperor William arrived at the front, enraged at the suddenness of the blow which had caught him napping, and excited beyond measure by the fierceness of the onslaught.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



SALL AND I.

One day Sall fooled me; she heated the poker awful hot, then asked me to stir the fire. I seized hold of it mighty quick to oblige her, and dropped it quicker to oblige myself.

Well, after the poker scrape, me and Sall only got on middlin' well for some time, till I made up my mind to pop the question, for I loved her harder every day, and I had an idea she loved me, or had a sneaking kindness for me. But how to do the thing up nice and proper that perplexed me orful.

I bought some love books, and read how the fellers git down on their knees and talk like poets, and how the girls would gently fall in love with them. But somehow or other, that way didn't exactly suit my idea. I asked mother how she and dad courted, but she said it had been so long she had forgotten all about it. Uncle Joe said mother did all the courting.

At last I made up my mind to go ahead and chance it, for this thing was fairly consumin' my mind; so I goes over to her dad's, and when I got there I sat like a stupid, thinkin' how to begin.

Sall seed something was troubling me, so she said, says she:

"Are you ill, Peter?"

She said this very soft-like.

"Yes! No!" sez I. "That is, I ain't quite well. I thought I'd come over to-night," sez I.

I thought that was a good beginnin'; so I tried agin.

"Sall," sez I, and by this time I felt a bit nervous and a little shaky about the knees, "Sall," sez I.

"What?" sez she.

"Sall," sez I agin.

"What?" sez she.

"I'll get to it after a while at this rate," thinks I.

"Peter," sez she, "there's suthin' troublin' you; it's very wrong for you to keep it from a body, for an inward sorrer is a consumin' fire."

She said this, she did, the sly minx. She knowed what was the matter all the time very well, and was only tryin' to fish it out; but I was so far gone I couldn't see the point. At last I gulped down the big lump risin' in my throat, and I sez, sez I:

"Sall, do you love anybody?"

"Well," sez she, "there's dad and mother," and a countin' of her fingers all the time, with her eyes half shut like a feller shootin' off a gun, "and there's old Fido (that were their old dog) and I can't think of anybody else just now," sez she.

Now this was orful for a feller ded in love; so, after a time, I tried another way. Sez I:

"Sall," sez I, "I'm orful lonely at home, and sometimes think if I only had a nice, pretty wife to luv and talk to, move, and have my bein' with, I'd be a very happy feller."

No notice.

"Sall, do you know any gal as would care for me?"

With that she begins, and names over all the gals for five miles round, and never once came nigh naming of herself, and sed I oughter git one of them. This got my back up, so I hitched my chair up close to her, and shut my eyes and sed:

"Sall, you are the very gal I've been hankering after for a long time. I luv you from the sole of your head to the crown of your foot, and I don't care who nos it, and if you say so, we'll be jined together in the holy bonds of hemlock!" sez I; and then I felt as if I'd throwed a ton weight off my back, I felt so relieved.

With that she gave a little scream, and then she, sed sez she:

"Peter!"

"What, Sally?" sez I.

"Yes!" sez she, a hidin' of her face behind her hands.

You can guess how I felt.

"Hooray!" sez I. "I must holler, Sall, or I shall bust. Hooray! hooray! May I jump over the table?"

With that I sat down by her and clinched the bargain with a kiss.

Talk about your blackberry jam! Talk about your strawberries and cream! You wouldn't a got me nigh 'em—they would all a'been sour after that! Oh, these gals! how good and bad, how high and low they make a feller feel! If Sall's dad hadn't sung out 'twas time all honest folks was a-bed, I'd a sat there two hours longer!

You ought to 'a' seed me when I got home! I pulled dad out of bed and hugged him. I hugged mother, I hugged Aunt Jane, I larfed and hollered, I crowed like a rooster, I danced round there, and I cut up more capers than you ever heerd tell on, till dad thought I was crazy, and got a rope to tie me with.

"Dad," sez I, "I am goin' to be married!"

"Married!" bawled dad.

"Married!" squalled mother.

"Married!" screamed Aunt Jane.

"Yes, married," sez I; "married all over, married for sure, married like a flash, joined in wedlock, spliced for worser or better, for life and for death—to Sall. I am! Me! Peter Samson, Esquire!"

With that I ups and tells 'em all about it, from A to Z. They was all extra well pleased, and I went to bed as proud as a young rooster with his first spurs.

G. Bennett.

Digitized by Google

RAPID METHOD OF BANISHING
SUPERABUNDANT FAT.

Extraordinary Success in the Treatment of Obesity.

INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT FOR CURING CORPULENCE.

The process of curing any physical disorder is so generally the converse of "delightful" that the use of this and similar terms in reference to Mr. F. C. Russell's now popular treatment for corpulency naturally attracts special attention. These terms are to be found in a large number of letters included in the just issued 18th edition of Mr. Russell's little volume of 256 pages, "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.) These communications are from persons of both sexes, and it is apparent that their number is represented by thousands annually, who have found in this system of treatment a safe, rapid, and permanent cure for excessive fatness. This testimony forms in the aggregate, indeed, a wonderful record of the rapid reduction of excessive adipose tissue, and those who have personal reasons for being interested in the subject should send to the above address three penny stamps for a copy (post-free) of Mr. Russell's notably suggestive book. "I think the treatment most delightful," writes one out of a large number of equally enthusiastic correspondents. And the expressions "Admirable tonic," "Splendid stuff," "A delicious beverage mixed with mineral waters," are of constant recurrence in this singularly interesting correspondence. The details given by many of the writers of these letters as to the results of the treatment fully justify the use of such eulogistic phrases. It must certainly be delightful to experience the sensation of losing unnecessary and dangerous fat by pounds per week, and frequently by stones per month, and that by the aid of treatment which simultaneously increases the appetite and renders its reasonable indulgence innocuous. The experience, too, must be rendered still more delightful by the knowledge, which may be gained from a perusal of Mr. Russell's book, that his preparation is a pure vegetable product, without any admixture of the mineral poisons which are too frequently administered. With a candour which also is delightful, Mr. Russell prints in his book the recipe for the preparation.

The following are extracts from other journals:

SOME GOOD NEWS FOR FAT PEOPLE.

Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an undoubted success and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring recorder. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information we may say that on sending threepence in stamps, a book entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of medical and other journals (British and Foreign) and other interesting particulars, including the "recipe," can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Belfast News Letter.

VICTIMS TO OBESITY.

This is a question which has occupied the attention of medical authorities from time immemorial. Some argue that the lean kind take longer to shuffle off the mortal coil than their stout brethren. The statistics naturally favour this argument, and no doubt are correct to a great extent, because sufferers from obesity are more susceptible to disease in consequence of the debilitated state of the system when clogged with abnormal adipose tissue; but a curious fact has been overlooked, viz., that corpulence generally commences about the age of thirty-five to fifty, after which time it seems to decrease; therefore, before the proverbial "three score and ten" is reached, the whilom fat man is, by a natural process, again reduced to what may only be called moderate plumpness, and thus cheats the statistician. Stout persons can now, thanks to science, reduce their weight in a most extraordinary rapid manner, without the slightest injury to their constitutions, or without resorting to those drastic remedies which only operate for a time, or by the continuance of the use of toxical drugs extending over such a period that renders it baneful to the long-suffering patient. An eminent Continental therapeutist recommends the victim to obesity to eat fat meat, while an equally eminent American prescribes lean ditto, and the stomach is to risk an accumulation of serious disorders by swallowing a pint of hot water daily, a most nauseous remedy we should think, and not unattended with danger. The past master in the cure of corpulence is Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., whose book (256 pages), entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure," price only three penny stamps, seems to impress us considerably, for he reduces more weight by his system than the Continental and American physicians, without any of the absurd restrictions which would make life scarcely worth living. He uses simple herbs, the properties of which he seems to possess a more than usual knowledge of, and he makes but little secret of his method, so refreshing after the mystery made of most chemical and herbal concoctions for various complaints.—Wetherby News.

Digitized by Google

CONSULTATIONS FREE.

You will observe that we have commenced a remarkable offer of fifty sovereigns to be distributed amongst the readers of Short Stories every week. We select fifty names and addresses from the various London and provincial directories and other sources, write them on fifty envelopes, put one sovereign in each envelope, and lock the whole up in the editorial safe. All the persons named who apply will have the money sent to them. Applications must be made on post-cards, and no money will be sent unless applied for. In view of the fact that the names are chosen promiscuously, it may so happen that some of those selected are of people who do not read Short Stories—your neighbour, for example, or your dressmaker or milkman. It would be doing them a good turn, therefore, if you suggested their applying to this office. If it should so happen they receive a sovereign, they will thank you. But don't omit to apply yourself at the same time.

T. G.—In some parts of Sweden women often work as farm labourers. If a woman has an infant she carries it in a leather bag on her back, after the manner of the Indian squaw, and is thus enabled to work with both hands.

Investors.—On an average, about two-fifths of the companies promoted yearly in England come to grief.

W. S.—Musket-balls were used as current coin in New England from 1638 to 1652. They were valued at one farthing, and were legal tender up to one shilling.

Cholly wants to know how to manage a silk hat when it has got a wetting. ——Leave the hat until partly dry without touching it, then wrap a towel carefully round it to absorb the dampness, moving the towel a little with the lay of the silk. When nearly dry, rub with a hot cloth until perfectly smooth and glossy.

Gallus.—There is a lake of blood-red water in the Grison Alps, between the places called Bruggershorn and Wolfsboden. The colour of the water is due to the presence of millions of vegetable infusoria. That portion of the Alps where the lake is situated is very seldom visited by tourists.

Max.—The figure of Britannia stamped on all our bronze coins owes its origin to the Romans, who cast it on medals to signalise their conquest over Britain. The figure is represented sitting on an island in order to show the nature of Great Britain, and her warlike accoutrements show the warlike spirit of her inhabitants. The lighthouse and ship are both modern innovations.

S. P.—A Roman camp, a Saxon temple and three cathedrals have in turn occupied the site of St. Paul's. The present cathedral was built from a tax on seaborne coal.

H. V.—The period known as the "Middle Ages" is not a fixed period, but varies in different countries. It may be said to cover 1,000 years, from the fifth to the fifteenth century. It may be roughly said to extend from the transfer of Imperial power from Rome to Constantinople in 476 to the beginning of the Reformation in 1520.

Reader.—The word "preface" used in the beginning of books was originally a word of welcome to a meal, and was equivalent to "Much good may it do you."

Ex.—The first formal and written treaty made by England with a foreign nation was that entered into by Henry III. with the Dauphin of France in 1217. The Dauphin was then in England and was leagued with the Barons.

Jack Tar.—The most dangerous part of the British coast is that which lies between Flamborough Head and the North Foreland. This includes both the Thames and the Humber. The next most dangerous coast line is that between Anglesea and the Mull of Cantire.

E. L. D.—The term "El Dorado" was not originally used to designate any particular place; it signifies "the gilded" or "the golden," and was variously applied. According to some authorities, it was used to designate a religious ceremony of the natives, who covered the anointed body with gold dust. On that account the whole of Guiana was at one time known by the name "El Dorado."

Clock.—The so-called "Dutch" clocks were "made in Germany," the centre of the trade being the village of Freyburg. They were exported to all parts of Europe under the name of "Dutch clocks." In his play of Love's Labour Lost Shakespeare discourses thus: "A woman that is like a German clock, still a-repairing; ever out of frame, and never going aright." There is evidence to show that Shakespeare was a 'cute business man, and he appears to have known a thing or two about clocks. Whether his comparison was right I am unable to say, not being personally acquainted with the lady referred to.

A. L. G.—The title of "Lord" Mayor of London was first conferred in 1354 upon Thomas Legge. There had been sixty Mayors of London before the more imposing title was conferred.

M. A.—The brown-red colour in the wooden shoes or sabots of the French and Belgian peasantry is produced by exposing them to the smoke of burning wood.

C. B.—Try a mixture of oil and graphite for preventing screws from becoming fixed; it will also protect them against rust for years. This mixture facilitates tightening up, is a good lubricant, and reduces the friction of the screw.

Toe.—Square-toed boots were the fashion in the time of Queen Mary. The width of the toes of men's boots became at length so great that a proclamation was issued, limiting the the width to six inches.

W. W. asks: "Why do glow worms shine?"——It is difficult to say for certain, for there are many reasons put forward. It is only the female who emits the phosphorescent light, and some people think it is for the purpose of attracting the attention of the males. Another theory is that glow worms shine in order to save themselves from capture by birds which feed upon insects, for the flesh of the glow worm not being particularly palatable, the light helps their would-be captors to recognise them, and so leave them alone. Other people think that the glow is to enable the little creature to see its way in the dark, while again others declare that it is an attraction for the bringing of other small animals within the range of the worm.

Flor.—The modern British florin was first coined in 1849, but florins are of ancient date. The first English florin was issued by Edward III.; its value was 6s. The piece derives its name Florence, where it was first coined. The two-shilling pieces coined in 1849 were called in owing to the fact that the letters F. D. (Defender of the Faith) were omitted from the Queen's title.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 11th, if intended for the Issue on sale Oct. 25th, and dated Oct. 29th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

£60

TO BE GIVEN AWAY,

Among those taking part in the following

Free Cash Prize Competition

NO ENTRANCE FEE WHATEVER.

1st Prize £25. 2nd Prize £20.
3rd Prize £10. 4th Prize £5.

The above money prizes will be given away as an advertisement amongst the competitors who can rearrange the following twenty-four letters to represent the names of four well-known trades, selected by us.

TUBREHCKAREBROCEGRPARDER.

Send in your solution at once, and we will inform you if correct, and give you full details of the Competition with conditions and date of closing. If you cannot solve all four do as many as you can, as there are four prizes to compete for. No Solution can be received after October 17th, 1896.—Address: "COMPETITION" MANAGER, 117A SEVEN SISTERS ROAD, LONDON N.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Ild. Guide (230 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists' Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

---

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

MASON'S The Only Painless Corn Cure.

Never known to Fail. KILLCORN

Sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., Price 1/- per bottle, or post free from the Proprietor, 3 Guildford St., Leeds.

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £5, £3 OR £00 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

Send 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Miss HEYWOOD, 77 Hinchill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 6lb. to 11st."

Mr. OANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; thankyou returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

Countess G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.—Really Genuine, in patent air-tight tins. ½lb., 10d.; 1lb. 1/4, 1½lb. 2/4 including tin and postage. Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE, for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

Tincture of Halberis

DOSE: Five to Ten Drops in half a wineglassful of water.

A Specific Remedy for Biliousness, Liver Inaction, Heartburn, Indigestion, Acid Risings, Constipation, Headache, &c., &c. Prices: 1/1, 1/10, 2/8 and 4/9, post free.

GILBERT & HALL,
Homœopathic Chemists,
Bournemouth and Boscombe.

PUT YOUR FINGER ON A GOOD THING AND USE

NUCOLINE

A PURE VEGETABLE BUITER.
For Baked and Boiled Pastry, Frying, &c.
A Perfect Cooking Butter.
Nutritive, Digestive, Economical.
Five Prize Medals Awarded.
Stocked by all London Stores, &c.

A Sample Tin sent post free for 3 stamps.
Write—
LODERS & NUCOLINE Ltd.,
SILVERTOWN, LONDON, E.

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

LYLE'S COLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED. PUREST & BEST.

IT IS NOT

Reckitt's PARIS BLUE

UNLESS RECKITT'S NAME IS ON THE WRAPPER.

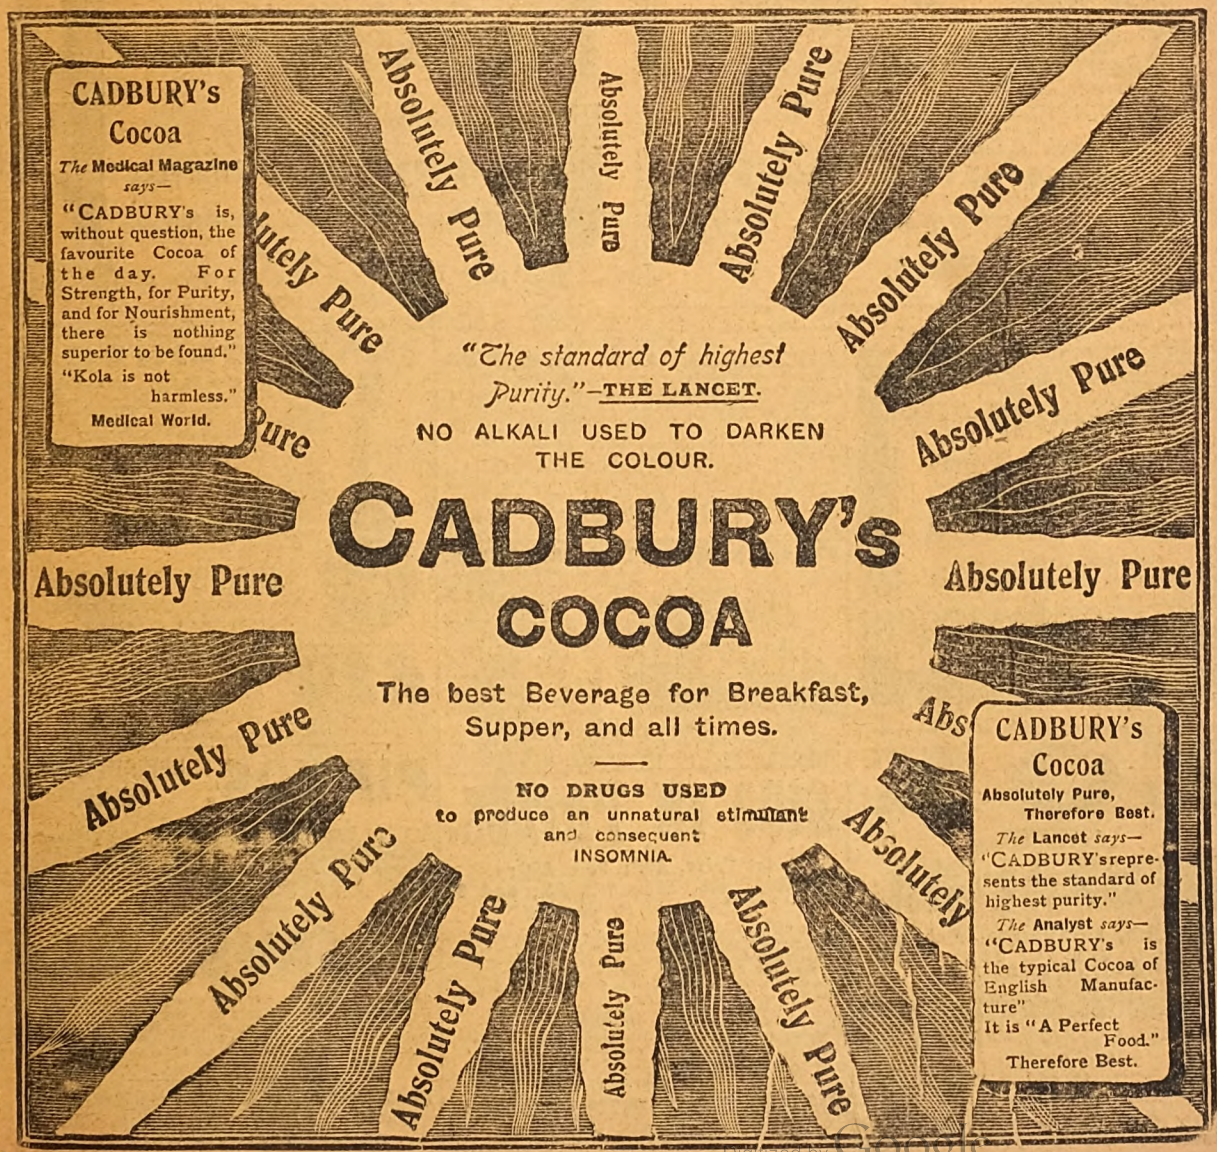
Digitized by Google

50 SOVEREIGNS OFFERED EVERY WEEK TO READERS AND NON-READERS.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 511. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 15TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.



Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 0d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

The READIEST WRITER

. . THE . .

"RELIANCE" Fountain Pen,

Fitted with 14-carat Gold Nib (Iridium Tipped), Fine, Medium, or Broad Points.

Double Feed, Handsome Chased Vulcanite Holder.

THIS PEN WILL LAST FOR YEARS

EVERY PEN GUARANTEED.

WILL NOT GET OUT OF ORDER.

Sold at 10/6.

We send this pen, complete in box, with filler and directions, post free for 5/-

WONDERFUL VALUE.

THE RELIANCE PEN CO. LIMITED,
26 IVY LANE,
PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Reduced Facsimile

REMEMBER, a 10/6 FOUNTAIN PEN for 5/-

Agents Wanted.

Reduced Facsimile

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 1½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

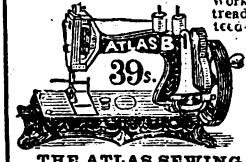
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

MANDOLINES.

FINE ITALIAN MODELS, 13 Red Maple Ribs, 7s. 6d.; Brown and White Ribs, 10s. 6d.; GENUINE ITALIAN, with 15 Maple Ribs, 15s. 6d.; ditto, 17 Rosewood Ribs, 17s.; 19 Rosewood Ribs, Pearl Inlaid, 24s.; ditto, superior, Closed Machine, 30s. Magnificent Do Meglio Model, Rosewood, 50s.; ditto, superior, 63s. Genuine De Meglio, finest-toned instrument made, £5 15s. For cases, strings and pick, see list post free. All with machine heads and bent sound boards. Crate and carr. free.

JOSEPH RILEY'S,

ON CONSTITUTION HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See 11d. Guide (239 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £30 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 Hatton Garden, E.C.

£100 IN PRIZES.

1st Prize, £25; 2nd, £20; 3rd, £15; 4th, £10; 5th, £5; and 25 Prizes of £1 each.

CASH PRIZES, as above, will be given away as an advertisement for PRAIRIE POWDERS, the unequalled pleasant and harmless remedy for Headache, Neuralgia, Nervousness, Rheumatism, and Tic, among competitors who succeed in turning into the names of five common ailments the following letters:

ACHEHEDA, GANRLEUAI, ESNUOVSRENS, HEMSATIMUR, ITC.

Post your solution, together with a Stamped Addressed Envelope, for result, to

THE PRAIRIE POWDER CO.,

Dept. 40, 19 Borough, London, S.E.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 511. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending October 15th, 1898.

THOSE WHO FOUGHT AT OMDURMAN.

No. 3.—Bugler of the 12th Soudanese.

THE SHAWL WITH THE TORN CORNER.

THE evening express was swinging along the Great Northern line, carrying its usual quota of sleepy passengers and valuable luggage.

Suddenly there was a queer rocking kind of motion; a lurch, a flying of gravel against the windows, a horrible grinding of wheels, and a sudden halt, which effectually awoke the passengers and scattered the luggage promiscuously.

"Fire-box of the engine has dropped," called out the guard, in the same careless tone in which he announced the last station; but he condescended to add, reassuringly:

"No danger, ladies—only a delay of a few minutes."

Of course, all the gentlemen—with womanly-curiosity—flocked out to inspect the damage, while we ladies gave long sighs of relief at escaping what might have been a serious accident, and began talking as if the incident had introduced us.

We were only three in number; a motherly old lady, a young married woman, and myself—a girl whose girlhood was almost in the past tense; for I had past from my teens into the twenties, and was the last unmarried member of a wealthy county family.

Like a spoilt child whose chief delight is to run off to the neighbours, my greatest enjoyment lay in travelling hither and thither, with or without pretext, just as fancy willed; this time it was a letter from a friend, inviting me to visit her and help her plan her wedding-trousseau, which had proved the all-powerful magnet.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Though scarcely half-way to my destination, I had already planned trousseaux enough to supply all the society brides of that season; but now—who can continue the same train of thought when once grossly interrupted?

The old lady was too flighty and talkative to suit me, but the younger one was very pleasant, and we chatted like old friends.

Before the accident she had been deeply engrossed in a novel, and seeing her finger its pages caressingly, I was wise enough to plead sleepiness and excuse myself for a nap.

"Oh," she exclaimed, "that jacket does not make a good pillow, let me lend you a shawl!"

And with several dexterous movements she adjusted it beneath my head, smiling sweetly, and went back to her book.

Instead of sleeping, as a well-regulated young lady should, I stared about, or idly twisted the fringe of the shawl.

A scent of wild roses came from its soft folds, and I quietly smiled my approval of the owner's taste, for the wild rose was my choice of all perfumes, and I had used it since a mere girl.

I lifted my head to readjust the shawl, and how familiar it seemed—soft and grey, with long knotted fringe, just like one I had had many years.

I nestled down again, and fell into a train of reminiscences; how my great-aunt had brought it over the sea, how it had saved my life in a storm, and how our pet dog used to play with the fringe. Yes, and one day he got angry and bit a piece off the corner!

Involuntary I turned the shawl over, and there—wonder of wonders!—one corner was torn in precisely the same way. Could it be that this was my shawl? Surely mine was in one of the attic trunks that—no I remembered distinctly; it was among the articles that our chamber-maid stole last year.

Then I pondered slowly over that event, recalling our surprise and dismay, when, one morning, not only the new servant was missing, but many small valuable things; the India shawl for one—making a motley array, and no doubt a larger one than we ever realised. The same night she disappeared the bank had been robbed of thousands of pounds and some silver which had been placed in the vault for safe keeping. The authorities were quite positive that the theft had been committed by one of the under book-keepers; but a year of skilful detective-work had failed to trace his whereabouts, and the people of the town had well-nigh forgotten the occurrence.

There was a strong conviction in our family that the book-keeper and our chambermaid had left by the same route, and that, could one be found, the other would be easily brought to justice also.

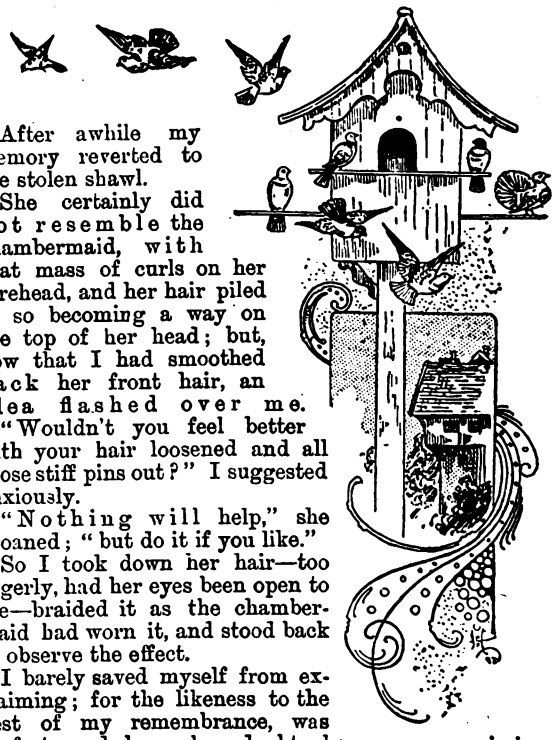
As I pondered, the idea grew stronger that I had stumbled upon one of the stolen articles; for did not the wild-rose scent proclaim it—the torn corner, and even the knots in the fringe testify to it?

The owner—I turned to scrutinise her, and saw her lying down, her book on the seat, and a look of intense pain on her face.

"One of my miserable headaches," she said, in answer to my query; adding wailingly: "and I haven't a thing to stop it!"

"Let me dampen a handkerchief to lay on your forehead! It might aid you," I asked.

She seemed so ill that I stood stroking back her hair and trying to charm away the dull pain by magnetic touches.



After awhile my memory reverted to the stolen shawl.

She certainly did not resemble the chambermaid, with that mass of curls on her forehead, and her hair piled in so becoming a way on the top of her head; but, now that I had smoothed back her front hair, an idea flashed over me.

"Wouldn't you feel better with your hair loosened and all those stiff pins out?" I suggested anxiously.

"Nothing will help," she groaned; "but do it if you like."

So I took down her hair—too eagerly, had her eyes been open to see—braided it as the chambermaid had worn it, and stood back to observe the effect.

I barely saved myself from exclaiming; for the likeness to the best of my remembrance, was perfect, and beyond a doubt she was our missing servant.

But I must have more proof to bring before a court. Besides, the gentleman with her might prove to be the book-keeper—whom, alas! I had never seen—and by keeping still I might ferret out the greater criminal.

There was no danger of losing their company, for our engine was too badly broken to admit of reaching a side-track, and we must wait for aid. Presently a gentlemen entered, swearing half-audibly.

"Oh, here is James!" my invalid exclaimed: "let me introduce you, Miss——"

"Miss Warren, of Brighton," I supplied, purposely taking to myself a fictitious name; but the "Brighton" slipped out correctly, and caused my tongue an awful bite.

"My husband—Mr. McCord, Miss Warren," my acquaintance said, and, bowing, we began conversation with the useful phrases.

He was a good-looking man, but his eyes seemed always in the act of opening widely, which gave him too alert a look. He had caught at the word "Brighton," and saying that he used to live there "a long time ago, when a mere boy," he asked endless questions about the changes that had taken place.

I became loquacious: told him, among other things, that none of the new buildings surpassed that of the Bank—"the bank which was robbed last year, you know."

"No! Is it possible? When was that?" he exclaimed, evidently to lead me on.

So I launched into the sea of falsehood without compass, sail, or oar, knowing not whether I was working for or against myself, only knowing that I had aroused an intense interest in my companions, and hoping to secure some clue.

Digitized by Google

The detectives were still at work, I said, and it was rumoured that they were now on the right track, and were merely waiting for more evidence. It was an outrageous fib, but the chance of frightening him was too good to be lost.

Plainly he considered me, from my conversation, a very simple-minded girl, for he was quite unguarded, and, in his anxiety to hear more, showed that he had not only heard of the robbery before, but had been in Brighton since he was "a mere boy."

Once more speeding on our way, we sought our berths, mine adjoining theirs. A long, wakeful night followed, in which I racked my brain in vain for a scheme that might lead to the law's success; for I felt positive that I had tracked the thieves.

When the grey dawn was creeping in, I heard whispers from the adjoining berth, finally these words:

"It may all be true. I had better telegraph to Don to hold up yet awhile; but we do need the cash!"

That was all, but it was something to go on. When the train stopped at Edinburgh, he left her to get breakfast while he went to the telegraph office. I followed, and the instant he left, went in and asked to see the telegram.

"It is not customary for us to do such a thing," the man said, coolly eyeing me with mingled surprise and contempt.

It was an audacious request, but not till afterwards did I realise fully its impertinence.

"Yes, but it is important I see it—most important! I'll give you five pounds for it!"

Stealthily glancing round to see that no one overheard, he handed me the slip, remarking, as if to justify himself:

"You mistake, there's really no importance in it. You are his wife, I presume?"

He had given me the rôle of the jealous wife, and I accepted it by a nod.

I copied the telegram, though he demurred greatly, handed over the money, and hurried back to the refreshment room.

To my vexation the McCords had gone.

I had understood that they were going on to Aberdeen like myself.

I waited on the platform for them to return.

I had been waiting for some time, wondering what I should do, when I was informed by a messenger that there was a telegram for my husband at the office.

I went in at once, and the clerk handed it to me with a sly remark that perhaps I would take it for my husband.

"He didn't expect an answer, I suppose," he said, "for he didn't say he would come for it."

Of course I took it—how eagerly, he never knew.

The first one was addressed to J. C. Duncan, 17, Gale Street, Brighton, and read as follows:

"Don't trade the w—— yet. It isn't safe."

The answer was:

"Have traded with an old German in Lucas Street. Safe enough."

"The w——"! What could that be? I thought long before I remembered that other valuables were stolen from the bank. Then the mysterious "w——" began to stand in my mind for a watch, and at a venture I decided to telegraph to one of the bank directors:

"Was there a watch stolen from the bank last January? If so, please describe."

His answer was:

"Yes; a large gold one, with seven small diamonds forming an 'L.' Why?"

Too excited to heed his question or think of my visit, I bought a ticket and took the first train back.

Doubtless I should have put the matter in a detective's hands; but, with all a girl's ardour, and also excited beyond reason's range, I determined to act alone. I was certain the McCords had eluded me.

The next day I was in a shop in Brighton, and the watch with its tell-tale "L" lay before me.

I secured a promise of the old Jew to keep the watch twenty-four hours, and then, seeking the detectives' headquarters, told my long story in all its details, and handed in the three addresses which had cost me so many manœuvres—that of J. C. Duncan, the McCords' home address, and that of their destination, which she had given me in our first chat.

Within forty-eight hours, in a Brighton court-room, were assembled three officials of the Bank of Brighton, Mr. and Mrs. James McCord, alias Jim Mallory, the ex-book-keeper, and Mattie Frayer, our ex-chamber-maid, J. C. Duncan, alias Don Mallory, the old German Jew, several lawyers, detectives, and myself.

The Mallory brothers struggled hard to asseverate innocence; but the case became too strong, and they confessed, accepting the inevitable decision with stoical resignation.

Not so did "Mrs. McCord," whose conduct for a time was violent.

The shawl will be handed down to our family as an heirloom; and though all this happened years ago, the scent of the roses clings to it still.

T. K. L.

He: "Are you sure I am the only man you ever really and truly loved?"

She: "Perfectly sure. I went over the whole list only yesterday."

Jack: "What did you think of that cigar I gave you yesterday?"

John: "Not much. It cost me sixteen shillings. How so? Why, it gave my wife the idea that the gas was leaking somewhere, and she sent for a plumber."

Mr. Figg: "I see that some man with a fondness for figures has estimated that if all the babies born in 1890 were placed in a stack, 8ft. square at the base, it would over-top the Eiffel Tower. What do you think of that?"

Mrs. Figg: "I think that a man who could talk that way about babies is nothing but an old brute."

At a reception Mr. Evarts was once drawn into a discussion between two ladies.

"Mr. Evarts," said one, "do you not think I am right in saying that a woman is always the best judge of another woman's character?"

"Madam," replied Mr. Evarts, "she is not only the best judge, but also the best executioner."

Mrs. Hoon (looking up from her newspaper): "Mercy me, I have just been reading an account of an anatomist whose house was packed with skeletons, and who had a paper knife which he used for cutting comic papers which he declared was made from the funny-bone of his first wife. I cannot believe any man capable of doing such a thing as that!"

Hoon: "Neither can I. There never was a woman who had a funny-bone."

Digitized by Google

HOMESPUN YARNS.

By Levin Carnac.

V.—THE WHITE FEATHER.

A LOG-BUILT house in a remote gorge of the British Columbian mountains is not exactly the place in which one would expect to find complete suites of handsome furniture, overmantels, Liberty curtains, and art-china suspended by wires on the polished, match-boarded walls and stood about on pretty brackets and crewel-fringed shelves.

Yet it was only a few summers ago that I found myself a guest for a fortnight's shooting and fishing in just such a house, furnished in just such an incongruous fashion. I had met my host down at Victoria; the rendering of a small service on my part had led to a better acquaintance, and that had resulted in an invitation to go with him into the hills and have a taste of sport in the wild North-West.

It was on the evening of my arrival that I learnt the chapter in his life-story which I am about to set down here.

"You've made yourself a remarkably comfortable nest out here in the forest primeval; but if you'll excuse my saying so, it looks to me rather to have been built for a pair than a single bird."

My host's brow clouded for a moment as I spoke, and I was beginning to fear that I had said what had been better left unsaid when he reassured me by replying with a short laugh that had more pain than fun in it:—

"Yes, you are right. And as a fact it was built for two, and there would be two or more in it now if the greatest mercy that has ever befallen me had not come to me in the shape of what I then thought the greatest misfortune that could befall a man."

I didn't like to ask for the story, much as I wanted to hear it, for there was evidently a tragedy in the background; so I was well pleased when my host leant back in his easy chair, nodded towards a framed cabinet photo that stood on the centre shelf of the overmantel, and said:—

"That was the girl. Get up and look at her, and then I'll tell you the story. It'll help us through the evening anyhow."

I looked and found it the portrait of a very pretty girl of about twenty. A girl with just the face to drive a man half crazy with its saucy, tempting beauty. Beneath the glass at the foot of the photo was neatly pasted a tiny white feather, and just as I was going to ask why it was there my host said:—

"I see you notice the white feather. Well, that's the key to the story, so now you can sit down and listen.

"I've been out West for nearly fifteen years, and, as things go, I've done very well. Years ago I won a lot of then almost worthless shares in a copper mine at poker, and for the last ten years that mine has been a gold one to me. Then this timber estate has panned out very well, and altogether I am, though I don't look it, a rich man.

"It is just three years back this spring that some business connected with the purchase of the range on the other side of the valley took me to Montreal, where I had located the owner after a considerable hunt. While I was in the city I determined to stop a few weeks and look round, for it was my first visit east since I had left Ottawa as a boy of sixteen. I had been at my hotel for a week and had done all my business, and was beginning to get sick of town life, when one afternoon in the vestibule I ran up against an old chum whom I had known out here five years before. He had been even more fortunate than I had, and was just off for a trip to England to see the old folks at home. Half an hour later he had persuaded me to go with him, and in two days we were on blue water steaming eastward.

"We had a very good time in the old country. My chum introduced me to his people, and they invited their friends to meet us, and so it came to pass that I met Maggie Jeffries, the original of that photo—and then the good time became a glorious one, for I fell in love with her at first sight, and before very long found out that all the love was not on my side.

"The upshot of the matter was that I proposed, was accepted and formally engaged, but Maggie's father, who was really very much attached to her, insisted that at least six months should pass before we were married, and after some disputing on my part it was settled that I should return here and set my house in order, and that Maggie should come out to me at the end of the stipulated time.

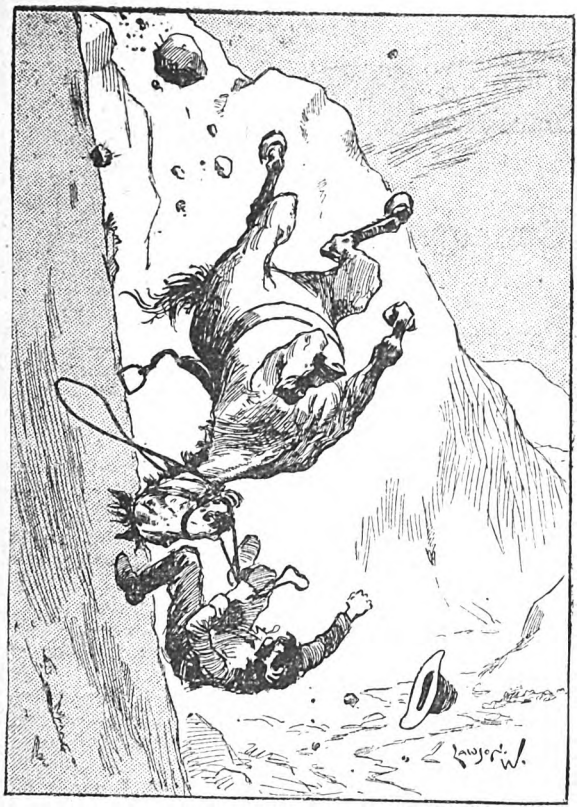
"When this was all arranged Maggie made a suggestion which took my fancy immensely. She proposed that I should buy the furniture for our backwoods home in London, and that she should help me to choose it. For the next fortnight we were as happy as two lovers with plenty of money to spend could well be. Maggie had very good taste, and as I was in no humour to spare the cash we got a very pretty little fit-out—as you can see from the remains of it. At last it was all bought and packed up ready for shipping over, and I said a fond farewell and took passage in the same boat that brought it.

"I needn't try to tell you what loving pains I took in fixing up the outlandish home that was to be the scene of the first few years of our married life. I was determined that the house should be as cosy and comfortable as money and work could make it, and so I went at it with a light heart and counted the days until the letter came that was to tell me to go to meet and marry my bride.

"At last it came, and I started off across the continent, feeling—well, if you've ever been in love yourself as badly as I was, you will know without my telling you, and if you haven't it's no good thing to tell you.

"I put in the necessary residence at Halifax, and was ready armed with the license by the time the steamer came in. I went out to her in the pilot boat the happiest man this side of the Atlantic and came back the most miserable wretch that the sun of that summer's day shone upon.

Digitized by Google



His horse slipped on a rock ledge, and carried its rider over a hundred feet sheer into the cañon below.

"Not to dwell longer than I need to on what is still to me the most painful part of the story, I will just say, in as few words as may be, that the girl I had trusted with the happiness of my life had sold herself to a higher bidder during the brief interval of the passage from Liverpool to Halifax.

"The man who had out-priced me was a vulgar, flashy millionaire, who had struck oil in Pennsylvania, and after a miserable scene with me, during which she first tried to excuse her fickleness, and then broke down and cried, and implored me to forgive and forget her and live to be happy with someone more worthy of me, and all that sort of rubbish, I started back West, sad and angry and soured with all the world, and she married her oilman and started off on a tour through the States.

"When I got home I felt fit to set fire to the pretty little home that I had prepared for her with so much pains, and burn up everything that reminded me of her, but common sense prevailed after a struggle, and I set-to to conquer my misery by hard work instead. As time went on my heart softened towards her a bit, and I even came to take a sad sort of pleasure in the furniture we had chosen together in the Old Country.

"When a couple of years had passed the wound had healed again, and I was getting pretty contented once more, when one night, after I had settled down to my book and my evening pipe, I heard the sound of horses' hoofs outside, and then a loud knock upon the door, and a voice which said:

"'We have lost our way among the hills, and shall be very grateful if you can take us in for the night. We will pay well for the accommodation if you will oblige us.'

"I threw the door open, and by the light of the lamp that still burnt in the passage I recognised the man that Maggie had married in preference to me. I swallowed the left-handed blessing that rose to my lips, and asked who was with him. 'My wife,' said he, and the next moment I was outside helping Maggie off her pony.

"Of course I took them in, and gave of the best that I had in the house. Maggie had put on experience so fast that she treated the meeting as a mere matter for polite surprise and pleasure at meeting an old acquaintance. I thought differently, but I knew enough to hold my tongue, and I did. I even took a savage sort of pleasure in watching Maggie's queer expressions as she recognised one after another of the pretty trifles she had helped to choose.

"At last I was evilly gratified to see the surface ice of her artificial training melt into tears under the influence of the old associations. Her husband was out of the room at the time, and my gratification was quickly changed into a fiercer emotion when she turned to me with her pretty eyes brimming over, and sobbed out:

"'Oh! Jack, how I wish these were mine now. I am so miserable.'

"Before I had any time to shape a reply her husband came back, and we went into another room to supper, and as soon as that was over Maggie went to bed complaining of fatigue, while her husband settled himself to a struggle with the whisky bottle. I soon saw that the man was a perfect brute, an animal in every respect but sobriety. Maggie might well be miserable.

"After two hours' hard drinking the whisky beat him, and I helped him to stagger to the door of his bedroom, and returned, sad and disgusted, to think things over. I suppose I must have dozed off in my chair, for I woke up with a start, feeling a pair of soft arms round my neck and a kiss trembling on my lips. I cannot tell you what was said during the next half-hour or so, and, if I could, it wouldn't be right.

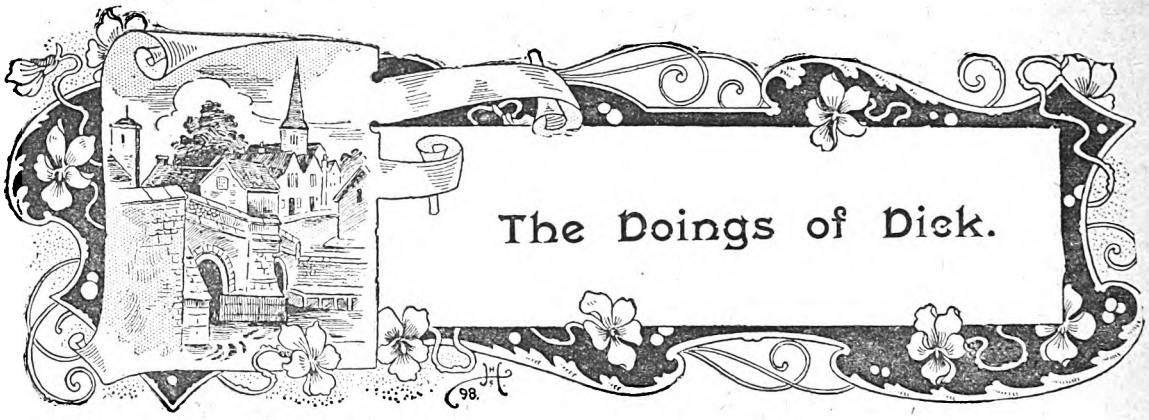
"Let it be enough to say that I was tempted to the last limits of an average man's endurance by the pitiful story of my old sweetheart's wrongs and sufferings, and her passionate plea to be released at any price. I believe I was just on the point of yielding, when she whispered a few fierce words in my ears which, in an instant, froze the hot blood that was boiling in my veins, and turned all my lawless, re-awakening love into horror and disgust. Without a word I cast her from me, and left the room with her last words, 'You coward! you are not worthy of me!' hissing in my ears.

"That night I dreamt that Maggie stood by and smiled on me as I flung her drunken husband into the mill-race, and the next morning I was off to the woods before they were up.

"I never saw either of them again; but what Maggie tempted me to do happened all the same, for within the month I received by post a cutting from a Victoria paper detailing a fatal accident to a gentleman travelling in the mountains alone with his wife. His horse had slipped on a rock ledge, and carried its rider over a hundred feet sheer into the cañon below. Both were killed instantly. I knew enough to feel convinced that the 'accident' was probably, if the truth were told, a case of murder.

"The cutting was pasted neatly on to a piece of scented notepaper, and underneath it was tied with a true-lover's knot of red silk that little white feather."

Digitized by Google



The Doings of Dick.

It was the autumn of the year; we had all many studies for future use.

At that time Jules and I shared a studio, and Dick occupied the adjoining one.

Jules and I were on rather cool terms with Dick just then, for he had entered our studio, like a thief in the night as we remarked—though it was really in the afternoon when we were both out—and had "borrowed" our lay figure.

I had tried to induce Jules to leave town for a holiday. This was the day before Dick stole the lay figure.

Jules would decide nothing, however, just then, and we did not see Dick; it was not until after his unspeakable treachery that Jules agreed to go.

"We will hasten from a place tainted by that man's presence," he said to me, "and on our return we will remove to some secluded spot where he will seek for us in vain."

I did not share Jules' indignation to its full extent; in fact, had Dick not taken a new half-pound tube of white of mine at the same time as the lay figure, I should have felt quite friendly towards him; still, it was clearly impossible to anticipate a pleasant time, with these two fellows perpetually quarrelling. No, it would be more peaceful to go away with Jules alone. I could always sit on Jules when we were alone. So we decided to go to a little fishing village on the Norfolk coast where I had stayed once before.

It was agreed that we should start in two days.

Nothing was to be said to Dick.

Judge, then, of my surprise, when we entered the station on the day in question, to behold Dick.

I turned to Jules.

"What is the meaning of this?" I asked, white with rage, of which, however, with masterly self-control, I allowed no trace to appear.

Jules feebly affected surprise, and said he "did not know; perhaps Dick was not going by our train."

I knew now that treachery was afloat.

How much longer would I go on trusting these two with my guileless heart?

It only wanted Dick's words to make all clear.

"Hallo, Arthur, my dear and attached friend!" he said. "Surprised to see me, eh? You see, Jules came to me yesterday about the lay figure, and accused me in round terms of taking it without permission. I told him how astonished I was, and how you had said I might have it any time I wanted it; and then Jules explained your mean behaviour, and told me of your plan of going away. He said he could not leave me after all that had occurred, and I consented finally, yielding to his persuasion, to accompany you. You know I bear no malice, so you've only to say you're sorry, and we'll forget the past."

I was boiling with rage; but I held my peace.

Jules had whispered while Dick was talking—

"He's sold a picture, and is taking down a dozen of cham. with him."

I merely mention that to show Jules' disposition. Determined not to do things by halves, I forced myself o smile genially, and holding out my hand to Dick, I said:

"Well, to tell you the truth, old man, I was a bit surprised to see you. Jules told me you could not possibly get away, as you had some work to finish, and, judging by the absence of my flake white, I felt I had corroborative evidence."

"Oh, the white; that was not for myself. Jones dropped in and asked me for some, and I sent him round to your place. I am surprised, though, that he should have taken it in your absence. Not a gentlemanly thing to do, I must say!"

I felt it was no use. Natures such as Dick's, where the moral qualities are almost dead, are adamantine in their hardened iniquity.

At the end of our railway journey we found the trap we had ordered waiting to convey ourselves and our luggage to the village five miles away. Dick was delighted with every inch of the scenery, and extolled its quaint, unusual, un-English character at every turn.

Presently, as we approached the village, Dick and Jules were surprised to find that the peasants recognised me and touched their hats; that the farmers nodded, and the occupants of a sumptuous landau, an elderly gentleman and a young lady, bowed to me as we passed. I had not told them that when I stayed at Miversham before it was with a relative, who was at that time rector of the parish, and that through him I knew everyone.

Dick said:

"Why, you never told us you knew anyone down here. Who were the people in the landau?"

"Oh, only Lord Miversham and his daughter, Lady Juliet; he's the lord of the manor, you know," I replied, with nonchalance.

Jules pricked up his ears.

"The Earl of Miversham?" he said. "Why, he's one of the biggest picture buyers in England!

Digitized by Google

Jules was essentially aristocratic in all his views and feelings, Dick decidedly radical.

I now enjoyed my triumph to the full.

Jules wished to make the acquaintance of Lord Miversham, because, as he said, the Earl might buy his "Psyche."

Dick was anxious to know him, in order to persuade him to convert his estate into a co-operative farming company, renounce his title, and speak on socialism in Hyde Park.

He said an Earl stumping in Hyde Park on a Sunday would be useful to the cause.

I gave them both to understand that I could not take the initiative, but said that I should call at Miversham Court, and if Lord Miversham chose to include them in the invitation to dinner which I was sure to receive well, of course, they could go, that is, if they had brought their dress clothes; I had. They had not, and they banded together to abuse me.

Arrived at last at our inn, Dick and Jules both expressed themselves delighted with their quarters, and again and again commended me for inducing them to come to Miversham. I was amused with Dick: I had not induced him at all. We had a bottle of champagne, and they drank my health, and expressed, in the warmest terms over the whisky, later on, their appreciation of the sterling qualities I possessed.

I hate to say anything against either Jules or Dick, but I must set it down here, that some time afterwards, when they were friendly, they made a great joke out of what they said that night; and would say that the serious way in which I "swallowed their blarney and replied to it was too delicious!" I tell them not to be ashamed of the one good, generous action of their lives, even though it was under the influenced of—but, no! I will not betray them.

The next day I had to show them round; of course, we did not expect to do any work for two or three days. As we were walking through the village I met Dr. Sinton, whom I knew very well. He was delighted to see me again; asked me to introduce him to Dick and Jules, and said he would be pleased to see us whenever we could drop in at his place. During lunch I spoke of Dr. Sinton and his daughter Cicely, mentioning, in a casual way, that when I stayed at Miversham before, she was an extremely pretty girl. Jules and Dick both thought it would be pleasant and civil, to call at the Doctor's that afternoon.

"Rather bad form to drop in the same day we were asked," I said.

"No, my boy," said Dick, "you see, Dr. Sinton's introduction to us may be regarded as a call, and in foreign courts it is the custom to return a call upon the same day. Now, we may be recognised as foreigners here, so we shall be only right in following the usages of the best society."

I was annoyed at Dick airing his knowledge; I did not, of course, believe in the truth of his information, but Jules was gazing admiringly at him, as much as to say: "That's up against you, Arthur! What a lot Dick does know!"

"I did not imagine, Dick, that a person of your Spartan radical views would frame your conduct on the example of an effete aristocracy!" I retorted.

"Don't talk rot; of course, while the world remains in its present condition of ignorance, a wise man must assume its imbecile habits and customs," was Dick's remark.

So it was decided we should call. And we did.

Cicely Sinton was at home, and was, of course, pleased to see fresh faces. She was delighted, too, to see me again; but with feminine deceit concealed the fact so well that neither Dick nor Jules perceived it. Jules was not much attracted by her; he admired dark women just now, and Cicely was divinely fair. But Dick? Well, I blushed for him. He started at once, and neither Jules nor I could get a word in.

The conversation during the Doctor's absence (he was called away to see a patient) consisted of this:

Dick said: "Miss Sinton, how happy you must be in this sweet spot, far from the madding crowd with its million of squalid by-ways. For my part, it is the ambition of my life to dwell in some such fair Arcadia, and attune my whole soul to the song of the nightingales!"

Cicely said: "Well, do you know, I'm sure you'll be disgusted to hear it, but I love London, and long to be in its bustle and life. Existence in the country saddens me."

"Yes," said Dick, "I could see that you had the grand free spirit of the modern life, that laughs to scorn the musty mediæval yearnings for rural simplicity, a simplicity that exists only in the febrile brains of the minor poets."

"But," said Cicely, "I thought you but now professed a love for the country?"

"Yes," said Dick, "I am universal, and love all things in degrees; but my chief love is for the beating pulse of some mighty city—the cradle of civilisation, the hive of the universe!"

Jules and I exchanged glances, but felt it would be ill-bred of us to expose Dick; and Cicely seemed quite satisfied with his equivocations and mixed metaphors.

The conversation now turned to music, and Dick, who had about as much ear for music as a Bactrican camel, and whose favourite melody was "Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-Ay," gravely assured Miss Sinton that Bach's fugues afforded him exquisite enjoyment; that he could read the mystery of Wagner's great modernism, and that Mendelssohn might be likened in music to Wordsworth in poetry. Poetry and painting passed in review before them, and even politics were lightly grazed.

The Doctor had come in during the latter end of all this; and had glanced inquiringly at us when Dick had given vent to something more than usually idiotic.

I had a few words with Cicely before we left; I reminded her of the happy time I had spent at Miversham before, of how well she and I had got on together at tennis; and hinted that existence since that time had been grey and gloomy. I always considered it impolite not to tell a girl that her absence obscures the sunshine; it pleases her and it does not hurt me. I also apologised for Dick's erratic oratory; but here she stopped me quite fiercely, and remarked that Dick was one of the cleverest and most universal men she had ever met.

The next day I decided to call at Miversham Court, and Jules said he would just stroll up with me, so we started. As we neared the great grey Tudor pile, which had been the home of the Mivershams for so many centuries, Jules' enthusiasm positively glowed.

Jules was in the midst of an eloquent discourse on the pride of descent, including his own history, when we arrived at the Court. We learnt to our annoyance that the Earl and his daughter, Lady Juliet, had left for town the previous day. I was disappointed on Jules' account; and began to express my sorrow, but instead of taking what I said in the right spirit, he insinuated with malice that perhaps Lord Miversham was at that moment in Miversham Court, but was not at home to me.

Digitized by Google

"If the example of Sir Child Cocoa, or whatever your ancestor's name was, has no better influence for taste upon you than it has to keep you accurate in your history, you might as well have been without him!" I exclaimed.

"I do not always quote history as you learnt it in your school books" (I agreed with him cordially), "but as it stands recorded in the archives of our family!"

I suggested that he alluded to the Newgate Calendar, and we walked back in silence.

Presently we came to a meadow overlooking the back of Dr. Sinton's house, and we beheld a solitary figure pacing solemnly up and down, with eyes cast upon the ground, and anon raised to a window of the Doctor's house.

It was Dick.

He did not see us, but continued his meditative posture all unconscious of prying eyes.

Jules suddenly forgot my remark anent his family archives.

It had indeed only been a small revenge of mine, for Jules used at one time to lead the conversation round to pigs, and when he arrived there he would turn to me and say—

"And talking of pigs, old man, how are your people?"

Jules, I say, forgot my remark, and nodding knowingly in the direction of Dick, he winked meaningly at me.

"It is a case," he said, "a bad case; we must do all we can to prevent this for the sake of the poor girl, Arthur!"

I agreed with Jules; I thought it would be a sad and solemn thing for me in the future to have to bear the reproaches of Cicely's broken-hearted father—when Dick, having married the girl, would take to drink, and sink lower and lower towards poverty and vice. Yes, we must unite in this common cause and rescue the still unsuspecting Cicely.

Dinner-time arrived, but no Dick.

We dined, Jules and I, and had a bottle of Dick's champagne.

Dinner ended, still no Dick.

We began to grow anxious, and had serious thoughts of going out to look for him, when Dr. Sinton's boy came round with a note addressed to both of us. I opened it and read:

DEAR ARTHUR AND JULES.—Happening to meet Dr. Sinton quite by chance at 6.30 this evening, he prevailed upon me to dine with him. Of course, I demurred, fearing you would miss me, but the Doctor was so pressing he would take no refusal. Solacing myself with the reflection that both of you were blissfully happy in your toadying flunkeyism at Miversham Court, I yielded; but sad to relate, as I was rising from the table I was suddenly seized with one of my old attacks of cramp, and found myself unable to move. Dr. Sinton did all he could for me, but the pain was so intense, every time I put my foot to the ground, that, in short, I'm going to accept the spare bedroom here for to-night. Send my things, and don't weep for me. No need for either of you to come.

DICK.

We stared at each other in stupid amazement.

"Old attack of cramp!" said Jules, "must be so jolly old, he forgot even to mention it before!"

"Stay at Dr. Sinton's," said I, "when he's only ten minutes' walk from here!"

"At any rate," said Jules, "it would be unfeeling, if he is really bad, not to go and see him. We should reproach ourselves eternally if he never got over it!"

I agreed, and dismissing the boy, we collected the raggedest and worst of Dick's things and walked over.

We found him reclining in an easy chair by a cheerful fire in the dining-room, with the suffering (?) limb extended upon a low chair. He was smoking one of the Doctor's cigars, and talking in low tones to Cicely, who sat near him with an anxious look on her sweet face.

The Doctor had been again called out.

We rushed up to Dick and began expressing our sympathy.

"Forgive me, Miss Sinton; in the horrible racking anxiety for our old friend I had almost neglected an apology for our intrusion. Dick, my dear Dick, how are you? Is it dangerous? You must be careful, and above all not smoke!" So said Jules.

"No, Miss Sinton," I broke in, "pray do not let him smoke. When he has had these attacks before we have been told to keep everything away from him. He is not allowed wine, or cigars, or——"

"Arthur is right," said Jules, "he must be kept in a darkened room—padded, if possible—and left severely alone. In this lies his only chance!"

Cicely, who did not appear so pleased to see us as I should have expected, now became terribly concerned.

"My father did not seem to think the case so bad as you say; in fact, he said that so far no virulent symptoms had supervened, but that the patient must be kept quiet," she said.

As for Dick, the workings of a suppressed rage on his features—a rage he dared not in the least betray—had the effect of making him like some ghoul who strives to appear like a good angel.

"Really, Miss Sinton, Arthur and I could carry our poor friend back most carefully, and it is a shame to impose an invalid upon your hospitality," continued Jules.

Cicely would not hear of this, however, so I said:

"At least let us relieve you of the task of nurse. We will remain with him turn and turn about, and so release you from the trouble and responsibility."

I don't know what would have been the outcome of this, for Dick was fast degenerating into a frantic maniac, and had already reached down towards the heavy brass dogs in the fender. Luckily a diversion was caused by the return of the doctor.

Cicely seemed surprised. "Why, how soon you're back, papa. I thought you were called to the Freestones at Amperton?"

"There appears to have been some mistake, my dear,"

Digitized by Google

replied Dr. Sinton. "I met Maurice Freestone before I was halfway there, and feared he had come to hurry me and that it was a serious case. He, however, was smiling, and asked me where I was going. I told him I had been sent for, half an hour before, to attend to his father, who had had a fall from his horse.

"Maurice said: 'Oh, it's a hoax, Doctor; there's the guv'nor coming down the road,' and, sure enough, there he was. I inquired of Robert" (the Doctor's boy), "and he says he was told by Brown's boy down in the village, and that Brown's boy was spending a shilling in ginger beer and chocolate creams at old Mrs. Choople's shop. I can't make it out at all, unless it's the work of that villain Smalldoes, the German quack homœopathic, who's trying to get my practice away."

Jules and I registered a mental oath that we would interrogate Brown's boy, and felt that his revelations would only justify our suspicions. Yes, it was a black and deep-laid plot, and what could we do? To actually betray Dick would be to bring down the wrath of the Doctor upon me for introducing so vile a character to him and his daughter.

The Doctor asked me if I had seen Dick under a similar attack before.

"Yes," I replied, "he is very liable to them, and they are unfortunately of long duration. The doctor who attended him last said that six weeks would be about the minimum of the next attack, but that he could be moved with safety within twenty-four hours after the seizure, so I thought that next day at the latest we had better send for him; he could be carried home on a door!"

"It is a very peculiar and interesting case," Dr. Sinton said. "I can find no swelling and no tendency to inflammation, and this confirms me in a theory of my own that in cases of approaching tentanus, which frequently arise from latent paroxysm of the gastric nemius, no symptoms of any kind are manifested; and, in fact, it is by the entire absence of them that a diagnosis may be arrived at."

I said: "As you say, Doctor, the absence of symptons is conclusive."

The Doctor at first seemed pleased, but, recollecting that he was bound to assume I knew nothing about it, he said—

"Not always, I assure you, but in the present case, certainly."

Jules and I saw that, at any rate, Dick was booked there for one night; so all we could do was to sit close to him and talk incessantly, thus effectually preventing him from exchanging whispers with Cicely, which he had been doing all the time the Doctor was talking to me.

We reluctantly rose to go at length.

We said good-night effusively to Dick, and repeated to the Doctor (when we got him in the hall) what the specialist whom Dick had consulted before had said about his not being allowed to smoke or touch stimulants, and then we departed gloomily to the inn. It was impossible to think of work while we had this terrible responsibility on our shoulders.

As soon as we had finished breakfast next day we started for the Doctor's, feeling exhilarated at the thought that to-day at least, we would set matters to rights, and if absolutely necessary drag Dick back even to town with us.

You can imagine how exasperated we were, then, when we were shown into the Doctor's small consulting room, and not into the dining room as before.

The Doctor entered presently.

"Your friend is no better this morning, but I feel sure he is not physically worse. He has, however, become somewhat excitable and hysterical, a very common phase in his complaint, and cannot bear to see anyone except—er—myself or my daughter. He even shows signs of impatience when I enter the dining-room!" So said the Doctor.

"We are both deeply grateful to you for your care and kindness," I returned, "but I assure you when he is like this, to humour him too much is apt to prolong the attack. The special——"

"Pardon me," interrupted the Doctor, somewhat piqued. "I am, I feel confident, as capable of treating a case of this sort as any man."

Jules and I quite agreed with him in our own minds, but did not say so. Presently we came away and did not begin to employ bad language until well out of sight and hearing of the house. Then Jules burst forth.

When we had cooled down we began to make plans.

"Suppose we send an anonymous letter to Dr. Sinton describing Dick's character?" I suggested.

Jules the Bayard, the chevalier sans peur et sans reproche, the descendant of the valiant and immaculate Childe Kau, affected to be shocked at this.

"No," he said, "I could never condescend to an action that was not straightforward, manly and open. I propose," he went on thoughtfully, "that we listen to Dick's conversation with Miss Sinton, hidden behind those laurel bushes—we can very well hear, because they have a fire and the window open; then we will bribe Brown's boy, who seems open to corruption, to tell Robert, who will tell the Doctor, who will question Dick, who will get moved on—eh, what d'ye think of that?"

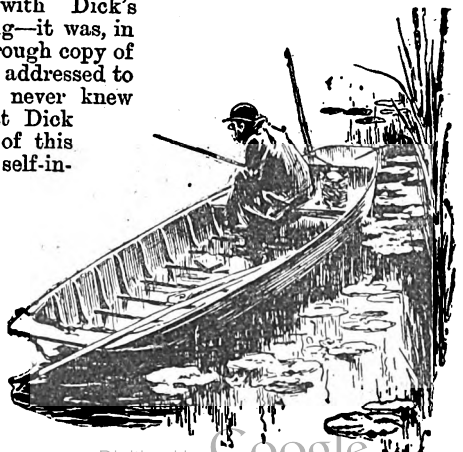
There seemed to be something in this; at any rate, it was worth finding out how matters stood before we took any decided action. So I agreed with Jules to try the laurel bushes.

We had lunch, and drank to Dick's confusion in some of his own champagne, then we started upon our errand of mercy.

Taking a roundabout way, we skirted the meadow at the back of the Doctor's house; and stealthily, with movement like the subtle savage on the war trail, we crept nearer and nearer, till at last each found himself hidden in the shadows of the two huge laurels that flanked the dining-room windows.

My attention was caught by a crumpled piece of note-paper on the grass.

I picked it up, and smoothing it out, discovered it was covered with Dick's handwriting—it was, in fact, the rough copy of some lines addressed to Cicely. I never knew before that Dick was guilty of this species of self-indulgence, and any lingering leniency I might have felt towards him took wings and flew as I read the lines.



I ground

Digitized by Google

my teeth as I came to the end of the effusion and was about to tear it into small atoms and scatter them to the four winds, but on second thoughts I put it in my pocket. The murmur of voices began to reach my ears, and I could distinguish Dick's speaking in low tones. Presently Cicely spoke.

"But do tell me, Dick, all about your life with your two friends; of course, I know something about Mr. Arthur—and will you be angry if I tell you something?"

Dick declared that nothing she could say would anger him, and she went on:

"Well, Dick, I don't like him; he has a most objectionable habit of patronage and finality about his own remarks, don't you think so?"

Dick said: "As one of my oldest and best friends, I feel I cannot speak against Arthur, so I will content myself with admitting that what you have said is no more than the truth, and that, as a matter of fact, he is, without exception, the most argumentative, dogmatic, and at the same time ignorant and objectionable fellow it has ever been my lot to meet with—unless it be Jules, who has all Arthur's faults and none of his good qualities, supposing Arthur to possess any."

Jules and I had had enough of it; we felt that we were too late.

We stepped stealthily away and joined each other as soon as we were out of sight of the house.

Whatever our thoughts may have been just then we did not express them.

Each felt that collaboration had been a failure; we must play the game now, as Jules would have said, being an enthusiastic if incapable cricketer, "off our own bats."

As for me, although Cicely had gone down in my estimation through her manifest preference of Dick to myself, I felt that this would not have been the case had I given her any encouragement.

I merely regarded her somewhat disparaging remarks about me to Dick as a woman's subtle flattery.

Of course, I knew Jules would not be likely to take my philosophical view of the case.

He would resent Dick's treachery to the end, and would never forgive Cicely her remark about me, his friend.

No, I would say nothing to him of my altered views, for to Jules the man who changed his mind was not a philosopher, but a vacillating and weak-minded person.

The remainder of that day we spent in friendly fashion, carefully avoiding all reference to Dick.

We talked of what we should do the next day, and explained that we had seen some subjects, and we were most eager to commence work.

At twelve the next day the prodigal returned.

He wore a look partly truculent and partly nervous.

He limped as he approached us, until he read the looks exchanged between Jules and myself, when he relinquished that effort.

"Well, you fellows, I'm much better, sudden improvement, could not trespass any more on the Doctor's kindness. Real good fellow he is, too!" he said.

For a moment we were silent, then we said in a breath, "How is Miss Sinton?"

Dick blushed. (Yes, it's the truth!)

"I believe Miss Sinton is quite well," he said. And another silence fell upon us.

Then Jules asked lightly: "Doctor been called away lately?"

"Scandalous trick of Smalldoes," said I.

"I hear Brown's boy is very ill, suffering from an overdose of ginger beer and chocolate creams, and that he has made some sort of confession to Dr. Sinton," remarked Jules.

Dick began to fidget in an uncomfortable manner, but he said nothing.

Then I began to talk about poems and quoted some of Dick's effusion.

"You unmitigated sneaks!" he said in a rage; "you underhand, contemptible, contumacious jackals! You two vipers, whom I have nourished only to plunge your poisonous fangs into my heart, and trample my simple faith beneath your boots! When have you known me to commit a deceitful action? When have you found me aught but honourable and true? I have done with you both! Go, leave my presence! The very sight of you disgusts me with humanity. Go!"

It was then that my nobility of character came in and averted a catastrophe. I said to Dick:

"All you have just said to Jules is, though perhaps too bitter, scarcely more than the truth. I deeply regret the part I have played in yielding to his persuasion and playing the spy to some extent upon your actions; yet I have the consolation of knowing that I besought Jules, with tears in my eyes, to destroy the beautiful lines he became possessed of in some way unknown to me, and not to profane those words of love by reading them in the wrong spirit. No one can be more rejoiced than I at the happy result of your ruse de guerre. Let me, my dear Dick, be the first to offer you my most sincere congratulations."

Dick was delighted. To have me in his camp set his heart at rest about the future, for he did not forget that Dr. Sinton might come to me for information when he came to know the state of affairs between Dick and his daughter.

As for Jules, stunned by Dick's attack, flabbergasted by my position, his brain was in such a whirl that it seemed the most natural thing in the world for him to join me in congratulating Dick.

And thus through my diplomacy, tact and benevolent sympathy for human failings, we three were once more united.

Dick is engaged to Cicely now, with the Doctor's consent. But somehow, I don't think Cicely likes Jules or myself very much. Can Dick have told her anything? If I thought he had I'd—No! I wouldn't!

H. P. Lacey.

Amateur Scientist: "Can you explain to me the reason why so many people become insane?"

Guyer: "The answer ought to suggest itself. They have no reason."

"When I asked my wife to marry me," said Feltt, "she did not answer. Silence gave consent."

There was no reply, and Feltt added:

"Since we have been married, though, she does not express her sentiments that way."

Tradesman (to old gentleman who has purchased a lawn mower): "Yes, sir, I'll oil it, and send it over imme——"

Customer (imperatively): "No, no, no! it mustn't be oiled! I won't have it oiled. Mind that! I want noise! And, look here—pick me out a nice rusty one. My neighbour's children hoot and yell till ten o'clock every night, so—(viciously)—I mean to cut my grass from four till six every morning!"

Digitized by Google

A Premature Proposal.

IT was early May, and two were walking together in the Elysian Fields.

To see Lizzie Robinson, to exchange ideas with her, to discuss theories of life, to tell all that had been in his mind in the past, and almost all that he hoped for in the future, was at one time the chief necessity of Frank's existence.

What she felt in return was his ever-recurring problem.

She liked him, of that he was certain. A dimple showed near her lips whenever he approached her, and her eyes rested on him as if they had found what they had been seeking.

Often he was pervaded by a soft intoxication of belief that she waited for him; that his coming was the signal for the real interest to begin. Oftener still, he was depressed by the conviction that her sympathy for him was purely a matter of curiosity; that she was trying to read him as she might read a book, and that, when she reached the last leaf, she would throw him aside.

The girl seemed to him to feel no vital need of any friend, any helper.

Her instinct was—freedom.

To-day he had chanced to encounter her near her home, and had asked if he might speak to her a moment.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, and at the same time took three steps away from him.

He then passionately blurted out what he had never meant to utter until the right moment came, and by every sign this was the wrong moment.

"Having said so much," he went on, "I must say more; I ask you to be my wife."

"Oh," said Lizzie again, a sense of outrage implied in her look and tone.

He took one stride and reached her. He laid his hand on her arm.

"Do you hate me?" he demanded.

"Hate you? Why should I hate you? Not the least in the world."

"Do you love me?"

"Not the least in the world."

"Then," said he, "I will go away. If you will not love me, the world itself is not wide enough for you and me."

Their eyes met, and she was frankly amazed at the signs of trouble in his face.

"What nonsense!" she cried, with scorn. "We were friends, we are friends, we can go on and be better friends."

"Lizzie!" he exclaimed, with fresh impetuosity. "Friends? You do not seem to know what the term can mean. Only as your husband can I be your best friend."

She shrank from the word.

"Nothing could induce me to marry," she cried.

"If you like me as a friend," he persisted, with vehemence, "why not as a lover, a husband?"

"I do not like you at all, at this moment, simply for thrusting such a word upon me. I feel you to be a tyrannical personality towering above me, trying to govern me."

"You would hardly, here and now, care to have me go down on my knees. But in heart and feeling I am at your feet, Lizzie. Honestly, if life is to be worth anything to me, I must have you in it. There is a vacuum in my existence; I ask you to fill it up."

"No, no, no," said Lizzie. "I am very much interested in myself," with a brief laugh. "I intend to give myself free play and see what I can make of my life. I have all sorts of schemes. I intend not to marry."

He drew a long breath as he spoke. He averted his eyes; he bit his lip.

"Schemes in which I have no part," he said heavily. "Well, I wish you all happiness, Miss Robinson. But no—I will not be insincere. I can't wish you to be happy without me. The day I become purely disinterested I shall suffer less than I suffer at this moment."

Then saying: "I must bid you good afternoon," he walked rapidly away, while she entered her father's house.

Lizzie could hardly gather her thoughts together. A thousand words she had been ready to utter to Frank burned in her heart, and her tongue was stiff and stubborn.

It had all been so sudden; he had been so impatient.

She had altogether been taken by surprise, and felt that she had not made her case clear. She was conscious of a tumultuous rush of sensations.

A fortnight passed, and she heard that he had gone abroad.

She could not at first believe that he had deserted her. What had she said, what had she done, that he should in a moment renounce the pleasant intercourse which had become their habit? Yet, when she recalled his words, his tones, his glances during that interview, she was no longer inclined to be angry; in recollection, they gained new efficacy—she was thrilled as his meaning became magnified and intensified. Then, conscious that she was softening, she would cry: "I must be wise, strong, consistent, true to myself!"

All these three months that she had known Frank she had been conscious of a sense of power. How insidious his influence had been, flattering her that she was free, yet all the time imprisoning her in meshes which, light as gossamer though they might be, she found it hard to throw off. For she was obliged to confess that, now she no longer saw him, although she was to all appearance leading the life she had hitherto led, the interest had flatly gone out of it; it lacked the central moving figure.

Digitized by Google

She would never think of him again. Then, having decided never to think of him again, she went on thinking of every word he uttered—of the general why and wherefore—of things tangled, which might have been smooth—of what is, compared with what might have been—until the fifteenth day of May, on the evening of which day she was to appear at Mrs. Fabian's ball.

The night was warm. Lizzie was dressed in white, and looked airy and girlish. A murmur ran round the room as she came forward.

Suddenly she flushed. The truth was that Lizzie had caught a glimpse of Frank standing in a corner of the room, and for a moment everything had whirled round before her eyes.

He approached her as she stood surrounded by a group. Her eyes met his with conscious meaning.

"I had almost forgotten you," said Lizzie, saucily. "It is so long since I have had the pleasure of seeing you."

Later, when she was following Mrs. Fabian to her carriage, he came up.

"Why not walk home?" he said. "The moon is full, the night is like summer."

"I am going to walk," Lizzie said to Mrs. Fabian. It was a pleasure snatched out of the very teeth of loss and loneliness to see him.

"Please take my arm," he said. "I want to monopolise you for a moment. I sail for America to-morrow at three o'clock."

"I heard you had already sailed."

"Without bidding you good-bye? Hardly."

"Ah!" murmured Lizzie.

Let her struggle as she might to vie with him in high spirits, Lizzie was conscious of a lack of rebound. He evidently considered everything rounded off, complete, finished, dead. He looked at her with an eager expression when she did not speak.

"Well?" he said presently.

"You see," she observed with an effort at lightness, "that I supposed you were half way across the Atlantic, that you had gone without a word."

"Did you care particularly? But no—I will not press questions. Still, I wanted to snatch just one moment. We are at least friends. You yourself said that we had been, were still, and could go on being friends."

He bent his head and swiftly kissed the hand which lay on his arm. She would have withdrawn it, but his own closed over it.

"This is mere friendliness," he said. "To-morrow night I shall be out of sight of land, and you will be free to go your own way."

Lizzie felt like crying out. She had quivered at his words; they were like the shrewdest irony. All of human blessedness seemed to be offered in this companionship.

Alone against the world?

Why should she stand alone? Why should she fight the world?

Conquered and despoiled, what could the world give her in return for rejecting this joy immeasureable? What childish folly for her to reject that which was the only thing she realised a clear need of?

Still, what she said was:

"I hope your journey will be pleasant."

"Delightful," he returned curtly. "Much you know of my state of mind. But you have refused me. Wretch in fetters, as I am, I must bear my pain and be silent. Is this good-bye?" continued Frank, and he took both her hands in his.

And what was the sequel? some reader might exclaim. In her reply to Frank, did the girl exalt herself in the glowing light of Love, or weakly seek shelter again under her Will o' the Wisp of Friendship?

Let us draw the curtain—and leave them in their happiness.

HAROLD MALTHOUSE.

The Pledge of a Man.

THOSE who know Cape Dolphin in the summer only, when fair winds mingle the odour of kelps with the scent of new-mown hay, and the docile sea licks the feet of the bluff like a well-trained hound coaxing his master to play, are likely to think of the fisher-folk as enjoying a holiday existence. But I, who have dwelt among these simple people from my boyhood, and have heard the dull roar of the monster, and seen the red froth upon its lips red with the blood of those who were near and dear to me, have other memories; and when the storm goads the waters to fury, my heart ever puts up its prayer for the men at sea.

And there is one storm that will ever be present in my mind. It was in 1882, and it left its trail of mourning all along the coast.

Of all the folk that lived in the little fishing village there was none (save my parents, for whom I held a due reverence) who seemed to me half so brave and admirable as Bob Finney, whose father was the master of the Rose Marie. We were almost of an age; indeed, I was a month the elder, yet such was the size and vigour of this young giant that he instinctively arrogated to himself the position of a superior, which I, ever of puny build and faint heart, as instinctively acknowledged.

It was Bob who cast me, a lubberly boy of fourteen, into the water, and compelled me to learn swimming, an art of which a mother's over-tender care had left me ignorant. It was he who hoisted me, struggling and howling, to the masthead of the Lively Annie, and it was he who thrashed Tom Taylor for doing the self-same thing. He was the hero of my boyish days, the staunch friend of my early manhood.

Digitized by Google

But, although we remained steadfast friends, we came to see each other less often as the years passed by. Bob was all for the sea, and could no more hold away from blue water than I could part company with my beloved books. It was this wide difference of tastes that forced us apart and sent him out into the blue horizon, while I still hugged the desk at school and blossomed from an eager scholar into a doubtful teacher.

Now, although Bob's love for the sea was as deep and broad as the sea itself, there was that in the village which held him back from long voyages and kept him knocking about in a fishing smack, when he ought to have been at least second officer on his father's brig. And that which kept him back was the love of a woman; perhaps, as Bob said, the best woman at Cape Dolphin. And so, here was Bob, beaten like a shuttlecock between the battledores of his two loves—his ingrained love of the alluring sea, and his absorbing passion for Hilda Manter—who was a woman well worth some sacrifice.

Hilda had sat beside me in the little red schoolhouse, week in and week out, for years, and I felt that I knew her much better than Bob, who was reefing and luffing in his boat. Indeed, there was a time—but I am telling Bob's story, not mine, and I can only say that I was wrong, and that Bob, at sea in his boat, had kept far closer to her than I at the next desk.

And so it was he who was in her thoughts as her eyes wandered from her book and out over the sparkling sea to where the fleet lay, a cluster of white specks on the horizon. And it was he who came at last to be looked upon as her true love, while I was counted their steadfast and mutual friend, who held the open confidence of each and listened to many a tender tale with what inward fortitude I might, but always, on the outside, pleased and proud of their trust in me.

And so it was that I knew before anyone else when these two birds were planning for the nesting. And very modest and charming their plans were, though falling short in ambition of what seemed to me right and proper. For I held that a rocky little farm, a week now and then at the fishing, and the wage of a lifeboat man—for Bob held a berth in the lifeboat—were all too little for a man who deserved a command. But the twain were happy, and Hilda wore such a light in her eyes, and looked upon me at times with such a dreamy, tender gaze, that my heart fell a-throbbing, and I went hot and cold in an instant, until I remembered that a lover loves all mankind, and it was in this general, and in no sense an individual, way that Hilda regarded me.

Now, it grieves me to the heart that I must write down aught against Bob; but I have set myself to write a true account of these matters, and, to their proper understanding, no fact must be omitted. Moreover, I hold that my dear friend emerged so strong from his troubles that a passing weakness may well be forgiven.

Bob was a man of large and generous nature, and it has fallen under my observation that such men fall the more readily into this particular weakness. Your mean and narrow soul knows not the temptation of conviviality.

Nevertheless, it was a sore blow to me when I first found him in liquor, loud and boastful before the inn door. He fetched me a buffet when I rated him, which I did, perhaps, a thought too roundly, there being others present. He was ashamed of it afterwards, and begged my pardon humbly enough when he was sober; but, for all that, he dropped more of his wage at the bar than a decent man should. Hilda noticed it, I felt sure, though she said never a word; but the town gossiped over it not a little.

And so matters went on from bad to worse, until one night there came a stiff nor'-easter, and a great ship drove bow on upon the rocks. The men of the lifeboat station got the crew safe off the wreck; but it was fearful work, and they were short-handed, Bob and one other lying drunk and sodden in the public-house.

I met him next morning when he was in that savage mood that follows a debauch.

"Bob," I said, walking close up to him and standing face to face, "you're a bigger man than me, but you're a villain, and so I tell you."

For a minute I thought he would have thrown me from the cliff into the sea, as he had done in boyhood, but in far different mood. His face grew white, and his great hands clenched tight. But he only said—

"Not another man here would dare say that to my face, John."

"But I dare," I retorted angrily. "Do you remember Jerry Watson, the scandal of the village when we were boys? Well, you are the Jerry Watson of to-day. Take care that you don't die as he did—drunk, and face down in shallow water."

"You take a deal upon yourself," sneered Bob. "You milksops always do. A man has but to take a glass or two, and you are down on him with your cant. When I want your opinion, I'll ask for it; until then, keep it."

"A glass or two, indeed!" I cried. "You lay like a sot in the tap-room while better men than you risked their lives in the boat where you belonged. No thanks to you that the crew of that wrecked ship don't lie awash in the surf to-day. I thought better things of you, Bob Finney. Think of your family, man—think of Hilda."

He took a quick step towards me then, and made as if to strike me down, so that I threw up my hands to ward off the blow, when round the corner came Hilda herself, her soft eyes widening in alarm at our fierce attitudes. Bob swung on his heel, and went to her at once.

"Hilda," he said slowly and heavily, "will you turn against me? I was discharged from the crew to-day for drunkenness, and here is John Ladd, of all others, casting me off with scant ceremony and no loss of time."

Before Hilda could answer I had my say, which was not much, and tapered weakly off because of what I read in her eyes.

"That is not true, Hilda," I began with heat. "I do not cast Bob off. But I do say he lacked much of manhood last night, and that I was ashamed for a man of his stock to lie like any tramp in the gutter while his mates took their lives in their hands, as brave men should when need comes. And I say, too, that it is little love and less respect he shows to you, and that he is not worthy to——"

But Hilda held up her hand to stop me.

"That will do, John Ladd," she said, with quiet dignity, laying her hand in Bob's. "And I think it is very ungenerous of you, who have always been Bob's friend, to talk so. But what you say and what others say will make no difference to me, for I love Bob Finney, and am not the woman to thrust him down when I should raise him up. There is not his equal for manliness in the whole country; and I will marry him and save him, let people think what they may."

Digitized by Google

And with these brave words and a scornful glance at me, she slipped her arm through his and the two went off, her head proudly erect, but Bob's hanging low upon his breast.

But though Hilda spoke bravely, and was enough of a woman to live up to her words, she had no thought to sign articles with an untrustworthy skipper, and so she told Bob Finney, as I afterwards learnt, as soon as they were out of earshot of myself.

"Bob, my man," she said, 'twas Bob himself told me, so I can vouch for the truth of the matter, although the words are my own, "Bob," she said, "you've got your work cut out for you. I'm thinking you'll be easier at the head of the house if you save yourself, than if I do it for you. I'm giving you a chance. I'll marry you one year from to-night, if we are both alive and you do not change your mind. It rests with you whether I marry a man or a sot. And I have faith to believe, Bob, that there'll be a man beside me at the wedding."

Of what Bob said I have less knowledge, but as a man in his case will promise anything, I make no doubt his answer sailed close to the wind of her wishes. But as those who have the greatest claim upon a man's love are the last to learn of his shortcomings, it so happened that the townspeople knew more of Bob's failings than ever came to the ears of the gentle Hilda.

Moreover, a man cannot bid farewell to a congenial habit without strong regrets, which even a strong will may not always overcome at once. The old boon companions are ever ready to urge, cajole, and sneer at a man who seems to set himself above them by leading a decent life. And a tithe of Bob's earnings still found its way to the bar.

And so it was that Hilda grew pale and sad of face, and the neighbours pitied and scorned her, according as their natures were soft or harsh. But neither pity nor scorn did they offer openly to Hilda. There was that in her nature which taught them better. And while she grew pale, Bob's face waxed red and venous. But just when the village had made up its collective mind that Bob Finney was past hope, there happened a thing which made him come about like an unworthy craft in the teeth of a sudden gale, and shape his course for the safe port of sobriety; no less a thing, in fact, than the great storm of 1882.

It happened in the early autumn, before people had fairly bidden good-bye to summer, and made up their minds to face cold winter. In the morning the boats set out for the fishing before a white-ash breeze, and the fishermen bobbled peacefully in their dories and sang cheerfully at their work. In the late afternoon the women-folk were huddled on the head, peering out to sea to behold the battered fleet come staggering in one by one, driven like chips before the gale.

As each boat came in, they shrieked to one another in shrill voices that seemed a part of the tempest:

"That's Sampson's boat!" "No, it's Binley's! I know it by the patched sail." "Heavens! They'll be on the rocks!" "Thank Heaven! she's over!" And then an awful shriek as one small sloop, with three men clearly to be seen, went down before their eyes.

At last the night fell, and the storm grew in fury as the night hid its deeds. The lighthouse twinkled hopefully, and the wretched women kindled great fires on the beach and crouched beside them, waiting for the dawn. None who wore the long night out, as I did, on the open beach, can ever forget the horror of it all.

It was just past two in the morning when a gun was fired out there in the storm, and a rocket went flashing athwart the black sky. Then we knew that a ship was on the rocks, with but one chance in a thousand that she would hold together until morning came, and the crew, if any were then alive, be brought ashore.

It seemed worse than useless to launch the lifeboat in the darkness and in such a sea, but the crew could not hug the driftwood fires and wait for daylight while men's lives were being beaten out by the surf. So, with infinite labour and much loss of precious time, the Lyle's gun was hauled to the point nearest the wreck, and an attempt made to throw a line across the hulk. And all this time those on the wreck kept burning signal lights and firing the minute gun.

I well remember how, as the line was thrown again and again, and each time fell short, the hardy men about me, their faces white in the light of torches, clenched teeth and hands, swearing deep-throated oaths; and once, when a sudden flare of light aboard the wreck, more brilliant than most, showed us the poor fellows clinging fast to the rigging, I saw the capt in bury his face in his horny hands, and sob like a little child. Then, turning to his mates, he shouted hoarsely:

"Boys, the gun's no use. We must try the boat or let 'em go under. All hands to man the boat!"

And with a quiet "Aye, aye, Cap'n," these men turned and tramped sturdily back to face death.

There was a wail among the women when the boat was run out, but the men thrust them quietly aside, and as the grey dawn was turning all faces ashen, they ran her out through a smother of white foam, and were swallowed from sight in the rush of waves.

To those who watched her as she was thrown greedily from crest to crest, as if the mob of famished waves were wrangling among themselves for this choice morsel, it seemed as if she buffeted an endless time. Yet I have no doubt she had not struggled a quarter-of-an-hour with the sea, when it cast her back again, reeling and helpless, with two men and the captain lying stunned across the thwarts.

As we gathered stupidly round the half-drowned men, I became conscious of one that elbowed his way through the throng with masterful purpose. It was Bob, his face set and determined.

"Men!" he cried, "we must try it again. There's no time to lose. Run her out again and give those poor fellows a chance!"

But though, indeed, all could see that the men dropped from the rigging one by one, like ripe fruit, no man stepped forward to man the boat. It looked like certain death, and the men were cowed.

"Will you come?" roared Bob, "or will you stand like curs and let good men drown?"

Then, as they still stood like clogs:

"You won't?" he cried. "Then I'll bear a line to them myself! Stand you by to pay it out! You can do that at least!"

And with that he began hastily to knot a light line about his waist and coil it down free and smooth, while the others crowded about him and sought to hold him back.

"Stand off!" he cried. "I'll show ye there's a man yet in Bob Finney's skin!"

But I had read of such another scene, and could not bear to think of Bob throwing himself away, and I was about to cast myself upon him when Hilda stepped calmly to his side, and, drawing down his face to hers, kissed him before them all.

Digitized by Google

"Now, let him go, if you will," she cried, turning scornfully upon us. "He's a man. Go and skulk by the fire and let him drown, you that have held yourselves above him! Fine men you are, and I hope you'll die in your beds of old age, with the shame of this day's work black upon you!"

Now, whether she meant all this, or whether it was a shrewd play upon our manhood, I never knew, but it worked well. I felt the blood rush to my face, and a force quite beyond my control thrust me into the circle where those two stood alone, and I said:

"I'm for the lifeboat, Bob!"

He looked at me with a strange and wholly cold expression in his blue eyes.

"You were always a lubber at the oar, John," he said.

"I can steer," I retorted hotly.

"Let him go, Bob," cried one, and so many thrust themselves forward for a place in the boat that Bob had but to choose his men.

Now, in the telling, it seems a long wrangle, but we had the boat afloat again ten minutes after she was cast ashore, and the men were pulling, strong and steady, for the wreck.

"No hurry," said Bob; "save your strength; it's a hard pull."

The men lay to it with a will, and I held her head well up into the wind, taking the waves bow on and expecting each one to smash us like a toy.

The boat was awash with icy water, and a driving sleet froze stiff on our oilskins. We rose on the crest like a cork, and dropped into the trough like a rock, with a thud that was like to open every seam. But we could see that we were nearing the wreck, and Bob seized a heaving-stick and prepared to let fly a line into her rigging, where her crew might make it fast.

"Heaven grant they're not frozen stiff," said Bob.

But when the line fell among them, as it did at the second trial, it was plain to see that they were beyond all power to help themselves, and, such as were not dead, frozen fast to the ropes. Twelve men they were, and death stared them in the face. A groan went up from the lifeboat.

"They're gone!" cried one. "Heaven help them!"

"We'll help them ourselves!" roared Bob. "Lay her close under the bow, John, and hold her while I jump for the chains. It's a chance, and I'll take it."

Once more he knotted the line about his waist, and without a word I put her where he said. It was a desperate chance. The great ship was pounding on the rocks, and likely to part amidships at every blow.

The green waves fell away from her shining, black hull, until she towered above us like a cliff, then whirled us aloft so that we seemed about to drop upon her deck. Not one among a thousand picked men would have dared to leap. But Bob watched his chance, and, all encumbered as he was with ice, succeeded.

Once in the rigging beside the half-frozen men, his deft seaman's fingers soon rove a whip, and one by one, with infinite care and danger, ten of the crew were lowered into the boat. She was by this time loaded far past the danger mark, and the wreck showed every sign of breaking up. I called to Bob to leave her, but my voice was lost in the roar of the wind and sea. Yet, like an answer came his signal to cast off and pull ashore. But the men held to it with set teeth and I beckoned frantically for him to save himself. His only answer was to cut the whip away and lash himself beside the others in the shrouds.

There are those who have blamed me that I put the boat about and left him there to what seemed certain death. But the lives of us all were at stake, and we were many while he was but one, and he remained of his own foolhardiness. Besides, as any landsman can see, I was powerless. But I take notice that those who blamed were not of the lifeboat crew—nor did Hilda blame me a whit. That I can swear to, having it from her own lips.

Once ashore with the rescued men we turned and ran her out once more, which does not look as if we were cowards, leaving a brave man to his death. I had little hope of the wreck holding until we reached it, and less of taking the men from her, if she did; but I should have held myself no better than a cur if I had not made the attempt.

Our task this time was harder than before, the men being weary and the water even rougher. But at last we lay close in the lee of the wreck and threw a line over her at the first attempt. There were now but two men in the rigging. Bob and one other, the third having been washed away while we were gone. It was not long, therefore, before we had them in the boat, Bob coming down last.

It is a marvel that we ever came ashore. Indeed, one poor fellow was swept away, and my exhaustion was so great that I seemed to have no command of the steering, and we were once almost broached to in the trough of the sea.

But, somehow, we at last felt the keel grate on the beach, and knew that we were safe.

It was a rare sight to see those rugged fisher-folk seize Bob Finney in their arms and swing him aloft upon their shoulders! And I saw more than one woman go up to Hilda and kiss her, as if she, too, had done some great thing.

And when we were come to the nearest house, and such of us as could crowded in for shelter and food and warmth, and the hot grog was going round, it was Bob who pushed the untasted liquor from him, and going up to Hilda, kissed her heartily, full on the lips. We all knew what that meant. It was a pledge, and Bob has kept it like a man.

FREDERICK WHEELER.

Have You Tried for One of Pearson's Fivers?

If you haven't, then you should surely do so at once, for, if it should so happen your name has been selected as the recipient, you would feel pretty sad when the news came to you that one of those crisp £5 notes had been lying in the editorial safe waiting for you to apply, and that you were not going to have it after all because of your indifference.

Pearson's Fivers are distributed under the following conditions: Ten names are selected every week from various sources—the names not only of householders, but of lodgers and soldiers and sailors. These names are written on envelopes in each of which is placed a £5 note, and the notes are dispatched on application.

Can anything be more simple? Do not lose the opportunity of making £5 for the sake of a post-card.

Digitized by Google

A Head for Business.

The head master of the High School heaved a sigh of relief when he knew that Allan Poynter was not to return after the holidays. Allan was one of the best scholars in school, but his great fault was a mad passion for betting, and he used such good judgment, derived from a careful consideration of all the factors, that he was enabled to spend double the allowance that his rich father gave him every month.

Many were the remonstrances that the father had given his son on the habit, but the young man would invariably try to end the argument by asking his father which he thought was the worse—betting on a horse race or wagering on the rise and fall of the wheat market, and as John Poynter was one of the most reckless (and yet most successful) members of the Stock Exchange the father would dismiss the subject with the statement that speculation on "'Change" was considered highly respectable, while wagering on sporting events was resorted to mainly by the lower element of society. This reply was considered unanswerable by the father, but was not at all convincing to Allan.

So well had the younger Poynter stood in his studies at the High School that his father had hopes of the future showing his offspring to be a very learned scholar, and young Poynter, it was decided, should be sent to a clerical training college which was presided over by the Rev. Dr. Jessup, an old boyhood chum of the London broker. The rigid rules of the college would preclude young Poynter from any large development of his ruling fault.

Allan would have preferred going into business in the city, and had entertained strong hopes that his father would introduce him to the bulls and bears on "'Change." He had even told his father of his ambition, but the elder Poynter had mapped out his next four years differently, and disappointedly the son obeyed the wishes of his father.

So when the autumn term opened Allan appeared at the college to begin work. Allan went to the sanctum of the head of the institution and gave a faint knock at the door.

"Come in," said a kind but stern voice.

Allan turned the knob and walked into the presence of about as benevolent-looking a man as he had ever laid his eyes upon and for a moment he wavered in his determination to do something that would bring about his dismissal. "I think I have run up against a hard job this time," was the thought of the young man, when he had mentally surveyed the learned scholar before him.

"Good morning. Take a seat. Wish to see me?" said the Doctor.

"Yes sir. My name is Poynter, son of John Poynter, of London. I believe he is an old friend of yours."

"What! John Poynter's son! I am certainly glad to see you. How is your father?" and the Doctor cordially shook the young man's hand.

"Very well, I thank you, sir. Here is a letter from him," and Dr. Jessup opened a sealed envelope, took out its contents, and read the following:

My Dear Old Friend Jessup,—This will introduce to you Allan, who, I have determined, shall be trained for better things than city life. I have entrusted him to you that he may be brought up in a more straight and narrow path than he has been in the habit of travelling. I warn you he has one great fault. He possesses a perfect mania for betting, and it does not make any difference whether it is on an international yacht race or a hop, skip, and a jump. I am in hopes that he will gradually wear this habit off during his course at your school. Don't let him bet, and if you hear of his staking any of his money secure the same by all means and return it to me. I will curtail his allowance to that amount. I think between us we ought to be able to teach the boy a good lesson.

Your old friend,
J. Poynter.

"So you are going to enter college?" frowned the Doctor.

"I believe that is the sentence imposed upon me," said Allan, who had been watching what effect the mysterious letter would have on the great educator.

"Well, sir, I suppose you know that our rules of government are quite strict?"

"I think that was one reason why I was sent here," said Allan, rather unconcernedly.

"Well, I assure you that while they may seem strict to a young man in the habit of roaming about a large city at his will, we exact nothing but what it will be for your own future welfare to live up to.

"Your father intimates that you are given to betting. Under no circumstances can we allow this here. You will understand that."

In the meantime Allan had moved nearer to the open window to get some of the fresh autumn air. He beheld in the grounds outside a handsome young lady of about his own age, and was paying more attention to her than to what Dr. Jessup was saying. In fact, he was making quite violent exertions to attract her attention.

"What in the world are you undergoing those contortions for?" asked the Doctor, who had noticed the desperate efforts of the boy.

Digitized by Google

"A decidedly charming bit of femininity," said Allan, as he pointed out of the window.

The head of the institution glanced out and saw that the "charming bit of femininity" was none other than his own daughter.

"Sir," said he, the blood rushing to his face in his indignation, "do you understand that that is my daughter? How dare you talk so lightly of her? I have half a notion of sending you back to your father."

The words uttered caused an idea to flash rapidly through the brain of the young man, and he proceeded to execute it. It was a daring one, but he must take his chances to succeed in what he had undertaken. "I'll bet the old fellow has an awfully tender spot in his heart for her. I'll probe for it," he thought.

"Why," said Allan in a half-apologetic tone, "I was simply admiring the young lady. You wouldn't mind introducing me? I have taken a decided fancy to her."

"You—you have taken a fancy to my daughter! What do you mean?" almost thundered the Doctor. "If it were not for the fact that you are the son of my old friend, whom I would hate to offend or be obliged to explain to, I would have you ejected immediately from my room."

"Now, don't get excited," assured the boy. "Let us talk reasonably. I am a respectable young man—and as your daughter glanced up, I think she looked as if she would be decidedly willing to meet me. Now, don't get angry," continued the young man, as the Doctor jumped to his feet and pointed to the door.

"You are the most audacious young man I have ever seen. You certainly act more like a person fit to be sent to an insane asylum than a religious college. You are positively impudent. What's the matter? Have you been drinking?" asked the Doctor, growing more and more indignant all the time.

Then Allan played his trump card.

Said he:

"Let us talk mildly. Now, to convince you that I have made no mistake, or that I think I have not, I am willing to wager twenty pounds that if she comes in here she will acknowledge before you that she is quite enraptured with me, and is in fact willing to embrace me."

"Why, you conceited ass! you impudent young scoundrel! leave this room immediately," cried the reverend gentleman.

In the meantime Allan had taken from his pocket-book two bank-notes, but thinking it was all over with his plans started to leave the room, wondering how he could explain to his father.

Just then an idea struck the Doctor, who reasoned thus: "I will wager the amount, win the money or pretend to, return the whole of the young man's wager to his father with the recommendation that he deduct it out of his allowance. In fact, John Poynter suggested that in his letter. It may teach the young man a lesson to have to go through the year on a curtailed allowance. Surely I can trust Evelyn." And then aloud he said, just as Allan had reached the door:

"But wait a minute. Have you ever spoken to my daughter?"

"I have never seen her before in my life."

"Suppose I should make you this wager, would you swear that you would never say a word about it to anyone?"

"I give you my word."

"Remain here a minute," and the principal went to the window and called his daughter. The young lady entered the room.

"Evelyn," said her father, "have you ever seen this young man before?"

"That young man?" came a sweet and innocent young voice. "Why, never, father. Why do you ask?"

"Never mind now," and as the daughter looked about her in wonderment, the Doctor turned upon the impudent young man and said:

"I will accept your wager. I have twenty pounds in this drawer," and he proceeded to count out the correct amount. The Doctor knew he was not doing exactly right, but had faith in the ultimate result. None the less confident of the termination, as far as his plans were concerned, was Allan.

"Who will be the stake holder—your daughter?" asked Allan.

"Agreeable," asserted the other, and each handed the money to the astonished young lady.

"What in the world does all this mean, father?" she asked.

"It means, my dear Evelyn, that this young scoundrel bets that you have become so infatuated with him that you would be even willing to embrace him. Tell him that you would not."

"Why, have you both lost your senses? Surely, father, I do not know the young man, and you know I would do nothing of the sort!"

"I'll give you three minutes to change your mind," spoke up Allan, who was commencing to feel more like smiling at the situation than any time since he entered the room.

And he pulled out his watch and commenced to count off the minutes.

"One minute." (A wait). "Two minutes," said the young man. (Another wait.) "Ten seconds more. Do you still refuse?"

"Sir!" said the scornful young lady, who was holding her father's arm and wondering how her own father could allow her to be thus talked to.

"Well," said Allan, closing his watch, "you have won."

"Won it! why certainly," and Dr. Jessup bent down and kissed his daughter as tenderly as if she had just been saved from some imminent danger. "Leave me, Mr. Poynter; you have unnerved me," and the young man went out. In a few minutes Dr. Jessup had written off the following telegram:

"Have won twenty pounds from Allan. Will send it by post with explanatory letter."

In an hour the following answer came over the wire:

"Do you mean that you actually made a wager with Allan? Wire reply."

The doctor looked at the message and sent the following:

"Yes. Followed your instructions by retaining money he wagered."

Dr. Jessup then wrote a full explanation of the occurrence to John Poynter, and after a few days the following reply came back:

MY DEAR FRIEND JESSUP,—Innocently enough, you have lost eighty pounds for me by your making that bet with my son. A few days previous to his leaving home for your institution we became involved in an argument on the propriety of betting, and he bet me one hundred pounds that even you would make a bet if you thought you were sure to win. So much confidence in you did I have that I readily accepted the bet and acquiesced in his condition that I would not inform you of our own bet. I fell into his trap as easily as you did. You won me twenty pounds, but at the same time lost me one hundred. I have only myself to blame, and we will not refer to the matter again.

I think on the whole that Allan is better fitted for a business career, and I have written him to come home and go into the office with me.—Your old friend, J. POYNTER.

ARTHUR JOHNSTONE.

Digitized by Google

The Tragedy of Eaton Square.

CHAPTER I.

A Strange Compact.

Colonel Eldridge was generally considered by society to be a prosperous man.

He was a widower, and lived with his only child, Maud, in Eaton Square. He entertained lavishly, was a director of more than one big company in the city, and was always to be seen at the most fashionable gatherings of the season.

Yet he was probably the most unprincipled scoundrel who ever walked either into a drawing-room or down Threadneedle Street.

The wonder was that he had never been found out.

He had often marvelled at his success himself; but now, as he sat in his library one chill November morning, he saw plainly that there was a strong probability of his being found guilty of misappropriation of trust funds, and of appearing at the Old Bailey in the guise of a fraudulent trustee.

His position certainly was dangerous.

His sister had married a rich country squire named Michael Crosmaduke, but had died within twelve months, after giving birth to a son.

Shortly afterwards Michael Crosmaduke broke his neck in the hunting-field.

In his will he had appointed Colonel Eldridge to be sole executor and trustee for the baby-boy, young Michael, until he should attain his majority.

Furthermore, the Colonel was to have two thousand a year for the education of his ward, and the remaining income from the Crosmaduke property, amounting to some eight thousand a year, was to be allowed to accumulate. By his will therefore, the Colonel would have the handling of ten thousand a year for twenty years, minus the expense of educating young Michael.

The will further provided that in the event of young Michael not living to attain his majority, the estates, which were entailed, and the accumulated income, should belong to Ralph Crosmaduke, a brother of old Michael's, who was sheep-farming in Australia.

The Colonel—then only a Major—greedily accepted the trust, and made his own plans for enriching himself at the young orphan's expense.

There were three difficulties in the way.

The first was that young Michael might die before he was twenty-one, in which case there would be Ralph Crosmaduke to settle with.

The second was that young Michael might be seized with a certain form of madness, which was hereditary in the Crosmaduke family, in which case awkward questions would be asked.

The third was, that young Michael himself might become aggressive.

But whatever his faults might be, Eldridge was a bold man.

He had won the V.C. by an act of reckless bravery, and by a very different act of recklessness determined to win a fortune.

On the chill November morning at which date our story commences, Colonel Eldridge was painfully conscious that his plans had not succeeded as well as he would have wished. It only wanted six months before young Michael came of age, and the boy's spirit had on several occasions been aggressive towards his uncle. He had been educated entirely by private tutors, who were the paid tools of Eldridge; but they had been unable to exercise much influence over a mind so full of contradictions.

He was a deep student, especially of the classical poetry of Rome and Athens. His chief enjoyment lay in the calm of bookland. Yet at times so great was the violence of his temper, the sure prelude to the madness which was the fatal base of his family, that people were afraid to approach him.

The Colonel had received a letter from him by the morning's post dated from Rome. The writer stated that he should be glad to spend Christmas in London, and to remain in England until his coming-of age, so that he might make himself acquainted with the business details of his property, "from the management of which," he observed, "he should soon have the pleasure of relieving his uncle." There was an allusion also to the accumulated incomes and interest, which the writer presumed would amount to about two hundred thousand pounds.

Digitized by Google

Now, the Colonel had seen very little of his ward. The presence of a young man who shut himself up in a room with his books, and was apt to have uncontrollable fits of passion, could hardly be acceptable in the house of the man of the world and his handsome daughter. Yet here was young Michael, actually on the way to Eaton Square, with the avowed intention of claiming the money of which his guardian had robbed him.

The Colonel was disturbed in his meditations by the entrance of his daughter, a handsome brunette of twenty-four, with commanding figure and faultless features.

Many people wondered that she had not married; but the truth was that, though men admired her, yet they were, at the same time, rather frightened of her. Her character may be best judged of by the fact that she had been for some years the constant companion and associate of her father.

She read attentively the letter which Colonel Eldridge handed to her.

"So we are to have this young bear with us for six months."

"I am afraid it can't be helped, Maud, but it is the end of the six months I am looking forward to."

The woman gazed searchingly at her father.

"Yes, Maud," he continued, "there is no doubt about it. For the last twenty years we have been living on Michael's money. Now it will be in his power to have me arrested."

"Surely there must be some way out of it?"

"There are two ways. One is to leave the country. In other words, to become an absconding trustee, before any suspicion is aroused, which means comparative poverty for the rest of our lives. The other is to make him marry you."

"Fancy having Michael Crosmaduke as a husband."

"Fancy being mistress of Crosmaduke Park and ten thousand a year."

"With a madman for a husband."

"Exactly, Maud. But remember that you can have the madman locked up in an asylum. When I play a deep game, like the one I have been playing for the last twenty years, I calculate beforehand every move on the board. Now, if what Poole tells me is correct, Michael's reason won't last for more than a year; you can then have him put away quietly in an asylum, remain the mistress of Crosmaduke Park and its ten thousand a year, and also gain the sympathy of society."

"Suppose Michael does not choose to marry me?"

"I cannot imagine anything of the sort. I cannot suppose that you can't make a young hobbledehoy fall in love with you."

"Well, when will my work commence?"

"Poole writes to me that they hope to be in London within ten days."

"Will Mr. Poole stay here?"

"Yes, if he wants to. Besides, he may be useful."

"And will insist on being well paid for his utility. However, it is too late to retreat now."

The expression on the woman's face was hard as she uttered the words. There might have been an excuse for Maud Eldridge if she had consented to ruin Michael Crosmaduke, and drive him into a madhouse, in order to save her father; but her action was dictated solely by love of self. She lived merely for enjoyment, and for obtaining the means for enjoyment. It would have been impossible to have found a more unscrupulous and more unwomanly character than that of Maud Eldridge.

CHAPTER II.

Tutor and Pupil.

There is no greater sight in the world than that of the Coliseum at Rome, as seen by moonlight.

But Mr. Arthur Poole, bear-leader in ordinary to Michael Crosmaduke, was not influenced by it.

He was smoking a cigar, as listlessly as he would have done in the smoking-room of his London club, while he waited for his pupil, who—as he, the tutor, would have expressed it—was engaged in acting an affecting and affectionate parting scene with his lady-love, amongst a lot of damp and mouldering ruins.

"I wonder what old Eldridge will think of this affair?" he thought to himself. "The lad must marry, and I suppose Nina Perugia will do as well as anybody else. The Colonel will want my assistance to help him to make terms about those back rents, and I shall be able to charge my own price. Finally, I gain the gratitude of Nina, Michael, and Eldridge. Ah, here come my turtle doves!"

Nina Perugia was a perfect type of Italian beauty; her figure and her graceful carriage betrayed the native of a southern climate. No wonder that the boy by her side had fallen madly in love with her, with all the ardour of his poetical mind.

He had seen her first at La Scala, in Milan, the birthplace of musicians. He had heard her sing, and her notes had thrilled his soul. An introduction soon followed, and l'affaire d'amour between the beautiful soprano and the rich young Englishman became a matter of public gossip. He followed her to Rome, wrote passionate odes to her, and beneath the shadows of the Coliseum had just implored her to become his wife. She, in return, had promised to love him for ever.

The tutor and the pupil sat up late that evening. Michael, who had always been averse to taking advice on any subject from anybody, now beseeched Poole to tell him how to act.

Should he ask Nina, and her brother, who was her only relation, to come with him to England?

Should he delay his departure, and marry her at once in Rome?

What should he do?

Poole, in spite of his sagacity, had grave doubts as to what course he should advise Michael to adopt, for the simple reason that he was entirely in the dark in regard to Colonel Eldridge's plans.

Was he in the position to attack the Colonel, presuming that that crafty diplomatist chose to quarrel with him?

Was his influence over Michael sufficiently strong to enable him to dictate whether the Colonel should be pardoned or prosecuted?

On the other hand, it was certain that, sooner or later, Michael would marry Nina, and therefore it would be better for him to accept the post of mentor to the young couple at once, rather than to give anybody else the chance of ousting him.

"Let us see the lady's brother in the morning,

Digitized by Google

Michael. When we have learnt their wishes we shall be able to judge better."

"Nina's wishes are my wishes," the boy answered impetuously. "Why should I care for anybody else?"

"For no reason in the world that I can see, my dear boy. I only thought that you might like to tell your uncle of your intentions."

"If you mean Uncle Eldridge, I shan't bother about him for a moment. You know how shabbily he behaved to me. If it had not been for you putting me in the way of borrowing money, I wonder how we should have lived."

This was perfectly true.

Poole, considering that the Colonel's allowance was not so liberal as it might be, had introduced his ward to a certain solicitor, whose practice, though sharp, was highly respectable, since his clients belonged mostly to the upper classes. This "gentleman by act of Parliament," whose name was Nock, was only too pleased to lend Michael Crosmaduke money, while Poole thus provided himself with a weapon, with which, if necessary, he could assail Colonel Eldridge.

"Just as you like, Michael; just as you like," replied Poole, who understood his companion's temper. "I only thought it proper to mention it to you; though as you say, there is no reason why you should study your uncle's feelings in a matter which concerns your life-long happiness. No," he added, as if to himself, "it is for your uncle to seek your friendship rather than for you to seek his."

"Yes, and he may not get it when he does seek it, He has the upper hand now, but in six months. he will have no more control over me than his own valet has. With all his cunning he has been a fool, as he will find to his cost when Nock examines his accounts."

"Then you have determined to employ Nock as your family solicitor?" Poole asked quickly.

"Yes. In fact, I half promised to do so at the last interview I had with him."

Poole said nothing, but he immediately decided to take the part of his pupil, in the event of a quarrel between him and the Colonel. He also decided to see Nock directly he arrived in London.

Luigi Perugia, Nina's brother, like his sister, sang at the opera. Like her, too, he possessed the beauty of his race. His careless gaiety made him a universal favourite. For his sister he had the deepest affection, and perhaps her welfare was the only thing that he ever thought seriously about. He was smoking his morning cigarette as he pondered over Michael's offer to Nina, of which she had just told him, when Poole was announced. The two men shook hands cordially, when Poole plunged at once into the object of his visit, namely, to propose that if Nina was willing, she should marry Michael as soon as possible, and that then the four of them should go to England, where Luigi could have the satisfaction of seeing her established in her new home.

Luigi answered that his sister's wish would be law to him, but as her brother and only relative he must be pardoned if he asked about Signor Crosmaduke's position.

Poole was willing to give him every information. The only reason for hurry was the necessity of Michael and himself to return to England before Christmas.

But whatever doubt Luigi might possess. was now dispelled by the entrance of Nina and Michael. A single glance told Poole that Nina had consented to a hasty marriage. All that remained to be done was for Luigi to make his inquiries as quickly as he could.

CHAPTER III.

A Deed of Darkness.

373, Chancery Lane.

To Colonel Eldridge, Eaton Square.

Dear Sir,—I beg to inform you that my client, Mr. Michael Crosmaduke, of Crosmaduke Park, has lately been married to an Italian lady, whose maiden name was Nina Perugia. As I understand that Mr. Crosmaduke is mainly dependent upon you for the next six months, I should be glad if you would favour me with your views in regard to his financial position during that period.—Yours truly,

Richard Nock.

Grand Hotel.

My Dear Uncle,—I have just returned here from Italy. You may be surprised to hear that I am married to the loveliest creature in the world. I hope to have an early opportunity of introducing her to you and my cousin Maud. I have instructed my solicitor Mr. Nock, to write to you on business matters.—Your affectionate nephew, Michael Crosmaduke.

Such were the two letters which Colonel Eldridge received one December morning. They contained the first intimation he had had either of his nephew's return or of his marriage.

The Colonel had certainly not provided against this contingency. He felt himself to be checkmated. He knew Mr. Nock by reputation, and was fully aware that there was no mercy to be gained from that quarter. He knew, too, from his silence, that Poole must be against him. Worst of all, he was suspected. Even that last resource of the swindler—namely, flight—was denied to him, for he guessed that he was being watched by private detectives.

Maud seldom appeared at her father's breakfast-table. His hours were too early for her. She was astonished, therefore, when her maid informed her that he wished to see her immediately in his study.

"Read there," he said, as he handed her the fatal two letters.

She took them, and read them. She understood their meaning only too clearly.

"Is there any chance of forgiveness?" she asked abruptly.

"None whatever. Poole has betrayed me. I confess that I did not think him clever enough to do so, but it appears that I was mistaken. Then there is Nock to deal with."

"Then what do you intend to do?"

"In the first place I shall try to get rid of the suspicion which already exists against me. I shall see Nock this afternoon, and instruct him to draw against me to the extent of five thousand pounds. You must call at the Grand Hotel, and invite Michael and his wife to stay here for Christmas, and for as long afterwards as they like to remain. You know how to act the affectionate cousin without my teaching you. For the rest we must trust to chance, or, rather, to our own skill."

Colonel Eldridge's visit to Mr. Nock was satisfactory so far as it went. The solicitor knew that he could not insist on inspecting the trust accounts until the coming of age of Michael Crosmaduke, and, therefore, was fain to be content with five thousand pounds. The Colonel, on his part, pretended to be angry at the conduct of his ward. He dwelt on the fact that he was trustee for the residuary legatee, Mr. Ralph Crosmaduke, and could not exceed the powers of his trust. Of this, of course, Mr. Nock was aware; but the Colonel told him one thing which he did not know, namely, the hereditary madness in the Crosmaduke family. The solicitor did not feel so certain as he had been about being repaid the money which he had lent.

Digitized by Google

The Crosmadukes were out when Maud called at the Grand Hotel, so she left cards and a cousinly note of invitation to dinner for the following evening.

The invitation was accepted. Colonel Eldridge was agreeably surprised when he was introduced to Nina. Her beauty was undeniable; the vivacity of her manner was as charming as it is rare in London society. But when he heard her sing in the drawing-room those notes which had held breathless the audiences in La Scala, his admiration was as great as his astonishment. The Colonel determined to win the confidence of his nephew and his beautiful wife. Perhaps, after all, it might not be too late.

He managed to get a few words in confidence with Michael before he left.

"My dear boy, it hurts me very much that you should be staying at an hotel when this house is virtually your own. Now, why not come here to-morrow? We can give you a private sitting-room, and you must treat the place as Liberty Hall. Say 'yes,' at once, for I don't mean to take any denial."

"It is very good of you, uncle; but I have my brother-in-law staying with me."

"Bring him with you. We have plenty of house room. Ah, Nina!" he added, as Mrs. Crosmaduke came on the scene, "for I shall take the privilege of an uncle and call you by your Christian name, I have just persuaded Michael to bring you and your brother here, instead of your staying at an hotel. We shall expect you, to-morrow, shan't we, Maud?"

Maud seconded the invitation, and so it was arranged that Michael, his wife, and Luigi Perugia should take up their abode in Eaton Square on the morrow.

Mrs. Crosmaduke came on the scene.

The Colonel's manner changed immediately his guests had gone. He beckoned to his daughter to follow him into his study.

"The girl is superb," he said brusquely. "It remains to be seen whether she is as clever as she is beautiful. I suppose this brother will be a thorn in our sides. What did you think of Michael?"

"He is less of a cub and more of a madman than since I last saw him."

"What do you mean? Don't speak in riddles."

"I mean what I say. There was a curious sparkle in his eyes, and an unnatural ring in his laughter, a nervous twitching in his fingers as he handled his knife, which made me shudder. Now that I have seen him again, I swear to you that I could never marry him. I would not be in Nina's place for all the wealth of the Indies."

There was a ring like the ring of a hammer upon steel in the voice of Maud Eldridge, as she uttered the last words.

The Crosmadukes and Luigi Perugia arrived on the following day on their visit of indefinite length. Christmas passed, and the bells rang the old year out and the new year in, without anything occurring to disturb the ordinary life in Eaton Square. There was only one thing which made the Colonel uneasy, and that was that he could gain no tidings of Arthur Poole.

It was not till one evening in the second week in January that Michael betrayed any tokens of his unmanageable temper. Nina had offended him by singing a favourite song of the Colonel's instead of one which he had asked her to sing. The incident, trivial as it was, served to arouse his passion. He tore up the song, and threw the pieces in the fire. Then he abruptly left the room.

Pride alone prevented Nina from bursting into tears. With a strong effort she restrained herself, and merely saying: "I am afraid Michael is not well to-night," followed her husband.

She found him writhing on a sofa with his hands before his face. She spoke soothingly to him, but at the sound of her voice his rage was doubled in its intensity. His eyes shone like burning coals. He uttered oaths too blasphemous to be repeated. His lips were damp with a milky foam. The man was mad!

With difficulty they got him to his bedroom. A doctor came and administered sedatives, which soon sent the patient into a quiet sleep. Nina, in spite of remonstrance, insisted on staying with her husband. Shortly afterwards the household retired for the night, and the house itself was buried in darkness.

But see! What is that form shrouded in black, gliding like a ghoul of the night with muffled tread towards the chamber of curtained sleep? Look, it enters! It has a razor in its hand. Horror of horrors! What is that liquid stream?

* * * * *

"Eaton Square tragedy. Verdict. Sentence." Such is the cry of the newspaper boys, who congratulate each other on the business they are doing.

Michael Crosmaduke has been found guilty of attempting to murder his wife Nina, has been declared of unsound mind, and is sentenced to be kept in confinement during Her Majesty's pleasure. On the morning of the tragedy he was found in a raving condition, accusing himself of having murdered his wife. Evidence having been given to the effect that the unfortunate man had been subject to slight attacks of insanity, though his friends considered that this was merely the result of his being a deep student.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER IV.

The Madman's Story.

The ravings of my miserable mind have become less constant. I am no longer tortured with those feelings of remorse which made my brain a seething pandemonium of frantic rage, which made me an inhuman monster.

I am no longer haunted by that dread apparition which used to arise before me as an avenging angel to bear witness to my crime.

And yet now that I take up my pen in my moments of peace I am at a loss how to explain the experiences which I have gone through. How can I, a prisoner in a madhouse, expect to be believed? My words will be considered the insane ramblings of a disorganised brain.

I have suffered worse agony than was ever suffered by man. Have I atoned for my sin? Have I been forgiven?

Have you, Nina—you, the pure woman whom I murdered in my rage—vouchsafed to me your pardon? I believe you have. It is the only consolation left to me in this life; may I not be robbed of it!

I have seen Nina. I have seen her constantly.

It is at night that she comes to me, when, with wasted strength and feverish brain, I lie down exhausted, yet unable to speak. Then it is that her spirit comes and gazes upon me, bringing with it an atmosphere of sacred calm.

How can I express my joy when she first came to me with pity written on her countenance? I gazed on the radiant beauty of her countenance, and I know that she is happy.

Let me now, while it is fresh in my memory, state how her beatific vision came to me.

It was in the middle of the night, and I was lying thinking of her, when a strange light appeared at the foot of my bed. At first it was indistinct, and seemed to me like the faint light of a moonbeam trying to pierce through the gloom of my bedchamber. But as I raised myself on my elbow, and gazed steadfastly at it, it assumed a more definite shape. I could see the vague outline of a woman's form gradually emerge from a halo of radiance.

I called to her by name, and as I called her features became distinct.

She visits me now every night, and on each succeeding night her form becomes more and more distinct before my vision. As the welcome light which heralds her approach steals into my room, there now comes with it a sweet fragrance like the scent of many herbs, which fills my senses with an undefinable joy.

But I have had more wonderful experiences, experiences which I never dreamt could have happened to mortal man. The eternal part of me has left its earthly prison of clay and wandered forth in sweet unison with Nina's angelic spirit. It has been my lot to know the true communion of souls, and to journey with my own and only beloved through the realms of infinite space.

It happened thus: After appearing to me as usual, she beckoned me to her. For a moment I felt the most excruciating pain. My heart beat against my ribs with such force that I thought they would be broken. My forehead was struck as if by an electric battery. Then all power left my limbs, and I was unconscious.

How long I remained in this state I cannot tell, but when I awoke I was by Nina's side, in the midst of that halo of radiance in which she always appeared to me. I looked at my bed, and saw there my own body apparently plunged in deep sleep. I could feel Nina's subtle influence. My spirit seemed to merge in hers, and together we were wafted gently from my room.

The agony of that night will haunt me throughout all eternity. My first recollection after leaving my prison chamber, was to find myself in my uncle's house in Eaton Square. Nina drew me with her into the very room where we had last lain. There, before my spiritual gaze, I saw our bodies buried in deep sleep.

How can I depict what followed? Yet the picture is burnt into my brain.

Look! The door opens softly, and the figure of a woman muffled in black approaches the bed. From beneath her wrapper she draws her hand, and in it a razor. Now I see her features. In her eyes there is the cruelty of the man-devouring tigress, glittering more sharply than the steel in her hand. I recognise her now.

She is my cousin Maud. She bends down. With lightning fingers she bares my angel's throat. Another second and the deed is done. The life blood spurts forth, and I see no more.

CHAPTER V.

Mr. Poole Solves the Mystery.

I have been asked to put down on paper all that I know about the Eaton Square tragedy. The task is a difficult one, since the publication of my knowledge proves me to be a selfish schemer.

Some years ago I committed the egregious blunder of placing myself in the power of Colonel Eldridge. From that time I was his slave, and hated him accordingly.

Four years ago he told me he would do me a good turn. He said that he had a ward, and would make me his tutor, with a salary of five hundred a year, until he should come of age. The ward was Michael Crosmaduke, who was then seventeen. He further stated that Michael had a peculiar temper, and that there was hereditary madness of a homicidal nature in his family. My only other instructions were that we should travel on the Continent, and visit him in London once in every six months. Our expenses were limited to a thousand a year.

That was the information which I received from Colonel Eldridge. I gained some more information from Somerset House, which made me suspect that my employer was a fraudulent trustee.

From the time I was first engaged as Michael's tutor to the time of his marriage with Nina Perugia, my suspicions were so constantly confirmed that they became convictions. Except for the short visits twice a year, the Colonel objected to our being in England, which made me conclude that he did not wish the identity of his nephew to be known. During these visits he hinted to me, with the conversational finesse of which he is a perfect master, that he should like me to encourage his nephew in any vices which might be latent in him.

I should mention here that during the whole time that Michael was under my charge I made it my special object to gain all the information in my power in regard to diseases of the brain, more especially those that are hereditary. I had Michael before me as a subject for practical study.

My pupil had no vices, but he had very expensive tastes, and as my own tastes are, and always have been, expensive, we were often short of money. Colonel Eldridge refused to supply us with more than he had agreed to do, so I had to seek the assistance of a shrewd and amiable gentleman named Nock. Being shrewd, he understood our position; being amiable he lent us, or rather Michael, money. I believe he has never repented either his shrewdness or his amiability.

What I have already written is only a prologue to the Eaton Square tragedy. I will come to that at once, only pausing to say that I had never discovered as yet any certain symptoms of insanity in Michael.

After the marriage I came with Michael, his bride, and Luigi Perugia to London, where I left them at the Grand Hotel, as I had to go into the country on business of my own. The next news I heard of Michael was that he was accused of attempting to murder his wife during a fit of insanity.

I was present and gave evidence at his trial, when he was sentenced to be kept in confinement during Her Majesty's pleasure.

Shortly after the trial I had an interview with Colonel Eldridge. At first he abused me, but I told him that I knew him to be a fraudulent trustee. The result of the interview was that I became his private secretary, and went to live at his house in Eaton Square.

By this time Nina had recovered from the wounds which she had received upon the night of the tragedy. Her grief for the fate of her husband was intense, and she often assured me that she was convinced that it was not by his hand the deed had been committed.

I did all I could to comfort her, partly because I was fond of her, and partly because Colonel Eldridge relied on her friendship for me to save him from any awkward questions in regard to the trusteeship.

She was living quietly with her brother in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park, and I was a constant visitor at the house. On several occasions she told me that she had seen her husband in her dreams, and asked me if I believed in the theosophical doctrine of the communion of spirits.

At the time I considered these visions to be merely the outcome of an over-excited brain. Although Colonel Eldridge was in the habit of calling to see her two or three times a week, Maud Eldridge always refused to come with him. She openly declared that she hated the sight of Nina's face.

I was exceedingly anxious to see Michael Crosmaduke at the asylum, and at last, through the medium of the Home Office, obtained a permit to see him. During my visit he told me the story of his dream, which has been already narrated, adding that, since he knew he was innocent, he was perfectly happy. He sent various messages to Nina, and in my opinion was as sane as he ever was in his life.

A fact which had already puzzled me now made me suspicious—namely, that if Michael Crosmaduke had committed the deed of which he was accused, he must have committed it after his fit of rage had subsided. After he had been put into bed, he had not spoken a word to his wife. That he should have attempted to kill her in cold blood, seemed to me to be most improbable.

Who, then, was the guilty party? According to Michael Crosmaduke's story, it must have been Maud Eldridge.

I will say nothing about any feelings of friendship that I possessed, and do still possess, for my old pupil. I will only say that it was to my interest to prove his innocence, and Maud Eldridge's guilt. From a worldly point of view, he would be a better friend to me than Colonel Eldridge.

My experience of life has taught me that, in the majority of instances, the whole truth is of more use than a half confidence. Acting on this experience, I informed my friend, solicitor, and money-lender, Mr. Nock, of my suspicions, and asked him for his advice. He could only suggest one scheme, which I immediately put into execution.

The scheme was to extort a confession from Maud Eldridge, while she was under hypnotic influence. We took into our confidence the most successful professor of hypnotism of the day, and I persuaded Colonel Eldridge to invite him to give an entertainment in Eaton Square. I also persuaded Maud to allow herself to be hypnotised.

I must ask my readers to imagine the consternation which her confession created. When she awoke, and learnt what she had said, she fled to her bedroom and poisoned herself with prussic acid, which she must have purchased with the intention of using in case of discovery by any chance.

On the following morning Colonel Eldridge left London, and has not been heard of since. I have been suitably rewarded by having the management of the Crosmaduke estates.

Michael Crosmaduke has, of course, been released. When I see the happiness of my old pupil and Nina, I wonder at the good which my own selfishness has caused.

P. North.

WARNING

BE WISE AND ORDER

THE ROYAL MAGAZINE

AT ONCE.

Obtain it for certain on OCTOBER 14th.

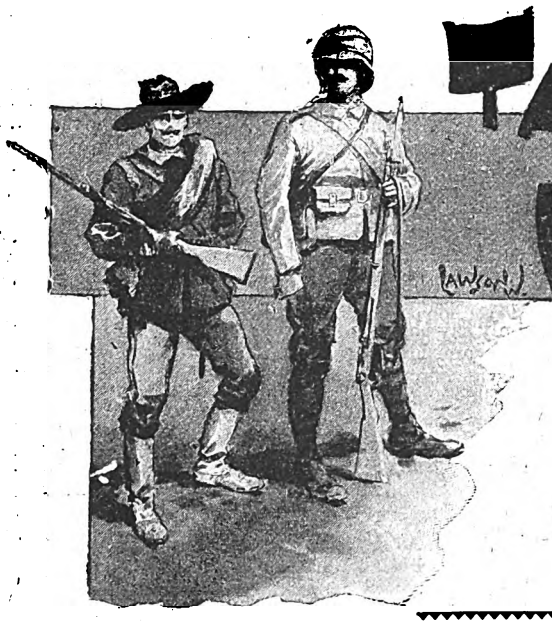
If you do not you will be left on the 15th.

THE ROYAL MAGAZINE

WILL NOT BE LEFT.

3d. 3d.

Digitized by Google



THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXI. (continued).

BRAVE at heart and with the true instincts of a soldier, the Emperor caught at once the nature of the situation, and a fierce anger convulsed him at the spectacle of some of his own picked Berlin troops staggering so quickly beneath the blows of the enemy.

For his troops, drilled with all the art and care of martinet perfection, had for the most part never been in actual warfare. And the sudden dash of the English Reconnaissance Corps, persistent, terrible, and not to be denied, had caused one of those brief panics from which even experienced veterans are not absolutely safe.

Sword in hand and regardless of danger, the Emperor rode among his retreating soldiers, and in furious language bade them take their stand again. Then, with a sudden change of purpose, rushed to a battery stationed hard by which commanded the English advance.

"They are at your mercy!" he shouted to the major in command. "Beat them back! It is a disgrace that a handful of men should withstand the whole German army!"

Glancing round, he saw a gun which remained silent. The British fire had decimated this section of the battery, and the quartermaster lay dead upon the truck. Without hesitation or thought, but yielding to a wild impulse, he sprang off his horse, and surrounded by amazed artillery officers who rushed up, trained the twelve-pounder unaided and with his own hand and fired it into the opposing infantry already pressing hard upon the retreating Berliners.

"Your Majesty!" cried a General officer, who dashed up at this extraordinary spectacle. "For Heaven's sake, remount! You are in the most frightful danger. What shall we say if any harm befall you?"

And so saying, he literally forced the excited Emperor to remount his charger, and without a moment's delay took him off to a safer spot.

It was well he did so. Shamed and encouraged by the brave action of their Emperor, the gunners, although pelted by a fierce fire, stood with desperate courage to their guns, and, as the enemy came more clearly into vision, began to take a surer aim.

In a few minutes a deadly hail of shrapnel opened upon the British Infantry. Already was the Berlin Regiment taking heart again, and thus checked in front and commanded by a frightful fire, severe damage was inflicted upon the brave attackers.

Colonel Stewart, of the Seaforth Highlanders, turned pale for a second as he realised that the fury of victory had carried his men into too precipitate an advance, and that the battery opening upon him would possibly render retreat hideously disastrous. The mist, too, was beginning to clear, and he saw that the whole corps, as it fell back, as arranged, upon the British lines, would be followed by a fire which might reduce the force to rags.

His plan of action was speedily formed.

Rising in his stirrups he yelled to the regiment in ringing tones which could be heard loud above the rattle of musketry: "The Mackenzies have got their chance. We must take these guns. Fix swords! Charge!"

His final order broke into a veritable shriek. He was answered by a wild Scottish cheer, and, without a moment's hesitation, the brave Highlanders rushed full pelt upon the German battery.

It was a terrible, if an heroic sight. The dauntless infantry, heedless of the fierce fire that played on them, closed up again and again as their ranks became thinned, and dashed imperturbable and resistless up the slight slope towards the deadly guns.

It was one of these rare acts which lift and ennoble War, and make it sublime. The Seaforth Highlanders knew well that they were giving their lives for their fellows. If they reached the guns and silenced their fire, it would be probably only by their own self-destruction. And they did not pause to heed this terrible thought, but with devoted heroism bore down upon the foe.

Step by step they pursued their way, falling in dozens as they advanced; but their fierce persistence had its effect. Mere courage could not withstand the grim, awful determination of men who knew they were doomed, and cared not for their safety. Bursting through the wavering ranks of a German infantry regiment which sprang forward to the support of the artillery, the noble remnant of the famous regiment cut their way to the battery, and in a second one of the guns was spiked.

It seemed unlikely that more than this could be effected. Dashing up from all sides, reinforcements from the foe arrived and threatened to surround them, and make of the battery a deadly carnage heap. The Highlanders held their ground nobly, and with superb defiance withstood a wild attack before which almost any regiment might be pardoned for staggering.

Digitized by Google

But now, in what seemed the last moments of a deed seldom parallelled, there came a new and welcome shout.

Fired it into the opposing infantry.

"Old England for ever!" was the cry borne upon their ears.

Amid the confusion it was difficult at first to realise what had happened.

Stationed some distance away, and engaged in assisting in the retreat and covering the retiring infantry, the 1st Dragoons had witnessed from afar the heroic effort of the Seaforth Highlanders.

Nor did Colonel Tomkinson wait to consider.

Forming his men, he bade them charge. Along the enemy's lines swept this magnificent regiment of cavalry, impetuous and terrible.

Tearing through opposing obstacles, and by sheer weight and valour beating aside the press of opposition, the Dragoons dashed like a whirlwind up the slope and cut into the swaying mass surrounding the gallant Highlanders.

So sudden, so magnificent, so resistless was the charge, that the whole enemy yielded, half beaten back, and half magnetised. In a second the remaining guns were rudely harnessed to some of the cavalry horses by the Dragoons. The Seaforth thus cloaked were soon enabled to rapidly retire towards their lines, leaving the foe amazed and wildly wroth, not only at the escape of their quarry, but at the loss of their guns.

From his post away to the right the Emperor William had seen the magnificent charge of the British cavalry, and in pride of soldiership could not refrain from an involuntary cry of angry admiration.

Mistaking his emotion, General Krudsdel, who was at his side, observed:

"Ah, those English! They have the devil's own luck."

His amazement was unbounded when his Emperor, turning fiercely round, said in indignant tones:

"Silence, sir! What do you mean by your insinuation? Do you know that those are the 1st Dragoons? I am their Colonel."

And turning his back upon his astounded General, he rode off.

Within two hours the masterly skill of General Fraser had carried the Reconnaissance Corps to safety. It had effected his mission.

Thousands of Germans lay dead upon the field. But this was not the worst.

For the enemy had commenced to know and to fear the might of the British Tommy.

The Emperor's precept had been terribly borne out in practice.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Unexpected Happens.

When Admiral Mahan quitted the shores of the United States he was fully convinced that the American nation and their political leaders held widely different views on the struggle in Europe. The sympathies of nearly every class of the community were entirely with the Mother Country, whilst the Washington bureaucrats thought they were playing at high politics by adopting a cautious and neutral attitude.

The Admiral also knew that as soon as the Sovereign People had made its opinions clearly known the politicians would "climb down."

Individually he was strongly on the side of Great Britain. Not only was her quarrel just—thus claiming his support as an upright and conscientious man of the world—but there was also a personal phase. As a sailor he quivered with the hope that when the United States navy came into action it might be to aid the flag of Nelson against any assailant, however powerful or ambitious.

Yet, he had his definite orders, and these must be obeyed against all quixotic inclinations, even though the performance of his duty should lead to the destruction of the ideals of his whole active life.

As a non-combatant, however, he was in no way prevented from offering his best wishes to Vice-Admiral James E. Erskine when he encountered the British North-American fleet on its way to the English Channel.

The two fleets sighted each other in mid-ocean on the fifth morning after Admiral Mahan had left New York, and when they came more closely together the American commander accepted the British Admiral's invitation to lunch, the two being, of course, already well acquainted.

"Why are you returning to Europe?" inquired Admiral Mahan when they were conversing together, apart from the other officers, on the quarter-deck of the Crescent.

"I really don't know," said Erskine. "It seemed to me that our home forces had absolutely crumpled up all the enemy's ships except the cruisers that escaped through Gib. and reached Brest in safety, and these could easily be held tight there by a section of the Channel Fleet. Under such conditions it would surely have been better to leave me in Canadian waters. But my instructions were imperative. I was to start forthwith, and call at Queenstown for further orders, keeping an eye open on the way for any stray French or German ships which might have designs on our commerce."

"It is curious, certainly."

"Yes," was the thoughtful rejoinder, "so curious that it suggests a tremendous possibility."

"And what is that?" said the American.

"Russia may be about to join the coalition against us."

Admiral Mahan uttered a prolonged whistle to give vent to his amazement—a proceeding so unlike the regulation deportment of a British officer of similar rank that a passing marine nearly followed his example.

"Snakes!" he said at last, "I wish that little business had been fixed up before I left New York."

It was now the turn of the Englishman to be puzzled. "Why?" he inquired.

"Because," came the emphatic reply, "my people are feeling real mean as it is about France and Germany rounding on you in such an underhanded way, but if they knew that Russia was also taking a hand in the game, I should not be sailing alongside you to-day by accident, but by design."

The brave Highlanders rushed upon the German battery.

"Are you quite sure of that?" said the other eagerly. "I must say that I despaired of help from the States when I read the speeches of your prominent men and the articles of your chief newspapers."

"I guess I know the American people pretty well by this time," was Admiral Mahan's confident answer, "and you must not forget that the people pay for both the men and the papers. They can have a fresh tune whenever they like, you bet."

Under existing circumstances the two officers agreed that it was inadvisable they should long continue in company, and the American Commander decided upon a more southerly course, as he was in no very urgent hurry to reach his destination, which, by the way, was the British Channel, where he could coal and be out of the way of the belligerents for the time, whilst within easy call of the American Minister in London.

Digitized by Google

Before parting the crews of both fleets cheered each other heartily. The American bands played "Rule Britannia," and the British bands struck up "Hail Columbia," following on with "Yankee Doodle."

Not to be outdone, and by way of a final message, the flagship of the U.S. fleet sent across the waters the strains of "Auld Lang Syne."

Thus, with mutual good wishes, the fleets of England and the United States slowly diverged in their journey eastwards, and ere the light failed over the sea they were hull down on the horizon from each other.

Vice-Admiral Erskine had a fairly smart lot of ships under his flag. They were not heavy vessels, it is true, and unable to encounter battleships of the latest type, but still, had such put in an appearance, there would, to use the classic expression of a gunner's mate on the Crescent, have been "a devil of a row." In addition to four recently built first-class cruisers, the Sutlej, Jumna, Narbudda, and Jhelum, there were the usual members of the North-American fleet, namely, the Buzzard, Canada, Cleopatra, Magicienne, Mohawk, Partridge, Pelican, Tartar, and Tourmaline—fourteen ships, all fast and all well armed with quick-firing guns.

On the morning after they had said good-bye to Admiral Mahan, the British fleet discerned the smoke of a distant assemblage of ships slightly northward of their course, and Admiral Erskine at once took measures to be prepared for all eventualities.

It was well that he did so.

Within half-an-hour's time he had counted eighteen French and German cruisers. Evidently these were the vessels that had slipped through Gibralter and remained so long inactive in the harbour at Brest. Their mission now was to cut off all communication between Canada and England, and they regarded themselves as fully equal to the task of capturing the British North-American fleet when they encountered it.

Nevertheless Vice-Admiral von Grüdenau didn't expect to meet his opponent in mid-Atlantic.

In fact he had been caught napping in every sense of the word, and Admiral Erskine was quick to realise that he was probably far more prepared for an immediate engagement than was the enemy. Anyhow, he resolved to act upon the assumption, and whilst the French and German ships commenced to make distance for effective manœuvring the British Admiral flew this signal: "Pick out your opponent and go straight for him."

The battle commenced at 8.10 a.m., by the Crescent firing at the German flagship Augusta, and within one hour and fifteen minutes four British ships and nine of the allied fleet had sunk, whilst the remainder of the enemy had struck their colours.

A Cunard steamship, the Lucania, had come up just as the opposing fleets were closing together, and one of her passengers thus described the fight in a letter to a friend:

"Excitement on board was almost at the point of madness as we saw the two masses of ships quietly nearing each other, without the slightest sound being audible over the intervening stretch of water. It was a positive relief to the nerves when the British flagship sent a shell whizzing at the enemy, who promptly replied.

"From that moment we certainly could not complain of want of noise. Not only was there the banging and clashing of the big guns and the rattle of small arms, but the constant clang of the projectiles against the armoured portions of the ships reminded one for all the world of the hammering and clattering in a shipbuilding yard.

"This, however, was not ship-making, but ship-breaking. In a little while we saw a vessel pitch on to her nose and go straight down. We believed her colours were French, but could not be sure.

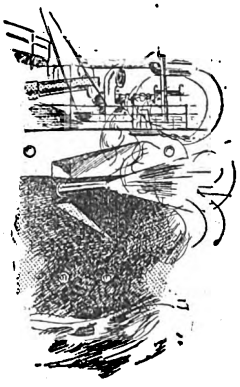
"Someone appealed to the Captain, a Scotchman, and asked him which side was winning. The Captain glared awfully at him and said; 'Are ye daft, man, tae ask sic a drivelling idiot's question'? Of course, the Captain, like the rest of us, hoped there would be only one end to it.

"At last it was all over. The noise ceased, the smoke rolled away from the face of the water, and we could see the Union Jack floating proudly, whilst not another flag was in sight.

"Then we cheered like mad, and the women began to cry for sheer relief. Captain Macpherson nearly burst the foghorn and steamwhistle before he gave the order to resume our course to New York."

The victory, though complete, had been dearly purchased. Several of the British ships were as badly damaged as those of the enemy which still floated, and nearly all were rendered so unseaworthy that a moderate gale would have endangered their existence.

Admiral Erskine found that over thirty per cent. of his men were killed or wounded, whilst on board the French and German ships the carnage had been terrible, and he had to send one half of his available medical staff to their assistance.



The British flagship sent a shell whizzing at the enemy.

Three at least of the enemy were quite disabled, and the Crescent, Narbudda, and Magicienne had to take them in tow.

By nightfall, the weather fortunately remaining calm, the British commander had succeeded in securing something in the disposition of his crippled fleet, which now commenced to move quietly eastwards, with the prospect of reaching Queenstown in about four days' time.

The night was clear, and the lights of the great company of vessels could consequently be distinguished at a considerable distance.

When, therefore, Commander James E. Tully, of the fast dispatch vessel Seahorse, sighted them, he knew that he must risk signalling an enemy and trust to his heels afterwards if the fleet should turn out to be hostile.

He sent up four white rockets followed by a red one and waited anxiously for the reply, with his hand on the engine-room indicator. It came, four red rockets and one white, and he knew to his exceeding joy, that he had fallen in with Erskine's force.

As speedily as possible he was conveyed to the flagship. He handed an Admiralty dispatch to his superior officer, and then, with the quick, comprehensive glance of a sailor, took in the details of the day's proceedings.

Admiral Erskine paled as he read the instructions he had just received.

"Great Heavens!" he cried, "my victory has been as disastrous as a defeat. I suppose you guess the contents of this dispatch, Commander Tully?"

"I am afraid I do, sir," was the answer. "When I left Portsmouth the newspapers stated that although Russia had not definitely declared war the Government feared treachery on her part. A strong Russian fleet had slipped through the Baltic and was last sighted, the day before yesterday, off the north-west of Scotland. The Surprise is also looking for you on the southern route, and I might have missed you if I had not fallen in with the American——"

Digitized by Google

"Ha," interrupted the Admiral. "Did you tell Mahan your news?"

"It was the first question he asked me after giving me the fullest information with regard to your possible location. He at once inquired if Russia had declared war."

"And what did you say?"

"I thought I was justified, sir, in giving him such news as I possessed."

"Perfectly justified. What did he do then?"

"He informed me of the chance of your meeting the allied fleets, which I see you have done, sir, with splendid effect, and at once, judging by his smoke-stacks, he started for England full speed ahead."

The Admiral gazed hopelessly at the papers in his hands before he said in a broken voice: "My orders are to proceed with all possible haste to the Bristol Channel to intercept a possible Russian attack upon our coal supply, and here I am, in mid-Atlantic, with a practically disabled fleet, hardly making five knots an hour and utterly unfitted to fight half-a-dozen well-handled colliers. Oh, it is cruel, cruel!"

But Erskine was not the man to flinch before difficulties, however insurmountable they might appear.

"Commander Tully," he said with his wonted calm tones of subdued energy, "you must return at once to Valentia and telegraph the facts of the case thence to London. Say that five of my ships can make ten knots, and at that rate we will reach the Bristol Channel. The others are useless, save to act as broken-down convoy to the nine ships I have captured. The other nine French and German cruisers are at the bottom of the Atlantic. If Providence so decrees, the rest of the fleet will in due course reach Queenstown. As a final word—every minute lost in conveying this news to the Admiralty renders the case of England more desperate."

Commander Tully saluted, swung himself over the side of the Crescent without waiting for the formality of a ladder, and said as he reached his boat: "Bend to it, my lads. 'Sharp's' the word with the davits, as the ship starts the moment I reach deck."

During four weary days did Admiral Erskine pace the deck of the Crescent, whilst his now tiny force crept along at what appeared to be a snail's pace over the vast expanse of the Atlantic.

More than ten knots he did not dare to ask his engineers to make, and it was only by almost superhuman efforts on the part of those devoted officers that even this moderate rate of speed was attained without the ever-threatened breakdown.

During this miserable period of inaction not a vessel was seen save one or two belated cargo-boats travelling eastwards, and from the absence of all outward-bound traffic, the British commander argued the fulfilment of his worst fears—namely, an expected or actual attack upon England by the Russians.

It was an ill task asking the Admiral any questions at this time, yet he achieved wonders in the way of repairs to his damaged ships as they progressed, and by the time they sighted Lundy Island they presented a highly creditable appearance. No one would ever judge by their superficial semblance that they had recently passed the ordeal of a terrific naval engagement.

It was midday on Thursday, May 25th, that the British fleet passed north of Lundy, and it was with a wildly beating heart that Erskine slowly deciphered the message signalled by the lighthouse keeper, who was telephonically connected with the mainland.

And this is what the fluttering little flags tediously spelled out:

"American fleet anchored off Cardiff last night. At daybreak strong Russian fleet passed up Channel to attack Cardiff. Negotiations took place between America and Russian Admirals, and it is believed that American Admiral insists upon delay in Russian attack. Reason not known. Channel Fleet now off Land's End on way from Havre."

Erskine smiled for the first time for four days. In fact, his accustomed good humour returned with avidity to make up for his previous anxiety.

"Mahan is a brick!" he exclaimed. "I might have known he would work off some dodge upon them. Played them up strong, I expect, upon the protection of commerce idea." And he stamped about the quarter-deck with such joyful eagerness the men knew all was right so far, and the wounded turned more comfortably in their berths as the good news permeated through the ship.

Embraced by his sister and his fiancee.

Three hours later the five ships were abreast of the Nash Lights. When the broad reach of the Channel between the Steep Holm Island and Barry began to open up, the British fleet suddenly saw three battleships and four cruisers, flying the Russian colours, coming down Channel, and Erskine at once threw his vessels in line across their path.

Preparations were speedily made for a fight, but when the Russians were some two miles distant they were seen, to the amazement of the British, in view of the disparity of the forces, to stop dead and strike their colours.

This token of unconditional surrender was immediately followed by a signal from the leading battleship: "To avoid useless bloodshed I yield.—Michaelovitch, Grand Duke and Commander-in-Chief."

Such an astounding piece of good luck could hardly be credited by the British Admiral, but by this time his officers were beginning to note through their glasses that the Russians showed many signs of recent severe handling.

It was indeed true that they were wholly unfitted to struggle against an apparently fully equipped foe, although vastly superior in class of ship and weight of armament; yet the wonder of the British officers now became absolute bewilderment. How had this thing happened?

In a few minutes the Russian Grand Duke was tendering his sword to Admiral Erskine.

"We could not fight against a fresh fleet," he said in excellent English. "My ships are practically disabled, and mere floating hospitals."

"Well we are mostly paint and bandages ourselves," said the Englishman.

Michaelovitch, Grand Duke, stamped his foot with rage upon the deck as he glanced round and saw that he had surrendered prematurely to a foe almost as crippled as himself and of such infinitely less relative power.

"You must not take it too much to heart," continued Admiral Erskine, in kindly tones. "You could not have escaped. The Channel Fleet is only six hours behind me."

The Russian tried to find comfort in the fact, but he was nevertheless furious at his own precipitation.

"Who fought you, anyway?" said Erskine.

"That irrepressible Yankee," growled the other. "He first tried to delay my operations and when I refused to fall in with his views formed up his ships between me and the port. I had no alternative but to attack him—with this result."

The agony of the Russian Admiral was such that Erskine could not seek to comfort him.

The Russian ships then put about and the whole compact moved slowly on towards Cardiff.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXIII.

Cheap Steam Coal.

"Oh, Irene, what awful news is this!"

"What?" cried Lady Irene Vyne, starting to her feet with passionate intensity.

"Russia has declared war. The paper says that the information is authorised by the Foreign Office, so it must be true."

The Russian delegate found himself confronted by the Harbour-Master.

"Is that all? My dear Ethel, I thought something had happened to Teddy," and the pale-faced but imperious young beauty sank back into her chair with an expression of absolute relief at the insignificance of the intelligence.

"But, Irene, surely this is serious enough! They say here that an attack in force may be expected anywhere on the coast at any moment. Newcastle, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Liverpool, are all anxious, as a Russian fleet has entered the North Sea, and its whereabouts is unknown, whilst the Russian Ambassador is leaving at once. The Channel Fleet is at Havre, and is ordered back for the defence of the South Coast. The two special squadrons are recalled from Kiel and Stralsund. It is awfully dangerous for the troops, is it not?" and Ethel Harington pensively dropped the fatal news-sheet and gazed affrightedly at her friend.

"Dearest, how can you think so? Have not our armies beaten the French and Germans every time they have met them? Are they not strongly entrenched with their bases on the sea, upon which no enemy's ship floats save this new ally? If we must face the world in arms let us do it with the same spirit we have displayed so far. Let the Russians send their ships. We will repair them and re-christen them in our dock-yards." Irene's colour came as she spoke, and a fearless light leaped into her sweet blue eyes.

"I wish I had your courage," said the other. "But then, you know, I never hear from Frank, whilst you have news from Teddy so often."

Irene went and knelt by the side of her companion and tenderly put her arms about her. "Ethel," she said. "If I were told that Teddy was killed, which God forbid should His merciful wisdom so decree, it would break my heart, but I should still rejoice that my country had received the sacrifice. Neither men nor women must think of fear whilst England is in danger."

Tears rose unbidden to the eyes of both girls, and they were silent for a moment. The door was flung open and Major Harington entered, to be impulsively flown at and embraced by his sister and his fiancée.

"Oh, Teddy, how did you come?" cried one.

"And when did you come?" said the other.

"But we're so glad you're here."

"We were just crying about your imaginary funeral."

"And Irene said——"

"I'm sure I didn't. You began about the Russians."

Then both together—"Do sit down and tell us all about it."

Major Harington, looking browner and thinner than when they had last met, did sit down, but promptly jumped up and kissed them both again. He seemed inclined to repeat the process, but they seized him and held him in an easy chair, while Irene said:

"If you don't tell us the news at once, you will get no tea."

Thus coerced, he explained that Lord Roberts had sent General Massy back to see hurriedly to some final details concerning the forwarding of the Third French Expedition, and that he, Harington, had accompanied the General as his A.D.C.

Great excitement and uncertainty prevailed at the War Office owing to the expected Russian attack. Lord Wolseley had delayed the departure of the first detachment of the Third Army Corps until it was known whether or not their services would be required to repel an invasion. It was not certain that transports accompanied the Russian fleet—that remained to be seen.

"As for me," concluded Harington, "I have exactly forty minutes' leave, and here I am."

"You're looking splendid," cried his sister.

"I must tell my father and mother you are here," said Irene. "They will be delighted to see you. But before they come I want to give you something." She leant over him, took his face between her hands, and kissed him.

This action, simple enough though it was, yet had an element of strangeness in its manner.

"That is very nice of you," said Harington. "But may I ask the reason of this special sign of favour?"

"Because I am proud of you, Teddy. If you had been killed whilst taking those guns, I should have worn a wedding-ring all my life as a lasting token of my faithfulness to the memory of the man who was to have been my husband."

Lady Irene Vyne was thoroughbred right through.

* * * *

On the morning of May 25th the early risers among the people of Cardiff were eating their breakfast and discussing the possible whereabouts of the Russian fleet, when a thrill of pleasureable excitement passed rapidly from the pier-head to the town at the news that a strong American flotilla of six battleships and eleven cruisers had anchored in the roads.

Councillor Ramsdale was the Mayor for that year, and notwithstanding the anxieties and duties entailed by the war, he never forgot the hospitable traditions of his dignified position.

He was soon astir and hastily convened a meeting of the General Purposes Committee to provide for the due entertainment of the officers of a friendly Power, as the hourly increasing sympathy of the United States had caused a keen sentiment of grateful kindliness to spring forth in all parts of the kingdom.

As it transpired, the committee, which met at ten o'clock, had a very different question for consideration.

"Steam coal will be cheap to-morrow."

Admiral Mahan at once sent the first lieutenant of the Minneapolis ashore to ascertain if there were any United State vessels in dock and preparing for a voyage.

There were two bound for New York and Philadelphia and loading with tin-plates in the Roath Dock.

"When will you be ready for sea?" said the naval officer to the two captains, whom he found at the shipping-office of the Board of Trade.

"To-night's tide," said one.

"Midday to-morrow," replied the other.

"I guess you'd better sail in company to-morrow," said the officer. "You'd feel kinder lonesome otherwise. The United States want those tin-plates particular bad?" he went on.

"Particular," assented one captain.

Digitized by Google

"It'll be a cruel thing for Philadelphia if that white metal ain't delivered by June 6th," said his companion.

"And I suppose that six-inch shells and shrapnel won't hurry up the loading?"

"You can stand on me, Admiral; my ship won't take any more tin under them unfavourable conditions."

"Commodore, there'll be a scarcity of tinplates in Philadelphia for a considerable period."

The lieutenant carefully noted the names of the vessels, the captains, and the owners, with the details of their charter-parties, and returned to the flagship.

Meanwhile Cardiff, and in a brief space the rest of the country, became strangely convulsed by the arrival of successive telegrams and telephonic messages announcing the passing of an unknown fleet of warships—flying no colours, but believed to be Russian—by Lundy Island, by the Mumbles Lighthouse, by Nash point, and, finally, by Barry.

At 10.30 a.m. the sound of cannon boomed over the sea.

Twenty Russian ships—at last their ensigns were hoisted—were rapidly steaming between the Steep and Flat Holm Islands and Lavernock Point on the mainland, and the miserable little batteries at those places were feebly thundering forth defiance to the enemy.

But the Russians knew that the weapons, mostly dating from the Crimean war, did not even cover the few intervening miles of the Channel, dropping their projectiles harmlessly into the sea, and leaving a broad central passage untouched. They did not even trouble to reply.

At eleven o'clock they hove to opposite the town, but somewhat to one side of, and farther away than the American ships.

The Mayor, and several members of the Corporation hurried to the pier office in order to learn the fate of the port at the earliest moment, and the local volunteers—such few as were left after the drafts for foreign service had been met—and some companies of the auxiliary army, formed up in the same locality.

Lord Wolseley telegraphed that Sir Richard Harrison and staff were travelling by special train to Cardiff, and that 100,000 men with 200 guns, would be in the town by four o'clock. The Channel Fleet, too, had started under forced draught from Portsmouth, where it had arrived from Havre.

The Russians had barely halted before a steam launch rapidly left the Kronstadt, and, flying a flag of truce, throbbed its way up the entrance of the channel, finally depositing a magnificent-looking officer and two juniors, attended by a small guard of marines, on the steps at the pierhead.

The Russian delegate found himself confronted by the Harbour-Master when he reached the quay.

"I would have the honour to see the Governor of the city," he smilingly explained, recognising the official by his uniform.

"This way," was the stern answer, and the party marched into the Pier Offices, which were close at hand.

The Mayor stepped forward at once to meet them.

He was pale with emotion, but furious at the thought of the pending horrors for his town and people.

"Well, sir," he said, with all the calmness he could muster, "what is your business?"

The Russian still smiled, and explained, speaking carefully, but most politely:

"The Grand Duke Michaelovitch, admiral in command of the fleet of His Majesty the Tsar, being instructed of destroying your docks and railways, is about to give them the dynamite. Also will he sink all ships in the harbour of you. He desires no evil to unarmed people, and women, and the child, but if any resist he will cannonade the city."

"Tell him, sir," said the Mayor, "that we fear neither him, nor his cannon, nor his master. Armed or unarmed, we defy him. And let me tell you, sir," he went on, with increasing vehemence, "that if you land here again with your men we will improve your English and add a lesson in Welsh!"

The envoy understood sufficient of this forcible speech for his purpose. He bowed most ceremoniously, and was escorted back to his launch by the Harbour-Master, amid the dead silence of the onlookers.

Admiral Mahan.

The Major was the first to break the spell cast upon the assembled leaders of the community by the dread presence of the enemy at the very threshold of the town.

"Come!" he cried. "Let us arm ourselves as best we may. We must, if need be, die in our streets to keep back the enemy until help is at hand."

A German coal-shipper, naturalised by long residence in South Wales, who had joined the group round the Mayor, sneered at the folly of the proceedings.

"Steam coal vill be cheap to-morrow," he said.

The Mayor heard him and turned fiercely upon him.

"Have you any to sell, sauerkraut?" he inquired.

The German was nettled at the nick-name.

"More dan you can buy," he snapped.

"How much, and what's your price?"

"Ten tausend tons at five shillings," cried the Teuton, who knew in the event of bombardment the port would be ruined.

"Here's a cheque for £2,500," said the Mayor, seizing a pen and ink. "Give me in return an undertaking to supply the coal or its market price, whichever you choose, to me or my heirs to-morrow at noon."

The German did not hesitate, the documents were exchanged, and next day at the appointed hour, the shipper, almost on his knees, besought the Mayor to take £5,000, and let him off his contract, as the market price of steam coal, f.o.b., was 16s. per ton.

Admiral Mahan had not been a disinterested spectator of the passage of the Russian launch up the fairway of the channel, and its subsequent return.

He forthwith dispatched to the Kronstadt the same officer who had landed at Cardiff in the earlier hours of the day.

When the lieutenant was brought before the Russian commander-in-chief he was laconic.

"Admiral Mahan, of the United States Navy," he said, "instructs me to ask your purpose in visiting British shores."

"I am delighted to explain to such a distinguished officer, who so ably represents a friendly country, that my mission is to destroy this and other ports in Great Britain," was the Grand Duke's answer.

"Russia having declared war against England?"

"Exactly." Michaelovitch, Grand Duke, urbane though he was, resented the interrogator's manner.

"Has notice been given to the United States of your attitude?" went on the lieutenant, quite regardless of the change of tone in the superior person with whom he was conversing.

"I presume so. That is a matter of diplomatic detail to which I have paid no attention."

"There are two American ships in dock here, and they cannot complete loading until to-morrow. They could not arrange otherwise, having received no warning of the outbreak of hostilities between England and Russia. Against a French or German fleet they take their own risk, of course, but in your case and under the circumstances, Admiral Mahan has directed me to ask you to delay your bombardment until these two vessels have loaded and sailed."

The Grand Duke laughed with angry surprise. "Preposterous!" he shouted. "Did anyone ever hear of such a childish request?" and he turned to his staff to volubly explain in Russian.

Digitized by Google

Every man guffawed loudly, but the American sailor surveyed them stolidly, though a slight flush came to his face.

"I have the greatest respect for your famous commander, in whom, as a seaman, I recognise a master, but I fear I cannot extend the same regard for his opinions on international law," said the Russian, who had now recovered his wonted complaisance.

"Admiral Mahan did not send me to seek your opinion of his acquirements," was the calm answer. "I am here to state his unalterable wishes."

"Unalterable wishes!" growled the Grand Duke, again astounded at the language used to him. "You must have misunderstood your commander, sir. Have the goodness to return to him and ask him to send a more intelligent representative—after I have finished my work. I am busy now."

For the first time during the interval the American officer smiled. "I am using my commander's exact words," he said.

"And if I refuse this mad demand," cried the Russian prince, now thoroughly aroused, "what is the alternative?"

"You must first pass through the United States fleet," was the quiet and measured response.

The officer spoke as though he were uttering the merest triviality, but his heart bounded tumultuously as he uttered the fateful words.

"Holy Nicholas! This is too much," shouted Michaelovitch. "Quit my ship, sir, and tell your admiral from me that I give your two ships half-an-hour to clear out of dock, and your fleet the same time to shift its moorings. In thirty minutes I open fire."

The lieutenant saluted and tripped lightly down the gangway to his launch.

When Admiral Mahan heard the result of the interview, his gleaming eyes alone showed the fire that flamed in his soul.

He turned to his flag-lieutenant and said:

"Have all preparations been made according to my directions?"

"All, sir. Every ship noted them and signified their completion."

"Then signal 'Prepare for action.' Ships will follow the flagship at six cable length and take station accordingly."

The United States fleet moved slowly off in the wake of the Minneapolis, and when they halted in line in the fairway of the channel they were interposed between the town of Cardiff and the Russian armament.

At one o'clock precisely the Russians deployed for the attack, and the Kronstadt signalled:

"I am about to open fire."

"Better wait twenty-four hours," came the reply from the Minneapolis.

The answer to this was a shell, which whizzed through the centre of the American line of ships and finally destroyed the remnants of the low-water pier.

Admiral Mahan was equally punctilious. A six-inch shell was sent shrieking past the bows of the Kronstadt.

Before it had dropped harmlessly into the sea far away towards the blue coast of Devon, so charmingly silhouetted against the bright summer sky, the two fleets were furiously engaged.

Admiral Mahan shouted to the captain of his ship, for an ordinary tone of voice would have been inaudible amidst the roar of the guns:

"If I've got to be hanged on my own quarter-deck I'll have a jolly good fight here first!"

(To be continued.)

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS
GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

THERE MAY BE ONE FOR YOU!

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☛ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

In many cases sovereigns must have been awarded to people who are not readers of our paper.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 2 distribution must reach us by October 17th, addressed to

The 2nd Sovereign Editor,
"Short Stories" Office,
Henrietta Street,
London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately. You may not apply in more than one competition on the same post-card.

NOTE.—A similar, but independent, competition in which 50 sovereigns are given away is appearing weekly in HOME NOTES and THE ATHLETIC RECORD.

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

TRILENE TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Miss HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,

62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row. (Est. 1850.)

Parcel free from observation

THE BEST HAIR DYE

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN, NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

Your Esteemed Inquiry Duly to Hand.

D. S.—About a quarter of the inhabitants of Paris live in apartments.

Yankee-Doodle.—The total length of railways in Great Britain is rather more than 21,000 miles. A very good proportion, when you remember that the total area of Great Britain is only 121,000 square miles.

G. G. puts the question: "Who is the greatest Royal traveller?"————I should say the Emperor William of Germany excels in this matter, while the King of the Belgians and the Prince of Wales might come next.

P. P.—Portugal is the ancient Lusitania. Its present name is derived from Porto Callo, the original appellation of Oporto. The latter name is the English rendering of O Porto, "The Port."

E. D. W. asks: "What is a 'rote of waves'?"————It is a favourite idea of the fishing and seafaring people of the north-east of Scotland, that in a storm three waves are strong and violent, while the fourth is comparatively weak and less dangerous. This succession they call a "rote of waves."

W. G. S.—Your friend is quite right; there is no mikado. The Emperor of Japan is known as "Tenno Hei-Ka," which means "His Imperial Majesty." Thus the people of Japan address their sovereign in exactly the same manner as do the subjects of the Kaiser. It is true, "Mikado" used at one time to be the title. It has, however, fallen into abeyance for several generations.

D. E. S.—True, the Tsar has some very large estates, one covering over one hundred million of acres, which is, in fact, more than three times the size of England. You must remember, however, that one acre of ground in London is worth more than a hundred million acres in the Russian steppes. The Tsar's biggest estate only brings him in £95,000 a year, while land in London has been sold for as much as £1,000 a square yard.

Tom Tucker is about to start on an ocean voyage for the first time in his life. He writes to ask me if I can tell him of any way by which he can find out whether he is likely to suffer from sea-sickness or not.————An easy way to put the matter to a test is to stand before an ordinary mirror that turns in its frame, and to let someone move it slowly and slightly at first, and gradually growing faster while you look at your own reflection. If you feel no effect whatever from it, the chances are that you will be able to stand an ordinary sea-voyage without any qualm.

T.—Probably the most ancient pulpit in England still in use is that in Lutterworth Church, in which Wycliff preached. It remains intact.

Doc.—The highest death rate seems to be one of Russia's records. At Krasnovarsk it reaches the appalling figure of 100 per 1,000, that is, one in every ten. It is 70 per 1,000 in several districts, and even in Moscow, among the lower classes, it occasionally reaches 44 per 1,000. These figures refer to a week when the death rate in London was 14·5 per 1,000.

B. B.—Boiling alive, as a punishment, is hardly dead yet, if we may believe the statement that came on good authority from Persia in the early part of the present decade. A tax-collector, who had been found guilty of appropriating State funds, was done to death in that manner. This was for the double purpose of punishing him and encouraging the others to be honest.

Schoolboy writes to ask if such a person as "John Gilpin of 'credit and renown' ever really existed."————Certainly he did, and he lived in a cottage at Thornton Heath, near Croydon, which is still standing, although, of course, it is in a very dilapidated condition, the roof being thickly covered with stout ivy roots, and a rich crop of weeds grows on the soil which a period of three hundred years has deposited on the tiles.

A cycling friend gave me a useful little tip the other day, which I now repeat for the benefit of my cycling readers. It is this. If you are unfortunate enough to get a punctured tyre when riding in the country miles away from anywhere, and find yourself out of rubber solution, an effective cement for repairing can be made with a teaspoonful of glycerine and a gill of glue, both of which ingredients can be purchased at any village shop.

B. V.—Of the rulers of great states who have been done to death during the past thirty years or so, three were Presidents. The United States have lost two—Lincoln, shot in a theatre by Booth in 1865, and Garfield, mortally wounded by Guiteau in 1881. The assassination of President Carnot of France is still fresh in our memories. Other rulers were the following: In 1874 the Sultan Abdul Aziz of Turkey "died suddenly"; it is generally understood that his journey to the Mohammedan paradise was accelerated by the application of a pair of scissors to a vein, but details are, of course, wanting. In 1881, the Tsar Alexander of Russia, grandfather of the present ruler, was horribly mutilated by the explosion of a bomb. The Empress of Austria does not, strictly speaking, come under the head of "ruler."

S. L.—The London Spas had a national reputation at one time. There is only one left now; it is not far from High Street, Streatham. It belongs to a firm of dairy farmers, who sell the water at one penny a glass. The water has a slight taste of sulphur, and is strongly impregnated with iron.

Sub.—What may fairly be termed a subterranean city exists in Galicia, in Austrian Poland. It is called the City of the Salt Mines, has a population of more than a thousand men, women, and children, many of whom have never seen the light of day, and possesses a town hall, a church, and a theatre. In the church are several statues, carved from rock salt.

H. E.—The Jewish congregation of Worms, in Germany, is of extreme antiquity. It is claimed that the community was established before the destruction of the Second Temple. On one occasion the members of this ancient body, when petitioning their monarch for more liberal treatment, pleaded that their ancestors took no part in the Crucifixion, as they had been settled in Worms long before the birth of Christ.

E M. writes: "I am pining to make a record of some kind—easily. I am going out to Tongaland, in the Western Pacific, and I shall take my bicycle; in that way I shall make a record—I shall be the first to introduce the wheel there."————You are a little late, E. M. The first bicycle was introduced into Tonga last year; this was followed by several others, and on the occasion of the king's birthday there was actually a bicycle race. Some of the natives are taking very kindly to it.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Back blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 18th, if intended for the Issue on sale Nov. 1st, and dated Nov. 5th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NO COMPETITION!

£200

IN CASH PRIZES!!!

SEND NO MONEY. NO ENTRANCE FEES.

This large sum will be absolutely given away in order to introduce our New Season's Price Lists of Linen and Fancy Novelties to the Public throughout the Kingdom. You may win a Sovereign and obtain the Price Lists post free by sending us a post-card with your name and address written thereon. Nothing could be simpler.

The Cash will be distributed thus:—Every Monday Price Lists will be posted to all who sent post-cards during the previous week, and the first twenty directed will be entitled to

ONE POUND EACH!

Everyone will be informed of the results with the Lists, the only condition being that all Prize winners must send us an order and P.O. for any goods selected to the value of 5s. or over within seven days.

Value of Prizes already distributed this year—£437.

In addition to the above Cash Prizes we will each week send a free Silk Handkerchief to the next 100, and we are sure these beautiful Prizes will also greatly advertise our Handkerchief Department.

Last season we received 4,118 repeat orders and thousands of Testimonials from our Customers, which conclusively prove the sterling value of our Goods.

Remember there are 200 Sovereign Prizes to be sent out before December 19th. Would one be useful to you? Then send a post-card at once to

JAMES ROBERTSON & CO.

(DEPT. K),

LINEN MERCHANTS,

63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON

Digitized by Google

KOKO
FOR THE HAIR

NOTE. We make no extravagant and foolish assertions respecting "KOKO," as to its being "the best in the world," and that kind of nonsense. We point to our testimonials in proof of the value of "KOKO" for the Hair. The high social standing of the writers is a guarantee of the genuineness and undoubted excellence of our preparation.

Royal Testimonial.

"Alsenstrasse, Berlin.
"KOKO" is the BEST DRESSING I KNOW. IT KEEPS the head cool, promotes growth, and is in every way EXCELLENT.
"PRINCESS HOHENLOHE."

A Doctor writes:

(The original can be seen at the Company's Offices.)

Gentlemen,—After using your "Koko" for over six months, I must acknowledge its superiority over any other dressings for the hair which I have tried. It keeps the head perfectly cool, and it does eradicate dandriff, and gives the hair a fine, glossy appearance. The medical treatment of dandriff may be summed up in six words—viz., "Keep the head saturated with oil." No doubt this is efficient; but if we adopt this method, the head becomes dirty, for the simple reason that all moving particles are caught and retained by the oil; and, again, bed linen is rendered disgusting by being stained. Now, your "Koko" possesses none of these disadvantages, and it is equally, if not more, effectual. It is for this reason that I prefer it to any other dressing. Since first trying it, I have used no other, and have great pleasure in recommending it to my friends and patients. I send you this little note merely to let you know how well pleased I am with your preparation.

The Late Mrs. E. Lynn Linton,

The Celebrated Authoress, writes:

Broughton House, Malvern. Dear Sirs,—I have used your "Koko" now since June last, and I have not only stopped the falling out, which had been excessive after a severe illness, but I have an entirely new growth of hair, while the old hair is longer. As I am not a young woman, but an old one, I think this is a convincing test of the value of your preparation."

ROYAL TESTIMONIAL.

Berlin
Alsenstrasse
Feb 25th 1896.

"Koko" for the hair, is the best dressing I know. It keeps the head cool, promotes growth, and is in every way excellent.

Princess Hohenlohe
Oehringen

SPECIAL OFFER TO THOSE WHO HAVE NOT YET TRIED "KOKO."

A 4/6 TRIAL BOTTLE FOR 2/-

Any person forwarding this Coupon and P.O. for Two Shillings and Five Stamps to pay postage, package, &c., will receive immediately for trial, by Parcel Post, under cover, prepaid, One regular 12-oz. Bottle of KOKO for the Hair, the price of which is 4/6, provided it is ordered within ten days from the date of this offer. In no case will more than one bottle be sent for the use of the same person on this coupon, as we make the offer solely for trial, knowing it creates a demand when once used; and this large bottle gives it a fair trial. We find it better to thus practically give away one bottle to make a customer than to spend large amounts in advertising. Any person into whose hands this offer comes may avail themselves of it. Address all orders with Coupon to:

KOKO-MARICOPAS CO. Ltd., 16 Bevis Marks, London.

Orders may be sent with this Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these trial bottle Coupons, and if we are not, the money will be returned. This Coupon will be received at 16 Bevis Marks, E.C., or 233 Regent Street, London, W., and 2s. only will be required when presented personally.

Koko is sold by all Chemists and Stores at 2/6 and 4/6 per Bottle.

THE NOVEL MAGAZINE IS NOW ON SALE!

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 512. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 22ND, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

Stomach Disorders.

MR. ROBERT SPROT, of 51 Orchard Street, Galston, Ayrshire, writes on June 10th, 1898:

"Guy's Tonic is the best Medicine my Wife has ever "taken for Stomach Disorders. She has been ailing more "or less for the last Twenty Years, and Guy's Tonic is the "finest Digestive Medicine that she has ever obtained."

Guy's Tonic: A Few Points

1. Its delicious flavour. It is pleasant to take.
2. Its freedom from Quinine and Iron; it therefore does not cause Constipation.
3. Its skilful and accurate preparation by qualified Pharmacists.
4. Its cheapness in price. Six ounces for 1s. 1½d.
5. Its approval by Medical Men.
6. Its employment in Hospital Practice.
7. The entire absence of harmful ingredients.
8. The universal good repute Guy's Tonic enjoys among those who have tried it.

There is no magic or haphazard arrangement in the virtues of Guy's Tonic. These things were studied with careful watchfulness for many years by a Doctor in a large West End Practice in London, and after years of practical experiment the formula from which Guy's Tonic is now prepared by skilled and qualified Pharmacists was that adopted as the best to attain the Digestive, Creative, and Invigorating power required.

In cases of Weakness, Debility, and in Convalescence after all Diseases, Guy's Tonic has a wonderful restorative power in building up the Health and Strength.

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on sale at all Chemists and Stores. This great concession in price is the result of vast sales of Guy's Tonic.

Try a 1s. 1½d. Bottle, and notice the improvement Guy's Tonic speedily effects in your Appetite. Energy, Strength and Vigour. Watch how it brightens the Spirits, and gives freedom from Indigestion and Debility.

10/6 — 10/6

Allen Foster & Co

SOLE MAKERS OF

THE 'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES

The "Alfosco" Half-Guinea Costumes are recommended by thousands of delighted customers, who acknowledge them to be GREATLY SUPERIOR in MAKE, STYLE, and VALUE, to any costumes they have ever seen at anything approaching the same prices.

Design No. 545. 10/6

Design No. 545. 10/6.

Design No. 69. 7/6

Design No. 69. 7/6.

A Great Bargain. The Cape for the Million. Price only 7s. 6d., made in an excellent Beaver Cloth, with collar trimmed with extra wide real Mohair Chinchilla. Colours—Fawn, Brown, Green, Navy, and Black. Send for one. Securely packed, sent Parcel Post, 6d. extra. Our New Illustrated Sketch Book contains a number of the latest designs of Jackets and Capes. Sent post free on application.

Design No. 545. Half-a-Guinea.

In a fashionable Costume for the Winter season. A wonderful costume for Half-a-Guinea. Made in the Allen Foster Specialite Serge. It consists of the stylish Reefer Jacket, with fashionably-made skirt. Velvet collar and tailor stitching. Costume Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6. Carriage paid, 6d. extra.

PATTERNS AND SKETCHES POST FREE.

Regular Stock Sizes of Costumes are 34, 36, and 38 inches round bust (under arms), the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 inches long in front. Large or Special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Each Costume securely packed, and sent by Parcel Post carriage paid, 6d. extra; skirt only, 6d. extra. Please mention Short Stories.

NEW SKETCH BOOK OF FASHIONS, ORDER FORMS AND PATTERNS, POST FREE.

A Large Variety of Styles in our Famous Half-Guinea Indoor Costumes.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KEATING'S LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENGES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,
62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row. (Est. 1850.)

Parcel free from observation

THE BEST HAIR DYE

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

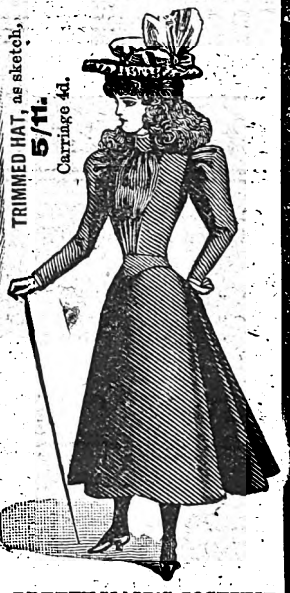
GOOD FELT HAT, as sketch, 2/6. All colours. Carriage 4d.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

are promptly sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and are made to look smart and yield faithful service.

TRIMMED HAT, as sketch, 5/11. Carriage 4d.



Model 934.

Exceedingly well-made and carefully finished Chesterfield Coat, and full-wide 10/6 Tailor Skirt. Price complete Costume, 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. Good quality.

Stylish blouse bodice and neat skirt. Bodice lined through, and made with pretily gathered front and shaped belt, 6/11 as sketch. Lengths and Prices:

35	38	42	46 in.	Car.
6/11	7/11	8/11	9/11 ea.	6d.

Lengths are from top of neck-band to bottom of skirt in front.

PRETTY MAID'S COSTUME No. 1016.

These Costumes are supplied in the following two good durable Cloths:
I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.
H. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth-surfaced and of lighter weight.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE,

together with the new 84-page Illustrated Fashion Book for Ladies and Children. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6yd. 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d. 7/6

COLOURS of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

THE THREE SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front.

Any other size can be specially made to measure 1/6 extra.

BANKERS: "London & Midland Bank Ltd." Please name "Short Stories" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

NIXEY'S BLACK LEAD.

Maker to the Queen.

World-wide reputation.

SHORT STORIES

No. 512. ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending
October 22nd, 1898.

THOSE WHO FOUGHT AT OMDURMAN.

No. 4.—Baggara Horseman.

An Arab Sweetheart

I REALLY do not think that a man who has seen a little fighting was ever so much bothered to tell all he knew about that little as I have been of late. It was my luck to be in some of the earlier fighting in the Soudan in the eighties, and the way I have been harassed for stories of gallant deeds performed by myself, would have tempted many a less truthful man to become a second Baron Munchausen.

I have made up my mind to say no more about my own doings, so I cannot gratify you this time; but as you are so pressing I will tell you what someone else did, if that will do. It will? Very good; here you are, and you may take my word for it that it's true, although—but you know the old saying about truth and fiction.

Towards the end of 1883, Colonel Hicks, or Hicks Pasha, was going strong against the Mahdi with a force of Egyptian troops and one or two British officers. After some successful fighting, Hicks reached Duem on his way to Kordofan.

About five weeks later, the force was decoyed into ambush at El-Obeid and annihilated. My story concerns a gallant attempt to warn Hicks Pasha.

At the very time that the force was moving from the Nile, an inkling of the plot came to Dick Farrar, a young Englishman of barely twenty, who was with the Arabs at a point several miles from Duem.

Dick was the son of a man who had spent many years of his life in wandering among these and certain Asiatic peoples, studying their languages and customs. On his last journey, Dick being then fifteen and motherless, Professor Farrar decided that his son should accompany him.

Less than a year later, Farrar died in the Soudan, and Dick was kept by the people, and became almost one of them.

When the Mahdist revolt broke out, Dick Farrar did not trouble himself about it; he was happy and contented, he knew but little about it, and he cared still less.

As time wore on, he fancied that his movements were watched, and then, suddenly, there came to him the

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

intelligence that aroused him to take an active part in the historical events of the period.

He was seated on a stone outside a small structure that served as a dwelling for the old man and woman with whom he lived, when he heard a voice behind him:

"Dick, do you still love your own people?"

Farrar started as the sweet tones struck his ear, and sprang up to greet the new-comer.

"Zelfa! I did not know that you were so near," he exclaimed, as he took her by both hands and gazed tenderly into her eyes, which dropped before his admiring look. "But why do you ask me that question?"

"Let us walk farther away and talk in the tongue which you have taught me," she replied in fairly good English. "We shall not be heard."

Wondering somewhat at her manner, Dick walked quietly by her side into the open. It was no new thing for those two to be seen together, and they both knew it, although they were scarcely conscious of the significance of the fact to others.

When they had gone beyond the chance of being overheard, Zelfa spoke.

"You have told me that you lived among a race of people who are brave and good, Dick," she said. "I know that your father was like that—and you——"

She paused in pretty confusion, while Dick whispered words that made her blush beneath her dark skin.

"My people are brave and good also," she went on in troubled tones, "and they are fighting to conquer this land for the great Mahdi. Oh, Dick, I am in trouble! I know not what to do!"

"Dear Zelfa, tell me all," exclaimed Farrar in perplexity. "What is this trouble that is making you so sad? What mean these strange words?"

"My people have already been defeated by the Egyptians led by men from your country. One of those Egyptian armies has reached Duem, and our spies tell us that the soldiers will march to kill the Mahdi beyond El-Obeid. Our people have planned that the army shall be deceived and led into a defile at El-Obeid and every man killed, including your brave countrymen."

"They do, eh?" muttered Dick, speaking more to himself than to the lovely girl by his side. He had not cared much which way the conflict went, but now he was aroused. All is fair in war, perhaps, but the thought that British officers were to be led into ambush and struck down without a fair chance of selling their lives dearly, set his blood throbbing in his veins.

"You have told me," continued Zelfa, "that you lived with an uncle named White, whose son, who was older than you, helped you. He was going to be a soldier. I have heard that one of the Englishmen with this army is a young man of that name."

"What, Tommy here, and going to be led into a trap! Not if I know it! Anyhow, not without my trying to save him! Zelfa," turning again eagerly to her, "I must save them; how can I do it? Can you help me?"

"That is my trouble," returned Zelfa, wringing her hands. "If I help you to save them, I am betraying my own race, and yet if I leave your cousin to die without warning, I am false to you—my love!"

For the first time Dick realised that the girl was passionately in love with him, and that he returned her affection. Unconsciously they had drifted from friendship into love, and the awakening had come to them, as to so many others, through trial and the conflict of love and duty. Unmindful of everything, Dick clasped Zelfa in his arms and kissed her.

But the thought of impending events soon came back to them and aroused them from their ecstasy.

"Something must be done to save them," said Dick as he released her from his embrace. "No, you will not be acting falsely to your people by helping me to warn mine, Zelfa. I shall be saving mine from butchery, so that the two armies may fight it out fairly; and if the Mahdi's troops see that the Egyptians are on their guard, they will prepare for a good battle. No, there is nothing wrong in it, Zelfa. And then," he continued tenderly, "my people will be yours also one day, because I shall take you away with me to live in England. Do you understand?"

With these and other arguments—perfectly sincere, though not quite logical—Dick persuaded his Arab sweetheart to complete her work by assisting him to warn the army under Hicks of the danger that menaced it. They conversed earnestly together, and finally evolved a plan which Dick was to carry out that night.

Just as they were about to retrace their steps to the village, a sudden thought occurred to Farrar that made him stop and turn hot and cold.

"Zelfa, if I do this, what will become of you? They will be certain that you have helped me and——"

He stopped in dread.

"I have thought of that," returned Zelfa quietly. "I know how to act, and when you are gone and danger is past, I will follow you in some way and meet you at Duem or another place. I shall find you. My love will guide me," she concluded simply.

"You must come with me," he began impetuously, but he stopped as he remembered that that was practically impossible.

Zelfa smiled, somewhat sadly, and they returned to the village without exchanging another word.

That night when Dick thought that the people about him were at rest, he stole out and made his way towards a boulder in the desert beyond.

Hidden within a recess there, he would find a camel which the loving Zelfa would have led thither ready for his ride to Duem on the Nile.

Stealthily he walked across the intervening space, keeping his rifle hidden as much as possible by holding it vertically and close to his body.

He had dressed himself exactly like the Arabs, having discarded the half-European, half-Arab costume he always wore.

His heart beat more quickly than usual, but he was not excited to any degree at this juncture, for he felt that he was scarcely likely to be stopped or challenged. The trouble would come when he was nearer the Nile, according to Zelfa's information.

The moon had not risen, and Dick hoped to get some distance away before it did. He reached the boulder and walked with a light step round it. He had just turned it, and sighted the ship of the desert, when a click caught his ear. He threw himself on his knees instinctively, and the next instant there was a report and the whizz of a bullet over his head.

Discovered! There must be no hesitation now; his own life was at stake. He sprang to his feet and rushed at the figure he saw in the dim light.

There was a short wrestling bout between them. Dick was a strong fellow, and he had not forgotten what he had learnt at school. The Arab went down with a thud and Dick did what he could not help calling a cowardly action—he struck the fallen man on the head with his rifle and stunned him.

Digitized by Google

There was no time to be lost. The whole force of the men would be upon him now. Already he heard the noise. He mounted the camel, and turning the creature's head in the direction of Duem, lashed it with the end of the long rawhide halter. The camel pitched and rolled like a veritable ship on the ocean, but it was not the first occasion on which Dick had ridden a camel and he took no heed of that.

The chief thing for him was that he had got a good start, and he felt no doubt that Zelfa had made the best selection.

Bullets now whizzed near him at intervals, and he could see that he was being pursued. At first the thought of firing back at them flashed across his mind; but he dismissed the notion at once. What chance would he have of hitting any of them, from the back of a jolting camel? Moreover, he was reluctant to fire at those who had been kind to him.

Then for a short space the firing ceased, and nothing was to be heard save the pad, pad of the hoofs on the sand

From an occasional glance backwards Farrar ascertained that the pursuers were not gaining, and he hoped that they would drop off and let him go; but the danger from stray bodies of dervishes was all the greater.

Several miles were covered and his pursuers were out-distanced. But now the moon had risen and he was a conspicuous object. He allowed his mount to slacken into an ordinary trotting pace. Another two or three miles were covered without incident, and then he reached a spot which he deemed to be a fairly safe place to rest for an hour or two.

He considered that he was now safe from pursuit by his old friends, and it was certainly advisable to give his beast a rest.

He fully expected to encounter some dervishes during the remainder of his journey, and although he relied upon his knowledge of the language and customs of the people, aided by his tact, to pull him through, he might have to depend upon the fleetness of his camel.

So he dismounted, and, hidden by one of the natural corrugations of the desert, passed the remaining hours of night in watchful repose.

In the early morning he resumed his journey. He went on steadily; it might arouse suspicion if he were seen racing over the desert, and, moreover, it would be better to reserve his camel's strength for emergencies.

He acted wisely. He had not been half an hour on his journey when he came in sight of a small body of dervishes. He decided to approach them without altering his gait; it would be better to do that than to attempt to escape them by making a detour and trusting to his camel to out-distance them—for he knew that they would come after him when they saw him going off in another direction, however slowly he might jog along.

Dick's heart seemed to thump against his ribs as he drew near to the dervishes. Suppose among that group there was one who knew him? In that case suspicion would probably be aroused. Those who knew him were, of course, aware that he was a European and they might well conclude, as he was now not many miles from Duem, that he was on his way to the Egyptian camp for some purpose inimical to the Mahdi's cause.

When he came up to them, Dick saluted them and eagerly scanned all the faces he could see. He could recognise none of them, and fervently hoped that he had fallen in with strangers.

He began the conversation by boldly asking them whither they were bound, and whether they had fallen in with any of the enemy. They replied that they were endeavouring, with other small bodies, to harass the Egyptions and hinder their march. Then they began to question him.

Farrar replied with assumed fervour that he too, was on the watch to have a shot at any venturesome Egyptian soldier or English officer—especially the latter—who might stray from the camp. The leader, a man about forty, shook his head warningly.

"You are over-bold," he said. "Our warriors must be brave, but caution must not be absent or our bravery is of little worth. These men rarely come out in ones or twos, but in small bodies to find out our position. Alone you can do nothing; come with us."

Dick bowed humbly, but repeated that he wished to get as near to the camp as he could; adding that he believed he could attain that object better by himself as he would not be so conspicuous as a troop of thirty.

After a little more talk, in a vain endeavour to dissuade him from his reckless purpose, they allowed him to pass on, with exhortations and good wishes. As he had no spear they gave him one; at close quarters—if it came to that—he would find it valuable.

Dick ambled away with a sigh of relief. Safe so far; if he could deceive others in the same way!

Another hour passed. The sun was rising and Dick began to hope that he was not far from Duem. It was quite possible that he might fall in with some reconnoitring party from the camp, in which case his mission would be accomplished far more easily than he had dared to hope. His spirits rose; he began to whistle a tune he had sung at school, and his mind wandered once again to Zelfa.

He had been troubled about her. How had she fared at the hands of her people? Who had betrayed them? It was not Ahmed, the young Arab whose suit had been rejected, for he was away. And what had Zelfa done to escape the punishment that would surely be meted out to her for her complicity in the plot? He had worried over this while he himself had been in danger, but now that success seemed within his grasp, he was disposed to regard this, also, in less sombre colours. She would have found a way of escape, he felt confident of that now.

How, and when, would they meet again? When he had warned Hicks he would return and seek the brave and devoted girl; that was settled in his mind. He was in the midst of plans for seeking her, when he heard his name called. Quite forgetting, in the half-dreamy state into which he had lapsed, where he was, he looked up and answered.

Then he looked in the direction of the voice and saw—Ahmed!

"You have ventured a long way, my friend," cried Ahmed as he pulled up his camel at a distance of three or four yards. There was something in his voice that made Dick watch him carefully.

"True," replied Farrar, who had also pulled up. "But what of that?"

"Why do you leave us—and the beautiful Zelfa—to rejoin those who may be able to send you back to your own country? Are not Zelfa's charms, even, enough to keep you with us?"

"How dare you talk of her in that way?" cried Dick in a rage. "What right have you to address such questions to me? Stand aside and let me pass!"

Touching his camel, Dick made an attempt to pass

Digitized by Google

Ahmed, but the latter quickly moved to the left and intercepted him again.

Dick saw now that a fight was inevitable; without more ado he gripped his spear and rode straight at Ahmed.

By a dexterous movement of his camel, Ahmed avoided the onslaught and made a thrust that Dick parried.

It was a singular duel. Both were young and active, both knew how to handle the camel and the spear. But Ahmed was the more skilful of the two, and Dick knew that he must be wary.

Again and again they wheeled and thrust at each other, but without any advantage on either side. Not until five minutes had passed was the fight attended with the least success; then Ahmed thrust his spear through Dick's shoulder and slipped off his camel to avoid the return lunge.

Quick as thought, despite the pain of the wound, Farrar struck Ahmed's mount a severe blow, making the creature cry with pain and rush off, and at the same time urged his own camel forward to escape the attack which he felt that his enemy would make with a view to maiming the beast.

This manœuvre had outwitted Ahmed, who—without his steed and armed with only his spear—was at the mercy of his antagonist armed with a rifle. That rifle was now levelled at his head.

"You have won," said Ahmed, calmly throwing down his spear and awaiting the death that seemed inevitable.

But Dick felt that he could not kill his adversary in cold blood, for the heat of the combat was over. He thought of "winging" him, so that he could not do any mischief, but the idea of a man lying wounded on the sand during the heat of the day was too terrible. He must try some other way.

"Will you promise me to turn back and go homewards if I spare your life?" he asked. "Will you swear it by the beard of the Prophet?"

Ahmed was silent. He revolved the chances swiftly in his mind. Then he swore an oath that Dick felt convinced that he would not break.

"You may go," said Dick, lowering his rifle a little. And without a word Ahmed faced about and strode away.

Dick now urged his camel forward towards Duem at a quicker pace. His wound now pained him terribly, and he felt that he was growing weak through loss of blood. He tried to staunch the wound by binding it up roughly, but he felt that he must go forward with all speed.

On, on, he raced. If he dismounted and rested, he could do no more and he might faint by the way. It was a race against physical infirmity, and he must win—he must win, for so much depended upon it.

On—on! He felt himself getting weaker and his head sinking on his breast. Half unconsciously he struck the camel with the end of the halter. Then he heard, as though in the distance, the report of a rifle. His camel fell forward, and he was thrown over the creature's head and fell with a thud to the ground.

* * * * *

When Dick Farrar came to his senses, he found himself on a rough bed, being tended by an Irish doctor and an Arab woman.

He learnt to his horror that he had been suffering from an attack of brain fever, and that this was his first lucid interval since he had been picked up in the desert some little distance from Duem, after he had been shot at by some dervishes.

He had raved a great deal about the destruction of the Egyptian army that had left Duem shortly before he had been found, and about "Zelfa" and other things.

How long had he been ill and where was he?

"A fortnight," was the answer to his first question.

"Near Berber," was the reply to the second inquiry.

Dick groaned in agony and tried to make them understand the position; but they soothed him and said he must be quiet and that he was showing signs of another attack of delirium.

And so it came to pass that Dick Farrar's attempt to save Hicks resulted in failure.

They were surprised that he spoke English and were ready to believe that he had lived in the Soudan; but when he endeavoured to make them believe the rest of his story they shook their heads warningly, or did their best to sooth him by pretending to believe him and carry out his desires. They did not believe him till the news of the disaster arrived.

It would serve no useful purpose to dwell upon Dick's sufferings, mental and physical.

He was hurried back to Egypt with others, and it was quite three months before he was about again.

Did he ever meet Zelfa again? Yes. It was fourteen months afterwards, when Dick was taking part in the memorable expedition to Khartoum—which he did as one of the series of efforts to find her—that he came face to face with her just after the battle of Abu Klea. She, too, had tried to find him, and had kept near the Mahdi's troops—occupied in tending the wounded—because she thought that he might be with the gallant little band.

But they came together too late; he found her wounded and dying.

The meeting was one of joy at seeing each other once more, and finding that they had been faithful to one another. And it was one of sorrow at parting for ever.

Zelfa died in his arms with a smile of content. She had escaped punishment by leaving her people and tramping about in search of him.

Dick Farrar mourned long for his Arab sweetheart, and it was thought that he would never marry. But constant intercourse with the women of his own race had its effect, and in the summer of 1890, when he was nearing his twenth-seventh birthday, he led a pretty English girl to the altar.

George Day.

ORDERS FOR

1,300,000

COPIES OF THE

Royal Magazine

have been received at the moment of going to press with this number.

Digitized by Google

THE MARKED CARDS.

THEY had been many days over the sea, the young man and the girl. He had forgotten whether this were the Pacific or the sea that sweeps the shore of Elysium.

Now, on the twenty-fifth day, they were on deck, and talking som what in this way:

"You must walk with me," she called from her chair.

"It's a delightful punishment."

"Thanks; I believe that's a compliment."

"Truth's a compliment, eh?" he said, miling.

"The best compliments, I suppose, are those that pretend to be truths, but are not."

"I am afraid this is getting rather too fast for me," he said. "Wait until I think about it."

"To carry out what you have begun, you should say to me, 'I can't think about it, for I have to think about you.'"

"Is it necessary to say that?" he said, looking down at the girl. "How beautiful you are!"

By the rules of conventional conversation it was an utterly inane remark, and the girl's laughter rolled out, full and delightful, but her voice was low.

"I am glad you think so."

A deeper red tinged his bronzed cheeks as he realised his temerity.

"You know I do," he said.

"Oh, do I? Our acquaintance is not of very long standing. A few days will see the end of our voyage."

He drew a long breath, and his voice was earnest. To land meant work, and to see her no more.

Two elderly persons were watching the two young people.

"What a remarkable girl Nellie Wolverton is!" one was saying.

"She's certainly carrying on a remarkable flirtation with that young man. Who is he?" said the other, with the severity of position gained by effort.

"Some sort of engineer in the employ of the Winfield company. Mary Winfield introduced him to Nellie."

"That girl would flirt with anybody. She seems to find all men infinitely amusing. Isn't she handsome? Now, you would suppose she was somebody or other. But the Wolvertons—oh, you know!" quoth the other lady.

"Her mother was one of the most pushing women I ever knew," assented her companion.

"Of the dead nihil nisi bonum," said the imposing one. "She was an extraordinarily ambitious woman. With pluck and a fortune, and a daughter like that, an ambitious woman can do anything in Australia. The Wolverton money is said to be incalculable now. Oh, dear, how many men have been after that girl! She flirts and laughs with them all, just as she does with that young man."

Mary Winfield was watching the two with much the same thoughts. This poor young man didn't understand sophisticated young women; it was abominable of Nellie Wolverton; she was sorry she had introduced them; she might have known that Nellie would play with any man as she would with a cat or a dog. Oh, dear, this Melville was so out of it; so busy and capable, and such an efficient servant of the Winfield company. But Nellie was Nellie, and Mary ought to have known better.

If Nellie were Nellie, she was proving it with a vengeance. She was making Melville tell her of himself, and she was giving him nothing of herself in return. They were seated now, looking out at the frothing white and green in the ship's wake. She was glancing at him again and again with mildly interested eyes. He was forgetting himself, and was telling how his father had left him only money enough for school and college, which he had increased by some tutoring; of how he had worked and won a position in a machine shop of the Winfield company; of how he had progressed farther, and now was near the head of his department, and had been sent to London on an important mission, and——

A young man came lightly across the deck, and bowed and exchanged some remarks with Miss Wolverton, and nodded at Melville with a "who-the-dickens-are-you" air and passed on after a moment. Melville's confidences, suddenly chilled. This youngster represented what he never had known. The girl by his side understood.

"Don't mind Bertie; he's just Bertie."

"Oh, you know," Melville began, "I'm so out of that set."

"Of that particular set you mean," she said graciously, as if she would imply politely that there were many others which he doubtless frequented. "The men are very stupid in it. It's all very stupid. It's just sport and gossip. For my part, give me men that do things."

"I think," said the young-man-making-his-way, "that I prefer other men to do things, and leave them to me already done. Now my father——"

He paused, wondering whether he had better tell her, and then it seemed to him, now that he remembered it, that this put him on a sort of equality with Miss Wolverton, as though the inequality that stood between them was suddenly swept away by the thought of this story. But had he a right to tell her? No, she wouldn't, couldn't know; that was so long ago and forgotten.

"And your father? Go on—I am interested."

"He might have had the things, the money, to have put me in your friend Bertie's position, if luck had been his way, and if he hadn't been cheated——"

Digitized by Google

"I never can think of you as a man like Bertie," Miss Wolverton said decisively, with that calm confidence in her eyes; the eyes may have been rather more expressive because this was the last day of all, and he would slip out of her life so soon. She was fair to look upon, clever, accomplished, charming; this fence of the sexes was her delight; she could no more avoid it than she could breathing. Our unsophisticated young man failed to understand her. Later, common sense was to reach out from the grim, matter-of-fact depths of his nature, and grasp his sentimentality until it hurt him.

"Oh it's a little story of what might have been years ago in Damp Flats in Queensland. My father was out there after gold, and he fell in with a man with whom he entered into partnership in a general store. Sometimes in exchange for goods, they took claims. At first they made a lot of money, and then they lost nearly every penny in trying to develop a claim that failed.

"Well, each blamed the other, and they decided to separate. They could decide on no other way than to cut the cards. So they sat down one day and cut, and some things fell to my father, and some to his partner. And the papers were drawn up, and the division made.

"A week after that a claim which had gone to my father's partner began to develop. It proved a find: my father's partner made the beginning of a great fortune that way."

"Well?" said the girl.

"Now, the shanty that served for the store had fallen to my father, not the stock, which went to pay the firm's debts. Three weeks after this my father sat talking with a mining expert, who spoke of the big find on my father's former partner's lucky claim; and he stated boastfully, to show his value as an expert probably that he had told my father's partner—we will call him Smith—that the claim was extremely valuable.

"This set my father thinking; Smith had believed the claim to be valuable. But my father could but acknowledge that the man had given him a chance, even if he had dishonestly hidden his notion of the claim. That day my father happened to be in the abandoned store. On the table were the two packs of dirty cards, just as they had been left the day of the division. They had cut in the bare inner room, which hadn't been disturbed since. My father picked up these instruments of his bad luck, and he saw that the pack Smith had used had been marked."

"How awful!" the listener said. "And you might have had the money, if it hadn't been——"

"If it hadn't been for Smith's dishonesty, yes, Miss Wolverton. But to return to the story, my father went to Smith, whom he accused, but Smith looked him in the face and laughed. 'You are crazy, man. And you haven't any proof. Who'd believe you?'"

"Was that the end of it?" the girl asked gently.

"No, not the end of it. My father could prove nothing, indeed. His affairs went from bad to worse. He left Queensland penniless. Later on, he accumulated the little money he was able to leave me. But it was always a hard struggle for him and my mother, who died shortly after I was born."

"And Smith? that's not the name."

Melville hesitated.

"No, that's not the name. It's a well-known name, but we will let it remain Smith. Everything Smith touched became money; he was accused of dishonesty many times in the course of his career, but nothing ever was proven; he succeeded, and is to-day one of the powerful men in Victoria."

They were silent, the girl grave.

"And that's the reason you think you are not in the class of Bertie Townley. Well, I don't want you to be in that class."

"If you would care that much!" said he, half lightly, half earnestly.

"Oh, I like you," she said cheerily, as she might have said she liked a fox-terrier.

"And the man's dishonesty was really your blessing; it made you do things."

He smiled.

"I must be going below. Oh, I have been so much interested!"

And she went away brightly smiling, and he felt, suddenly, just the least like a fool. This feeling was increased when he found in the bustle of landing that she had only a cool shake of the hand and a distant "So glad to have met you," and no acknowledgment of the fact that he had asked to call, which she had plainly evaded. He felt revengeful and a bit of an anarchist.

And the next morning when he was reporting to Mr. Winfield his success in London, and being complimented by the company's head, his success seemed cheap; he had a picture before him of a bright, high-bred looking, exquisitely-dressed young woman, surrounded by flippantly gay persons whose world was not his, and never could be; for when one is making his way ploddingly, with no particular capital, he can't reasonably expect that way to be made before he may be grey and all the desire for pleasure, life's good things, quite gone.

It may be supposed that Miss Wolverton put the young man of the voyage out of her mind. Perhaps she had some thoughts of him or else she never would have repeated the story he had told her at a dinner where her father was, most unusually, her escort. At a dinner one owes it as a duty to do his part. Nellie did not care to be lacking, and wanted her story to be as spirited as anyone else's. For she waged a little strife to make the world she knew hold her clever. Now she couldn't, try as she would, think of another story than the one Melville had told her.

"Mary Winfield introduced me to a very entertaining man on the boat, a man who does things, you know——"

"What does he do, horses or yachts?" said Bertie Townley. "Oh, I say, Nellie, you don't mean that serious-faced chap you were mooning about with so much?"

"The very man," Miss Wolverton said, without changing colour.

And she told Melville's story.

"How extraordinary!" gasped Mrs. Pemberton. "You do meet such strange people at sea."

"Business methods are oftentimes dishonest," said a legal luminary pompously. "Yet——"

"Your story isn't funny enough," criticised Bertie Townley.

Samuel Wolverton, I should say Sam, the great Sam, held his nose in his port. He's a thin, sharp-featured, silent man, and, looking at him, one always wonders how he succeeded in possessing such a daughter.

Driving home, he said to Nellie:

"If I were you I don't think I'd try to tell stories at dinner."

"Why, papa?"

"It's undignified."

"Do you think so?" she said petulantly. She usually had him well in hand.

"What did you say that man's name is?" he asked after a moment.

Digitized by Google

"Frank Melville."

Suddenly she turned.

"Papa, you were in Queensland?"

"Yes; what of it?"

"Did you ever hear a story like that?"

"I have heard a lot of stories; the diggings are full of them. As for your acquaintance, he was probably yarning."

"No, no, he wasn't."

"What makes you think that?"

"He isn't that kind of man."

"Nellie, I think that you can take care of yourself, but I don't believe you can judge men."

"Oh, trust me for that," she said airily; and at the moment she was indeed trying to judge no less a person than her father. She had thought that she understood him. Had she? He was fond of her; he denied her nothing, and she loved him. But—there were depths she could not fathom; and she knew no more of his real life, even less, than an outsider.

But now a sudden fear possessed her. She rushed upstairs to a little room which she used for her writing-table and her books, and eagerly she looked for a paper in a certain English magazine: "Modern Millionaires. No. X, Samuel Wolverton." Had she been mistaken? And then she read:

"The beginning of this extraordinary fortune was in '66, in the Damp Flat Mines of Queensland. Melville and Wolverton were storekeepers who exchanged a supposedly bad debt for the now-famed Bulfinch Mine. Wolverton bought out his partner."

For a minute the room seemed to swim.

"Oh, if mamma were only here!" the girl said moaningly. "It's true—true. This is all his, and not mine, every penny of it. And he knew when he told me; he knew."

And she stole down to her father.

She went towards him, the magazine in hand, and held it before him.

Wolverton started. He had never seen her like this; and her pallor frightened him. And then he saw to what she pointed.

"Was the story he told me true?"

"What if it were?"

"What if it were?" she said mockingly. "You can't understand, 'what if it were.'"

But the father said quietly, with a mastery of himself:

"If it were true, Melville couldn't have succeeded. He hadn't it in him. He would have failed at anything. I cut loose from him."

"But you haven't told me whether the story is true."

"I won't acknowledge nor deny it," he said at last. "What of it? You ought not to find fault. My money has made you a position as fine as any girl's."

"Good-night," said the girl.

At the door he called to her:

"Nellie, you haven't kissed me good-night."

"I can't—to-night."

And she was gone.

"A woman can't understand business. She'll get over it."

But he failed to sleep well that night.

She was not at breakfast. He went to her room. She was sleeping with a look that frightened him. On his way to his office he stopped at his doctor's.

"I wish you would see my daughter. I am worried about her."

He kept himself busied until about three o'clock, and then drove through the park, a tired-faced man people pointed out.

As he entered the house he heard Nellie's voice. He paused in the hall and listened.

"I am glad to see you, Mr. Melville," she was saying.

"I had your note, and came here promptly, I think."

"Yes, promptly."

"I have passed you several times since we landed at Melbourne, but I don't believe you saw me," Melville said rather bitterly.

He was thinking how charming she appeared here in her own house.

He was blaming himself for all that he had thought of her, when her world, of which he had that brief glimpse had been shut out.

"I sent for you," Nellie went on, "to ask you why you told me that story when—when you knew that your father's partner then—was—my father."

The listener started, and moved towards the door, and drew back.

At last he heard:

"Miss Wolverton—yes, it was so, it is so, and I was a coward to tell you."

"I am glad you told me," Nellie said humbly, for this was no longer the proud Miss Wolverton, she wondered at herself, tears were in her eyes, and self-control was far away.

"I don't know what made me tell you, and yet I do know. I have lied; I do know now. You seemed so far out of my reach, and I wanted you to be in my reach. Do you understand?"

"I don't know that I understand," the girl said. "I can't seem to understand."

"And—oh, you are crying. I have hurt you. I wouldn't hurt you for the world."

"Don't," she said, "please don't."

But he was saying:

"I know the reason now. It was—don't you see—didn't you see?"

After a moment the listener heard Nellie's voice.

"It's best so. If you do, it rights itself. And—I see it clearly. I know now why I didn't want you to be of Bertie Townley's class. You are a man who does things—and will—a man for a woman to be proud of, and—yes—it's all clear to me—I thought I was just flirting with you. But since that night I know it was more."

Presently the portière was pushed aside.

Wolverton was possessed of a certain grim humour, and instinct for the management of the quick crises was the measure of his success in affairs.

"I'm Samuel Wolverton, and you are Frank Melville," he said. "I listened to your conversation. I won't apologise; I am glad I did it. It seems to me, Mr. Melville, that your father's son has it back at me now. It seems to me that you hold the marked cards."

He stopped and looked at the two and then went on:

"Mr. Melville, what's it the ministers say? I am not much at going to church. But don't they say that when a man has wronged another the best amends he can make is confession of his fault?"

But, although a moment after the young man extended his hand, Wolverton was conscious that his daughter, whom he held his dearest possession, never would be the same to him, that distrust lay between them; that, at the height of his success, Melville's son had turned the marked cards against him.

M. Wood.

Digitized by Google

Love after Death.

"WELL, I never did take much notice of that kind of thing, but when something comes to the certain knowledge of a man, and that something he can neither explain nor reason out, then I say there must be something in it; and I don't believe in laughing at any one who does have faith in such things!"

And Tom Wardwell struck a match and relighted his cigar.

In the Club they had been discussing the "occult," and had turned to Tom Wardwell for his opinion.

The answer at once aroused interest and evoked a request for further information.

There were some moments of expectant silence, and then Wardwell, tossing away the stub of his cigar, leant back his head, and closing his eyes, said, at last:

"Yes, I do know something about this thing; that is, I know enough about it to know that I know nothing about it, except that such things are. If you care to listen, I'll tell you what I know, and you can make your own explanations—if you can!"

"All right, Tom, let's have it!"

"Some years back," began Wardwell, "I held a position in a large import house as head bookkeeper, with some six or eight fellows to look after. They were ordinary fellows, but there was one among them who would have attracted anyone's attention had they only caught his eye.

"He was a light-hearted fellow, near his thirties. He was not handsome, for his features were not regular, although great strength of character was denoted in every feature; but it was when you looked full into his eyes that you discovered the source whence came the light that fell upon his countenance. An irresistible influence fell upon you, and at once visions of all that was good and pure would flood your mind.

"You wouldn't wonder," continued Tom, as the others looked incredulous, "if you could have known him as I did. He was none of your 'goody boys,' but just a pure, upright man.

"Well, for some reason he took to me, as I did to him, and after a time I said to him one day: 'Fred, how is it you are always so happy? Don't you ever get discouraged, or have the "blues," or things go wrong with you, as they do with the rest of us fellows?'

"For an instant he looked at me with a look of surprise and a shade of pity in his glorious eyes, and then he said, 'Come home with me Tom, and I will show you as far as I can what it is that keeps me happy.'

"And then he told me of his home, and of his wife; he had been married six years, but no young fellow, having just won a bride, could go into more raptures than he did over his wife, and then he said, while the tears stood in his eyes, 'but I can only half tell it, Tom; no one can ever know what that woman is to me. I could not tell to anyone the heart-love and life we have and live.'

"I was awed by his emotion, and I said to him, 'Fred, that must be Heaven on earth to live such a life as that, and yet it is an awful thing for one human being to be so wrapt up in another, for life is short at the best, and —if—one should be called——'

"And here I hesitated, for he had turned to me again, and taking both my hands within his own said, while such a gladness rang in his tones, 'why, Tom, old fellow, that's the very best part of it! We are never going to be separated. We shall always have each other, right to the end of eternity!' And here he laughed a laugh that came from the very depths of his heart.

"I stood and looked at him in amazement, and the doubt just flashed across my mind if this man's brain was quite sound. 'But anyhow,' he broke in, 'come up to the house and see my wife at home.' I did go with him, and saw this happy couple in their new Eden of a home.

"Often he would ask me, yes, urge me, to go home with him; I was glad enough to go then, but since I have sometimes thought that it was because they pitied my loneliness out of the abundance of their love and love's surroundings, and oftentimes sacrificed the pleasure of evenings spent by themselves, in order to give me pleasure. And pleasure it was! That was the brightest time of all my life.

"Once, and once only, they touched upon the subject of their belief, that they were never to be separated! And it was clear that both firmly believed in that.

"Of course it was impossible for me to have any such faith, and not for the world would I have attempted to discuss this subject with them; and as I felt some hesitancy in asking questions, I did not gain as much information upon the subject as I should have then liked. I found they had made a long and careful study of this matter, and although they were by no means what is generally known as Spiritualists, yet they firmly believed that by pure and holy living here in the body, it would be granted to the one called first to the after life, to dwell in spirit near to the one on earth, until the time when they should once again join hands in the Spirit Land.

"It was a very comforting thought, but I could not help the shudder that would come over me when I thought of the blackness of despair which would surely come over my friend should he lose this idol of his life, and find that all his hopes were vain!

"But of these thoughts I said nothing, and the couple lived on, and loved each other more and more, and nothing eventful occurred to mar the happiness of their lives, until one morning I went to the office, and found Fred's desk unoccupied.

"As he had been there as usual the day before, I tried to think nothing of it, but as the day wore on and I heard nothing from him, I began to grow uneasy, and was about to send a messenger to him, when the door opened, and a boy came to me with a note; my fingers trembled in spite of all I could do as I unfolded it, and read just the one line:

Digitized by Google

"'COME UP AS USUAL TO-NIGHT.—FRED.'

"I tried to feel relieved as I read this, yet I had a strange foreboding of some ill to come which I could not throw off.

"When I came in view of the house, the first sight which met my eye was a large and most beautiful wreath of white and crimson roses hanging upon the bell! That was just like Fred and his wife; no mourning, nothing sombre, nothing sad for them when that journey was taken, for I knew at once that the idol of his life had been 'glorified,' as they always expressed it. 'There is no death!' was the strong point of their belief.

"I was now at the door, and I longed and yet dreaded to see Fred. What could I say to him? Should I encourage him with these false hopes, only to see him plunged in deep despair, or should I from the very first try to dissuade him from such false hopes, and tell him —tell him what?

"Just then Fred came in sight, and one glance into his face told me how cruel it would be to try to shake his faith in the belief that was so wondrously holding him up at such a time and under such circumstances as would have crushed most men. His eyes were heavy and swollen, and his face had a look of much physical suffering. For he had held the loved one in his arms from the first of it, until she had given him the last kiss, as he told me afterwards, and said with the fluttering breath: 'Don't be lonely, Fred, darling; I'll come to you as soon as I can; I know it won't be long'—and then——

"Well, that's all he told me, but I knew from his face that the shock was great, and that the great loving heart was even now longing and aching for just one responsive look and touch from the dear one who had never before remained unmoved by even the slightest look or word from him she loved so passionately.

"I could find no words to say to him, so I simply took his arm and he led me to where she lay.

"I won't weary you with details, but pass over the next few days.

"After it was all over Fred came back to the office, and I alone realised the terrible strain under which he did his work. It pained me to the heart to see him hasten as it came towards night, so that he should lose no time in returning to the little home, always expecting the return of her who had promised to come; and then each morning the eyes had a weary look, as though he had watched far into the night, and watched in vain.

"He would not allow me to stay with him during this time, for he had said when I urged the point, 'No, Tom, not yet; when she comes I want to be alone with her.'

"One morning, about a couple of weeks after he had laid his wife to rest, he came to me with such a bright look upon his face, all the weariness gone and a look of great joy and triumph shining from every feature. I was afraid the fellow's mind had indeed turned, and that which he had so longed for he imagined had come true.

"He came close to me and whispered, 'Tom, she's come at last!' I looked him steadily in the eyes for an instant, and then said the only thing I could say, 'Fred, I'm so glad for you!'

"Well, it was quite a long time before he asked me to come to the house again, but finally he did invite me, and I went. Then he told me how his wife administered to all his wants and comforts, just as she had always done before she left this early life.

"'I cannot see her. I hear her voice; I don't think you will be able to, but I can hear it, although she never talks of where she is, nor the conditions, and I dare not question her. I am content to wait until she tells me I may come, as she has already told me that time is not far distant.'

"Those were his words.

"By this time we had reached the house, and just as in the days gone by the light streamed cheerily out from all the windows.

"It was with a thrill of awe, and something of fear, that I entered with him, fear lest I should indeed find that his mind was turned, and awe, lest that not being the case, I was about to be a witness to a mystery no mortal man had ever witnessed before.

"We found the little table laid for two, with all the care and daintiness I had always seen in his home.

"After going home with him several times, the strangeness wore away somewhat, and we would chat about the affairs of the day, or discuss some subject as in the old days, but always in a subdued manner.

"And so she cared for him, and kept his home, and they held sweet communion together for as much as a year, and many a time, in the meanwhile, I have sat in a shady corner of the room, and listened to the sweet sound of melody, played by spirit fingers.

"One morning he came to me again, and said, 'Be sure you are with me to-morrow night, Tom, for then I am going Home!' I turned to him quickly, and knew what he said would come true, for it seemed even then that the light from the other world was shining upon his countenance.

"Being a practical kind of man, I did not like the idea of spending the night alone with him, especially as in the morning he would be found dead, so I sent a note round to a friend of mine, a doctor, a man upon whom I knew I could depend, and simply told him to come to Fred's house that night at eleven o'clock. I knew I could let him in at that hour, unknown to Fred, and I also knew he would do as I asked, and wait for any information I chose to give him.

"He did not fail me, and as I met him in the hall after Fred was in a deep sleep, I told him in a few words that Fred was sure he was going to die sometime during the night, and if such should be the case, I wanted a third party in the house. He nodded his head and accepted the explanation, although I knew the shrewd old fellow knew there must be something more to it. I showed him to a room, and after a few moments conversation I left him and returned to Fred's room.

"As I entered his room in the dim light, I saw a shadowy form flitting near the bedside. I saw the smile hover about Fred's mouth as he stirred uneasily in his sleep, and then I saw the shadowy form distinctly, and the sweet face of his wife bent over him. I saw her white arms clasp his form, I saw a spirit form arise from his body, and heard a soft whisper say, 'Come, my darling,' and his voice faint and far off reply, 'My wife,' and when the mist had cleared before my eyes, I saw Fred, with the smile still on his lips, dead!

"I called to the doctor; he came and looked at him, and simply said, 'Dead!'

"Death was ascribed to heart disease."

Wardwell arose hastily, the tears rolling down his cheeks, and said, "Good night!" and left the room. The others sat silent for a few moments, while some incredulous ones slowly shook their heads; but one of the others remarked, as they all prepared to depart:

"I believe that was true. I never knew Tom Wardwell to lie."

E. THORPE.

Digitized by Google

HOMESPUN YARNS.

By Levin Carnac.

VI.—THE SQUATTER'S WIFE.

TOWARDS the end of last summer, I was coming back from Dublin to London by one of the Irish boats, and as far as Falmouth I hardly exchanged a dozen words with any of my score or so of fellow passengers.

At Falmouth, however, the tedium of the voyage was finally banished by my making the acquaintance of a bronzed and g izzled globe-trotter, who came on board there, looking about as bored and lonely as I felt myself.

Coming along the gangway a porter stumbled and dropped a small handbag of his into the water, and the new arrival reproved him in a terse and forcible arrangement of invective which was fragrant with the aroma of the Bush. I sympathised with him, and fished up the bag with a boat-hook that happened to be handy. Half an hour later we were "talking Australia" over an introductory bottle of Bass.

My new acquaintance was a man of sixty or thereabouts, and he had apparently spent his whole life wandering about the world seeking the rest he could not find in stagnation.

As I had myself only recently returned from Australia, our conversation naturally turned on the land of wool and gold, and ere long, to my no small satisfaction, I found that my friend had been there in the fifties, those heroic times when half the adventurers of the world were hurrying to the Golden Land as fast as winds and waves could bear them, some of them to become rich in a few weeks, and poor again in as many days, and most of them to struggle through their attack of gold fever, and either die of it or recover from it pretty much as they were when they took it.

"Yes," he said, glancing with a dreamy, tired sort of look in his eyes along the beautiful bay down which we were now steaming; "those were wi.d times, and a lot happened that never got known in the outer world. There's many a rich man moving now in the best Colonial society who wouldn't care to meet himself as he was thirty or forty years ago, say on the pavement in Collins Street, or in the vestibule of Menzies' Hotel. I remember a lady who died a few years ago in Melbourne in he odour of sanctity and respectability, who—well, as we're both 'old chums,' and we've nothing better to do, I'll spin you the yarn. She's left no family behind her, and as I'll mention no names, there'll be no harm done to anyone.

"It was just as the first rushes were over, and the diggings had been glutted w th a crowd of vagabonds who had no idea of steady work at gold-digging or anything else, that I had made a decent little pile on the Burraloo Creek on Sydney side, and thought I'd have a spell and see the new country a bit. So I started down to Sydney on the stage, and after about fifty miles we got stuck up by a gang of bush-whackers. The bush was full of these blackguards along the tracks from the different diggings to the townships; most of them were men who had failed at the diggings and turned to this as an easier way of getting gold than grubbing for it at the bottom of a shaft.

"Well, we showed fight, and for half-an-hour things were pretty lively round the coach. In the end we beat the whackers off at a cost of one man killed, three wounded, and one wom n badly scared. That woman was the wife of a squatter whose station was about twenty miles farther down the road, and as I had got a bullet in my arm, which, if I hadn't stopped it, would have spoilt her beauty for ever, nothing would do but my going to spend a portion of my holiday at the station and be nursed. Of course I accepted, and by nightfall found myself comfort ible.

"In a fortnight or so my wound was nicely healed, and I had made great progress in the good graces of my host and his pretty wife. In the case of the latter, I am sorry to say, I had made more progress than was good either for her or myself. No word had ever pa sed between us that her husband might not have heard, but you know how much can be understood in such matters without any actual talking. She was young enough to be her husband's dau hter, and I was not long in discovering that, to her, married life in the Bush was nothing more or less than slavery in the wilderness.

"She had married her husband, I am afraid, for his money, and a few y-ars' 'solitary confinement,' as I have heard her call it, had suffic d to make him utterly intolerable to her. I was vain enough at the time to believe that if anything sudden were to happen to the old man I should not have much di ficulty in consoling her for his loss. My surmise proved correct as the third week of my stay was drawing to a close.

"For two or three days we had noticed a rather suspicious-looking character, half-Londoner, half-dust-fossicker, hanging about the home paddock, and one day I took it into my head to ride him down and get an explanation. I didn't get anything satisfactory, so I decided to march him up to the station for further inquiries. To this he seemed to have very strong reasons for objecting, and when I rode at him to collar him, he whipped out a six-shooter and took a pot-shot at me. He just missed me, and the next moment I had the drop on him, and he showed the white feather and went like a lamb.

"Things turned out pretty much as we expected. In those days the Knights of the Bush thought as little of sticking up an out-of-the-way station as of plundering a stage; and the loafer that I had captured was, as I had half suspected, the spy of a gang which attacked us that night, after shooting a man we had sent to the police-depôt for assistance.

"As we had caught their spy, and perhaps bribed or frightened information out of him, there was no pretence of sneaking into the house, as swagmen wanting work, or anything of that sort. They just posted half-a-dozen men with rifles to cover the two doors of the house, and sent a man to call upon us to surrender, and throw our arms out of the windows, under penalty of having the house burnt over our heads.

Digitized by Google

"We knew too much of the doings of that sort of scoundrel to look upon this as an idle threat. There were even cases known of whole townships being stuck up and looted by the big bushwhacker gangs that infested the bush in the fifties, and if one of these had got us now, the look-out was pretty mean. Still we had no hesitation in deciding to fight, for these brutes were as treacherous as they were cruel, and surrender would probably mean only another kind of death for the men, and what would be worse than death for the women.

"There were eight of us in the station-house, five men—the squatter, myself, and three home-hands—the squatter's wife, and her maid, and the Chinese cook. We were well armed, and the part of the house we garrisoned was log-built and practically bullet-proof.

"Mr. Jones—I call him that because it was not his name—opened the ball by giving the envoy three minutes to get out of sight, and then dropping him in his tracks because he didn't move fast enough. The reply to this was a volley from some dozen rifles from behind a brush-fence that hedged one side of the home paddock, and then the row began.

"There's no need for me to describe the fight, and I'm not a good hand at painting scenes in gore. Suffice it to say that a dropping fire was kept up on both sides for hours far into the night, besiegers and besieged 'firing on the flash' wherever it betrayed the presence of an enemy. All this time Mrs. Smith moved quietly about, helping us to bind up wounds and bringing us food and liquor as we wanted them, her face white and set, but showing no sign of fear or weakness, as most women would have done under such circumstances. Only once did she betray what she really felt, and that was in a whisper which reached my ear alone.

I uttered a cry of horror as the terrible truth broke upon me.

"Towards two in the morning, she brought some bread and meat and whisky to the window where I was stationed, and, as she put them down beside me she came up close and put her hot hand on mine—I can feel the thrill of that touch now, thirty years after—and said, in a dry, half-stifled whisper:

"'Oh Jack, I can't endure this much longer! For pity's sake get me away! There are two horses I've had saddled ready all night, and—'

"What more she would have said, or how I should have answered her, I can't tell you, for, at that moment,

Digitized by Google

we heard a crackling outside the house, and before we had grasped what was the matter the verandah was ablaze.

"There was nothing for it now but a determined attempt to break out and run the gauntlet at any risk.

"'Jack! give me a pistol. I can shoot a bit and—and I daren't be burnt to death. Quick. They're breaking in!'

"I gave her one of my revolvers full loaded, saw that the other was all right, and, telling her to keep near me, went towards the door that was now shaking under the blows of the blackguards outside.

"What happened during the next ten minutes or so I cannot tell you. I remember only a fierce hand-to-hand fight, a horrible medley of oaths, pistol shots, cries of pain, and the roar of the flames growing deeper and nearer every minute.

"At last Mr. Smith and I managed to get his wife out by the back way, and then we broke for the stables. When we reached them Mrs. Smith said to me:

"'Go in and get the horses out. We'll keep the door.'

"While I was loosing the animals I heard two shots fired. One was the dull bang of a smoothbore loaded with ball, and the other was the sharp, spiteful crack of my own revolver.

"I dragged the two saddled horses out, and found Mr. Smith lying on the ground, and his wife standing by the door with the smoking revolver in her hand.

"'They have shot him, and I shot back. For Heaven's sake, let us go!' she said, throwing the pistol away as she spoke.

"Without a word I lifted her into the side saddle, and turned to look at the dead man. As I did so, she cried:

"'Oh, come, Jack, come! They've seen us.'

"But as she spoke the flames of the burning house shot up, and, almost in the centre of the dead man's forehead, I saw the small clean hole made by a revolver bullet fired at close range. I uttered a cry of horror as the terrible truth broke upon me, and, as she heard it, Mrs. Smith struck her horse over the ears and went at a gallop across the home paddock and away into the dim, silent bush beyond. Two minutes later I was up and riding for my life—in an opposite direction.

"Yes, it was a narrow escape. If I hadn't turned to look at her husband's corpse and seen that hole I should have believed her, and six months afterwards I should have married a murderess."

NAMAROU.

NAMAROU used to bring us milk at the dewy dawn of morning and also in the evening, at the hour when the cattle abandoned the fields in herds, and collected in the village, within the walls of ruined huts, to sleep in safety from the panthers and hyænas.

Milk is the drink of the captive, say the blacks. But why should it be more degrading to drink milk than doka (wine made from the palm tree) or dollu (beer made from millet)? The proverb does not say.

It is one of those prejudices all the more tenacious because there is nothing to justify it. It is sufficient without explanation to mention the surprise manifested by the natives when the white people asked them to get them some milk from those superb black and white cows, which resembled those of Switzerland.

I must add that their astonishment was even mixed with amusement. At mealtime in our dining-room, in the open air, under a ficus, the good people, highly amused, form a circle round us, winking their eyes in a manner not to be misunderstood, and, in a low tone, made endless comments, interrupted by stifled laughter, when they would see us, with the white foam on our lips, replaced the calabash on the ground when our thirst was appeased.

But Namarou took no part in these childish demonstrations.

Our request, the first day, had appeared to her very natural, and without saying a word, she placed a dish, turned upside down, on her head, which gave her the appearance of an Annanite sharpshooter, and wended her way towards the pastures. An hour later she brought back the dish full to the brim, and placed it before our hut, to the astonishment of the populace, who were not sparing with their jests for her.

But our milkmaid was not to be moved by such trifles; she maintained perfect silence.

Every day, with her wooden dish balanced on her head, she came to bring us milk.

A couple of silk handkerchiefs and four strings of beads had rewarded her for her kind attentions, and doubtless the hope of other small presents contributed to keep up her obliging behaviour.

As with all people for whom life has been a hard one, the woman in Africa is willingly compassionate; her intelligence has its flashes, her heart its delicate feelings, unknown to the stronger sex.

This observation is equally true of those in other latitudes.

There was no doubt that Namarou had had misfortunes, but of what sort? at what time? No one knew. The tattooing on her cheeks and chest resembled less the marks of distinction adopted by the people who live between the Como and the Volta, than the scars seen on those living much nearer to the westward, in Diammala and Djimini. All that was known about her was that she had come to that place many months before, she and her two children, clothed with a piece of cotton round her loins, like that worn by the rest of the savages, her luggage only an earthen pot and some calabashes.

Who was she? Where did she come from? Was she an escaped prisoner, or a repudiated wife? On all these points, one could only resort to conjecture. The people of the community had admitted her willingly. She had taken up her abode in an abandoned hut, without any one dreaming of disputing possession with her. Blade by blade, she repaired the thatched roof, killed the lizards on the walls by striking them with a piece of hard clay, beat down the earthern floor with stones, and there she lived peacefully.

Digitized by Google

The little ones grew, mingled with other juveniles of the village, and shared in their games. Both of them, besides, made themselves useful.

The girl, already, could crush maize and millet in a wooden mortar as well as an older person. Hardly as tall as her pestle, she worked, turning it with her arm for hours at a time, only varying her task by sifting the flour through a sieve made from fibres of the palm-tree. The boy spent half his time in the blacksmith's shed, keeping up the fire by means of a bellows of goat-skin, on which he played with both hands, imitating, with evident satisfaction, the beating of the tom-tom.

Namarou was not handsome. She had a low forehead and rather hard features; her chest was better preserved than is usually the case among the blacks who have passed their twentieth year; she was tall and long-legged, with the shoulders of an athlete. To see her sitting on her heels at the threshold of her hut, all in a heap, one would never suspect her majestic figure and robust breadth of shoulders. When she arose it was like the expansion of a spring; you would look on the ground, involuntarily, for the trap from which the tall apparition had just sprung.

She had nothing really pretty about her, except her eyes; these were immense and very soft, the calm eyeballs of Juno, like those of a heifer.

Simply dressed, she wore a narrow strip of cotton cloth from Kong, but more frequently she was girded with a band of fou, a natural texture, being a sort of reddish-coloured bark.

Her only ornament was a leather necklace from which was suspended a nugget of gold about the size of a pea; on her legs and ankles large glass beads and coins were strung in rows and securely fastened.

Her coiffure resembled that of the Mandé woman, the natural hair being held in position by the aid of false hair, and drawn up in a knot, with two little locks or curls falling over her temples.

The house of Namarou was particularly clean and well-kept, and might formerly have served as shelter for a tribe.

It was a round hut, in the form of a beehive, but of unusual breadth—it could accommodate twenty persons. The summary of the furniture was this: three straw mats rolled up, and about ten calabashes arranged in a row according to their size—that was all.

There were, however, fastened to the perches which supported the roof, a quantity of gri-gris, bones, cows tails, bunches of dried grass, feathers of the guinea-fowl and the paroquet, as well as a doll-fetish, a hideous little figure, carved out of a log.

In one of the calabashes, which was as large as a cauldron, was a heap of cotton, the crop of several months, which Namarou spun, and which she coloured with a little chalky earth crushed between her thumb and finger. Thus were her mornings passed.

Evening found her still busy, after sunset, when the kitchen fires were lighted all round in the neighbourhood, and in the stillness of the short twilight, when the blue smoke was soaring towards the paling heavens.

One morning our friend did not appear at camp as usual. Our "boys," who had gone to seek information concerning her, reported that she was in her hut, that there was a crowd of people gathered about the door, but she could not come; Namarou was dead!

There was, indeed, a crowd round the hut; a throng attracted by the cries of the children, who, on awaking had found their mother already cold, with stiffened limbs. In the interior, some old men and the principal persons of the village, among whom was the fetish-prophet, discussed her death in a very animated manner close to the corpse.

There she lay on her straw mat, her shrivelled hands lying on the strip of covering, which was pulled up to her chin, her head thrown over on one side, and her large eyes wide open.

It has been said that she would go as she came, mysteriously. Her country is accustomed to short agonies, dreadful fits, and, moreover, subtle poisons thrown by the hand of an enemy or a creditor. To end a dispute, or to balance an unsettled account, there is nothing more expeditious than a decoction of strophanthus. But Namarou had no enemies, and, still further, the poor creature had no creditors. A few handfuls of coins and a little nugget of gold that she wore round her neck, were all her fortune. Someone had given her a blow, perhaps. One does not die like that naturally, and the blacks know it.

From whence came the blow? From sorcerer or a demon?

Sakarabrou has his rages, and woe betide his victims! He pursues them even in death, stifling the mourning of their relatives, and exacting silence from friendly voices.

He carries desolation to the very corpse, which shall never know the repose of a grave in the hut, or near the village, under a mound ornamented with good fetishes, tufts of feathers, wild fruits placed on wooden sticks, and calabashes filled with dew, where the birds may come to drink.

The remains of his victims must be thrown far away in the brushwood at the mercy of the panthers and vultures.

Such are the ceremonies that are granted to him who incurs the hate of Sakarabrou.

It was not difficult to find out the cause of Namarou's death.

The fetish-prophet made a sign; the curious crowd scattered, making way for two men who carried a sort of litter made on four poles torn from the roof, which they tied together. It was a very frail contrivance, only suitable for the weight of a little child; Namarou, who was so tall, could never lie on it. But it was not a question of raising the body upon it, but of tying on this litter the different effects that belonged to the deceased; her cotton garment first, then her spindles, her dishes, and several of the gri-gris which hung on the walls.

These objects, that were the witnesses of her life and death, would conduct the bearers to the one who had committed the murder. Namarou seemed to follow these movements; her eyes were fixed and her eyeballs dilated as with fear.

Now they leave her on her straw mat, alone in the empty hut. The group of old people, the fetish prophet and his acolytes carrying the litter, escorted by the crowd, go towards the dwelling of the fetishes, the temple of Sakarabrou, which is an inclosure containing a tree, half dead, whose old trunk is hollow with gaping cavities. In these receptacles fruits are deposited and dishes of "fonto" for offerings to the bad spirits. It is useless to take any trouble for the good ones, these people only flatter those whom they fear. On a low branch hang the tattered clothes that the demon wears when he appears among the circle of dancers by torch-light, on the evening of some great fête; also the tunic of leaves and the dragon's head with its threatening mouth. Beneath this disguise, according to the common belief, is the real presence! Sakarabrou is there!

Digitized by Google

The two men place the litter on their heads: shuddering, they wait hesitatingly. Although heretofore seeming quite indifferent, they now shiver and tremble, their faces become convulsed, and they shake their light burden. They can control themselves no longer; one single phenomenal suggestion makes them the docile instruments of the sorcerer, who, with an irresistible gesture, bends them to his will and sends them off at his command.

They scamper away, capering, running through the village in every direction, striking against the huts on this side and on that. Sometimes they lean against a door, listening, and then set off again at a mad pace.

From the spot where we are, an eminence at the entrance to Sapiase, the land slopes gently, so that the eye can follow all the particulars of the scene. There are cries and angry protestations when the runners, striking against a cabin, panting and streaming with perspiration, halt for a moment to take breath. The owner of the hut, fearful of being considered guilty of witchcraft, defends himself with vehemence, and calls upon the others as witnesses. They all know him. Is he capable of doing any harm to any one? Why, then, should he have made fetish against Namarou? He had no fault to find with her. They were friends. But the runners have gone away, and he is appeased.

This lasts for hours, while I think of poor forgotten Namarou, who is lying over there in her hut, still waiting, with her eyes wide open.

It is past noon, when, for the twentieth time, the two demoniacs return to the sacred inclosure, where they stop at last, panting for breath, with froth on their lips.

They lean stubbornly, with their backs against the fence, from which it is impossible to get them away. The crime has not been committed by a human being, consequently it is the fetishes who struck Namarou last night.

She is condemned now; her body shall not repose in the ground.

Then bursts forth a ferocious clamour, a concert of imprecations, and the troop hurls itself towards the quarry.

They bring to the middle of the place some gigantic tom-toms, hollowed out of the trunk of a tree, and the orchestra commences, making little taps as a prelude. Then the cadence becomes quicker, and the noise swells like the grumbling of a storm.

Namarou has been rolled up in her straw mat, and they bring her along, or drag her, rather. In hustling her about, the impromptu coffin breaks, and her head hangs down, raking the ground with its high knot of hair.

Then, throwing the body on the ground, another round is begun.

At first, they stand pressed one against another, marking their steps, with their backs bent and their arms dangling by their sides; then the dancers straighten themselves up and go off at a dizzy gallop.

In a cloud of red dust, the whole village whirls, a thousand persons, men, women and children; the young mothers with their children hanging to them in a sort of stirrup, like a soldier's cartridge pouch.

The fetish prophet and his men keep up the excitement with blows of the cat-o'-nine-tails, whose thongs clap on the greasy epidermis with a noise like that of wet linen.

The uproar has put all the domestic animals to flight The sheep and goats have run to the underbrush, the frightened chickens are perched on the roofs, and the cows, huddled together on the prairie, stop their grazing, and look on anxiously, with their necks outstretched.

When the tumult is at its loudest, some of the men, with a rush, take possession of the corpse, and carry it off at a run towards the woods.

For an hour more the dances and songs keep up with redoubled fury. Then, suddenly, the beating of the tom-tom ceases. Three blows are given, at long intervals, and all is silent.

The charm is broken; slowly and quietly the crowd disperses and the people go home calmly, feeling that they have done their duty.

Evening comes on, and the village has returned to its accustomed tasks. The housewives go to draw water, the pestles resound in the mortars, pounding the maize and millet.

The blacksmith in his shed, is making implements for war and tools for farming, and from the hive-shaped huts the smoke is again mounting towards the pale sky.

M. ALEXANDER.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS
GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☞ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 3 distribution must reach us by October 24th, addressed to The 3rd Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the First Distribution will appear next week.

Digitized by Google

THE PEARSON IDEA

Is to give the public the most and the best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.

Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original instructions and notes.

It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

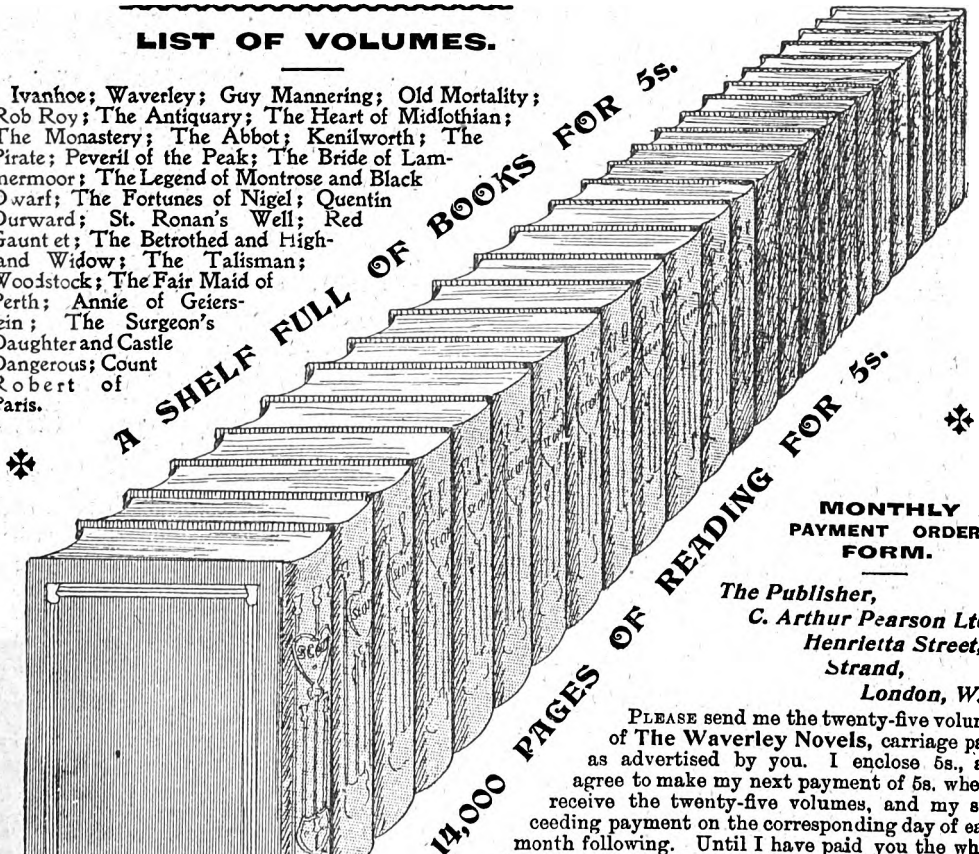
It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of Ivanhoe, or Flora Melvor of Waverley.

The Series consist of Twenty-five Volumes.

The cheapness, combined with the generous style of this series should render it an event to all lovers of class fiction, who ought certainly to find in it the edition of Scott which combines most advantages, including that of being the cheapest artistic edition ever published.

LIST OF VOLUMES.

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Annie of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.



All this is yours for 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

The Publisher,
C. Arthur Pearson Ltd.,
Henrietta Street,
Strand,
London, W.C.

PLEASE send me the twenty-five volumes of The Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I enclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payment on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

FOR YELLOW GOLD.

A Story Told by an Old Western Miner.

WHEN the stage "went light" they ran out the small buckboard, but when there were more than four passengers the big mud waggon was "put on."

This was a buckboard day, for there was not a single passenger.

What was more to the point, as the Gold Butte Mining Company regarded it, was that under the driver's seat was a box with ten thousand dollars in the newest of tens and twenties in it.

The driver had looked very blue when he drove his four mustangs from the post-office—where he took on a very flat leather bag, which spoke loudly of the incapacity or disinclination of the Thimble Spring people for letter-writing—over to the railway station, where he was to take on the box. Things were going all wrong at home. That was why his brown face looked so haggard; that was why he held so loosely to the "lines;" that was why he chewed so hard on the bit of "plug" in his mouth.

"Such hard scratchin' I never seed afore," was what he had said as he had listlessly thrown the mail bag into the waggon: "can't git no decent job nowadays. Nothin' ter be had by prospectin'—tried thet time an' agin; ef I git anything it peters out in ide a week. I might make a strike over to Sand Gulch, but it's a long way off, an' me an' Sue an the kids hez moved so often 'at that we can't raise nothin' ter move on now. Why in Sam Hill did Sue hev ter git that rheumatiz jes now, when we're so hard up? It's a shame. Why can't Bill git someth n' ter do?—great, big, lunk-headed cuss. Ef I had a brotl er poorer'n a crow, d'ye think I'd go and live on him till thar' warn't nuthin' ter eat in the house? Shoo, Zach Springer, you're a fool. Bill hain't done that. He ain't ter blame fer gittin' his leg broke that time. Bill's all right, but he's onlucky. Been tryin' fur a month ter git a job an' can't git in nowhere. He's willin' ter work. He'd stan' cotch deep in the creek all day long washin' out tailin's if he could make his salt at it. Tried it fer six weeks and didn't get enough to buy a pair o' gum boots. Woa, Buckskin! Hang that one-eyed crow bait! he'd jam right into the station platform ef yer didn't saw his teeth eout."

And then the box was taken on, and the express agent had something to say. That "something" was not to Zach Springer's liking. He chewed harder than ever on the bit of plug, and sawed the hard mouths of the mustangs by an unnecessary yanking of the reins.

It was a positive relief to be able at last to whack his lash down upon the sides of the nervous brutes and turn them loose for a forty mile run to Gold Butte.

Why had he needed a lecture from a hireling of the Express Company, and why should that smooth-jowled agent have looked at him with such dark suspicion?

"They think 'cos I get stood up down ter Black Rocks las' time I had a big load o' gold thet I need to be preached to every time I go out now with a full box. The stoop-shouldered, desk-settin' hounds! I'd like ter see one of 'em handlin' the ribbons when thar's a Winchester lookin' at 'em with an eye as big as a bar'l head. Don't tell me they wouldn't give in! The sweet-scented, calf-skin booted young ladies! Thar ain't a man among 'em."

Zach Springer's indignation was now in more complete possession of him than had been his feeling of blueness a little earlier. What he had delivered himself of just now is not what he would have said had he voiced his true sentiments with reference to the express agent's lecture. In between the words ran the thought that "they" had suspected him of having a hand in the Black Rocks robbery. Had that been the reason the stage company had cut down his pay to "sixty" a month? The chances were that it was. It was too blamed mean for a lot of hounds, like these people, to come it so high-handedly over a poor man who only wanted his own. Wouldn't it serve them right if——

The white dust of the desert rolled up on the mustangs' hoofs in little puffs, and sprays of it, powdery fine, followed the turn of the wheels half way up, there to be caught by the breeze and drifted behind in a long cloud that followed the buckboard like a haunting spirit. Sometimes, as the light breeze shifted, it came back upon the buckboard and its driver like heavy thoughts on the conscience of a guilty man.

It would serve them just right! Besides that, only think—ten thousand! What would the people in Mexico or Guatemala, where he would fly, know or care if somebody up in the far-off Nevada had dumped a box off his buckboard and gone back and got it after a few days—may be a week? It would have to be a dark night, wouldn't it? You couldn't go and get a box like that in the daytime and take it anywhere, for the whole country would be out looking for the man who had it Maybe a month. That would be better. It would all blow over by that time. Let's see, would it? Ten thousand was a good deal. Those stage-stoppers were always striking the box on the wrong day. They never got so much as that at one haul. In two months, then—perhaps two months. But it would have to be well hidden.

And the thought stuck to him despite all attempts to keep it off, though by the time he had driven the mustangs into Red Canyon his indignation at having been suspected by the company had died down. The box at his feet had taken on a new meaning for him. It meant smart gowns for the wife; it meant a good schooling for the children. Those five little ones had had a hard "rustle" of it to get what scraps of learning they had thus far managed to clutch; and as for clothes, they were dressed like juvenile scarecrows. Yes, all the hard scratching would be over if he dared to do what many another hard-pushed man had done. Resolving the whole matter down to a plain, clear-cut proposition, it was after all, simply a question of "nerve."

Here was the place to do it. Right here, where the high, scraggy rocks, with the patches of sage-brush atop, come so near to the buckboard. It could be thrown over there anywhere—into the sage-brush. It would be as well concealed as though buried in six feet of earth. The buckboard had reached the top of a long down-grade. Zach put on the brake and twisted the reins about the brake-handle. As if about to take a plunge into ice-cold water, he reached down for the box. But, wait a bit. He took off his big sombrero and hung it on a projecting rock. Then, flashing out his six-shooter, he sent a bullet through the brim of the hat, which he then replaced on his head. Though it had been hot enough when he started out from Thimble Spring, there seemed to be a chill in the air just now. Would they believe the story that he would have to concoct, even though he showed them the hole in the hat-brim? What would he care whether they did or not? They already suspected him. If he had the name he might as well have the game. He looked at a spot where the sage-brush clust red thickest, and made a mental throw or two in a tentative way in order to "get the distance."

Digitized by Google

What would Bill say? Bill was an honest man. He would blush with shame every time his brother's name was mentioned after that, for, of course, he would know. She would never suspect Any kind of a story would bamboozle her. Bill was smart; he could put two and two together as quickly as any man in the country. And yet Bill himself was a little reckless sometimes. He had been acting very queer of late, and had been over to Johnson's a good deal, drinking and playing cards with the boys. That would not do. Bill must be looked after, he was only a young fellow—a mere boy even if he had been trying to raise a moustache lately.

Yes, Bill was a good deal younger than he. Why, he remembered well the day he was born, when they took him to show him his new baby brother. He used to carry Bill all round, and he was the first one to set him on his legs, and try to make him walk. He remembered how it used to hurt his own head when Bill got a knock by falling out of his high chair. Bill was just as much to him now as ever, and those knocks which fate and the weakness of his nature were giving him now, hurt him just as badly—worse, perhaps, than they did brother Bill. What would Bill say?

He laid his hands upon the box again. It would be safe enough behind the rocks, there, under the sage-brush, as safe as if . . .

"Git up, thar! Git, Buckskin! Git, old Gabe! Ye lazy critters. G'lang!" And down came the long lash upon the dust-covered backs of the mustangs, and off down the long grade they ran, making the dust fly in the canyon as it never flew before. For Zach had grasped the reins in a grip of iron, and both his big cowhide boots were planted firmly on the box.

"This 'ere is what I call goin'!" he said, ten minutes later, as they were still flying down the grade. "But I lost some time with a fool notion that I orter a ben licked for ever thinkin' on a minit. Well, the mustangs got a good rest. Makin' up fer it now, though. They'll soon be in a lather. I'll git to the half-way house in a quarter of an hour, and then I'll take a good horn. I feel kinder narvous yit. That 'ere box is a heavy load on a man's mind. I s'pose the superintendent up to Gold Batte is worryin' about it too. Never mind, ol' feller, you'll see that stuff stowed away in yer safe afore sundown.

"What's this? A hold up, sure as shootin'!"

Out from behind a tall rock a man, with a piece of dark calico over his face and a very large Winchester in his hand, had suddenly sprung, and the muzzle of the rifle looked right into Zach's big round eyes.

The brake scraped the wheels and made the sparks fly.

The mustangs came to a sudden stand.

There was no getting by that Winchester.

"I reckon you've got the drop on me, stranger," the driver coolly remarked. "Stick up my hands? In course I will, ef you insist on it, but I tell yer these 'ere mustangs is mighty skittish, an' it's on ther daown grade. So yer needn't shoot if they start up, fur it'll be yer own fault. I s'pose yer arter th s 'ere box. Throw it out? It's too heavy fer that. Ye'll hev ter give us a lift."

The man with the gun said nothing, but the subtleties of the holding-up process were not so fine but that Zach understood every wave of the stranger's hand and every shrug of his shoulders, when the waves and shrugs meant anything. Zach had been held up before.

He of the calico mask did not step forward at once. In this suggestion that he should assist in taking off the box he seemed to suspect some trick. But one of Zach's hands were held aloft and the other, with the four reins in it, was on the level of his shoulder. The man edged up to the buckboard, exchanging the weapon which he presented at Zach's head for a six-shot revolver.

"Thanks, stranger," said Zach, with forced merriment. "I never like ter hev one o' them 'ere long-barrelled things p'inted at me. They shoot too straight. Now, here ye are."

With his foot he shoved the box along until it was near the end of the waggon.

"Thar it is, help yourself: but ye'll find it a heavy load ter pack ef yer goin' far."

The robber's fingers grasped the box nervously.

"A green un at the biz," thought Zach; "mebbe that'll be an openin' here yit."

The robber pulled and hauled at the box, but it would not budge, for it was caught on a nail-head in the bottom of the waggon.

In his feverish anxiety to secure the gold, he lowered the revolver a little and grasped the box with both hands.

Swiftly Zach's right hand fell to his hip and out he whipped his bright barrelled pistol.

"Got the dead drop, stranger! It's no go!" he shouted. "Put that weepin daown, you fool!"—for the man was raising his pistol. "You won't? Then take that."

A flash, a report, and back fell the robber without a moan. His fingers clawed the dust for a moment, as if he were grasping for a hold on life. But the hold was not to be had, for he gave it up and lay there quietly in the dust.

The driver shoved his pistol into his holster and wiped the sweat from his brow. It had been a close shave for the box, and a closer shave for him.

"Taks a purty keen un ter git erway with Ol' Zach artor all," he chuckled, springing lightly from the buckboard, while a broad smile lit up his brown face. "This' ere means a big raise from ther stage comp'ny an' a hundred er two from the Gold Butte folks. I guess they'll think the ol' man's all right arter this. Hooray for hooray! my stock's riz! It's way up ter a hundred an' fifty. Whoop-e-e! Haw-haw-haw!"

He stooped down over the dead man and lifted the bit of cloth from his face.

"Good Heavens! It's Bill!" G. Hill.

Digitized by Google

A Love - - - - in Tatters.

ELINOR RICHARDS worked in Olcott's shop. Dr. Frost was out driving with two lady friends, and they passed Olcott's.

"Oh, Dr. Frost, do let us go in here! They make everything. You can get your pockets full of all kinds of mechanical toys."

So they alighted and went in, and Dr. Frost was interested and amused, as he always was with mechanical devices, till he came to the table where sat Elinor Richards.

If Dr. Frost had been struck he could not have been more surprised. But nature and his professional training held his face in check. He stepped forward and held out his hand.

"Miss Richards! What a very unexpected pleasure! You have not forgotten me!"

Miss Richards had not forgotten. She glanced at his light gloves and at her own fingers wet with fresh paint.

"You must excuse me," putting her hands behind her. "I can't consent to ruin your gloves."

The Doctor smiled, put quite at his ease for the moment. That little wilful trick of refusal was one he knew quite well. She had put her hands behind her a great many times in the past when he had wanted to shake hands.

The little group passed on. Miss Richards sat down, drove her penknife into the table before her, snapped the blade short off, and went on with her work again.

Dr. Frost had entered on his profession without friends and in debt. And at the very outset he had said that since love and marriage lay in the natural order of things, he would choose a wife whose social standing should help and not hinder him.

He had met Elinor Richards the winter before. She had been spending some few weeks with her aunt, Mrs. Davis. Mrs. Davis did not belong to the extreme fashionable set. She lived in good style; had a good house, money, and more than the average culture and refinement. In a quiet way, Miss Richards, as her niece, became quite a celebrity.

Dr. Frost met her several times; at the opera first, and afterwards at the theatre. And then he fell into a habit of calling on Mrs. Davis informally, as his engagements would permit; and so when Miss Richards left the town he had grown to miss her.

He had settled with himself so firmly at the outset that he could not afford matrimony for years to come that he did not recognise any other sentiment than a passing interest. Elinor was not a girl to talk about herself; he had not the slightest idea of her circumstances or social standing beyond that implied by her relationship to Mrs. Davis.

But in his thoughts of that home which, by-and-by, he was to make for himself, he saw always at the head of his table a girl with grey eyes and brunette skin.

And now he had seen her again, and she was at work in a shop. Well!

Miss Richards went home from her work that night in a tumult, for which she had called herself various uncomplimentary names. If she had been more accustomed to mental analyses she would have understood that her own position was less the cause than the discovery of a very earthly streak in the man whom she had set very high among the gods. Dr. Frost had his face in very thorough control, but not so absolutely that Miss Richards did not feel the shock he had suffered.

The next day, or rather the next evening, Dr. Frost called on her. In that interview there was no trace of embarrassment on either side. Miss Richards gave him to understand quite naturally that she earned her own bread. But after he had gone she was cross and irritable, and then she cried herself to sleep.

In the next four days Dr. Frost saw her three times. What fascination drew him he could not define to himself. When he went away he coolly told himself that he was in love with her, and as coolly that it was a piece of folly from which he had better recover as soon as possible; and with a great pang at his heart set himself to make the most of the sweetness in Madeline Austin's smiles.

In October Mrs. Davis came back from some country visits she had been making with a severe cold, which developed itself into pneumonia. Straightway Miss Richards was summoned to attend her. That was the usual programme. Being the only niece in the family who had no regularly appointed home duties, all the sick people called on her for everything they wanted.

Digitized by Google

But she did rebel a little against this call. Yet what could she do? The necessity was stringent. She went, of course.

"That man loves me, I believe, and I"—looking straight before her—"might love him."

She found Dr. Frost in attendance. He did not look in her face when they met. He had only a few words to spare; the case in the room beyond was too grave to admit of careless speech.

For a week matters went on after that fashion. Then Mrs. Davis began to mend. But the Doctor's visits did not cease.

Madeline Austin's smiles were not the less warm and sweet, but John Frost forgot them in the light of a pair of steady, cold, grey eyes. Out of Elinor Richards's presence he made resolutions innumerable, and went back again and again into the dangerous influence.

The steady, grey eyes saw it all, knew that the man rebelled, and was drawn by a power he could not help. Mrs. Davis told her niece that it was popularly reported that a marriage pended between Dr. Frost and a Miss Austin.

About the time that Miss Richards was hearing this, Dr. Frost was also being enlightened. He was attending Harry Vaughan, who had broken his leg.

"Smythe tells me that Miss Richards is back with Mrs. Davis?"

"Yes."

Then Dr. Frost heard something about Miss Richards which he refused to believe.

The next day Dr. Frost found Mrs Davis weakly weeping over a rumour that a dear friend had just been relating to her.

"Cruel, Doctor; women are so cruel to each other. Here's Mary Morris with nothing to do but to keep this cobweb of gossip afloat till it grows into something that isn't a cobweb."

"I don't understand," with a cold sinking at his heart.

"Elinor's birth was unfortunate. There were circumstances in her parents' history that were extremely painful—one of those family skeletons that nobody wants meddled with. And someone has begun rattling the dry bones, and there'll be no end to the clatter, I suppose."

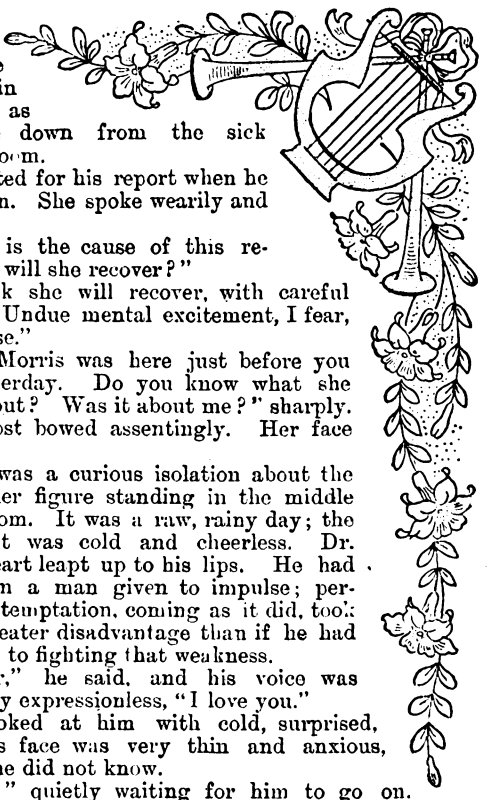
Mrs. Davis waxed hysterical, and Elinor came in, straight and tall, and sallow-faced with many nights' watching, and assisted the Doctor to minister to her aunt, their hands touching, asking and answering questions with mechanical coolness.

When the Doctor went away he shut his teeth hard to keep back an inarticulate expression—half groan, half an imprecation. Then he rode about till late at night and spent the rest of it in considering himself.

He could never marry her with this stain on her name. He moaned over that necessity of renunciation as bitterly as if he had ever had the intention of doing so. Now he thought he had. He fancied he might have faced everything else but this. He had to make his way in the world. He knew himself for a coward, and did not writhe the less bitterly for the knowledge. He did not turn, as a less generous man might have done, and accuse her of an endeavour to entrap him.

"I love her, and I shall never love anyone else. But I have not the courage to face her history, knowing that it is known."

All this was a poor preparation for meeting Miss Richards next morning when he went up to Mrs. Davis's in obedience to an early summons. He hoped she would be out of the way, but she met him in the hall as she came down from the sick woman's room.



She waited for his report when he came down. She spoke wearily and languidly.

"What is the cause of this relapse, and will she recover?"

"I think she will recover, with careful nursing. Undue mental excitement, I fear, is the cause."

"Mrs. Morris was here just before you came yesterday. Do you know what she talked about? Was it about me?" sharply.

Dr. Frost bowed assentingly. Her face hardened.

There was a curious isolation about the tall, slender figure standing in the middle of the room. It was a raw, rainy day; the grey light was cold and cheerless. Dr. Frost's heart leapt up to his lips. He had never been a man given to impulse; perhaps the temptation, coming as it did, took him at greater disadvantage than if he had been used to fighting that weakness.

"Elinor," he said, and his voice was thoroughly expressionless, "I love you."

She looked at him with cold, surprised, eyes. His face was very thin and anxious, but that he did not know.

"Well?" quietly waiting for him to go on.

"I said I love you. I am poor. I have my fortune all to make. I know your story. I can help you to bear it, or we will sink under it together."

To John Frost's alarmed eyes she seemed to grow taller and threateningly majestic. The cold eyes flashed angry lightnings; clearly Miss Richards had a temper. But save for a quiver of scorn in the clear tones, her voice was quiet enough. But before she spoke Dr. Frost's inner consciousness told him that he had not said the most felicitous thing.

"You are magnanimous. My poverty and my story. No, thank you, Dr. Frost. It would need a much stronger man than you to bear the double weight. Besides, would Miss Austin approve, I wonder, of your unequalled generosity?"

A dash of bitter red relieved the Doctor's paleness. He bowed and left her. Silence was dignified and—safe. He hated himself that he thought of that. But what could he have done, after all, if she had taken him at his word?

For two weeks more he saw Miss Richards nearly every day—saw her, and, for any emotion she betrayed, might as well have asked questions of and given directions to a skilful automaton. Then he did not see her, and Mrs. Davis confided her grievances.

"Elinor's gone home ill. She never had an illness before. And how am I to get well without her?"

Elinor came near finding this illness her last as well as her first. It was a low, nervous fever, wearing her down to skin and bone, and leaving her weaker than a baby, and irritable enough to make excusable her aunt's remark:

"Dear me, Elinor. There isn't much of you, but what there is is very trying in its quality."

Digitized by Google

By this time it was mid-winter, and she was invited to convalesce in Mrs. Davis's house, which proposal she flatly declined, and went instead to the house of a friend, with whom she spent six delightful weeks, making the most of her invalid's privileges, and getting back strength and flesh, and something that was almost beauty.

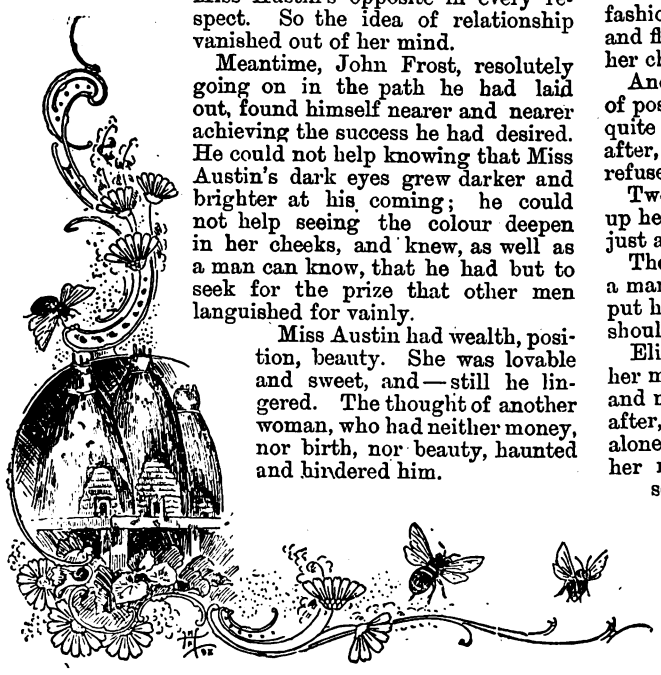
Among the men she saw was a rather elderly, artificial individual, whom she remarked chiefly because he bore the same name as herself. I am not going to make a mystery of the matter; it was her father, though she did not know that till some weeks later. He seemed in rather poor health.

In that country life, taking so much of its hurry and glitter as she chose, retiring behind the shield of her barely recovered health when she grew wearied, some latent possibilities developed themselves. No one asked if she had ever wrought for her daily bread; no one offered her pitying sympathy on account of her "story."

A well-bred, self-possessed girl, introduced sufficiently well by the friends whose guest she was, the very heterogeneous collection of elements called "society" asked nothing more. And among the rest Frank Austin fluttered about her, fitfully at first, as was his manner, and then settled down into a languid constancy of attendance, quite noticeable by those who knew the man.

Elinor did not mind much about him. She stood in no danger of falling in love. Down deep in her heart a steady pain throbbed and burned. She never mentioned John Frost's name; indeed, in these days, she had no occasion either for speaking or hearing it. When she first heard Frank Austin's name she regarded him with a quick little spasm of pain, remembering a certain Madeline Austin, whose name she had heard in quite another connection.

But Madeline Austin was slight and dark, with a flashing quickness of motion, and this young man had the build of a Hurcules; was blonde and slow — just Miss Austin's opposite in every respect. So the idea of relationship vanished out of her mind.



Meantime, John Frost, resolutely going on in the path he had laid out, found himself nearer and nearer achieving the success he had desired. He could not help knowing that Miss Austin's dark eyes grew darker and brighter at his coming; he could not help seeing the colour deepen in her cheeks, and knew, as well as a man can know, that he had but to seek for the prize that other men languished for vainly.

Miss Austin had wealth, position, beauty. She was lovable and sweet, and — still he lingered. The thought of another woman, who had neither money, nor birth, nor beauty, haunted and hindered him.

But one night, when the dance was done, he asked his question, and Madeline faltered her "yes," and Dr. Frost went home in the early dawn an engaged man; which fact Mrs. Davis wrote her niece very soon afterwards, taking a grim comfort in the telling.

Elinor was sitting with Frank Austin when her letter came. She read it, and flushed painfully. Austin was not looking at her. She laid it down, and startled herself with a bitter laugh.

"Miss Richards," a tone of alarm in his voice, "what has happened?"

"Nothing, positively. An earthquake, I believe, one of those social swallowings up that occur now and then in the best regulated circles, but nothing outside the interested parties, I assure you."

"I don't understand you at all," looking at her in a puzzled way.

"And I didn't mean you should. Dear Mr. Austin, I want you to go."

"I can do that, certainly," rearing himself aloft. "But I don't like to leave you in trouble if there's anything——" pausing wistfully.

"There isn't anything. I'm not in trouble. Oh, I can't tell you," covering her face in her hands.

Does anyone know what blundering spirit sometimes possesses a man?

"I don't want you to tell me. Oh, don't cry!" his own voice husky, and he came and stood over her; "because, Miss Richards, you see, I love you so," and he stood trembling in all his six feet of length.

Down fell Miss Richards' hands from her crimson face, and she stood staring in simple astonishment.

"Good gracious!" she said breathlessly.

Austin looked up at the sound and met her eyes.

"Is it so very preposterous?" he asked humbly.

"Yes. No, not preposterous at all, only so utterly impossible. Oh, you don't know!" breaking down again.

"I do know that I've blundered. I'll take it all back. You are not to think of it again."

"Then you don't—what was it, Mr. Austin?" woman-fashion coming all at once out of her grief and agitation, and flashing a smile into his face with the tears still on her cheeks.

And he, of course, bewildered by this sudden change of position, reiterated his assertion, to which she listened quite gravely now. And when he went away half-an-hour after, he had regularly proposed and been as regularly refused.

Two weeks after that there came a letter that broke up her established views of life as utterly as if she had just awakened from a dream.

The letter was from her father—such a letter as such a man would naturally write. He was rich—he could put his daughter at the head of an establishment that should gratify a high ambition.

Elinor had known comparatively little of the facts of her mother's history. She knew that she had left home and married clandestinely; that, little more than a year after, she had died at Elinor's birth, died neglected and alone; that the wretched little baby was taken by her mother's family, the father not caring even to see it, and making no provision for its maintenance.

So now, when the man who had caused all this misery reappeared and begged that his daughter would remember the ties that he had so long forgotten, trying to bribe her with promised splendours, she indignantly refused.

But, a little after, another letter came. Mr.

Digitized by Google

Richards was ill, probably fatally so, and begged his daughter once more to come to him.

"He is your father, my dear," her grandmother said, and then the two went to the bedside of the sick man.

Mr. Richards did not die; but his convalescence was a long one, and he spent the time by the seaside after the summer came. Elinor was with him. "My daughter" seemed to have become the centre of the man's existence. He clothed her in splendid apparel, and flashed jewels before her undazzled eyes. She bore her changed estate with superb self-possession. She thought of those other days when she wore print dresses and soiled her fingers with a day's work, if not with a feeling of regret, at least without a sense of weariness or distaste in the memory.

Then when the summer was over they went back to town, and set up housekeeping on rather a grand scale. She met most of the people she had known before, at one time and another, all but Dr. Frost and Frank Austin. But both these meetings came about after a while.

A little while after she met Madeline Austin at a wedding reception. In the ebbing and flowing of the crowd they found themselves near each other. Miss Richards was magnificently attired in velvet and rustling silk. Miss Austin, for once, wore a dress that did not suit her. Her dark face looked swarthy by the contrast, and by Miss Richards's side she sank into insignificance. At least, that was what Frank Austin thought, looking at the two. Miss Austin's sole associations with Elinor were her few casual meetings with her in last winter's quieter life. If Elinor remembered her with a different recognition, she did not betray herself. Perhaps, when all at once the relationship between brother and sister revealed itself to her, she half wished that last winter's decision on his suit had been different. Miss Richards was wholly feminine.

Later in the evening Dr. Frost appeared. She had not seen him for more than a year. He was looking careworn, and much more than a year older. At first he did not recognise her. When he did they talked with an odd constraint on them both.

Mr. Richards came up while they stood together. Elinor presented him. There was a great deal of courtly grace in the elder man's bearing, and his demeanour to his daughter was perfect. The Doctor looked dazed and bewildered, and Elinor left him before he had recovered his wits.

Left him and cried half that night because—oh, uncertain human nature!—she did not grieve more deeply over her lost ideal.

But when John Frost called, after a few days, the old charm fell on her again. For the sake of those old days she could not help being gracious and sweet, and evidently, also, Dr. Frost could not help being swept off his feet.

"I heard of your engagement," she said at last. "It is not yet consummated, it seems."

"And may never be. Elinor, I was an idiot. I loved you better than any other human being even while I was speaking those fatal words to Madeline. Only my ambition stood in my way. I love you now, I swear to you."

Miss Richards was rather unprepared for this outbreak. She looked at him steadily for a moment or two.

"You must go, Dr. Frost. I think I ought to be very angry with you. Only I am sure that you cannot mean this I would never hear your voice again. How can you dare say such things to me? Go, now."

He went out silently, and met Frank Austin coming in.

"Oh, yes, Maddy gave me this for you," pulling out a slim envelope.

And Frost found himself summoned to attend his betrothed on a shopping expedition.

John Frost told Madeline Austin the truth one day. He did not mean to. It was as unpremeditated, as thorough an accident as every other event in his history had been. He told her about Elinor.

"And you love her yet?" the girl said. She was pale and trembling, but she was very brave about the matter.

"Heaven knows—I hope not! I will be as true to you as ever man was to woman; but you must know the truth in this matter. I will not begin our wedded life with a lie. I will be a good husband to you, Madeline."

"No," she said coolly, "I think that must be over between us. You are a free man, Dr. Frost. Go and tell Miss Richards, and see what she says."

He protested and urged, and in the end he went. And just about the time he left Madeline, Elinor was saying: "But before I say yes, Frank, you must understand that I used to work in Olcott's shop."

"My dear, I know all about it. I have known it ever since I first saw you. Dr. Frost was attending me at the time, and Maddy came home and told me about you."

"And there is something else I have learnt lately that Dr. Frost knew. My mother——"

"Dear, I know that, too. We will not distress ourselves with this old trouble. Your griefs are mine, too, and we will bear them together; but we will not think of them now."

"I must go and dress for Mrs. Saxton's dinner. You will be there?"

He met Dr. Frost a few yards from the steps.

"I was just coming to you and Maddy," and then he stopped in a little ineffectual mental search for dignified expression, and, failing, used the bluntest.

"Miss Richards and I are engaged to be married. She has just promised me."

Neither Miss Austin or Dr. Frost are married. I do not know what the future will do for them, though I do not believe she will ever trust him again. For a few months they thought she would die, but travel and youth and a strong constitution pulled her through. It was a hard blow for a girl of her character, and she will never again be as hopeful and trustful as before.

As for Dr. Frost, though his practice grows steadily, and wealth and assured position seem to lie in his way, he is hardly to be envied.

E. V. Hall.

Digitized by Google

JIMMY.

"ANYTHING to-day, Mr. Brooks?"

"Nothing to-day, Jimmy."

The old man turns sadly away. He is very old. His coat is of rusty black and of ancient pattern, an old-fashioned high hat rests upon his silvery locks; but the coat and the hat are carefully brushed, and were it not for the very weary face beneath, one would not notice him so much.

Poor Jimmy! He had asked that same question at the same hour and the same theatre for many years, with always the same answer. He had been a good actor once and walked those very boards. The old walls had many a time resounded with laughter and applause of Jimmy's making.

He was a favourite then, he was watched and waited for, and no bill of the old house was deemed complete without the name of Jimmy Page. But now—well, it is different! He is old and it is a crime to be old. Everything else might have been forgiven, but that, never.

There were other actors now, young men and handsome men; then, besides, there were different people down in the front to look at them.

The old audience that used to love Jimmy is gone, no one knows where, but they are gone and have been these many years. Everything is changed—his old companions, brother actors of his other days, have faded away, and Jimmy sometimes wonders how it came that all have drifted so far and only he remains, forgotten and alone.

He replaces the old hat upon the bowed head and shuffles slowly across the stage, every nook and corner of which is rich in reminiscence to him. At the threshold of his old dressing-room he pauses for a moment—yes, it is the same looking-glass, with a face nearly as scarred as Jimmy's own. How often has it reflected his face in moments of triumph in the days of youthful power and happiness, as he looked into it; no wonder, he is far different now. Jimmy could see it. Far different. Then he was youthful, hopeful, young and full of bright thoughts for a happy future, but now—well, he is old, but that is sufficient. Jimmy understands and turns away.

He glances mechanically at the wardrobe scattered about him. It belongs to the new comedian. They say he will be a success, and above all he is young. Jimmy almost lets fall a tear as he wonders if the new one will ever be old.

He hopes not.

Down the passage he goes, where in brighter days he trod so happily, and at last he stands by the old stage door. There is his name, placed there thirty years ago. How well he remembers the night; and Fanny had written it there next to hers.

Poor, dear Fanny! She has gone with the other, and never again will cross that threshold, never again hear the creak of the old stage door. Gently, very gently, he pushes it open and goes out into the streets Some employés of the house are unloading luggage at the kerb. All speak to him as he shuffles by.

"Poor old Jimmy!" says one; "he was good once, so they say, but he is a 'has been' now."

Jimmy goes down the street, silent and alone. He does not heed the crowd that streams by him and buffets the old form here and there. He is thinking of something else. He is living in the days when so many were glad to know Jimmy Page, comedian.

As he climbs the little stairs of the house that Jimmy now lives in, he wonders how it came that the wise Providence has taken away all the other "boys and girls" and left him to grow so useless and so old.

"Ah, dear dad, how late you are!" says a cheery, girlish voice, as he enters the room.

Her nimble, kindly little fingers, the dearest in the world to Jimmy, take the old hat from the silvery locks and place it tenderly on the hook behind the door, lead the bowed figure to a comfortable armchair by the fire, and as he sits with a sweet, childish smile upon his patient face, Fanny, blithe and happy as a bird, bustles about, singing gaily as she sets the "tea-things" on the modest little table.

It is not a banquet, just a plain, simple little meal, but how they enjoy it! How merrily little Fanny prattles on the happy plans for the future! Her needle is bringing them more and more every day, and there will be no more times like the old ones when they were so poor; and then the meal is finished and he is seated once more in the armchair and she is singing merrily through her work, and it really seems for the moment Jimmy has forgotten that he is old; it seems as though there was some place for him after all.

Then when her work is over and she sits at the little stool at his feet he tells her of the bygone days. He has told her all before so often, but then it is all so new to her.

He speaks gently of her mother. Ah! she was a wonderful artist, none like her now, Jimmy is certain of that. Too bad, too bad she had gone. She could show them to-day what acting was, but perhaps it was better after all. She would have been old now, Jimmy would have grieved to see her so.

A brisk rap at the door and open it flies.

"Oh, Jack!" and little Fanny runs to meet him.

"What a handsome, manly young fellow he is; no wonder everyone likes him, no wonder Jack is a success," thinks old Jimmy as he cordially shakes his hand. He is a royal fellow is Jack, and Jimmy loves him—yes, even if he is the new comedian.

Digitized by Google

What a happy evening they pass, Jack singing and joking till his humour even effects old Jimmy, who really tries to sing himself.

It is an old song; they used to laugh at it once, but something is wrong; his voice is not quite in tune, something lacking, it is not so funny as it once was, and after he has finished Jimmy laughs quietly to himself and then looks at them.

Jack is gazing sorrowfully into the fire, and Fanny is weeping very softly on Jack's shoulder.

Yes, Jimmy feels they are right; he is certainly growing old, and Fanny helps him off to the little room to rest.

When they are gone Jack rises and tiptoes across the room to where Jimmy's coat hangs on the wall and quietly slips a gold coin into the frayed pocket and tiptoes back again.

Jimmy will wonder to-morrow how he came to overlook that coin before, but he will never dream how it came there.

Dear Jack!

Little Fanny soon returns, and together they sit by the cheerful fireside and talk very quietly. Jack appears in the new piece to-morrow.

Oh! how they hope he will succeed, how much it will mean for all of them! They will be together then, and never, never leave each other again; Fanny, Jack, and poor old Jimmy—won't they be happy!

No more heartaches, that is all past now; and Jimmy need never look for an engagement again; he will not need it, poor old soul.

Ah! little do they know the artist, little do they dream in the flush of their youthful years the hopeless yearning of the old man, who, tossing on his little couch near by, brokenly murmurs:

"Old, old, old!"

It is evening again. The lights of the great theatre shine brightly upon the twinkling snowflakes falling gentl upon the merry, good-natured crowd that swarms the great thoroughfare. Carriages without number are discharging their brilliant occupants at the theatre door, and many are the bright and happy faces that crowd the entrance.

It is the first night of the new comedy, and all the "first nighters" are there ready to condemn or approve.

At the rear of the building a somewhat different scene presents itself. The snow is heaped high about the old stage door, the lonely gas lamp flickers dismally in the night wind, and the street is almost deserted.

Some happy faces pass this door too, but most of them are silent and grave. A great deal depends upon this night to them, success or ruin stares them in the face, and the little "servant girl" hums a comic song with a very serious countenance as she hurries in.

Then comes Jack. He is very hopeful, and tells his companion as they enter together that it is certain to be "the hit of his life"

Who is this old crouching figure that comes shuffling through the snow and hesitates as he reaches the door? Why, it's Jimmy. Yes, he has come to take a lesson from the younger generation.

Somehow he seems older to-night, just a little more bent, and perhaps there are a few, just a few, more lines about his dear face.

The curtain is up, the play is on. The audience is very quiet and ready at an instant to approve or to crush.

Jack's time has come; he begins; quickly the ice is broken. They are with him, and the house fairly rocks with laughter and applause. He has won them and stamped his name beside the glittering motto, "Success" upon the play.

What a happy little heart is fluttering joyfully in the dear little girl who looks at him from the front, with so many happy tears—her Jack!

The company is in ecstasies and the author rushes round the stage to greet our Jack as he leaves it.

But where is Jimmy? Ah, yes, there is, "Right proscenium entrance," squeezed in a little space where the gas man has kindly placed him and given him a little stool to sit on.

Can it be he is not laughing and cheering with the mad crowd so near him? It actually seems that there are tears in his eyes, or something very like them, and as he gazes through them it seems to Jimmy that another scene, a far different one, unrolls before him—a scene of long, long ago. The comedian is still there, but he doesn't look quite like Jack, but like someone Jimmy knew once. Why, bless me! it's Jimmy himself, and, yes, he can't be mistaken, round him are the old "boys and girls." Again comes floating on his ear the familiar strains of the old orchestra he knows so well, wafted to him from out of the realms of long ago. Again the laughter and applause are his and his alone, Fanny is with him now, how beautiful she looks; it is a great night for Jimmy, and why? because he is young. Dear, dear Fanny, how merciful, he thinks, that you will never grow old. Oh; the happiness which surrounds him, just plain Jimmy, but the greatest of them all——.

"Curtain."

Bang goes the gong and Jimmy rises with a start. Gone. All are gone. All the familiar faces he saw such a short time ago. He must have been dreaming, these are different faces that go laughing by him; but they are just as young and just as beautiful, and as Jimmy turns to go away he sees his own in the little glass nailed against the gas box, and Jimmy only says: "Old, old, old!"

Just a little more bent, just a little slower does he shuffle to the stage door. He stops a second and in the dim light of the flickering jet prints a reverent and respectful kiss on the spot where her name stands next to his, then slowly, without being missed, shuffles out, and the old stage door closes half-reluctantly upon him.

"Jack, the piece went splendidly, and it's you that did it; never saw such a hit since I've been in the business," and the manager grasps his hand.

And Jack—well Jack only sees visions of a very happy little home with a sweet girlish face ever near him, and a dear silvery-haired figure by the bright fireside. How happy they will be!

"By-the-way, old man," says the manager as he is leaving, "I'm not at all suited with the way Davis does that character old man part; think you'd better tell old Jimmy to come round at rehearsal to-morrow and I will give him a chance at the part."

Jack can only say, "God bless you!"

How happy they all are after the strain is over and they know all is well; the little "servant-girl" is laughing merrily, and they crowd about Jack as they all walk down the passageway together to the old stage door. The door swings open; they are about to step out, when something lying in the snow blocks their way. Jack stoops and lifts it.

"Jimmy!"

Yes, the curtain that has been rung down so many years has risen to the sweet strains of the old orchestra, and once again he is playing his part with the "old boys and girls."

CHARLES HARTMAN.

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Eagle Strangles the Bear.

It was no part of Admiral Mahan's scheme to leave his ships as stationary targets to be battered by the superior gun-fire of his opponent.

No sooner did the action commence than he promptly echeloned the fleet to the East, thus effectually using his broadsides and compelling the enemy to change front in order to bring his full force into play. The manœuvre had another and important effect.

The tide was now rapidly moving down Channel, and the United States vessels in their new position had the benefit of a strong current for the purposes of rapid movement and easier execution of tactics. Ship for ship and gun for gun, the Grand Duke ought to have won the battle, and, indeed, he began the affair with a light heart as to its issue, though he bitterly denounced the American commander for so thoroughly upsetting his plans.

But in one respect out of many the Russian had seriously underrated his foe. He had heard of, but never seen, the dynamite gun—a fearful weapon to the development of which the United States had given particular attention.

Their artillerists had succeeded in developing to perfection not only the propelling power of this well-known explosive, but also in utilising its eccentric qualities in bursting the missile itself.

Gunpowder or gun-cotton has a direct and measurable effect in a specific locality when exploded by the impact of a shell upon the object aimed at. It also seeks the least resisting avenue of outlet. Dynamite, on the other hand, is a variable force, and most frequently attacks with the greatest fury the point of utmost resistance.

The Russian ships soon bore witness of the demoniacal energy of this unexpected assailant.

Whilst the blows of some of the American shells did little more damage than was effected by the first shock—the resultant explosion passing away harmlessly or wrenching off some obstacle many feet distant from the place struck—the majority of effective projectiles did enormous damage, crushing 9-inch plates as though they were bonnet-boxes, tearing whole sections out of a barbette, smashing big guns out of their carriages, and, at times, wrenching huge lumps from the body of a ship

Such terrific freaks of the giant explosive quickly demoralised the Russian sailors, and the battle had not long progressed before Michaelovitch, Grand Duke, ordered all efforts to be concentrated upon torpedo and ram attack.

But by this time the United States Admiral had received highly valuable professional assistance.

When the fight began, David Jenkins, master of No. 51 Cardiff pilot boat, was standing in the bows of his smart little craft near the entrance to Penarth Dock. He knew that in the then state of the tide both friend and foe were in imminent danger of stranding during the rapid and often careless course of a manœuvre.

Now, David Jenkins was not cast in particularly heroic mould. He was short and stout and sailor-like, with a small vocabulary of common words but a rich stock of expletives in two languages. He yelled to his assistants to cast off from the buoy to which the Polly Jenkins—his wife's namesake—was moored, and run up the mainsail and topsail and haul in the jib.

In a word, Admiral Mahan wanted a pilot, and David Jenkins was going to him.

If you can conceive what a fierce naval engagement means, if you can picture a sea torn with projectiles big and little, alive with torpedoes, and swept with torrents of bullets from Maxims and small-arms, you will realise the Inferno through which the Polly Jenkins passed like a pantomime fairy among the demons—smiling and untouched—during the next few minutes.

And what a roar went up from Penarth Head, from the masts of ships in the docks, from the balconies of such buildings as commanded a sea view, when the people understood David Jenkins' motive and saw him clamber up a rope thrown to him over the side of the Minneapolis, whilst a shell sent the smart Polly Jenkins to the bottom of the sea an instant later.

David coolly turned to help his mates, both of whom were saved, and then made his way to the conning-tower of the Minneapolis, where he found the Admiral.

When he heard the pilot's mission, Admiral Mahan gripped his hand for reply. In five minutes the effect of David Jenkins' presence was felt. Two Russian battleships were stuck in the East Mud, and a cruiser was aground on a shoal off Penarth.

Digitized by Google

The fight lasted exactly three-quarters of an hour. At the end of that time two Russian battleships and four cruisers were sunk, their tops being only visible above the water, three were ashore, four others, mere wrecks, had struck their colours, and the seven remaining vessels, including the Kronstadt, were hurrying down Channel, to return that evening in the safe keeping of Admiral Erskine.

Three United States ships had gone down, and four vessels had to be rapidly beached on the West Mud to prevent them from sinking in deep water.

The American ambassador, amazed and angered beyond expression, had travelled down from London in a special train in less than three hours.

Lord Wolseley had asked the Great Western Railway authorities to expedite him even to the detriment of the movements of troops. At 4.30 p.m. he was at the pier-head; at five o'clock he stood on the quarter-deck of the Minneapolis.

In the first choking rush of his astounded indignation he demanded and received the Admiral's sword.

But he was a man and an American. As he gazed round and saw the havoc of the fight, with its glorious testimonies of a superb victory, his right hand instinctively tightened on the hilt of the sword, and there was a suspicious weakness, almost a tenderness, in his voice as he said: "Why have you done this thing?"

"Couldn't help it, your Excellency," replied Mahan. "Michaelovitch wouldn't allow our merchantmen to finish loading, and he was confoundedly impudent about it, too. It was a real lovely fight."

"How many did you—that is, I mean, what explanation have you for attacking a neutral power?"

"Here's the documents of the case," said the Admiral, somewhat sheepishly producing a little scrap of paper, the memorandum made by the lieutenant at the shipping office.

The Ambassador pretended to examine it carefully, but he could not help giving a comprehensive glance round as he turned to lay the sword and its slings against the breech of a grimy and blood-bespattered gun.

"How many ships have you lost?" he said after a pause.

"Three," said the admiral, "and four on shore."

"This is appalling. And the enemy—at least, I mean, of course, the Russians?"

"Six sunk, three ashore, four taken, and seven had enough. They quit."

"And—er—how—er, I suppose I am justified in asking. How did our men behave?"

"I know a bit about fighting at sea—theoretically," replied the author of the "Influence of Sea Power upon History," with the modest pride of conscious knowledge, "and I may honestly say that I have never heard of a combat in which coolness, courage, efficiency, and daring exploit were more magnificently exhibited than by the United States fleet which I have had the supreme honour to command to-day. You should have seen," he continued, warming to his subject, whilst the diplomatist's face flushed as he listened, "you should have seen the Chicago tackle an armoured battleship twice her size, rattle her ribs with quick-firing guns, sweep her decks with Maxims, shrapnel, and bullets, minimising the effect of the enemy's big batteries by sheer dexterity of handling, and finally sinking her with a torpedo. It was superb; it was worth living for and dying for, ten times over."

"I came here at sixty miles an hour," burst forth the Ambassador; "but you couldn't wait, I sup——" Then finding the Admiral's eye upon him, he corrected himself stiffly: "There is no use in continuing this absolutely distressing conversation. You must consider yourself a prisoner until I have communicated with Washington." He walked away to the side of the ship and murmured: "My poor friend, what will be the end of this?"

The Ambassador and the Admiral gazed at each other in silence.

Admiral Mahan, pallid but firm, glanced round at his ship and her noble consorts, as though to take leave of them for ever, when a slight commotion at the companion-ladder attracted the attention of both gentlemen.

"I tell you," said a resolute English voice, "I must see the Ambassador himself." Accompanying the words, a tall, active man in civilian attire gained the level of the quarter-deck.

Advancing to the American Minister, he bowed and explained his presence:

"I am the telegraph master at Cardiff, your Excellency, and a message has just arrived from the Embassy of such exceeding importance that I resolved to deliver it myself."

The Ambassador opened the envelope, read its inclosure through twice with growing amazement, ran the fingers of his right hand into his hair beneath his hat, and silently indicated to Mahan that he was to read the telegram.

And this is what the sailor read: "London, 4.50 p.m. Following is exact text of cable just received: 'Washington, 11.4 a.m. President yesterday received confirmation of your reported rumour that Russia was about to declare war against England. Special meetings of Cabinet and Congress were at once held, and it was unanimously resolved that the United States should demand from Russia unconditional withdrawal of declaration of war. At 10.30 this morning Russian Ambassador announced emphatic refusal of the Tsar to comply with our ultimatum. At 11 a.m., President with unanimous approval of Senate and Congress, declared war against Russia, Germany, and France, as the ally of England. Take measures accordingly. Further instructions by cable later.—OLNEY.' End of message.—WHITE, secretary."

For fully half a minute the Ambassador and the Admiral gazed at each other in silence.

The sailor was the first to partially recover his self-possession.

"This cable," he said slowly, as though thinking hard, "is timed 11.5 a.m."

"Yes," gasped the Minister.

"And the United States declared war against Russia at 11 a.m.—the time recorded here?"

"That's so."

"And I fought and whipped the Grand Duke what's-his-name, commencing at 1 p.m. sharp, winding up the ball about 1.45."

Again there was a pause.

Slowly a smile of complete happiness spread over the face of the Ambassador.

Then he went to the place where he had deposited the Admiral's sword and it's trappings, picked them up, and handed them to Mahan, and calmly remarked with a delicious yankee drawl:

"Say, I guess you'll want these."

Admiral Mahan quietly buckled the belt round his waist, for he dared not give expression to his feelings lest he should break down like a woman.

But the astute diplomat, quick to control his moods and impulses, saved the situation.

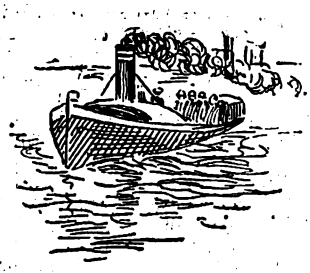
"Come," he cried, linking his arm through that of his companion. "I am simply dying to hear all about the row."

The one thing they did not discuss was the fact that Washington time is six hours behind that of Greenwich.

* * * * *

Those hundred thousand British soldiers came in useful at Cardiff after all.

Digitized by Google



He had gone down the harbour in his fast steam-launch.

Major Ramsdale "put up" a considerable portion of the German coal-shipper's anticipated cheque in securing huge stores of champagne and bottled beer for the particular use of the army and navy that night.

But, in the first place, with thoughtful care, he called for volunteers among the householders of the town to receive and tend the wounded, irrespective of race.

It was some hours before Admiral Mahan was able to make the requisite dispositions for the safety and comfort of his shattered fleet and the captured ships. By that time Erskine had arrived in the roads, and the two commanders soon exchanged news and greetings.

Late in the evening they and their principal officers—for the American Minister was compelled to hasten back to London—attended a grand banquet in the Town Hall, whilst the British troops lined the long road leading from the Docks and chief thoroughfare, St. Mary Street, in which the Municipal buildings are situated.

The jubilant enthusiasm of the inhabitants of the Welsh metropolis manifested itself in every possible way. Hardly a living soul in Cardiff went to bed that night.

At the banquet in the Town Hall the Marquis of Bute made a brief speech, but it contained good matter. He undertook, at his own cost, to float, dry dock, and repair the stranded American ships—a truly magnificent offer—and tremendous cheering took place when the Mayor read a telegram he received from the House of Commons to the effect that Parliament had voted the thanks of the nation and a sword of honour to Admiral Mahan for his brilliant services to the United States and to England.

Next day the gallant American was handed by a Queen's messenger an autograph letter from her Majesty, conveying her personal appreciation of the victory he had achieved, and stating that her Majesty would seek the sanction of the President to her desire to confer upon the Admiral a Grand Commandership of the Order of the Bath.

Much comment had also been evoked throughout the United Kingdom by the patriotic behaviour of the Mayor during the crisis, and the national sentiment was fully expressed when he subsequently became Sir Joseph Ramsdale, K.C.B.

Throughout all this rejoicing there was but one slight note of solitary discontent, which found voice in the public utterance of a Swansea town councillor: "Whenever there is a chance of advertisement Cardiff gets it. Even the Russian fleet passed us by."

CHAPTER XXV.

Under the Southern Cross.

Whilst Canada was equipping her sons to constitute an Army Corps of 100,000 men to be forwarded in detachments of 20,000 each to the assistance of England, and South Africa was gathering 30,000 colonists for the same laudable purpose, Australia, brimful of loyalty and courage, and anxious to make even greater efforts, was cruelly doomed to doubt and uncertainty.

The cable-cutting tactics of the initial stage of the war had the effect of completely isolating the island continent and New Zealand from the rest of the world.

Great as had been the exertions of the submarine telegraph repairing ships employed by the various cable companies, they were not able to touch the South Atlantic and Pacific lines until towards the end of May, and the first news that reached this country concerning Australasia showed that whilst the lion had been using both teeth and claws, his cubs were equally ready to tear things when the time came.

Sydney had been attacked on May 17th and succeeding days by the hired Japanese fleet, strengthened by four French and German Cruisers.

As the result of several conferences, inspired by the patriotic idea that the needs of Australia as a whole must be considered, and not the requirements of a section, the territorial forces of New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland, were admirably organised.

An efficient scheme of Federal Defence had been devised by Major-General Hutton, Major-General Sir C. H. Smith, and Brigadier-General Gunter, the respective commandants of the colonial divisions. The local fleet, such as it was, was concentrated at Melbourne, this being the point likely to be first attacked, as the naval armament was far too weak to be split up into sections.

Sydney Harbour—that superb landlocked retreat which is unequalled throughout the world for beauty and perfect design—could be adequately protected, it was felt, by modern fortifications, mines, and torpedoes. Unfortunately this was the last and incompleted item in the list of Colonial defences. The forts were not built, the mines not laid, nor the torpedoes in store.

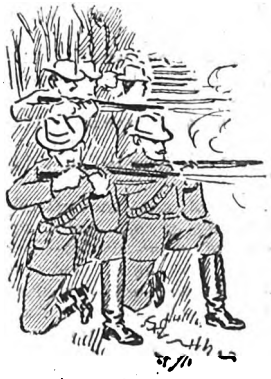
And it was the capital of New South Wales that the enemy first attacked.

Little news had reached the Colonies of the progress of events in Europe, yet such as came was terrible enough. The combatants were known, as was the failure of the attempt of the allies to invade England.

Then a fast steamer from Colombo brought tidings of the storming of Havre and Stralsund, the seafight at Gibraltar, and the heroic manner in which the Mother Country was grappling with her foes.

At once the pent-up excitement of the Australians rose to fever heat, and had there been ships enough available a strong army would have embarked for England within a week.

Preparations were immediately made with this object in view, when transports could be secured, and it was in the midst of the enthusiasm evoked by the project that the intelligence came like a thunder clap of the bombardment of Sydney by a powerful fleet of eighteen ironclads and cruisers.



A murderous fire .... rained upon the boats.

The first impulse of the Melbourne authorities was to send the local flotilla to the assistance of the sister city, but Major-General Hutton quickly wired to show the futility of this proposal.

"It would be useless," he telegraphed. "Six of these ships could blow all of ours out of the water in ten minutes. They are of the most powerful and latest type, and we would simply lose our ships to benefit the enemy. We cannot help our town being battered to pieces, but if these scoundrels, whom we believe to be Japanese for the most part, set foot on shore, we will only be too glad, as they will not require their ships again. Meanwhile we are doing our best with improvised shore batteries."

To his very considerable chagrin Rear-Admiral Cyprian A. G. Bridge, of the Orlando, flagship of the Australian Fleet, was compelled to admit that the soldier was right.

But the Orlando, Katoomba, Mildur, Pylades, and Ringarooma did visit Sydney Harbour whilst the enemy was there—a little later.

Digitized by Google

So well had the enemy's coup been planned that the first man to be aware of something unusual taking place was the Collector of Customs at Sydney, Mr. James Powell. He had gone down the harbour in his fast steam-launch during the early morning of the 17th for the purpose of inspecting a new revenue cutter which was stationed at the entrance to Port Jackson, when the master of his little craft called his attention to a fleet of warships some ten miles out at sea, steaming rapidly towards the harbour.

The sailor at once assured Mr. Powell that they in no way resembled the Australasian contingent, and the Collector deemed it best to return as quickly as possible to Sydney and inform the authorities.

The hour was an awkward one, but by utilising many messengers in cabs he soon succeeded in arousing the Governor, the Premier, the Hon G. H. Reid, Major General Hutton, and the commandants of local volunteer corps.

They all hastened to the Custom-house, and by this time messages from advanced signal stations began to arrive.

At last one definite statement came to hand. "There are six battleships and twelve cruisers, some of the latter possibly large gunboats, and the leading ship has just hoisted German and French colours," reported the light-house keeper, who sent the message by telephone.

For a moment none spoke. Then Mr. Reid said solemnly: "Gentlemen, our hour of trial is at hand. Let us each and all do our duty as best we may."

Major-General Hutton turned to Mr. Powell:

"I may use your staff?" he inquired.

"Let me be the first to serve your purposes," replied the Collector.

With remarkable calmness the soldier gave definite instructions to each of the officers present, and then sent off messenger after messenger, every man having his well-defined errand to fulfil, and a clear understanding of its purport should other measures be necessary to attain it than those which the general anticipated.

By nine o'clock, when the allied fleet brought to opposite Sydney, every battery in existence in the harbour was well manned, and some 3,000 troops were under arms in the town.

A German officer, by virtue of seniority, commanded the expedition, and he promptly sent an envoy ashore to demand the unconditional surrender of the city and colony to the Emperor of Germany and the French Republic, and the immediate disarmament of all troops under the control of the Governor.

He never heard the answer, as the moment his representative reached the side of the flagship on his return, every available gun on shore poured in a galling fire upon the warships.

As the gunners had plenty of time to train their weapons and test their range calculations, the resultant execution was marvellous; indeed, during the whole war no such weight of metal inflicted similar loss upon an opponent.

But the jubilation of Sydney at this small score was brief-lived.

The comparatively feeble defences of the port were trivial in the extreme compared with the floating destroyers within short range, and although the shooting of the Japs was not improved by the salute they had received, they quickly showed what numbers and scientific direction could effect.

It was no part of the allies' programme to destroy Sydney itself. They had come to capture Australia, not to ruin its great centres of commerce, so their fire was steadily directed towards silencing the batteries on land.

This they soon effected. It was simply impossible for such a one-sided duel to continue, and in an hour's time there was no responsive cannonading from the shore. The batteries were heaps of ruins, their guns dismantled, and their occupants for the most part killed or wounded.

Nevertheless they had stung the allies. A gunboat had gone down, and a French cruiser sank during the afternoon.

The Frenchman only became more choleric.

But the aspect of affairs changed when the German Commander-in-Chief ordered a strong storming party to effect a landing. Sydney Harbour is wooded down to the water's edge, save where the docks and wharves are situated. From every point of vantage, from every little patch of cover, a murderous fire from the Lee-Metfords, with which the Colonial troops were armed, rained upon the boats and rendered it simply suicidal for them to attempt to advance.

So the landing was abandoned for the time.

A lull now occurred in the fighting, and it was at this moment that a telegram arrived from Melbourne that chased away some of the pallor from the Governor's face and caused General Hutton to proceed with his defensive operations with renewed vigour.

Throughout the afternoon the enemy contented himself with vigorously shelling every spot where troops might find cover, and at last the early darkness of winter wrapped friend and foe in impenetrable gloom.

There were no lights visible either ashore or afloat; but the English Commander had already made every disposition to crowd all available troops—they were now pouring into the town by rail from the interior—upon the localities most likely to be the scene of a night attack.

At the same time field artillery was being hastily mounted in masked batteries for the purpose of amusing the enemy at daybreak.

Shortly after midnight the search-lights of the fleet suddenly flared upon the Custom House quay and the principal ferryboat pier. At the same moment a vast flotilla of boats came shooting out of the blackness; a well-planned attempt to land was being made at both points.

It was quite useless. A detachment of French marines did manage to reach the shore, but they were cut down to a man by a volunteer company, every member of which had served in the Soudan, whilst the European officers vainly strove to induce the Japanese sailors to face the music in front.

"Chinee-man plenty run; foreign devil too much fightee," said the devotees of the lotus and the lily. This affair in no way resembled the taking of Port Arthur.

"It is like their infernal impudence," said a youthful and very swaggering mounted infantry officer, "to send a lot of beastly black fellows to tackle Australia."

"But they're not black, they're yaller," replied the man to whom he spoke.

"It's the same thing. They're all niggers together." And of such is the ethnology of the Englishman who recks not of Exeter Hall or the DAILY NEWS.

Morning dawned with clouds of mist rolling up the harbour. Nothing could have better suited the purposes of the defence.

The black hulls of the warships, looming through the uncertain light, offered a fair target, whilst the gunners afloat could not readily distinguish the hidden batteries whence there belched forth such a continuous stream of diminutive but frightfully disconcerting missiles.

There was nothing for it but a change of location, and the allied fleet moved down the harbour out of range, leaving two more gunboats resting safely on the bottom.

A strong wind sprung up towards noon. It quickly drove away the mist, and the fleet returned to take their revenge upon the batteries, but these were now silent, and it was difficult work to discover their whereabouts.

Needless to say, the German admiral was greatly perplexed. He had the stronger force, but he could not bring it to bear. He could lay the town in ruins in half-an-hour, but this was simply damaging his own property, so to speak, as Australia could not hope to hold out against the united powers. He would play a waiting game, and simply blockade the port, knowing full well that the course of events would bring the Colonials to their senses.

Digitized by Google

So he anchored his ships at a safe distance from those spiteful little twelve-pounders, and strove to repair damages.

But on the fourth morning the people of Sydney began to pour forth in continuous streams towards every bluff and promontory that commanded a full view of the lowering warships, and waited patiently for some few hours for something to happen.

And something did happen, shortly after twelve o'clock, something that caused tremendous commotion and signalling, and blowing of trumpets and passing to and fro of steam launches among the allied fleet.

For at that hour there swept into the harbour, in the keen bright sunshine of a fine cold-weather day, nineteen English ships.

Admiral Fremantle was in front, with his flag flying on board the Centurion, and with him were H.M. ships Edgar, Æolus, Mercury, Peacock, Pigmy, Pique, Plover, Porpoise, Rainbow, Redbreast, Redpole, Spartan, Unflaunted, and the five vessels of the Australian fleet already mentioned.

A council of war was being held on board the Unser Fritz at the moment this astounding sight burst upon the gaze of the allies. Although the German Admiral promptly gave orders to prepare for action, he unhesitatingly uttered his opinion that it was their humane duty to yield, as they were wholly unable to cope with their unexpected assailants.

Sirdar Mahomed Khan.

They were short of coal, ammunition was not too plentiful, their ships were more or less damaged, they had lost a lot of men, and the majority of their crews could not be depended upon against British sailors.

"The devil is in league with England," he concluded, "and we can only recognise the fact."

But his junior French colleague strongly urged the necessity for fighting. Many of the British ships were small, luck might favour the allies, and, above all, it was dishonourable to their flags to capitulate without striking a blow.

Opinions at the board were evenly divided, irrespective of nationality, the saner men recognising the hopelessness of the situation.

The Frenchman only became more choleric.

"Messieurs," he shrieked, "this is the language of poltroons and cowards!"

Several officers angrily protested, but the Admiral took the quarrel upon himself.

"One of us two must decide," he said. "I am no coward, thank God, and I love my country more than my life; but this matter must be settled now, this instant. Bring me a loaded and an unloaded revolver," he went on, turning to a young commander near him, "and place them on the table under a covering of any sort."

The officer soon obeyed the order, whilst, amidst dead silence, those near the starboard port-holes could see the British fleet, some two miles away, deploying for attack formation.

"Here, sir," said the German to his confrère, with the utmost sang froid, "choose your weapon and fire at my heart. If I fall you will command the fleet."

The French officer, slightly unnerved by the man's stolid demeanour, but still burning with the shame of the

"Have you heard the news?"

threatened surrender, saw no solution of the difficulty other than that proposed by his superior.

He advanced to the table, hurriedly withdrew one of the weapons, placed it close to the Admiral's breast and pulled the trigger.

A sharp click showed that it was empty. He flushed, threw the revolver on the floor, smiled with rare self-possession, and stood at attention to meet his fate.

The German also smiled. "You do not exist, my friend," he said, and walked out of the cabin towards the deck to order a flag of truce to be instantly exhibited.

Admiral Fremantle said some earnest words, never, or hardly ever, used in the Queen's Navy, when he saw the signal.

He knew exactly what it portended, and it was too bad to have come here all the way from the China seas and not have a fight at the finish.

"Signal," he roared in a perfect fury, "that I will only listen to unconditional surrender."

"Ach, Himmel!" said the German when the message had been translated. "I accept!"

Then young Australia stood upon his head and did all sorts of ridiculous things before he packed himself on board the two fleets and started for Vancouver, whence he was sent across Canada by rail, other batches of him travelling by passenger-steamers to Cape Town and Portsmouth.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Sirdar Mahomed Khan—and Others.

Let us take a good look at the man as he walks with easy stride and erect figure across the *maidan at Bareilly.

He carries his fifty-seven years lightly does this Mahommedan swash-buckler, for he is a hardy descendant of a race of soldiers who prayed unceasingly to Allah that they might not die in their beds. Allah, assisted by the British Government, saw to it that their petition was granted in as many cases as possible, and this particular Mahomed Khan, though he knew he should never be killed in battle—how he came by the knowledge may perhaps be told some day—yet cherished the hope that his fate might come suddenly to him on parade.

He longed to leap into the Mahommedan paradise from off a horse's back.

His full name and title are "Rissalder Major Mahomed Khan, Sirdar Bahadur," which, being interpreted, means that the first two words show him to be the chief native officer of his regiment, the next pair represent his family names, and the concluding sonorous appellations signify that twice in his life the Government of India had delighted to honour him, once they dubbed him "Bahadur," or "honourable," and again when they said he should be called "Sirdar" or "chief" among Bahadurs, these being respectively the 2nd and 1st classes of the Order of British India.

He is a remarkable man is Sirdar Mahomed Khan, and he looks it.

He is six feet in height, strong, wiry, and straight as an ash-plant, without an ounce of superfluous flesh on his bones. His firm mouth and chin, his slightly hooked but well-shaped nose, his red-black eyes that can seem so kind or

* Parade ground or plain.

Digitized by Google

fierce, according to his mood, his long curled moustaches and small iron-grey bushy whiskers, all bespeak the Punjabi warrior, whilst many years of command and responsibility have lent a fine air of placid dignity to his expression.

The Sirdar, as he is familiarly known in the regiment, is treated with courtly respect by the Colonel commanding, and the latest joined squadron officer regards him with deferential awe.

For Mahomed Khan has a great reputation. He has six medals, mostly with clasps, and the Order of Merit, third, class, upon his breast, and it is a regimental tradition that had not both the Colonel and Major been killed at Maiwand, their personal recommendations would have converted, the last decoration into C.S.I.

In his tight-fitting blue frock coat, with its sky-blue facings, his well-cut riding breeches of Kharki cloth, his big black boots with their jingling spurs, and his gigantic turban and sash, both resembling a bright-coloured Scottish plaid in pattern, the Sirdar looked every inch a soldier. More than one lady in the station described him as a "handsome old gentleman," which was a very great compliment for a nativeto receive from an Anglo-Indian mem-sahib.

In the centre of the parade-ground Mahomed Khan met the C.O., Lieut.-Col. F.C.Burton, who was leisurely cantering his Arab pony towards the orderly-room, where he wished to transact some business before the heat of a May morning at seven o'clock rendered clerical work intolerable.

On seeing the native officer the Englishman checked his pony, and, after acknowledging Mahomed Khan's salute, said: "Good morning, Rissaldar-Major. Have you heard the news?"

"No, sahib," was the answer, both, of course, speaking Urdu, the most generally used language in Hindustan.

"Well, there is nothing quite settled yet, but we move soon."

"To Egypt again, sahib, or to Belait?" *

"No," replied the C. O. with a smile, "we won't cross the Kala Pali † this time."

"But, sahib," exclaimed Mahomed Khan with astonishment, "who is there to fight here? You do not use an elephant to break eggs. What is there to trouble us here but hill men?"

"What is there beyond the hills?" said the Colonel quizzically, and regarding his favourite native officer with kindly good humour.

The Sirdar became very earnestly excited at the question which met his own. Looking cautiously around he lowered his voice, and said with eager utterance and gesture.

"Can it be, sahib, that I shall live to see Penjdeh avenged —that I shall cleave the Cossack to the chin on his own desert?" And as Colonel Burton nodded the old man smote his breast and cried: "By the beard of the prophet, let me live beyond that day and I care not for anything else. I will say: 'It is finished.' They may bury me among women or say that my father—may his bones rest—was a Bengali."

"No man could lie so greatly, Rissaldar-Major," laughed the Colonel as he shook the reins upon his Arab's neck. "Meanwhile, it is soon to talk of these things in the bazaar." And with this well-understood hint to keep the information to himself Mahomed Khan was left to walk on air towards the lines.

That morning the recruits found him unusually gracious. He actually said that they would make decent sowars‡ after they had gone through a campaign.

* * * * * *

The excited elation manifested by Sirdar Mahomed Khan was typical of the feelings of the entire British and native army in India, when it became known that at last there was a prospect of active service.

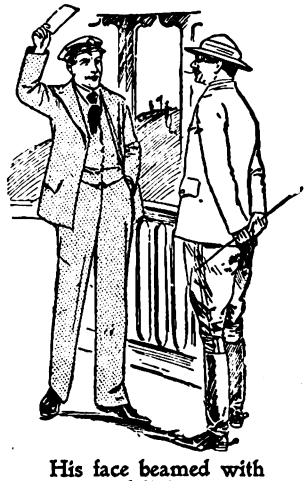
The fury and indignation of the British Tommy at being kept "stewin' and fattenin' on the bloomin' plains," as he expressed it, while his home battalion was carving up Frenchmen and Germans, nearly passed all limits.

The native troops were in a state of mild wonderment that nothing was being done, but, in their case "the sahib said so, and the sahib is always right."

Tommy Atkins, however, had no such gracious belief in infallibility of his officers to yield him philosophical comfort. He included the War Office, the Government, the Commanders-in-Chief at home and in India, and the authorities at Simla in one mighty and euphonious condemnation, and it was only his absolute inability to do anything but growl and drink more beer than usual that kept him from open insubordination.

The days came and went and passed into weeks, yet was there no sign, save tremendous activity in the departmental offices and the utmost medical solicitude for the care of the soldiers' health.

Long before the outbreak of the war the Commander-in-Chief had demanded and obtained from the Viceroy's Council the complete abrogation of stupid cantonment regulations ordained by home ministries in obedience to the threats of fanatical adherents, and the result was that the Indian Army was in a magnificent state of preparedness, and the percentage of sick had decreased to nearly vanishing point.



His face beamed with delight.

Such was the condition of British India when Lieutenant Rodney arrived at Bombay in the Hornet.

When he reached Aden the Political President deemed it expedient to request the chief naval officer at that station to send Rodney on special duty to Simla, in order that the Government of India might learn the fullest details concerning the state of affairs in Europe, as they had been so similarly cut off from all communications from Whitehall.

Having reported himself to Rear-Admiral Drummond, whose flag was flying on the cruiser Bonadventure, and received confirmation of the orders provisionally given to him at Aden, Rodney lost no time in starting upon his trying journey to Elysium, as the summer headquarters of the Indian Government is ironically termed by Anglo-India.

Here, after a conference with the Foreign Minister and the Military Member of Council, the sailor was ultimately honoured by a long conversation with the Viceroy himself.

He told his story in simple, straightforward language, and having soon narrated the absolute facts known to him, was encouraged to give his opinions as to the ultimate course of events, views which were soon to be proved remarkably sound and far-seeing when the telegraph got to work again.

Lord Elgin took a great liking for the handsome, open-hearted naval officer, who was not sufficiently aware of the tremendous importance of the Viceroy and Governor-General to be otherwise than outspoken and unaffected in his presence.

He brought with him a breezy wholesome air of belief in himself and his aspirations which was a relief to his lordship after the guarded and politic attitude of most of the high officials with whom he was surrounded, for even the boldest spirits in the Government of India are often trammelled by considerations of expediency.

* This is the general native term for England and Europe.
† Literally "black water" or sea.
‡ Troopers.

Digitized by Google

Rodney quickly took to the manners and methods of the hills, and thoroughly enjoyed the Anglo-Indian vie intime.

But he was constantly harassed by the thought that after his one quick dash from Malta to the East he was apparently condemned to comparative idleness during the rest of the war, for the East-Indian squadron was mostly composed of ships vastly more dangerous to their occupants than to an enemy, even if there was a remote probability of a foe putting in an appearance at sea.

When, therefore, he was invited to dinner at Government House on the night that the rumour spread of Russia being a possible ally of the French and Germans, Rodney suddenly hated the ease and luxury and careless abandonment of S mla existence.

At the conclusion of the meal the Viceroy rallied him on account of his unusual gravity, and Frank at once owned the cause.

"It seems to me," he concluded, "that the faster I steamed through the Mediterranean the more quickly I was leaving behind me all chance of further employment."

He looked so glum that Lord Elgin smiled.

"Cheer up," he said. "I will endeavour to put things right for you."

Next day Rodney received a telegram from Rear-Admiral Drummond informing him of his appointment, with the relative rank of commander, as second in command of a small body of sailors and marines detailed for field duty with the Indian Army. He was to hold himself in readiness to join the force at Quetta when ordered.

His face beamed with delight at the message, and his hilarity was so marked at the club that a Staff Corps major asked him what was the matter. Had he bought the winner of the day's hurdle-race at the overnight lottery?

Rodney explained, and also expressed his gratitude for Lord Elgin's obvious and kindly aid.

"Do you mean to say," cried the other, "that you yourself put up the Viceroy to work the business for you?"

"Not exactly," said Rodney, "but I growled about the aspect of things, and he promised to fix them up a bit."

"Well, you are a cool chap and no mistake," said the Staff Corps man.

From that day forth he regarded the sailor as a past-master in the art of getting influence to work in the right quarter, and often told the story to youthful and envious wing officers who tremblingly hoped for a cantonment magistracy or a berth in the "politicals."

* * * * *

Karachi, with its burning sands and gaping crocodiles piled together in sacred tanks, is a cheerless place enough in the hot weather.

There as elsewhere between the Hindoo Khoosh range and Adam's Bridge, the sun suffuses the sky with its burnished copper-hued rays during twelve long hours of the day, and the 1st Battalion of the Royal Fusiliers did not like the merry month of May any better because of the news which came crowding fast over the lately restored cables.

Inaction is always bad enough during the hot weather, but inaction for the Indian Army whilst the home battalions were carving fame and promotion out of huge masses of Continental troops was one of hose things, as the Adjutant put it, which brings a well-trained regiment down to the level of the depôt.

And Lieutenant T. R. Mallock was a very smart adjutant indeed. He had many mysterious figures and letters bracketed after his name in the "Army List," showing that he was qualified to instruct other people in almost every branch of military knowledge, so when he said that this absurd hesitation on the part of the War Office to utilise the Indian Army was "demoralising," even the C.O. sighed deeply.

At last, about May 21st, when the usual wagging of heads about the anniversary of the Mutiny had ceased, and portentious prophets of native disturbances had buried their reminiscences for another year, there shot through the length and breadth of India one of those mysterious electrical thrills which so invariably forbode great events through the ordinary sources.

No man has ever discovered the why or the wherefore of this curious and indefinite foreshadowing of dramatic intelligence, but that it actually exists is a fact so patent to every Anglo-Indian, that it cannot be disputed.

Arising in native circles, it quickly travels through the Eurasian community, and thence to the English officials, to whom it is often a guide and a warning.

And now this awesome, imponderable, and immeasurable medium, made known to the people of India that stirring times were at hand.

Mad, wild, improbable stories were told to wondering natives in the bazaar; servants in European houses asked their sahibs if they had heard of the foolish sayings of the moullahs and rakis, the Mussulman priests and Hindu medicants who batten upon the credulity of their religious adherents; and the wives and families of railway officials resident in out-of-the-way places suddenly discovered that they had pressing business at the nearest station where there was a British cantonment.

On May 24th the murder was out. Russia had declared war, and the entire Indian Army, British and native, was to take the field at once.

A well set-up and bronzed veteran, with badges on his arm showing fifteen years' service, was gulping down Murree beer in the canteen of the 7th when the news arrived.

The younger men around him were wildly excited and still more wildly speculative—one, who came out from home with the January draft, was pessimistic.

"We can do nothing," he said, "with the canal blown up, unless we land in England and march through Armenia, which will be a tough job."

"What do you know about it, rooky?" interrupted the old soldier, with a glance of calm scorn at the youthful exponent of the art of war.

"Well," said the other, somewhat abashed, "we surely won't content ourselves with seizing the Pamirs!"

"The Pamirs, you Johnnie," snarled the other, who was deeply versed in the gospel according to the Pioneer, "a regiment of wild goats couldn't advance throug the Pamirs. They'd be eaten by the garrison at Gilgit."

"Then what shall we do?" cried the novice, forced to confess his ignorance of the situation.

The veteran took a copious draught of the beer, and drew his kharki sleeve across his mouth before he replied:

"There is only one way to attack Russia, and that is the road she'd follow if she attacked us. What for did we build the Sibi-Quetta Railway? If you was to fire a cannon-ball through the Khojak tunnel, and it kept its line, where would it hit?"

He gazed triumphantly round, but the Royal Fusiliers were not strong in geography.

"The North Pole," hazarded one at length.

At other times the remark would have created a laugh, but this subject was too serious for levity.

The humourist had to pay for two gallons of "booze" to avoid being held down and belted.

"Herat is the gate of India, my boys," said the veteran oracularly, "an' it's through that bloomin' gate we'll be marchin' shortly, or my name's not Billy Watson."

And Billy Watson had no reason to change the name he had received thirty-five years earlier at St. George's-in-the-East, though a good many of the Royal Fusiliers took a longer journey by another and more shadowy gate than that of Herat before the Indian Army crossed the valley of the Helmund.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/ per month. 10 stops, 3 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

THE 'ENGLISH' ORGANETTE.

WITH EXPRESSION STOP EASY PAYMENTS, 4s. MONTHLY

4/- MONTHLY

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Reels, Hornpipes. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. No musical knowledge required. A mere child can play it. Most marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30/- Terms: 4/- deposit and 4/- monthly. Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. Mention this paper.

J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN

Try MASON'S

KILLCORN

The only painless corn cure.

IT HAS NEVER BEEN KNOWN TO FAIL.

Thousands of Testimonials have been received from all grades of society.

READ THIS ONE. Painless Cure!

"Leeds, Mar. 17th.

"Dear Sir,—I had three most painful corns, which were PAINLESSLY REMOVED by using rather less than a bottle of KILLCORN. I now walk with the greatest ease.—Yours, O. B. CARR."

KILLCORN is sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., in bottles at 1s. each, or sent direct on receipt of value in stamps by the Proprietor,

3, Guildford Street, Leeds.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £300 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½D AND 3D BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 138B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

Who would be without a

MUSIC STAND

Folding and Portable, Square legs. Gold bronzed, very durable.

3/- parcel post free. Two for 5/9, Three for 8/6. Carriage Paid.

Send for Catalogue A, Post Free, for Band Instruments, Fittings, Strings, &c.

3/-

Joseph Riley & Sons,

Constitution Hill,

Birmingham.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up

Estimates Free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Company. 186 Euston Road. London.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). Mgr., H. Myers.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 8d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

Digitized by Google

PLAIN SPEAKING.

Creepy-crawly writes: "We are taught that there is a use for everything, but can you tell me what use there is for wasps?"———Even wasps have their good points, for they are the most inveterate enemies of flies. One wasp has been known to kill nearly a thousand flies a day.

G. P. asks: "Has the Queen ever attended Parliament?"———Curiously enough, Queen Victoria has never seen her faithful Commons in session. Her Majesty could, indeed, be an observed spectator of the House of Commons at work if she sat behind the grill of the ladies' gallery, but this would not be consistent with the dignity of her Majesty.

F. L. H.—"The Roof of the World" is the Chang plateau, which lies north of and runs nearly parallel to the head waters of the Western Brahmapootra, or Sango.

It occurred to H. N T. the other day that it would be a good idea if we could have sea and mountain air supplied to us in our homes by means of pipes, similar to the way in which we now obtain our water and gas. He asks whether it could be carried out.———Although the idea of being able to command a delightful seabreeze or, if preferred, a blow from the mountains, as easily as we now obtain our hot and cold water, by merely turning on a tap, is a distinctly refreshing one, I am afraid there are too many difficulties in the way to make it feasible. For instance, the pipes and pumping plant would be a heavy initial expense, and, what is more, it would not be the chief difficulty to contend with. Air keeps very badly, and it would be no good having compressed reservoirs like great gasomete s, for, after a short sojourn in such a receptacle, the breezes would lose all their valuable properties.

C. E. S., a signalman on H.M.S. Centurion on the China Station writes: "Will you kindly tell me the quickest time a letter has taken to go from London to any port in Australia, to settle an argument?"——— I have made inquiry, and find that twenty-nine days is the shortest time, and that the port is Perth, West Australia. Melbourne comes next with thirty-one days, sixteen hours.

W. M.—Antipyrin, the well-known remedy for headaches, is a product of coal tar, and is the subject of a German patent.

M. C.—The mud volcano is a feature of the Yellowstone Park. Instead of lava, it emits liquid mud. Everything within forty feet is caked with mud. No, there is nothing exactly like it in this country, because the mud volcano is gifted with an odour stronger than that of over-ripe eggs; but omitting the odour, we have a very good imitation of the mud volcano in our large wood-paved thoroughfares on a wet day. You have only to stand on the kerb for five minutes, and your appearance will be much like that of the ground about the volcano.

L. W.—The Lord Chancellor of England, on retiring from office, has a pension of £5,000 a year, whether his term of office has been long or short.

M. L. asks: "When were the female parts in plays first acted by women in England?"———The first English actress appears to be Mrs. Coleman, who played in one of Davenant's productions in 1656. In 1662 we find these words in a license for a new theatre: "Whereas the women's parts in plays have hitherto been acted by men in the habits of women, at which some have taken offence, we do permit and give leave for the time to come that all women's parts be acted by women." In the time of Shakespeare the female parts were always acted by boys. Coryat, in a book published in 1611, regarding a stay in Venice, mentions that he saw women acting on the stage, "which I never saw before."

G. P. S.—From calculations made, it has been computed that, for the last ten years, the average annual expenditure in Italy of American tourists has been about seven million sterling.

Miner.—The first man who discovered gold in Australia was hanged for his pains. He was one of the first convicts transported to Botany Bay. On discovering the secret, he took a sample of the mineral to Governor Phillip to prove his statements, and, instead of getting the reward he expected, he was promptly hanged for attempted escape, and to prevent the discovery from becoming generally known.

W. M. propounds the following. "Is it true that two conflicting sounds produce silence?" ——Sir John Herschel stated that "it has been found that two conflicting sounds produce silence, as two converging rays of light produce darkness." You may, therefore, take it as a scientific truth; but it doesn't always work out like that in practice. The other day there were two conflicting sounds in Henrietta Street; one proceeded from a trombone, the other from a donkey. One performer started during a brief pause, in the music of the other, and I devoutly hoped that the two conflicting sounds would produce silence. But they didn't. Two others conflicting sounds were required for that purpose—the voices of a policeman and the owner of the donkey. I am not taking into account the voice of our mathematical editor, as that was not loud but deep.

P. S. M.—The total cost of the food consumed by the animals of the Zoological Gardens is about £4,000 a year.

Spinster.—Cats were often kept in convents in the middle ages. Perhaps that is the origin of the traditional association of old maids and cats.

A. M. asks: "What is the origin of the superstition that crooked money brings luck?"———It comes from the Middle Ages, when, if a person became ill, he would appeal to his favourite saint to use his or her influence to bring about his restoration to health, and one or more coins were held close to the sufferer's body and bent in honour of that saint. If the person recovered, the coin was sometimes sent to the church or shrine of that particular saint, but in most cases it was retained as a charm by the restored sick one.

With reference to the paragraph which appeared on this page a few weeks back concerning the climbing perch, R. H. S. writes to say that he recently came across an account of how this fish, in India, has been known to ascend cocoanut palm trees in order to drink their milk.

RESULT OF ARTISTS' COMPETITION.

The prize of two guineas offered for the best set of decorative head pieces, corner pieces, and tail pieces has been awarded to Miss E. Woolmer, 7 Cranbourne Court, Albert Bridge, S.W.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double " "	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page " " " ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page " " " ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page " " ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole " " ...	12	10	0
" half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Back blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 25th, if intended for the Issue on sale Nov. 8th, and dated Nov. 12th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WEIGH THIS UP

and you will SOON SEE how your Washing is done in half the time and at much less cost by using

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Cheapest, Purest, and most Economical Soap on the Market.

Lathers Freely in the Hardest Water,

and is equally successful in the Household as in the Laundry.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

not only reduces the Housewife's work to a minimum, but it saves her fully 25 per cent. of the money she expends on soap, for it is a FULL-WEIGHT Soap, each Tablet weighing 16 ounces as against 12 ounces in other soaps at the same price.

SOLID SILVER

£21 TEA & COFFEE SERVICES

(Or £21 IN CASH)

AS FREE PRIZES.

THIS IS A BONA FIDE COMPETITION.

PERFECTLY FREE. NO ENTRANCE FEE. NO DIVISION.

WE WILL PRESENT ONE OF THESE TEA AND COFFEE SERVICES TO EACH PURCHASER OF

The "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK,

who fills in correctly the missing letters in the words below, relating to the "Onrios" Dream Book.

1. THE O····S B··K OF D···M I·····S
2. B·····Y B···D AND I·····D
3. WILL A····D YOU A F·····S D·····N OF YOUR F····E
4. AN I·····E A·····R TO YOUR P·····Y
5. WILL S····Y L··D YOU TO U·····E F·····E

The "Onrios" Book of Dream Interpretations is a handy publication, beautifully bound and illustrated, and will afford you a faultless definition of your future. It is an infallible adviser to your prosperity, and will surely lead you to undeniable fortune.

WHAT TO DO.—When you have found what you think are the missing letters, write the words out on a sheet of paper, numbering them 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, as above, and send same to us, with a P.O. (not stamps) for 2s., and stamped addressed envelope for results, and we will forward to you, post-free, a copy of the "Onrios" Dream Book. (Foreign orders 3s., payable in London.) We offer the above prizes to purchasers of our Book, in order to make this remarkable publication known to the public, and we are prepared to expend some thousands of pounds on this method of advertising our unique Dream Book.

REMEMBER, EACH ONE who correctly fills in the missing letters will receive a Solid Silver Tea and Coffee Service, value £21. These Services are of Solid Sterling Silver (Hall-marked), and consist of a 2½ pint Coffee Pot, price £7 10s.; 2 pint Tea Pot, £6 10s.; Full-size Sugar Basin, £4; Full Size Cream Jug, £3—Tea and Coffee Service, £21. They are manufactured and catalogued by one of the best-known London Silversmiths, and cannot be purchased for less than £21. As a proof of this, should you be a winner, we will give you one of the above Tea and Coffee Services, OR THE CASH, whichever you prefer.

The "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK (COPYRIGHT) is a book which will tell you the meaning of all your dreams, and may thus be the means of guiding you to the acquisition of Fame and Fortune. This book is a translation of old Arabic, Hebrew, Persian etc., Oneirological manuscripts, parchments, and scrolls, which have come into our possession, some of them dating as far back as 3700 B.C. It is a high-class publication, beautifully printed and bound, with 19 Engravings of well-known pictures by some of the Greatest Masters. These pictures alone are worth more than the price we ask for the book. Everyone, whether they be in the highest or lowest station in life, should possess this Marvellous Book. Nothing like it has ever been published before.

DO NOT DELAY, but send AT ONCE for the "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK, and grasp this opportunity to win one of these beautiful solid Silver Tea and Coffee Services, as a certain portion of the issue will be reserved for Foreign and Colonial orders. Write your name and full address very distinctly, and put the name of this paper on the top of your letter. Keep the number of your Postal Order in case it goes astray. This competition will close on December 30th, 1898. The solution of this Competition has been sealed and deposited with Messrs. Hibberd, Wall Street, London, N. Prizes will be awarded and results posted within the following week.

YOU CAN HAVE THE SILVER SERVICE AT ONCE

before the Competition closes. Full particulars regarding this will be sent you with the "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK.

Please address your letter to THE "ONRIOS" PUBLISHING CO., SYDNEY AVENUE, MOOR LANE, LONDON, E.C.

TO SAVE TIME AND TROUBLE ASK FOR AND USE ONLY

GIBSON'S STONED RAISINS

IN 1LB PACKETS READY FOR USE. STONED & CLEANED BY GIBSON'S PATENT PROCESS WITHOUT REMOVING ANY NUTRITIVE PART Untouched by Hand!

RETAILED EVERYWHERE. WHOLESALE ONLY Wm BROWN & Co OF LIVERPOOL, LTD

EXTRA REFINED THEREFORE NO WASTE

NO BETTER IN THE MARKET

DICKSON'S SCOTCH BEEF SUET

GAINED HIGHEST REWARD AT COOKERY EXHIBITION 1897.

One lb will go as far as two lbs of ordinary suet.

Sold at all stores &c throughout the United Kingdom.

THOS. DICKSON & SON, LTD. EDINBURGH.

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

TRADE MARK

NOS ASPERA JUVANT

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST

ASK FOR & INSIST ON HAVING HARRIS'

DELICIOUS & ABSOLUTELY PURE

MADE ONLY BY HARRIS AND Co

GOLD MEDAL

BERMONDSEY CAKE FACTORY, LONDON, W.

OF STORES & GROCERS EVERYWHERE

CAKES

APPLICATIONS FOR SOLE AGENCIES INVITED.

ZEBRA Grate Polish.

In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

A LIBRARY FOR FIVE SHILLINGS.
See Page 568.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 513. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 29TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

"MATCHLESS"

WARNING to LADIES.

BEWARE of POLISHES containing injurious ACIDS which RUIN your metals & SPOIL your HANDS.

TEST

TRY IT ON A PENNY.- Dab a small quantity of Polish on a penny & leave it overnight. IF it contains ACID, it will turn quite green by the following morning. BUT "MATCHLESS" WON'T!

FREE FROM ACID, POISON OR GRIT.

LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD

METAL POLISH.

PATON, CALVERT & Co MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED. PUREST & BEST.

No. 2 Ready November 22nd.

THE ROYAL MAGAZINE. 3D.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

DO YOU KNOW?

GIVES PERMANENT STIFFNESS, BRILLIANCY, AND BEAUTY TO ALL STARCHED ARTICLES.

IMPARTS ENAMEL-LIKE GLOSS TO MUSLINS, LACE, LINENS, &c., EQUAL TO NEW.

MAKES IRONING A PLEASURE.

SOLD IN PACKETS BY GROCERS, OILMEN, AND AT STORES EVERYWHERE.

By Special Appointment — Makers to Her Majesty.

THE PATENT BORAX CO. LTD., LADYWOOD, BIRMINGHAM.

The READIEST WRITER

. . THE . .

"RELIANCE" Fountain Pen,

Fitted with 14-carat Gold Nib (Iridium Tipped), Fine, Medium, or Broad Points.

Double Feed, Handsome Chased Vulcanite Holder.

THIS PEN WILL LAST FOR YEARS

EVERY PEN GUARANTEED.

WILL NOT GET OUT OF ORDER.

Sold at 10/6.

We send this pen, complete in box, with filler and directions, post free for 5/-

WONDERFUL VALUE.

THE RELIANCE PEN CO. LIMITED,
26 IVY LANE,
PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Reduced Facsimile

REMEMBER, a 10/6 FOUNTAIN PEN for 5/-

Agents Wanted.

Reduced Facsimile

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 65,094. TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and silence to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188s, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

MANDOLINES.

FINE ITALIAN MODELS. 13 Red Maple Ribs, 7s. 6d.; Brown and White Ribs, 10s. 6d.; GENUINE ITALIAN, with 15 Maple Ribs, 15s. 6d.; ditto, 17 Rosewood Ribs, 17s.; 19 Rosewood Ribs, Pearl Inlaid, 24s.; ditto, superior, Closed Machine, 30s. Magnificent De Meglio Model, Rosewood, 50s.; ditto, superior, 63s. Genuine De Meglio, finest-toned instrument made, £5 15s. For cases, strings and pick, see list post free. All with machine heads and bent sound boards. Crate and carr. free.

JOSEPH RILEY'S,
ON CONSTITUTION HILL,
BIRMINGHAM.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 25 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 3 Stops, 2 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 8 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Hornpipes, &c. A mere child can play it. Cash or easy payments. List of tunes and full particulars free.

DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

THOSE WHO FOUGHT AT OMDURMAN.

No. 5.—Dervish Soldier.

All rights reserved.]

No. 513. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending Oct. 29, 1898.

The Night of the Ball.

"We shall meet at the ball."

As Ethel Hetherington stood before the long pier glass in her bedroom, putting the finishing touches to an exquisite toilette, these words passed through and through her mind. Half-abstractedly she rearranged a dainty curl, a piece of soft lace and a ribbon, then stood away, drawn to her full height, and mechanically surveyed her own picture.

And clear grey eyes looked back into clear grey eyes and knew that the picture was beautiful.

But the vision had little enough hold on her, for another form rose up before the glass, and, as she slowly drew on her gloves, her thoughts were far away.

"We shall meet at the ball," he had said, and the remembrance of a certain subdued light in his eyes brought an answering light to her own and a faint flush to her cheeks.

The "Pale Proud Princess" they called her jestingly, and there were several in the brilliantly-lighted ballroom who wondered when they saw that faint flush. It took them back to an old time when she had been the radiant belle of each county ball, a laughing girl in her teens.

She had been statuesque so long now that they had almost forgotten. It was noticeable that while the men asked her far less beautiful sister for two and three dances, few ventured to ask her for more than one, and that they received with a more than usually deferential bow.

Digitized by Google

It seemed that they were all a little in awe of her. All except one, and when he approached her the flush deepened a little, and her whole face softened.

"I hope I am not too late; I have been detained," he said, in a deep, mellow voice.

She gave him her programme, and he wrote his name three times on it, the two last dances being near the end and following each other.

"May I?" he asked quietly, searching her face.

She murmured an assent and he moved away, but he did not ask anyone else to dance with him. Instead he took a seat beside an old lady, who was well known as a brilliant conversationalist, and remained there until his dance came.

There was something striking about this man, and many eyes glanced towards him again and again. Evidently he was a stranger, for those who appeared most at home in the room asked who he was.

Meanwhile the object of their curiosity sat very still, quietly surveying the whole company. He was not particularly handsome, but his face was clever and attractive; one recognised in it the face of a thinker and of a man of more than ordinary character. Masked cynicism was, perhaps, one of the most predominant traits, and a quiet, veiled scorn of much that he saw and much that he knew. Many times his keen eyes sought the form of Ethel Hetherington, but the closest observer could not have divined his thoughts towards her.

And Ethel danced on with a lighter heart and lighter step than was usual to her, knowing that her name was the only one on his card.

When the turn for their two came, he asked her if she would go out into the garden. She assented, for it was a beautiful June evening, and a young moon shed a soft, silvery light over the shrubs and trees that looked very inviting after the hot glare of the ball-room.

He fetched her a wrap, and then led her to a sheltered spot beside the lake, where they sat down with that absence of formality and general speech which betokens a quiet sense of understanding.

He sat half-turned to her so that he could see her face clearly. A deep interest was manifest in his own, and those who knew him well would have been surprised at it. For Lindsay Gibson was not an admirer of women; he knew their weaknesses too well and was too cynical to believe in them. A week ago he had been thrown rather curiously into Ethel Hetherington's society, and ever since he had been drawn back to it in a way that surprised even himself.

And Ethel watched for his coming back as she had not watched for anyone's return for years.

For some minutes they talked casually, and their conversation, typical of both, was of deep subjects far removed from the atmosphere of the ball-room.

"I am so fond of the night," she remarked presently, after a brief pause, "it is so grand and serene. It makes one ashamed of one's littleness and meanness. Life seems more real at night, and one forgets the farces."

"You have felt them?" he questioned.

"Often. There seems little enough that is real, but maybe the fault lies chiefly in ourselves."

"What does that little comprise, may I ask? I am afraid I cannot offer any examples myself."

"I have been sceptical a long time," she said, "but I believe in love and friendship."

"Do you?" and his lips curled significantly.

"I have a friend who is worth everything to me," she said quietly.

"I doubt it," he replied. "Don't think me rude, but I have always doubted if women were capable of real friendship towards each other."

She regarded him for a moment with a resentful air.

"What of men?" she asked.

"Men are better friends to each other than women. At the same time I am not a lover of my sex. We are all bad, everyone of us."

"You are somewhat sweeping."

"I have been round the world with my eyes open and all my senses on the alert, and I know."

"All the same one sees through the spectacles of one's own conclusions."

"Not solely. By gathering ideas as you go, you see through other people's spectacles as well."

"And have you been round the world and seen no love?" she asked with a touch of scorn.

"I have seen a great deal, but most of it was wasted."

"I don't understand."

"The son, whose mother breaks her heart for love of him, is usually the bad son. A strong man wastes his love on a frivolous, shallow woman, and a deep-hearted woman worships a selfish, egotistical man. I don't know how it is, but this has impressed me most."

"And whose fault is it?" she asked. Her face had grown white suddenly, and she was gripping the seat-rail hard.

"Not anyone's I suppose, only women are unreasonable and men are bad!"

"You are hard on my sex. If they are unreasonable they are also true."

"A few here and there, perhaps, and then, as often as not, they are unreasonable in being true."

She seemed stung, for her lips curled scornfully as she said:

"Women are not cowards. They will suffer for the sake of their principles and ideals, whereas a man will slip out the easiest way in preference."

"It is open to doubt as to which is the wisest."

She looked at him wonderingly, at a loss to know if he were serious or not.

He met her gaze unflinchingly.

"It is possible for an ideal to be wrong," he said quietly.

She looked away from him, and the whiteness grew on her face and the tightness about her lips. He was watching her closely, and a sudden thought seemed to come to him that moved him, and brought a keen, questioning look to his eyes.

For a few moments there was a tense silence, the very earth seemed waiting. Perhaps she knew that two of her children were about to stand face to face and soul to soul, with conventionality torn aside and truth uppermost. And maybe she felt Mrs. Grundy's shudder at the horrible spectacle of two people daring to be themselves.

"Ideals are very good," he said slowly at last, "but they are not often practical. When you are older you will understand what I mean."

"I do not think I shall know any better than I do now," she replied in a strained voice. "The truest measure of age is experience, and not years."

"If experience has left you your ideals you are indeed fortunate," he said bitterly.

"It would have left you yours had you been willing to pay the cost," was the slow reply.

He looked at her as if waiting for her to go on,

Digitized by Google

and with the strained look growing in her eyes she added:

"I have."

Then it seemed to him, as he continued watching her, that a veil was lifted from her face, revealing something he had not expected—the look of a woman who sometime has played fearlessly with high stakes in the game of life and accepted the issue.

"You interest me deeply," he said, "but I feel I may not ask you to tell me more," yet his attitude expressed waiting expectancy.

"I don't know why I should mind telling you," she said, sitting up straight and looking before her without seeing anything. "It all happened long ago, and there is nothing to be ashamed of. You doubt love and friendship, but I believe in both because I have proved both; the one in a friend, the other in myself. Eight years ago I had a lover. I was very young and very earnest, and when I gave him my heart I gave him all I had. I was never half-hearted about anything in my love; I lived up to the highest ideal I could conceive. For many reasons we could not be openly engaged, but I was not afraid to wait; I felt time could make very little difference to a love like mine.

"But it wasn't easy, for there were many hard things to bear from my people, as well as the waiting and loneliness. But I hoped on undaunted, with absolute faith in my lover and the belief in a happiness in my future that would more than atone for every hour of pain."

Her face grew grey, and she bit her lips, while his, colourless as her own, changed strangely.

"I waited five years," she went on with forced calmness, "and then a newspaper told me he had married someone else."

A long pause followed, and widely different thoughts coursed through their minds. To her the conversation had been the reopening of an old wound that had cut too deep ever to heal entirely, and had not yet lost its power to pain. To him the revelation had come like a blow from an unseen hand, and shattered a beautiful new fabrication he had but just built, and in which she was the corner-stone, leaving him with the ruins all about him.

For Lindsay Gibson was a man of strong opinions, and what he had just heard struck dead across the face of one of them.

At last he spoke.

"Supposing you met that man again," he said very quietly, "should you hate him?"

She clenched her hands and caught her breath, and again there was silence for a brief space.

"No," she said at last, "I am not his judge."

"I thought not," he answered, "yet you ought to. He behaved like a scoundrel and a cad."

"Hush!" she interrupted. "It is over now; there is no need to say it. What happened is between him and me."

"That is where you are wrong," he said. "It should be beneath you to think of him in any other way. It is the mistake good women make. They will shield their broken idols."

She bit her lips but did not reply for a few minutes. At last she said:

"Perhaps it is not possible for a man to understand a woman's love."

Again a long pause followed, and each wrestled with his own heart.

Back to the woman, as if no sad years had intervened, came the memory of her old anguish. Fresh as yesterday seemed the cruel awakening, the hopeless despair, the first crushing sense of the helplessness of womanhood.

She had smoothed it all over since, that few eyes might discern the scar; learnt to smile and be merry in spite of it. But there had been that about her ever since which withheld both men and women from being too friendly, or daring to intrude upon her reserve, though all the time her heart ached for sympathy and companionship; and this for the first time Lindsay Gibson had given her.

In the short space that she had known him she had found in his nature that which could satisfy her own. Already a new vista of happiness had been opened to her; she had stepped into the soft light of a glad possibility. But now, for a few minutes, the old anguish remained uppermost, and the past blotted out the present.

And Lindsay Gibson sat forward with his eyes on the ground, while a mental conflict waged within him. He had said he had no ideals, but he had been deceiving himself, for in reality this girl beside him embodied his highest—the ideal of how a woman could love. But it was in her past, and there for him lay a fatal barrier.

At last he turned to her, and the hush of the night grew deeper and the trees stayed their whispering.

"They say a woman never loves twice," he said with slow, questioning emphasis.

"She never does," was the low, strained answer, for the past still held her in a cruel grip, and, all-unknowing and all-unguarded, she spoke her own doom.

Then followed silence, broken only by the wind that murmured through the trees like the sound of a long-drawn sigh.

A short time afterwards they were back in the ball-room, and with a low bow he left her in the care of her next partner. But the flush had gone from her cheeks and the light from her eyes, and she moved as one dazed or in a dream.

When the ball was over she saw him once again, and his face was very grave, almost stern. She was waiting with her sister for their carriage, and he came up to her to say good-bye.

"I shall not see you again," he concluded, "as I am leaving Benly to-morrow. In a few days I shall go abroad."

She gave him her hand, and he held it a moment.

"Good-bye," he said. "I shall always be glad that I met you, and I shall not forget what you said. If at the end I have an ideal that has weathered the storms of existence I shall have to thank you for it."

"Good-bye," she answered very quietly.

Then she saw him walk away through the darkness.

GERTRUDE PAGE.

"THERE'S ALWAYS ROOM on TOP."

AT least there used to be till Home Notes came along and monopolised the position. Since then the others have gone underneath.

Irrespective of its price (1d. weekly) nowhere can you find

Such Fascinating Frocks, Such Dainty Dishes,
Such Short or Serial Stories, Such Entertaining Articles,
Such Hints as to Beautifying the Home.

There is a Page for Children, and one about them.
Novel Competitions with Large Cash Prizes.

IT WILL GIVE YOU £1 STERLING FOR A HALFPENNY.

Digitized by Google

HOMESPUN YARNS.

By Levin Carnac.

VII.—A FATAL MISFIT.

Two or three years ago I was making a solitary walking tour down the valley of the Weser, from the quaint little town of Bückeburg to the old-time city of Hamelin, known to all men as the home of the famous Piper who took the children with him to fairyland over the Klüt-Berg.

It was a good month before the regular tourist season began, and so I had the "Guest House"—to use the good old German word—to myself at the different villages at which I stopped on my way through the hill-country of the Deister.

At one of these halting-places, however—a big, straggling village that the Prussians had just promoted to the rank and dignity of a post-town—I met a fellow-wanderer, who, like myself, was taking his pleasure apart from the crowd.

I had just settled myself down to supper in the guest-chamber of the best-looking inn in the place, when the door opened, and a well-built, fair young fellow, clad in grey tweeds, and with knapsack on back and stick in hand, walked in and glanced round the room with that queer, half-lost look, by which you can always tell an Englishman abroad for the first time.

He was followed a moment after by the host, and at once proceeded, with an Englishman's usual disregard of the confusion of tongues, to order his supper in excellent, undiluted English, the host replying in almost equally pure German.

I, of course, took the liberty of introducing myself and disentangling the verbal muddle. This done, I invited the new-comer to sup with me, and so began a companionship which lasted till the end of my trip.

My new acquaintance was a young barrister who had started out on a walking tour with a friend who had undertaken to act as interpreter, but who had been called back to England the day before on urgent business. Hence the awkward position from which I had rescued him.

When we started on our way the next morning, having exchanged personal particulars overnight, I turned the conversation on to law and crime in the not unpardonable hope of getting something out of a lawyer for nothing. I succeeded very fairly, for my friend was still rather proud than otherwise of his profession, and therefore quite willing to talk about it.

What I wanted was a story by the wayside, and so I proposed that we should exchange yarns, he leading off with the story of his most curious legal experience.

He agreed, and this is how he kept his part of the contract:

"My own practice, such as it is, is confined to the Common Law, but I have had one criminal case, and that was about as singular an affair as any Old Bailey counsel could well have come across.

"It is about four years ago now, and briefs were few and far between with me then. I hadn't had one for nearly a month, and was sitting one afternoon in my chambers, wondering when the next was going to turn up, when a telegram came in and sent me flying off home as fast as a hansom could carry me. The wire was from an old schoolfellow, and one of the few real friends that had so far crossed my path. The words of the message were:

"'I have been arrested for murder. Come at once.'

"The address was Exeter gaol. I just caught the three forty-five from Paddington, and by half-past seven I was listening to my friend's story in the cell. The crime of which he was accused was even worse than murder, for his own father was the victim.

"The particulars he gave me were terribly bald, and to anyone but an old friend they would have been anything but conducive to a belief in his innocence.

"The night before he had gone out for a long walk according to a habit of his with which I was well acquainted, and had got home between eleven and twelve. Not feeling inclined to go to bed, he went upstairs to the library to get a book, and on his way passed the open door of his father's study. The old gentleman was sitting at his table as he passed, and wished him 'Good-night,' thinking he was going to bed.

"He remained for about an hour in the library; and as he passed the study door on his way to bed, he noticed that it was shut, and that the light was out. He had heard nothing unusual during the time he was in the library.

"The next morning the housekeeper roused him about seven and horrified him by telling him that his father had been found dead in his library chair. A doctor was at once sent for, and a very brief examination of the body convinced him that there had been foul play and that the old gentleman had been strangled from behind as he sat at his table writing. The strangling had been done with a silk handkerchief which lay beside the body when the crime was discovered, and that handkerchief bore my friend Fred's initial in the corner.

"He at once said that he remembered leaving it in the study the day before, and to him it was clear that the assassin had found it and used it as the most silent and effective weapon at hand. The police, however, had told him to keep that story with the other one about his nocturnal walk for the magistrates, and arrested him on the circumstantial evidence. He had been before the magistrate that day and the case had been adjourned for my attendance.

"I ought to add that robbery had evidently been the motive for the crime, whoever had committed it, for the murdered man's writing-table drawers had all been forced, and a small safe in the library had been opened with the key, and altogether nearly £300 in notes and gold was missing.

"The following day my friend was committed for trial, 'reserving his defence.' As a matter of fact the poor fellow had no defence to reserve. There was no clue to any other solution of the mystery than his guilt, and, worse than all, it was well-known that he had lately incurred debts which his father had refused to pay. The only link lacking in the fatally short chain of circumstantial evidence was the failure of the police to trace any of the stolen money to him. It had apparently vanished into thin air. This, however, was but small consolation either to him or to me.

Digitized by Google

His father had been found dead in his library chair.

"The sessions came on in about ten days, and during that time I hardly slept, so incessantly was my brain working to discover some clue that would point away from my friend, in whose innocence, in spite of appearances, I firmly believed.

"At length, on the day before the trial, a last despairing search in the library resulted in my finding a shred of fustian caught in the casement of a window opening on to a verandah. In an instant I was out on the sloping roof, examining every tile down to the water-pipe. Sticking on to this I found another larger shred of the same fustian, and in the pipe itself a horn coat button.

"This was something. Indeed it was much. But it was hardly enough to make a defence that would counteract the terribly direct evidence against the accused. I therefore kept my discoveries to myself, and thought away harder than ever.

"The case before ours was one of house-breaking. Curiously enough, on the very night of the murder, a diamond pane of glass had been removed from the window of a house occupied by an old man reputed to be a miser, and the burglar had put his hand through this, opened the window, and so entered the house.

"The accused was a big brawny fellow, his hands hung over the edge of the dock, and I was particularly struck with their immense size. To the astonishment of the court, and the disgust of the solicitor retained to defend him, he brought the case to a sudden stop by pleading guilty. He got twelve months, and as he was leaving the dock an idea struck me that brought my heart into my mouth, and in an instant I saw my way clear before me.

"Fred's case came next. The prosecuting counsel made his opening speech and called his witnesses. I cross-examined none of them, but waited anxiously for the return of a messenger I had sent to bring me the lead frame of the diamond pane at any price. The last witness had just stood down as he came and put it into my hand. When I rose to begin the defence, I astonished everybody in the court by asking that the last prisoner should be brought back and placed in the witness-box. To all objections I simply replied:

"'The life of my client and the clearing up of this crime depend upon what I ask being done.'

"At last I got my own way, and the burglar was brought back. I only asked him three questions, but they were enough. They were these:

"'How did you open the window in —— Street?'

"'By putting my hand through the pane I took out.'

"'How did you lose that button off your coat?'

"'Climbing through a hedge a fortnight ago.'

"'Did you ever fall off a verandah, and try to save yourself by catching at the waters, out?'

"At each question the man grew whiter, and more uncomfortable. At the last one, he opened his mouth to speak, but only an indistinct gurgle came forth.

"Then I produced the lead frame, and the two shreds of fustian, and the button, and addressed the Court with them in my hand. This is something like what I said:

"'The man in the witness-box has pleaded guilty to a crime that he did not commit, in order to conceal his guilt in a far graver one. He says that he opened the window in ——Street, by putting his hand through the place he had taken the pane out of. Here is the identical leaden frame. Let me see him put his hand through it.'

"It was handed up, and, as the man put out his hand to make the trial, he drew it back, and staggered with staring eyes, to the rear of the box. It was evident, at a glance, that he could not even have put all his fingers through it.

"'Now, see if this is the button you lost in the hedge. I found it in the water-pipe of the verandah outside Mr. Tressillan's library window, in the frame of which I also found this shred of stuff, which I think matches your coat.'

"As I spoke, the wretched man put his great hands to his face and sobbed out, 'Heaven forgive me! Yes, I did it. Take me away.'

"Three weeks later, one morning, at eight o'clock, Fred called me into his bedroom and pointed through the window to the black flag floating over the gaol wall. He put his hand on my shoulder, and said with a shudder:

"'But for you, old man, that flag would be flying for me.'"

Digitized by Google

LOVED TOO WELL.

SURELY this was a dull town, if there ever was one.

The walking gentleman swore below his breath, and the low comedian got out between the acts and regaled himself with too much beer. It was raining outside, and the roof of the "opera-house" of Walapong leaked in places.

The company had been doing one-night pitches, and they wanted to know "why the advance agent had booked them for two nights in this hole."

Half of the properties and costumes had not arrived, and the leading lady walked on, in the runaway scene, with her travelling-ulster thrown over her ball-dress, instead of the white-and-gold Canton flannel imitation of a gorgeous opera-cloak which she should have worn.

She walked on, as it has been said. Properly, she should have rushed on. But, for this handful of top-booted men, who whistled and stamped, and used bad language as a regular vocabulary, what was the use of giving one's self any trouble? The audience would not know the difference.

This, on general principles, was the great fault of the leading lady. She was rather too prone not to think it worth while to take trouble. She and the manager had had words more than once. He had threatened to replace her. She had laughed in a cool and impertinent way she had.

"It would not be quite easy to replace me," she said.

For the rest, she shrugged her shoulders. What did she care?

She sauntered to the footlights now to deliver one of her speeches. Her pencilled eyes leisurely swept the audience. At one bench they became arrested.

He was there again.

"He" was a mere youth. Or, who knows?—perhaps he was not so young. He had one of those absurdly ingenuous visages that never grow old. This was the leading lady's thought of him. He had taken his seat quite in the background to-night, as if ashamed of his insistence—afraid of being caught at his post again.

This time the actress looked at him attentive y, while she went mechanically through her thrilling dialogue with the heavy villain. His eyes devoured her. He had the ecstatic mien of a devotee before a saint. The leading lady had not always been a member of a "travelling company." She had a different part behind her. It was not a new thing in her life to be looked at as this wild-looking Australian stockman was now doing, for he was probably a stockman; she did not know or care. She had only begun to notice him after his pleading, rapt eyes had encountered hers night after night, and she had awakened to a perception that he was following the company from place to place. The woman was no longer in her first youth. Much experience was hers. She recognised the look in the supposititious stockman's wide-open blue eyes as denoting that rarest thing in nature, an absolutely self-abnegating passion.

From then on she began to take a certain half-amused, half-commiserating interest in him. And to-night, if he were at his usual post when the actors went out—he usually lingered to the last, humbly in the background until she left the house, and then followed her and the rest to their hotel—it went through her mind that she would speak to him.

He was at his usual post near the door. And she spoke to him. He stood speechless before her as if the heavens had opened upon him.

"I suppose you want to know me," she said, studying him carelessly with the great worn-looking eyes, whose size was further increased by the dark lines round them. "I've noticed your fidelity. It is uncommon enough to be rather amusing. I warn you that I am not at all the sort of woman you will get any joy from knowing. But come and see me to-morrow, if you care to make the trial."

She left him standing there.

The following day he appeared at the two-storey building which constituted the hotel of the town.

Melanie—such was the name he had learnt to know her by from the bills—received him in a bare room, with the crude daylight pouring in. Hers was a face whose beauty had been ravished by something more than time. But there was still something about her that made her unlike all other women.

"What is your name?" she said to her visitor.

"Conrad Kepler."

"Well, then, Conrad Kepler, you are doing a foolish thing to fall in love with me. I see that you really do love me. And it is folly, harmful folly to you. Why waste your time following me from place to place? Go back to the pretty, innocent, fresh young girl who loves you. I am sure there is such a one. Marry her, settle down on your farm, and be happy. You have nothing to do with such as I am."

Digitized by Google

"I love you," said Conrad Kepler.

"You love the paint, and the powder, and the cheap finery and paste diamonds, and the poses I take, and the shrieks I give when my lover deserts me. You are unsophisticated, and you love all that."

"I love you," the young man insisted quietly.

"I thought it only kind to let you come here that you might see me as I am."

"I love you." This was Conrad Kepler's only answer.

* * * * *

The company had moved on to still another town. The places were so alike the name scarcely seemed to matter. And Conrad Kepler, dogged, humble, asking nothing, content with his unrequited adoration, with a chance crumb, had followed the company again.

One day the low comedian permitted himself a bibulous joke on the subject. Melanie gave him a look that silenced him. She was not liked by her associates, but she was rarely molested. It appeared tacitly agreed that she should be allowed to go her own way.

That same afternoon she said to Kepler:

"All this must cease. I was indifferent as to what you did at first. I did not care about you one way or the other. But now I have a friendship for you. To love you would be an absurdity. I shall never love any one. All that is dead and the ashes have covered it. I never had a brother. But I feel that you would not have done badly for one. I like you. I must respect your feelings. You force me to do so. And, liking you and respecting you, I tell you, once for all, to waste no more time on me. Go back to your home, to your friends, to the girl who loves you."

"I can't go back," was the reply. "I can only tell you one thing—I love you."

"Why?" she demanded impatiently.

"You are beautiful——"

She laughed.

"Not now!"

"You are beautiful to me," he went on, unabashed, "as the sun and stars. I never knew what life meant till I saw you that first night. After that it was fatal. You may say or do as you like. I must love you. I can't help it. Yes, it is fate."

She had been pacing the room all day restlessly. All day she had been restless. The ghost of the bygone past had risen out of its shallow grave. That morning as she stood at the window a man had walked by on the other side of the rough, glaring mining-town street. She had but seen the back of his shoulders—a certain turn of the neck. But how the spectral memories rushed back! It was only a chance resemblance, of course. But, oh, fool! How could she have cheated herself with the thought that she was turning to stone, becoming senseless, incapable of the old wild throb, the old wild agony? Just a chance resemblance, and it had awakened this tumult of soul.

"Soul!" she repeated to herself with a bitter, inward laugh. "I did not know I had one. That's dead, too. He had none, that's certain, and he killed mine."

Now, abruptly, she stopped before Conrad Kepler. A strange thought had flashed upon her—had taken possession of her. Her great eyes held his with a new power.

"I wonder if you really love me, and how much?" she said, more to herself than to him.

"Yes, I love you," he murmured. To him it was the simplest thing on earth.

"How much?" she repeated, a sombre fire beginning to burn in her eyes, a little tremor quivering in her thin nostril. "How much? Enough to die for me? Enough to kill—to kill for me?"

She held her breath as if suspended. Breathless, too, Conrad Kepler looked at her. What did she mean? He did not know. But, without hesitancy, he answered:

"Yes."

"You would kill a man whom I might point out to you, saying: 'That man wronged me, that man murdered me, morally and mentally: took the joy of life from me for ever. That man I hate with an undying hatred. Avenge me! Kill him!' You would do that?"

She fell back from him, her features relaxing, her fingers trembling.

"Yes."

"You are a phenomenon of devotion!" she exclaimed with a harsh, discordant laugh. "You are one of the wonders of the world. But possess your soul in peace. I shall ask no such service of you."

* * * * *

She had thought it a chance resemblance. It was not that. That same night, in the midst of the play, Melanie saw him—the only man she had ever loved; the man who, years before, had induced her to marry him, only that she might learn that he had another wife.

She had left him, asking herself what she should do with her ruined life. She had beauty; some talent. She went on the stage. But the springs of all hope, all endeavour, were broken. She did not try to rise. What use? She could live after a fashion for a few years. At the worst, life was not long. And at the end there was the peace and rest of death. Thus she had said within her own soul. And eight years had passed. And now, for the first time, across the flaring footlights, on the outskirts of civilisation, his steady eyes met hers.

Conrad Kepler's rapt, unwavering glance, from another part of the hall, followed her every motion. But Melanie, on this night, knew not even that he was there.

The following day he went to her hotel. She had gone out, he was told. The company were to move on late that night.

The young man followed the direction indicated to him, and which the actress had taken on leaving the hotel. It led him to a stony, level space on the confines of the town. Arrived there he paused abruptly, and remained rooted to the spot. Beyond the unfinished brick wall of a house, which had been hastily run up, and left uncompleted, and which now screened his own figure from view, there stood, in relief against the evening sky, two forms—Melanie and a man.

The man appeared to plead, to urge, to insist. The woman whom Conrad Kepler loved stood regarding him with folded arms; the pose of her head, the rigidity of her body, were eloquent of contempt, of speechless, quivering rage.

Then she turned, he following, and moved away, walking quickly in the direction of the unfinished building. Conrad Kepler, as they approached, drew further back. They did not see him. There was a look upon the woman's face that he had never seen there before. Still the man appeared to urge, to plead. He was handsome; he had the air of a man of the world. Then, quite near the screening wall, Melanie for an instant stopped. Conrad Kepler could not see her face now, but he could divine its expression by the ringing, yet trembling, tone of her voice.

Digitized by Google

"Love you! You speak of love now—now? What do you know of it? What did you know of it eight years ago? Love means truth. Do you know what truth means, even? No! Had you killed me, in the body, you would have wronged me less. My heart, my soul, all that was vital in me you did kill. Your oaths betrayed, defiled. Better death a thousand times than the hurt you did to me!"

She had hurried on again, the man still at her side; but Conrad Kepler had not moved.

After an interval of which he knew not the duration, he stirred. Night had fallen, only where the sun had set the sky still burnt dully, like a reflection of distant camp fires.

* * * * *

In the hotel there was confusion. The theatrical company were preparing to leave. No one noticed a slight, boyish-looking man pass up the stairs. He asked for no one, but in a few minutes he stood before a door and entered.

Melanie was alone in the room. She turned swiftly. Some great change had been wrought in her since Conrad Kepler had seen her last. But he observed nothing. His eyes were set and glassy.

"I am glad you came. I have something to tell you with my good-bye——"

"I, too, have something to tell you," he said, interrupting.

And now she had been struck with something strange about him.

"What?" Her lips just formed the word.

"I have killed him."

She did not shriek. She tried twice to speak.

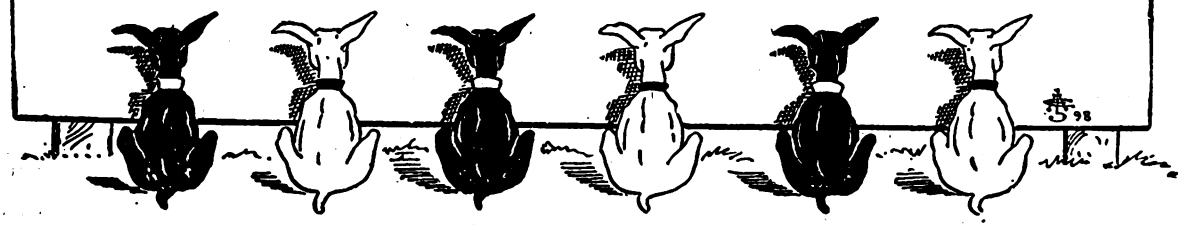
"I have killed him. I heard you this evening; then I knew what you meant yesterday. I laid in wait for him after he left you—left this house—an hour ago. I followed him. It is done now—all done."

Then words came to her, and a laugh that was worse than sobs.

"Fool! fool!" she shrieked. "I loved him in spite of all. The woman who stood between us is dead, and I promised at last, before he left me just now, to forgive all and to marry him to-morrow."

E. Thorpe.

MUCH TO FORGIVE.



The little Prussian farm was not more than six acres square. A narrow road bordered it on the west and a neighbour's meadow on the east.

The stump of a gigantic poplar crumbled to decay upon the dividing line. Round it, grey and sodden, lay the chips that had flown at its downfall, and remnants of two fences, one in fairly good repair, the other broken to splinters.

A path ran up from the road to the gate, which was white, in a row of pointed palings, and a green walk under an arbour reached the house. There was a window right and left and two doors, side by side, in the porch. One sacred to Sundays and cleaning days, the other to rare visitors during the week. As a rule, people were expected to go round to the kitchen and not make footmarks on the carpet.

Cat'rina was small and slight. There was a dull red in her face; her nose slanted upward and the corners of her thin lips drooped

She kept the rugs turned face downwards, to prevent their fading, and the table-cover wrong side out. The sewing-machine was swathed in white, and there were pieces of newspaper folded and laid between the door and the threshold to keep out the dust.

On Saturday she reversed the rugs and the cover in mute concession to Sunday, and on Sunday she opened the window and unlocked the door of the room, which had a fairly good carpet, a sofa, an easy chair with a tidy, and a centre table upon which lay the Bible and a hymn book. She put on her best frock, her earrings and an amethyst ring, and sat, as the weather permitted, on the porch or at the window to wait for Lewis Eisenoch.

She had done this for the last five years.

Conrad Grau never affected the room. Even when Eisenoch was driven to propose for Cat'rina, because the matter must be settled somehow and Cat'rina refused to follow his suggestion and ask her father herself, he went round to the kitchen.

Cat'rina watched him off the porch before she ran within and whispered to her mother.

Mrs. Grau nodded many times and smiled ecstatically.

Digitized by Google

Both women tip-toed into the kitchen and pushed their bodies into the angle formed by the half-open door. Through the long space between the door and the lintel they could see and hear. Cat'rina dropped on her knees that her mother might peep over her head.

It was but a little way from the front to the kitchen. The path ran between the end of the house and the garden. Eisenoch stopped to look over the palings at the rows of turnips and carrots and cabbages like bouquets.

Five steps led from the kitchen porch to a paved court.

Above it a vine, heavy with fruit, made a purple stalactited ceiling. There was enough red light slanting from above the trees to enable Conrad Grau to read the paper which he held across his knees. He followed every line from right to left and from left to right with a horny forefinger.

Eisenoch said good evening.

Grau read audibly to the end of the paragraph and cleared his throat. He did not raise his eyes. He knew why the young man was there. With this end in view he had been negatively polite for a number of years.

The vision of a poplar passed before his eyes, green in June, lying shorn in November across the meadow. He remembered how twelve good men and true decided not one, but many times, that the poplar had not stood within his boundary lines; therefore must he pay to Johannes Eisenoch the value of the tree and the cost of the several suits.

Finally he remembered how he had been compelled to count out his small hoard of money and confess himself beaten.

Herein lay the gall and wormwood. Now he might cancel a portion of the debt.

Eisenoch shifted his position and made a mighty effort.

"I have been keeping company with your Cat'rina these five years," he said. "My father left me the farm. I've got two horses and a couple o' cows, with the heifer coming on, and six as fine pigs as any in the country, ready for killing. They ain't half starved either. Everything's got plenty to eat."

Grau went on with his reading.

"I held my oats back and they'll bring a pretty penny. I've got as fine a lot o' cabbages as you can see in a week's march. Nobody's can come near 'em, and cabbages'll bring a good price before the winter's over. Cabbage is scarce."

He looked down the path that zig-zagged over the hill to the dairy and waited for some evidence of approval. Finally he said:

"You know this, and never had nothing to say against my coming round these five year yet, so I thought you'd just as soon me and Cat'rina should be married about the middle of October?"

A rage seized Grau; it strained his joints and wrenched his muscles. The paper across his knees shook; but he followed with his great forefinger every line from left to right, from right to left.

He looked slowly from the extreme corners of his eyes, and said with guarded scorn that had been waiting for years for expression:

"Your father was a rascal and your mother was a fool. I shall keep my Cat'rina for a better man."

It was good to pay off the debt he owed Eisenoch to Eisenoch's son.

Left to himself he continued to read, though the shaded spot grew dim and the letters on the page became indistinguishable.

The women behind the door stole back into the room and looked at each other. Through the dusk Cat'rina saw her mother lift her hands and close her eyes; she saw her open her mouth to its widest and move her head backwards and forwards in a slow, vibratory fashion, as if she never intended to leave off.

They said not a word to each other as they closed the windows and locked the door, and Cat'rina turned all the rugs face downwards and swathed the sewing machine in its cotton cover.

Although there had been the finality of few words about Grau's decision, Eisenoch did not discontinue his visits at once. For several evenings he sat in the yellow chair on the porch while Cat'rina's father read the paper before the kitchen door.

What was the good of Eisenoch's keeping company with Cat'rina if he was never to marry her?

Cat'rina herself saw it in this light.

She mentioned the subject one last Sunday evening and made it easy for him to get away.

It had rained in the night: the clouds were still heavy. The young chestnut wood had shed its leaves until the road was yellow with them. The drops that splashed from the branches were the only sound in the stillness.

Cat'rina leant on the gate and said:

"It's no more use our going on like this. I've been thinking this morning about the other girls. I expect you have been thinking about them yourself?"

"Not particular," Eisenoch admitted.

"There's Rosa and Carolina and Maria and Louisa."

She told them off one by one upon the palings of the gate.

"They're all good girls—good, industrious girls. Maria seems to me the best for a wife."

Eisenoch took up the list:

"Rosa's a pretty girl," he said; "so's Carolina."

"They're young. You can't tell how they're going to turn out—these young girls."

"What do you think of Louisa?"

"She's got a temper. You can't get a word out of her when she's sulky."

Eisenoch was afraid of a girl with a temper.

"There's the Reizer girls."

"Neither of 'em makes good butter. Dealers tell you that Reizer's butter always fetches less in the market than other people's. They let their cream get musty. But they're nice girls. Now, there's Anna. Have you thought of Anna?"

Anna was stolid and colourless. Her hair was scant; her pale eyes were expressionless.

Eisenoch had not thought of Anna.

Cat'rina became enthusiastic. She said there wasn't a girl in the place that could compare with Anna. She had the wash out every Monday morning, rain or shine, by eight o'clock, and the Lenzes had a big family to wash for. She was a good housekeeper—her dairy was neat as as a new pin.

"Hart gets the same for her butter as he gets for mine."

Eisenoch was not interested. No man was interested in Anna.

"What do you think of Sophie?"

Cat'rina had a vision of red cheeks and redder lips, of smiles and dimples and abundant black locks.

Sophie was her dearest friend. For years she had patronised her, and told her all her plans and prospects for a wedding, and Sophie had been agreeably, acceptably jealous.

She felt a pang of mingled anger and jealousy.

Digitized by Google

She could not say "Long live the Queen" to this successor.

Eisenoch repeated his question:

"What do you thing of Sophie?"

"Sophie?" she stammered, "Sophie?"

She moved her head from side to side.

"Don't you think about Sophie," she said.

"No?"

"No."

He persisted stupidly:

"I always understood you thought a lot of Sophie."

"Nobody can say they ever heard me say a word against Sophie Hilweg."

"But you——"

"I don't think she's the wife for you—that's all. All the others suit you better. Anna suits you best of all. Anna's a good girl."

Eisenoch went down the path and turned as if he had forgotten something.

"It's not worth while to think about Sophie?"

"No; besides——"

"What?" asked Eisenoch.

He sprang up the path and took hold of the palings.

Cat'rina hesitated.

"They say the young preacher in the next village is beginning to pay her attentions. They've taken him home to dinner twice this summer already. I don't say it's true, I only heard so. You think about Anna."

At night, Eisenoch thought so much of Sophie that he found it difficult to sleep. He hated the problematic preacher.

In the morning he went over to her father's house to buy corn, though he had plenty.

Early as it was, Sophie's tub was empty. She had pinned up her skirts and stood on tip-toe—she was not tall—to fasten a sheet upon the line. Her arms were round and white, her hair was black, she se med so altogether desirable that Eisenoch could scarcely prevent himself from taking her round the waist and telling her at once of the honour he had come to confer upon her, particularly when she turned her face over her shoulder and all her smiles and dimples appeared for him.

She said:

"When did you see Cat'rina last?"

He replied:

"I come over to see if your father had a little of last year's corn. I've got a young horse over there I don't like to feed on new corn." After a pause he said: "Cat'rina—Cat'rina, what makes you always say that same thing to me about Cat'rina?"

He made a long explanation while Sophie listened or laughed encouragingly.

They were married a month later.

Cat'rina went to the wedding in a new gown and gave the bride two glass butter dishes. She gave two because she wished to avoid any possible imputation of jealousy.

Time passed on.

Sophie's boys and girls became men and women who passed and repassed her gate co tinually.

Cat'rina grew middle-aged and grey-haired. Her father was an old man. A wordless devotion sprang up between them. Each was eager to serve the other, but gradually his tasks became her own.

One morning Cat'rina came in from milking to find his chair by the fire unoccupied and the voice of the clock like a menace in the empty room.

When she called there was no answer.

A truth she had never acknowledged took hold of her and a horror of loneliness came upon her.

As she mounted the stairs the sun came up from behind the young chestnut wood, and its rays shone red on the bare white wall.

Old Grau lay long and straight upon his bed. His hands were clasped in a knotted heap on his breast. The feeble strength of old age had gone from him.

When he saw Cat'rina at the head of the staircase his mouth quivered.

"Oh, Cat'rina," he said, "you poor girl!"

He began to talk incoherent y.

"You must be left by yourself. In the night I know it, and I think of you by yourself here, all alone. And I think about the poplar and Eisenoch's son."

For a moment, while they looked at each other, their relationship was forgotten. They were just two human creatures, and one had satisfied his enmity at the expense of the other, and learnt how bitter such satisfaction is at the last.

Cat'rina crossed the room and knelt down by the bed. She laid her hard hands over her father's.

"When I think of all I did to spite Eisenoch, and him dead already, and that it only spited you, why, then, I know you've had much to forgive, Cat'rina."

As she looked from the barrenness of the past to the loneliness of the future, Cat'rina, for the first time, knew how much she had forgiven.

ELGA DENET.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS
GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☛ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 4 distribution must reach us by October 31st, addressed to The 4th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the First Distribution appears on page 556.

Digitized by Google

TWO GOOD MEN AND TRUE.

JOE and Jim had been partners for years. They had travelled to the gold fields together, built their little cabin among the first on Kangaroo Creek, shared the same board and luck. They had seen a few rough cabins grow into an important camp; they had seen pistols drawn and lives threatened and taken almost daily in their times, when a six-shooter was the only court of justice, and he shot best who shot first.

Life was rough at Kangaroo Creek in those days, and even now, when it was a thriving little settlement, it was often a case of "kill or be killed."

One night Joe and Jim had sat talking with a miner whose claim adjoined their own—"Piggie," they called him, and if ever he bore other name none at Kangaroo Creek knew it. "Piggie" was reputed to have been a gentleman before he came to Australia, and his talk was different from most of the boys, and his hands were smaller and whiter. "Piggie" had made his pile and was going away the next day, going home; and Jim and Joe found his body floating in the creek in the morning, with staring, half open eyes and a knife in his back. They buried him silently by the creek.

"Pity," said Jim.

"So 'tis," agreed Joe.

And Joe and Jim guarded their own little hoard a bit more carefully and kept their fire-arms in better condition.

It was almost time for Jim and Joe to leave the diggings. They had worked there six long, weary years, and had their share of luck. They had risen together with the sun, toiled side by side day after day, shared their evening meal, and drank and smoked together with little variation. They seldom spoke, yet closer friends never shared luck.

Over a bottle of liquor they talked about returning together, but after three hours' tacit and smokeful deliberation, and ten minutes' earnest discussion, they decided to hang on for another year.

"We shall have enough by then," said Joe.

"I should say so," replied Jim.

And so it was agreed.

The arrival in the village of a woman ruffled the even tenor of their companionship. Nothing could have parted Jim and Joe for one moment except an explosion or—a woman. Men may hob-nob together for a lifetime, but bring a woman on the scene and trouble begins.

She was a giggling, fair-haired thing, the first barmaid at the Palace Hotel, the one "pub" at Kangaroo Creek.

She was a woman, and it was this fact that struck the sleepy minds of Joe and Jim. Hitherto the customers of the reeking little canteen had been attended to by men like themselves—bare-armed, grimy, perspiring. The two partners began to find a vague attraction in spending their evenings there, and watching Nellie flit about through clouds of smoke.

Jim would even leave his work in the middle of the day, and Joe would ponder earnestly as to where he could be, while Joe would occasionally saunter out at odd times without even saying "Coming?" to Jim. All of which was getting very serious and unaccountable. But each man kept his secret, and talked less and smoked more than ever.

One evening, the first for many, they were passing in their own little den. It certainly was a rough night without, and the men were, as they confessed, "dog-tired"; but perhaps the real reason for their domesticity was the fact that "Nellie" had left the diggings for a few days on a visit.

They put the bottle on the table, and lighted their pipes; Joe and Jim sat as usual, gazing earnestly into the fire.

"Did well to-day," suggested Joe.

"Very well," agreed Jim.

The two puffed on in silence, each eager to unburden himself of some secret, but uneasy as to how to start.

"Nice gal, Nell," Joe remarked at length.

"So she is," agreed Jim.

"I got a kind o' surprise fer yer," said Joe after a few minutes of silent puffing.

"Oh!" was all Jim said.

Joe hesitated, but at last summoned up courage and blurted out:

"Jim, I'm going ter marry a gal."

"You is?" said Jim after a pause. "Have you made up to her and asked her, Joe?"

"Not yet; but I kissed her good-bye last night."

"So did I," said Jim looking up.

"You're a liar, Jim!"

Jim did not answer, but filled up the glasses again, and they both gazed stupidly into the fire.

"I've her portrait here somewhere," said Jim at length, producing a photograph.

"Why, so have I," replied Joe, taking out another.

Both men paused; then Joe said firmly:

"I mean ter get her, Jim!"

"Not if I know it! She is promised to me," replied Jim with equal firmness.

"So you've been sneaking after 'er, Jim?" asked Joe.

"No worse than you," replied Jim candidly.

"What do you mean, Jim?" asked Joe.

"What I says, Joe," answered Jim.

Another very serious pause.

"See here, Jim!"

"Well, Joe."

"You want that girl, I s'pose?"

"I do."

"Well, so do I—that's straight out."

"Then I s'pose we'd better settle it at once," said Jim.

"How, Jim?" asked Joe.

"Pistols," suggested Jim.

"Good," replied the other.

"Fust thing to-morrow, back o' the hill," proposed Jim, "and he best man wins."

"Right you are," acquiesced Joe.

"Good night, Joe."

"Good night, Jim."

The old partners were up at dawn as usual. Joe noticed with some concern that Jim searched for tobacco in his pouch and found none. Such a thing might, Joe reflected, put Jim at a disadvantage; he hastened to put the matter right.

Digitized by Google

"Hev some tobacco, Jim?"

"Thanks, Joe."

So they commenced their walk together. They were both dead shots. Neither would be likely to miss a coin at twenty yards, much less the sturdy breast that would soon be his target.

And on the way they reflected, as usual, each within his honest, slow mind.

"I could hit Jim, of course," Joe's thoughts ran; "I'd be a mug if I couldn't! But he is sure to pop me, too. That's no good to either. Besides, he's my old partner, is Jim, we've pigged in together now, how long is it? six years! No. I'll not down old Jim this time; 'tain't worth it. He's a better man than me, is Jim, and I shouldn't care to hang on alone if Jim was gone under, durn me if I should, not for all the women in the world!"

"Joe or me, one or the other; both, I spect," reflected Jim cheerily. "Poor Joe! It don't seem right somehow to stick an ounce of lead into him, after these times together, because he happens to fancy a girl, same's me. S'pose he did miss me—or only wing me—which he won't? Well—durn it—I shouldn't know who to talk to without Joe in the corner opposite, smokin' his pipe. No—I ain't goin' to murder old Joe—not just yet awhile."

They reached the place.

Joe held out his hand.

"Well, so long, Jim."

"So long, Joe."

The hand-grip was a long one—the voices were not quite as firm as usual. But Joe's eyes twinkled even now at the thought of the ingenious trick he was about to play on Jim by missing him; the corners of Jim's mouth twitched with merriment, as though he were conjuring up Joe's surprise presently at finding himself unhurt.

But each felt, with the utmost certainty, that he had only a few seconds longer to live.

They took up their positions.

Through the trees the wind whistled and snarled, the dripping of the rain on the foliage above them was the only sound.

Joe particularly noticed an irritating flapping leaf, almost over Jim's head; Jim remarked that a squirrel was playing about in the tree beneath which Joe stood.

"Say when, Jim," suggested the ever-garrulous Joe.

"No—you," replied Jim.

Joe smiled broadly as he counted evenly:

"One—two—three—fire!"

The reports rang out. The squirrel dropped headless at Joe's feet; the leaf fluttered down on to the brim of Jim's hat. The men gazed at each other for a few moments; then they gradually understood how things were. The two began to laugh outright. The laugh increased steadily in volume, and was prolonged for five minutes.

Joe began the conversation.

"Well, Jim. We're durned fools, we are."

"I should think we is, Joe," agreed Jim.

They advanced to each other, and shook hands again.

"Confound you, Jim," said Joe warmly.

"An I you, too, Joe," replied Jim.

At last accounts Joe and Jim were still together—and still unmarried.

V. Hewitt.

Result of First Distribution.

Of the fifty persons selected in the first Short Stories Distribution, four have applied. A sovereign has, therefore, been sent to each of the following:

W. GYDE, The Barracks, Warley, Essex.

Miss WILLIAMS, Ivy Cottage, Rowlands Castle, Havant, Hants.

J. B. WIGHTON, 26 St. Domingo Vale, Everton.

G. R. CHALMERS, R.N., H.M.S. Worcester, Stationed off Greenhithe, Kent.

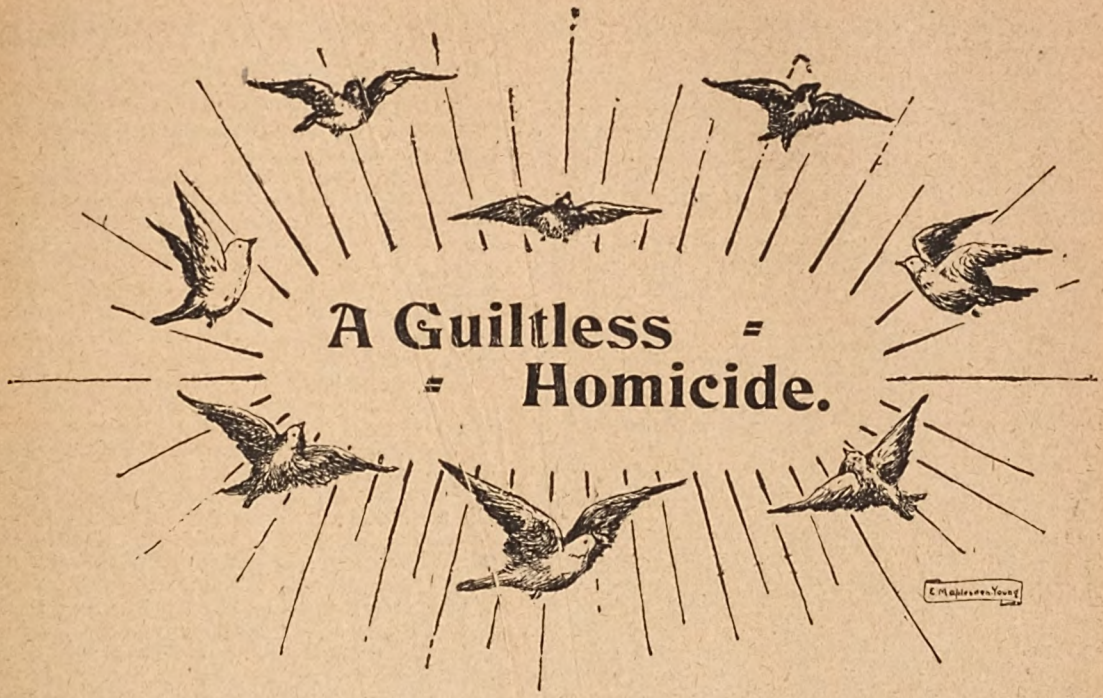
Here is a list of those people who would have received a sovereign each had they applied for it:

John Evison, West Street, Crowland, Peterborough; Daniel Smith, Harkstead, Suffolk; Miss Frankland, 6 Church Square, Whitby; Arthur Buckle, 7 Hawthorne Villas, Queen's Road, Wimbledon; James Carter, 21 Skinner Street, Swansea, South Wales; Miss Sayer, 31 St. Peter's Street, Ipswich; James Garnett, 113 Prospect Road, Scarborough; George Sadler, 6 Union Street, Norwich; Mrs. Stanmer, 11 Alexandra Road, Broadstairs; Joseph Avery, Railway Street, Barnes, S.W.; Miss Caroline Plumridge, 3 Foxton Terrace, Friar's Stile Road, Richmond; Miss Lily Strickland, 5 Chapel Road, Stamford Hill, N.; Frederick North, 10 Bath Street, Northampton; G. A. S. Vint, 11 Carlisle Street, Belfast; Thos. Peed, The Nurseries, Norwood Road, West Norwood, S.E.; W. P. Brigstocke, 1 The Terrace, Ryde, Isle of Wight; Miss Hickman, The Cottage, Hagley, Stourbridge; J. W. Somerton, 49 London Road, Worcester; Richard Wilson, 47 Railway Road, Leigh, Lancs.; D. Bevan, 19 Glover Street, Birkenhead; J. Hindle, Strand, Exmouth: R. Douglas, 48 George Street, Perth, Scotland; R. Gilmour, 12 Brougham Street, Greenock; Miss E. Ashford, 166 Icknield Street, Birmingham; Mrs. W. Morris, 17 Harrowby Street, Bute Docks, Cardiff; Miss L. Williams, 13 Mostyn Road, Brixton; Thos. Mantle, Trewen, The Woodlands, Conway, North Wales; E. Packman, 10 Arbroath Road, Dundee; W. Waymont, 53 Tierney Road, Streatham; R. J Henderson, 33 Hollybank Road, Drumcondra, Dublin; R. S. Lord, 16 Grange Avenue, Rawtenstall; John Bray, 189 North Road, Plymouth: Joseph Mayne, Forest, Redruth; John Morris, 35 Worsfield Street, Battersea; James Matthews, "The Elms," Newbury, Berks; Thos. Drew, 480 High Road, Chiswick; Joseph Percival, 166 Oldham Road, Ashton-under-Lyne; Miss L. Higgs, Andersontown, Falls Road, Belfast; Mrs. H. Rogers, 18 Baronsfield Road, East Twickenham: H. Gillet, Gwithian, Hayle, Cornwall; Miss Emma Carter, 1 Dancer Road, Fulham, S.W.; Miss A. Sweet, 50 Portman Street, Rowbarton, Taunton; S. H. Gordon Able, Onecote School, Leek, Staffs.; D. Gilchrist, 29 West Scotland Street, Plantation, Glasgow; Harry Attree, 328 Uxbridge Road, W.

This is a very encouraging start, and readers must be commended upon their enterprise in applying in such large numbers. It may possibly so happen that those people whose names and addresses are given above as having failed to apply for the sovereign awaiting them are not readers of Short Stories, and it may with equal possibility happen that the list of persons selected for this week's distribution contains amongst them a good proportion of non-readers. Under these circumstances, it is to be hoped that every reader will mention the distribution to at least one friend, and put this friend in the way of making his application in the proper fashion. Who knows but what the name of your next door neighbour has been selected, and that he will fail to secure his golden sovereign simply because he is unaware of this generous offer? It behoves you, therefore, to mention the fact to everybody with whom you come in contact. It surely is not worth losing a sovereign for the sake of a post-card. Your name may not be amongst those who have been selected up to the present; on the other hand it may, and you would feel rather unhappy if on opening your Short Stories a week or two hence, you found that your name was down as one of those who would have received £1 had they applied for it!

Digitized by Google



A Guiltless Homicide.

MALLORY felt himself almost slinking up the avenue. He could not escape the memories of the days when he had bounded between these trees as a boy, galloped up the hard, smooth road on horse-back, or come, later, as a young prince upon his own estate. The contrast of past and present made him feel the blood in his face, and sent a little shudder of disgust running down his spine.

There was resentment, too, against the old man that he felt had robbed him, not only of his prospects in life, but of his self-respect. Besides the droop in Mallory's shoulders, there were tears of self-pity in his eyes, which made him despise himself, and added to his anger against the old man up there in the house. Once let us get the idea that a thing is ours, by whatever chance or gift, and we consider it ours by unalienable right.

Mallory did not go to the front of the house. He hesitated for an instant at the side, and looked through the unshaded window and saw his old cousin, his only living relative, sitting as he had sat night after night for twenty years, with his books about him, reading, reading. The student lamp was old, and the shade of green paper threw a sickly light on the bony old face, with the thin lips a little drawn up at one corner, as if in a perpetual sneer. The eyes were small, with slanting, tent-like lids. How Mallory did hate the expression of that face! How many times had he given him nothing more than the most courteous and polite attention, and how he had writhed under it!

In the midst of his misery, and in the very act of turning about and going back to the gate, Mallory noticed with contempt the worn table cover, the green paper shade, and the shabby dressing gown that his cousin wore about his narrow shoulders. A man with a large fortune—more than a large fortune—to spend his life like that! And how old and pale he looked! He couldn't live long, and then that money, all the money that Mallory had been brought up to consider his very own, would go to a library that nobody would ever enter except dusty old men like this.

It seemed to him that he must prevent it. He walked rapidly round the house until he came to the back-kitchen door, which he tried. It was fastened, but there was a shuffle across the floor, and a hand on the lock.

"Who's there?" a strong voice asked.

"It's I, Grainger," Mallory said. "Let me in."

The door flew open instantly, showing a pleased and delighted face.

There was a hesitancy in the butler's look until Mallory held out his hand, and then Grainger grasped it in both of his with affection.

"I'm glad to see you home again, sir. I was just about to take a bit of supper, Mr. Mallory, and there's some as good devilled kidneys as you've seen since you were here before. You must taste 'em, sir."

Mallory was hungry, or he had been hungry, but it seemed to him that he must go in there to his cousin and say or do something to make him change his mind about leaving all that money to a stupid library. What good would libraries, or anything else, do old George Dent after he was dead? And here he was, starving, ragged, without a place to lay his head; he, a gentleman, who had been brought up to expect that one day all this would be his! It was cruel. It was wrong. His cousin must be made to see it.

Grainger went on preparing the table before him.

"The Mason family are back, sir," he said with his eye on the tin coffee-pot on the range.

With the smell of the kidneys and the coffee, and the sight of the white napkins, to which he had been unaccustomed in these last months, a sense of comfort came to Mallory to which he had been long a stranger.

But when Grainger mentioned the Masons, that nervous gnawing of impatience and protestation against fate began again in his heart.

Digitized by Google

"When?"

"Last week. I saw Miss Emily the day before yesterday. She asked me where you were, and I told her you was in France again, sir. I knew she would think it strange you would be in town and not come to see us. Wouldn't be stopping at the old place any longer, so I just told her you were in France. It seemed to me she seemed a bit disappointed."

"Don't tell her, Grainger. I rely upon you not to tell her. Do not tell anyone. I want you to promise me that no one shall ever know I am not in France. If I could go, I would go."

Mallory felt himself getting weak. He put his head down in his hands. The thought of Emily Mason added a new drop to his cup of misery. He had never been in love with her, but he had liked her, and had basked in her admiration of him. His cousin, fourteen months before, had called him in one day and told Mallory that he had given him home, education, opportunity, everything, and had found him at twenty-six only a good-for-nothing, mildly dissipated young man, as unfit as possible to manage and profitably use a great estate; that he considered his own duty discharged towards the young man by the past, and for the future his fortune would go where it would be of some service to humanity. He meant to endow a great and solid reference library for scholars like himself. And Mallory with sixty-four pounds and his large and handsome wardrobe, had been turned out into the world.

People did not know that he was not the old man's heir, and he might have made debts anywhere, but he knew that his cousin would stop that, as soon as he heard of it, in a public and humiliating fashion. He could not stand such a disgrace, so he dropped out of sight. He would not go to any of his old acquaintances for employment, and he could get none from other people. He was learned in nothing, save elegant and easy ways of spending money; and no man wanted a subordinate for that purpose.

The loss of Emily Mason had not been even a spot in his general misery. He had not thought of her till now, but now, for some reason, she seemed infinitely precious, infinitely above him, and he could not bear that she should know anything about him or his degradation.

"No danger o' my telling, Mr. Mallory," Grainger said, pouring the coffee into the cup. "I'm thinking Mr. Dent will repent, before he dies, of ever having made such an unjust will. It's only right that the estate should be your own. You ought to marry Miss Emily and settle down here in the old house, and let it be livened up again. It's no way to live, this way. Why, every night I lock Mr. Dent up in the house, and take the keys and leave him there until the morning, reading, reading. He won't let me even sleep in the house. It's no way for a Christian to live."

The odour of coffee gave Mallory a sickish sensation.

"Go and get me some brandy, Grainger. I am ill," he said, pushing away the food before him.

Grainger brought a bottle from his little bedroom.

"Here's some of the real stuff. There's only a few bottles of it left."

Mallory swallowed half a glassful, and sat for another quarter of an hour looking into the glowing face of the range. The brandy seemed to go clear into his eins, and race through them instead of the blood. He had not eaten since the night before. It had been days since he had had a respectable meal. That impelling desire to stop his cousin's determination to disinherit him before it should be made irrevocable by his death came back with redoubled force.

"I am going to see Cousin George," he said.

"That's right," Grainger replied, "that's right."

But he looked a little uneasy at the flushed face and disordered, soiled clothing.

Grainger loved Mallory, the impulsive, sweet-tempered, generous boy who had brought him all his troubles who had always been generous and generally considerate. He loved him as though he had been his son that had never been born. In the eyes of Grainger, Mallory had never been guilty of a wrong action in his life.

It only wrung the elder man's heart that he could not bear the young man's troubles—that he could not make things straight.

"Don't you think, Mr. Mallory, some clean linen—now, I've got plenty, if you'd but wear it. Mr. Dent——"

"Oh, hang his infernal ways!" Mallory cried. "I'm going in to tell him he shan't keep me out of my own. I'll spend half the estate in the courts. Do you lock him in? Where's the key?"

"Here it is. But I wouldn't go, feeling that way, Mr. Mallory, indeed I wouldn't. Wait awhile."

"I'm going now."

And taking the key, he strode across the flagged court between the outer kitchen and the house.

The wide halls were dark. There was no light in all the house, except the library. The old man slept in a room next to his books but Mallory knew every step of the way. He had lived there ever since he was ten years old.

When he reached the library door he hesitated for an instant, and then knocked.

"Come in," his cousin's voice said calmly.

The very tones of it took away all of Mallory's bravado. He opened the door and went in.

Mr. Dent looked up from the book in his delicate hands. Mallory stood, and when his cousin finally recognised him, he, too, arose and held out his hand.

"How do you do, Arthur?" he said coldly. "Will you have a chair? It seems to be a chilly evening." And he drew a light cane-chair towards the smouldering fire.

It was all so hopeless. Mallory had nothing to say. How could he sit there in his rags, a confessed failure, a man—an ablebodied man—who could not keep himself from starvation, and protest against a man who had piled scores of thousands of pounds upon each other by sheer hard work, leaving them as he chose?

Mallory felt the sneer in that face already. He knew that his cousin supposed he had come as a beggar, but hardly as such a colossal beggar.

He made up his mind that he would not ask anything of his cousin. He would explain this disordered dress by saying he had been hunting in the neighbourhood. Whatever he thought, he might think.

They went on talking of commonplaces. Mallory asked what line of study had been taken up in these months. He told of the new books he himself had seen in shop windows in the city. The old man mended the sunken fire, taking some pieces of a pine box and an old hatchet from a closet in the chimney.

As he got up, Mallory's eyes rested on the books and papers on the table. One was a legal document, long and rather narrow in its fold. Idly his eyes spelt out, upside down, the writing on the back. Little chills ran down his back. His lips were dry.

Digitized by Google

"The last will and testament of George Mallory Dent."

This was the will that disinherited him.

All sorts of wild fancies went through Mallory's brain. What if he should steal that will, and his cousin should die before he could make another? All the vast property would be his.

He reached out his hand to take it, and then he realized how inevitable detection would be, and how it would not only be public disgrace, for his cousin cared not a whit for the world, but it would cut off hope absolutely.

Mr. Dent was bending over his fire. The hatchet lay on the hearth. Mallory's heart went like a steam hammer. "No! no!" he was saying to himself; and even as he said it, almost in his grasp he saw that great fortune —life—the world. What was life or money to this old man?

Crying to himself that he would not, he put his hand out and drew the will towards him, his face purple with emotion.

He felt as though it were some demon that moved his arm—he had nothing to do with it. He snatched the hatchet, and struck again and again, in an agony of fear that he might not do the work thoroughly, that the old man would speak again and accuse him.

Then, keeping his eyes from the body, he opened the paper which he had still kept crushed in his hand.

The fire was there, and he intended to burn it, but some impulse—some caution—caused him to open it and see that it was the document which disinherited him, and which had moved him, forced him almost against his will, to kill his cousin.

It was very short.

After a few trifling bequests to old servants and friends, and a donation to the library of a well-known college, the entire property, consisting of stocks, bonds, mortgages and land, was bequeathed "to my cousin and only living relative, Mallory Arthur Dent."

Mallory turned again and stupidly looked at the date. "April the twentieth, eighteen hundred and ninety." That was two weeks after he had left the house. His cousin had either grown sorry for his hardness, or he had always intended to leave his property in this way.

Mallory's eyes went down to the huddled figure of the old man. He started once to pick the body up, and then he drew back.

Oh, the uselessness of it! The pity of it! An impulse of sorrow for the kind old man, dead, murdered by his own cousin, his almost adopted son, brought tears to Mallory's eyes, mingled, too, with sorrow for himself. Why hadn't he been wise enough to foresee this?

He put his arm on the mantelpiece and groaned in agony of spirit. He had put a terrible crime upon his soul, and for what? Worse than nothing!

And then he shut his teeth and called himself a fool and a coward.

He had an attack of terror when he saw that blood had stained the will.

"But any murderer might have handled it," he said to himself, putting it down on the table, while a great quaking took his heart at the name he had given himself.

He went over to the blinds and drew them down, walking round the dead man's feet, blew out the lamp, and walked out.

He hesitated at the door for an instant, the coming conversation with Grainger taking form in his mind. His heart was going like a whirling ball in his bosom. Suddenly he remembered that he had left no way for the supposable burglar to enter the house. He opened the library window and went back. He could find his way about the room in the firelight. He went over to the window and opened it. He stopped by his cousin's desk. There was money there, he knew. Mallory was not a thief. He stood and reasoned the matter out in his mind. There must be some seeming motive for the murder, and robbery was the only one.

He must take the money; and then it was only taking his own. Did not the will lying there leave him his cousin's possessions?

He turned the key of the shiny old mahogany desk and rumpled the papers. He knew the money-drawer, but he purposely fumbled on his way to it, disordering everything.

Finally he turned to go. The firelight flickered on the pitiful heap that half-an-hour before had been a clever, well-bred old man. Mallory shut the door softly. He felt as though he were somebody else. He felt himself arranging a programme of life for the person who was himself and yet a stranger.

He remembered that there was a theory that all murderers were insane He went over in his mind the possible plea of insanity if he were discovered.

Discovered!

There came an awful quiver as he thought of the consequences. He determined to buy a bottle of prussic acid and carry it about with him for an emergency.

He moved heavily out into the court, closed the door that led into the house and locked it. Grainger came out of his little kitchen, letting a light fall on the damp bricks.

"What luck, sir?"

Mallory had a stupid feeling that he had learnt a part and was forgetting it, but he improvised on the moment. He seemed to himself to be standing behind this new person he had become, and directing him.

"Grainger," he said, and there was almost a note of patronage in his voice—the consciousness of being no longer a beggar was coming out—"we have done my cousin an injustice. He brought out his will and showed it to me. He has never disinherited me. That idea was the anger of a moment. He has asked me to come back home."

"I can have your room ready in five minutes, sir. It's good news you tell me. I always knew Mr. Dent had a good heart."

"I am going to-night," Mallory said hastily. "I told some friends I would meet them in the morning. Be careful, Grainger, that you tell no one that I was here. I have been in France, you know."

"Yes sir—yes sir. No danger of my telling."

Mallory had walked out into the night. The ragged clouds were scuttling across the sky, and the wind blew fresh and damp across his face. As he went down the avenue, boldly stepping out, he still had that sensation of irresponsibility, of moving a creature who was dear to him, and in his care, but not himself. There was no fighting horror of his deed in him. He wondered that more murders were not committed, it seemed so simple a thing.

Mallory in these months had lived a life of which there could be no possible trace. He had gone to a poor and cheap little hotel in the East-end, and had lived upon the proceeds of his jewels and his wardrobe and some money he had had from Grainger. When he emerged into life again he came up with the old greetings, in the old way. He had felt that he had always expected to do this. He went to town that night, and getting into a cab, was driven to the hotel where he had kept a room for years before his departure from his former life. The clerk was the same, and the servants about the office. They all knew him.

Digitized by Google

"Give me my old room, if you can, Harris," he said graciously, as he wrote his name down. "I'm rather seedy. I've been out in a yacht for two weeks, and my baggage is goodness only knows where."

"Been hunting, sir?"

"Something like that. Glad to get back."

The clerk laughed. He had heard that story before.

Mallory went up to his room. He wrote some letters, one to his tailor, telling him he was in his hunting clothes, and he must send him up something respectable at once. He took a pleased comfort in his bath, and in daintily arraying himself in the clothing that was sent into him. His mind lingered on the trifles of half-a-dozen suits of silk underwear that came in. They looked so soft and luxurious.

It was afternoon before he was presentable. He knew he was not likely to hear of his cousin's death until the evening, and felt that the time until then was his own to be merry in, and he meant to make the most it. He came into the dining-room at one o'clock for his luncheon, fresh and modish, and at ease. The waiter, who had received plenty of cash from him in tips, drew out the chair at his favourite table at the avenue window, and beamed an anticipatory welcome.

As he crossed the room he heard his name pronounced in a tone that was flattering.

He turned hastily to see Emily Mason, with her mother and her young brother at the table he was passing.

How daintily pretty Emily was! He had never noticed before how the hair grew about her face. And what an innocent, sweet, oval face it was.

They greeted him with frank delight. They were so glad to see him home again, and had missed him very much. They had run in for a day for shopping and the matinée—wouldn't he go with them?

He would; and he would have luncheon with them. He listened, smiling and delighted, to all the light talk of their day, that had been, and would be again, his day. He had grown tired of the theatre in the old times, but as he thought of the bright, happy crowd, and of sitting in a box at Emily Mason's side, he felt that life was sweet.

He went to the train with them after the theatre was over, and gave Emily a lingering hand clasp that brought the colour into her cheeks.

"I'll be down in a day or two," he said gaily, as the train started.

He went leisurely back to his dinner, still smiling—opened the evening paper, and faced the head-lines of his cousin's terrible murder.

The story was told with all the ghastly details which belong to that class of literature.

A mention was made of the dead man's heir, who was on his way home from France, not knowing of the disaster; and then the last line said that there was strong circumstancial evidence against John Grainger, the servant of Mr. Dent. It was also evident that the murderer had entered by the door, as the window had been opened from the inside by blood-stained fingers.

Mallory took the train that night for Middleton, the little country town where his cousin lay dead. His anxiety to get to Grainger and hear what he meant to tell of his own visit, was the paramount idea. It meant a great deal more to him now, than seeing his cousin had meant last night.

Grainger must know. How could he face him?

How could he expect Grainger not to tell? If he but mentioned his coming last night, any child could read the true story of the murder. How clumsy he had been!

And oh, how unnecessary it had all been! He drew his finger about inside his collar as though he were strangling.

Certainly Grainger would tell of his coming. Did he expect him for an instant not to? He started up. He must get off the train, go somewhere, where there was yet time. Already he saw perpetually before his eyes that black horror.

And then he thought of Emily Mason, and what she would think when she knew that he was a murderer—that he killed his cousin, the man who had taken him, an orphan lad, and treated him as a son.

And within a few hours he had leant over her chair, had eaten at the same table with her, and been light-hearted, and happy and gay.

He would offer Grainger half his fortune. There were clever lawyers. They would not let an innocent man be convicted of a crime. There must be dozens of ways of getting out of it, and he would compensate Grainger, he should not suffer.

It was a bright sunny morning when Mallory reached the little town, which was in a state of great excitement over the murder. Mr. Dent had been a prominent citizen, and to have him killed one day, and his long-absent heir come home from France the next, was a sensation that gave an excuse for almost a cessation of the ordinary routine of the day.

Mallory was surrounded with old friends and acquaintances as soon as he left the train.

He wanted to push everybody away, to cry out and ask where Grainger was, that he might get to him, but he had to stop and receive condolences and make arrangements.

He emphatically declared to everyone his belief in Grainger's innocence, and as soon as possible made his way to the county gaol where he was confined. He found him sitting on the side of his bed, sad-faced and downcast.

Mallory fairly pushed himself ahead, he so dreaded the coming reproaches. Old Grainger loved him, but he knew that there was nothing that could stifle truth when it came to a matter between man and man. The old butler had a principle which never faltered.

Mallory felt himself cringe as he went in. Grainger sprang to his feet with a laugh of joy and relief. There were tears in his eyes, and his hands trembled greatly as he put them about Mallory.

"I knew you'd come, Mr. Mallory, just as soon as you heard. To think o' them thinkin' I'd harm Mr. Dent, that I've lived with all these years, that I've been taking care of like as if he'd been a baby!"

"Of course you didn't. Nobody believes you did, Grainger. The idiots who put you in here shall be made to pay for it. I'll have you out in a few hours."

"I can't think who could a' done it," Grainger said, his brow wrinkling. "Some tramp must have come along and seen his light and the open desk."

Mallory's heart beat with relief and nervous apprehension. It was so plain, yet evidently Grainger had not yet connected him with the crime. When would he begin to do so? The instant he began to put two and two together he would see.

"They asked me if there had been anybody there that evening," Grainger went on, "and I told them no. There wasn't anybody there but you, sir, and there wasn't any use of bringin' that in, and telling the family troubles we'd had and that nobody had known all this time."

Digitized by Google

Mallory found that it was not so easy a matter to release Grainger as he had supposed. Murder was not a bailable charge. His spirits rose again as he found that Grainger had not suspected him, and that there was no danger of his giving the clue to others. He felt almost as though he had not done the deed. He himself, this present personality, would never have been guilty of such a dreadful thing.

He went to his cousin's funeral, although he had not looked at the dead face, and felt sorry and unhappy in almost a normal way. The letters that came to him from old friends pleased him. He had been without sympathy all these months, and was inclined to value even the most perfunctory show of it.

The little note that Emily Mason sent he read over and over, and then put away in his pocket. He saw a great deal of her in the next few weeks. He rode and drove with her constantly. He did not stay at the old house, but had the whole interior torn out and remodelled. The room where his cousin had been killed he had torn entirely away.

The great lawyers that he had brought down to attend to Grainger's case all declared that there was no doubt of a complete acquittal. A man could not be convicted upon such flimsy evidence. And Mallory went on living his life, feeling that he was two selves, one the honest, upright man, generous, kind-hearted, whom Emily Mason knew and loved, and who was working and spending money to aid the old servant whose innocence he believed in, and the other that hidden self who sat sinister, yet ashamed, and prompted the other man in his part.

Sometimes he wondered if he would ever become possessed by a demon and confess. Men had done such things. And then one day he wondered if his children would inherit the tendency that had made him a murderer.

As the trial drew near he became hollow-eyed and nervous. Under all that questioning, something must come out, he felt that would show the world the true state of affairs. Let them but get the least clue, and the whole story was inevitable.

In his grief and despair one night, hungering for sympathy, and seeing it ready for him in her eyes, he had told Emily Mason that he loved her, and she had promised to marry him within a few weeks. He felt it another safe-guard against detection. He felt he was taking a hostage from fate. A kind Providence would not allow the happiness of a true, good woman like Emily Mason to be blasted.

Grainger, conscious of innocence, reassured by his lawyers, was cheerful and almost care-free. Mallory laid plans with him that he was to take charge of their house with a staff of servants of his own choosing, during his and Emily's long stay abroad after their marriage, which was to be celebrated in a fortnight or so. When they returned Grainger was still to have the chief place as director of household affairs.

Emily often came to see him, but never without Mallory. He told her that he did not care to have her go to the prison alone. He felt a horrible fear that she would discover the truth.

The trial opened with little excitement. Mallory attended the first day but as he was not called as witness, he did not go again. Everyone knew that he considered Grainger innocent, and it seemed likely to be only a short matter.

When he reached his room, after a long ride with Emily on the third day, he found the great lawyer sitting at the table.

"Mr. Dent," he said, "I've an astonishing piece of news for you. The jury without leaving their seats, brought in a verdict of murder in the first degree."

"What!" Mallory shouted, shaking the heavy man by the shoulder. "Convict an innocent man——"

"I know he is an innocent man," the lawyer said gravely. "As innocent a man as you are."

* * * *

Mallory had gone to the prison and said good-bye to Grainger, who had begged that the wedding should not be postponed. He would die happier, knowing that Mr. Mallory and Miss Emily were together.

The church was full of friends, as Emily walked down the aisle upon her father's arm to the sound of the wedding music.

The clergyman came forward in his white robes, as Mallory, ashy, shaking, took Emily's hand in his—in a double murderer's hand he thought.

As the clergyman began in his solemn voice, he wondered if it were he who would go from here to sustain Grainger to the gallows where he was going to die for him—Grainger, the kind old man, who had made his boyhood a happy one.

The service went on:

"I require and charge you both, as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, that if either of you know any impediment why ye may not be lawfully joined together in matrimony, ye do now confess it."

Mallory gave an awful cry, and throwing Emily's hand from him, turned and ran down the aisle like a madman.

People rose in their seats, and there were startled outcries, but he ran on, out of the door, hatless, the wind blowing his hair over his forehead, the white flower in his coat swinging on its stem as it slipped down.

On, on to the prison!

He must stop it, at any cost. What was he, that he should dare do this thing?

The people were gathered round the gaol. Mallory tore through the outer court, and was stopped by the guard at the door into the yard where the gallows stood.

"Let me by," Mallory shouted. "You know me. I must get out there."

"Stop! Stop!" he shouted, waving his arms wildly. "He didn't do it. I did it! I am the murderer!"

* * * * *

"Mr. Mallory, Mr. Mallory, for Heaven's sake, wake up! You must be dreamin' something terrible. Eat some supper."

Mallory opened his eyes and stared about the little kitchen. The kidneys were covered on the range.

He stared at Grainger, not hopeless and helpless and bound, but rosy and good-natured, pressing food upon him. He rubbed his eyes and laughed foolishly.

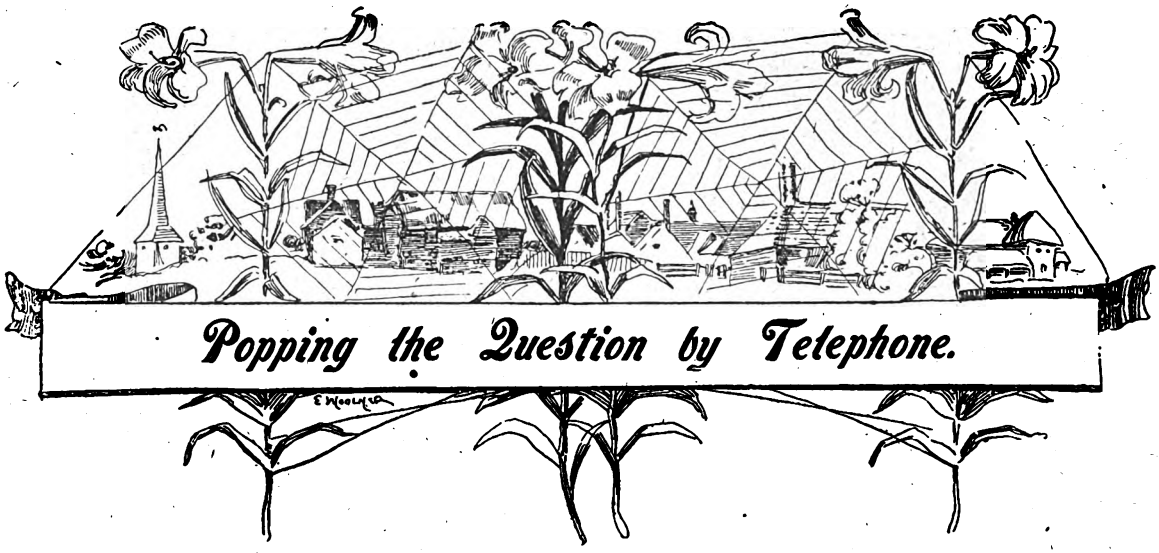
"I think I will have some supper before I go," he said.

An hour later, as he walked down the avenue, the cold rain in his face, he stopped again at his cousin's window, and saw him there, reading—reading, the green light on his bony old face.

He looked long, as though it were a precious sight, and then he thanked God, and went on.

M. Merriton.

Digitized by Google



Popping the Question by Telephone.

I.

ARTHUR WINGFIELD was a very desirable young fellow from all points of view. He was in a City office; his salary was good for a youngster of twenty-four; his future prospects were bright; he enjoyed the confidence of his employers; and of five clerks he was the head. He handled the petty cash, and banked the firm's receipts. He drew out the quarterly balance-sheet of the firm, and therefore knew, as well as his employers, how matters of business stood.

Mr. Philpotts, the senior partner of Messrs. Philpotts and Leslie, merchants, Hannen Road, City, was getting on in years. His nearest living relative, Eric Philpotts, was a scapegrace nephew, an indolent, but good-looking youth of nineteen. He had been to Eton, and had had grounded in him what was in all respects a scholastic training, falling within short distance of a University education, but somehow, Eric, to use his own slang expression, "couldn't cotton to City work," and so by degrees he lost the confidence of his uncle, of the firm, until at length matters came to such a crisis that old Mr. Philpotts had perforce to dismiss him from the service of the office. Up to then he had been second clerk. But Eric was his uncle's heir, and not another living creature was there to rightly come between him and his uncle's vast wealth. But whatever Mr. Philpotts might do with the disposal of his own private property, either by leaving it to Eric, or to strangers, or to charities, it was clear that Eric's chance of succeeding to a position in the firm was now lost to him for ever.

Old Mr. Philpotts (he was known in the City as "Old Phil") was in an unusually merry mood one morning, and so after the early morning's business preliminaries were gone through and Wingfield had received instructions for the day, the head of the firm, standing with his back to the fireplace, put the question bluntly to Mr. Wingfield:

"Are you engaged to be married yet, Arthur?"

"Well, sir," stammered Arthur, "I cannot say that I am, although I am particularly friendly with a charming young lady."

"Why are you hesitating to pop the question? Are you afraid to marry on £250 a year?"

"Oh, no, sir; it isn't that at all," replied young Wingfield, colouring red in the face, for he was a bashful young man.

"Then, what is it?"

"I am afraid it is because I cannot summon up sufficient courage to ask her."

Mr. Philpotts smiled.

"I see—I see. It is only a question of time and opportunity," he said.

"I confess I have had both, but I have let them slip from me."

"Do you mean to say that she has fixed her affections elsewhere?" asked the chief with surprise.

"Oh, no! Alice Fortescue is not the kind of girl to throw me overboard. By that I mean to say that although we have often been together quite alone, I have somehow always felt a sort of repelling influence drawing me away from the main issue just when I have neared the crucial moment."

"What kind of girl is Miss Fortescue?"

"A dear, true-hearted, generous——"

"I don't mean by poetical inference," interrupted the chief, with a smile curling about his lips. "I can, of course, quite understand that you think her the brightest and best in the world. But who is she? What is she?"

"She is a stenographer at Luddigates and Simmons, Old Broad Street. We both live at Dalston and we come up to the City every morning——"

"And return at night, I suppose, and probably meet for lunch every day," added the chief, "and yet, like the point of a steel pen, you are extremely fine in your devotion, but divided on the question of coming up to the scratch. I sincerely sympathise with you, Arthur. But the only thing for you to do is to wait until Miss Fortescue proposes, which the young lady is bound to do, and pretty soon, too, I should imagine. I shall be glad when the happy day is fixed for many reasons. In the first place, every young man filling a position of trust ought to marry, for the fetters of wedlock put restraint upon him. Again, certain changes have taken place in the office, in consequence of which more responsibility has been thrown upon your shoulders."

Digitized by Google

Thus expiating on the necessity of marriage, regarding it in every light as the chastening influence in the character of men, Mr. Philpotts walked up and down the room. He stopped suddenly.

"I am anxious to see you settled, Arthur. Mr. Leslie is thinking of retiring. I cannot last out much longer; that is to say, I, too should like soon to retire, hence Mr. Leslie and I are discussing the question of admitting you into partnership next year."

Mr. Wingfield was, of course, fairly and rightly staggered at this piece of good news.

His presence just then being required in the outer office, he withdrew from Mr. Philpott's private sanctum.

"I'll settle this business myself," thought the old gentleman. "I'll get Luddigates to lunch with me, and make arrangements—or I should say scheme them—for the early union of Miss Fortescue and Arthur. He is madly in love with her," saying which he walked over to the telephone and rung up No 1898, Bank.

"Are you there? Are you Luddigates and Simmons? Thank you. Who are you? Miss Fortescue, did you say? Ah, yes. Beautiful day, isn't it? Been away for your holidays, haven't you? Er—well—er—is Mr. Luddigates in? Ask him to come to the telephone, please, will you? I say, Luddigates, is that you? I'm Philpotts. Lunch with me to-day—usual place—want to see you particularly. Don't bother about him; it'll do to-morrow. Send him a wire, or telephone him, that you can't come. But you must come, my friend; something important. Thanks—yes—thanks. I'll be there at 1.30. Good-bye."

II.

Mr. Luddigates was sitting alone in his private office—a white-haired gentleman, with a fresh complexion and a kindly blue eye. He rang his bell, and presently here glided into his office, from an outer one, with book and pencil in her hand, a fair-haired girl of about twenty. Her face was perhaps pale, but she had a nice complexion, the beauty of which was added to by a pair of sparkling dark blue eyes. She was an extremely comely girl, of very persuasive manners, and was considered an unusually attractive young lady.

"I want to give you a few letters, Miss Fortescue." The girl sat down in her usual place close to Mr. Luddigates' desk, and "took down" about a dozen letters.

"Just one more, miss. Messrs. Philpotts and Leslie——"

The girl looked up blushing scarlet, and then bent her head down again.

"'My dear Philpotts,'" began Mr. Luddigates, "'I am grieved to hear of your determination not to stand for election for your ward, but if, as you tell me in your letter, the only reason is your age and the lack of supreme energy which accompanies one's every advancing year, perhaps there is ground for your supporters excusing you. I hear that our mutual friend, Leslie, is retiring. But I suppose you have still young Mr. Wingfield, a very promising young fellow, but as he remains unmarried, I should hesitate about doing that which you contemplate, at all events for the present. You tell me he is to be married soon. That's much better. As you have chatted with his young lady, you will, of course, know what she is like. Owing to the coming changes in the composition of the firm I can understand your anxiety respecting the solid position of your head clerk. Dine with me on Monday evening at my club, if you care to!'"

Miss Fortescue felt quite ill as she retired to her own desk in the outer office. Her eyes almost danced out of her head. Everything about her was a blank. Her head swam; she was dizzy, hysterical. She hurried to the telephone box, which was in a third office, shut herself up in it, and rang up the Exchange furiously.

"Put me on 17,310 Bank," she called to the Exchange, with a pronounced tremor in her voice.

"Is that you, Arthur?"

"Yes—is that Alice?"

"Yes. Oh, Arthur, is it true—tell me, quick?"

"Is what true, darling? What's the matter?"

"Why—there's something wrong somewhere, isn't there?"

"There was a false alarm of fire here an hour ago. Don't be alarmed, dearest. I'm quite safe. The engines have gone."

"Oh, I don't mean that—but fancy your having a fire! How dreadful! I've rung you up about something else."

"Can't you go to-night? Don't bother, then, darling. I can get the tickets changed."

"You don't understand, Arthur. Mr. L. has just dictated a letter to your Mr. Philpotts, and your name is mentioned in it, and my heart is breaking."

"What does the old rascal say?"

"Why, that you're engaged to be married—but you are not, are you, dearest? Say no."

"I cannot say no. Are you there? Alice, are you there? Don't go away. I cannot say no. Am I not engaged to you?"

"To me, Arthur?"

"Of course, dearest. Isn't that so? But when is the day to be, Alice?"

"Oh! Arthur."

"Are you there? When is the day to be?"

"I'm taking my holidays next month—August 15th—but, Arthur, this is too——"

"I have just fixed mine with the governor for August 15th, too. How lucky! Shall we say then, my love?"

"Have you finished?" called out the Exchange operator.

They had.

Mulvy Ouseley.

Ethel: "Why did you dismiss Mr. Goodheart?"

Blanche: "Oh, he got so he'd rather sit at home and hold my hand than take me to the theatre."

"Your father doesn't know anything about artillery, does he?" he asked, apropos of nothing in particular.

"Not exactly," she replied, looking at the clock, "but on occasions I've known his boot to make a first-class substitute for a quick-firing gun."

However, he didn't wait to test it.

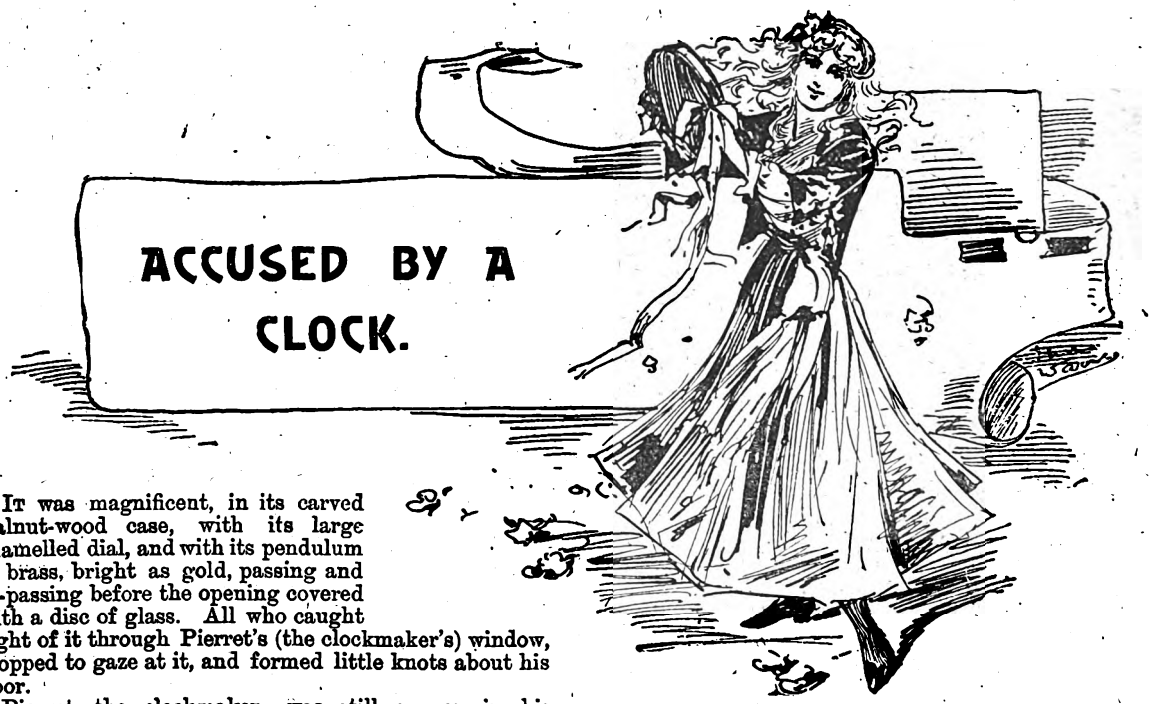
Miss Ethel: "Mr. Bloomer called upon you night before last."

Miss Clara: "Yes; he is delightful. But he stayed so late."

Miss Ethel (with a slight cough): "Yes, he told me that it was twelve o'clock before he could get away."

Digitized by Google

ACCUSED BY A CLOCK.



It was magnificent, in its carved walnut-wood case, with its large enamelled dial, and with its pendulum of brass, bright as gold, passing and re-passing before the opening covered with a disc of glass. All who caught sight of it through Pierret's (the clockmaker's) window, stopped to gaze at it, and formed little knots about his door.

Pierret, the clockmaker, was still a man in his thirties; but nevertheless, he was inclined to sadness, and not at all talkative.

He had known a great sorrow.

Seven years before, while he was serving in the army, his father had been murdered—in this very shop now occupied by him.

Who was the assassin?

On whom could he avenge the old man, who had never done harm to anybody, and who had been so kind to him.

Justice had failed to lay hand upon the murderer and robber, who had carried off four thousand pounds, saved sou by sou by the father for his son.

All researches had been fruitless. Pierret had finished his time of service in the army, and, as soon as he was free, had returned and established himself in the murdered man's shop, determined, doubtless, to drive away care by labour.

But it was clear that sorrow was gnawing at his heart.

At nightfall he was seen wandering about the village as if in search of somebody, that somebody being, surely, the criminal.

Time passed—weeks, months, years. The murder was forgotten by all save the orphan and the—other, who could not but remember it.

Quite recently Pierret had gone to Paris and remained there several days making purchases, bringing back with him the magnificent clock, which set everybody who saw it longing to possess it.

"Come in, gentlemen," said Pierret to the admiring groups who pressed closely about his shop window.

"What is the price of it?"

"One hundred crowns."

"Does it strike?"

"Certainly. Listen!"

The clockmaker caused the bell to sound—clear, sonorous, silvery.

"But nobody will buy it," said Pierret. "I am afraid I have done a foolish thing in bringing it from Paris."

"Oh, that depends, Pierret! We are not rich enough, but there is somebody here——"

"Really! whom?"

"Eh? Locard, good-looking Locard! who is going to marry, and who doesn't mind what he spends."

"If you would not mind putting in a word for me——"

"With pleasure; and—who knows?—by touching him on the side of his vanity——"

"You would be doing me a great service."

Jacques Locard was not very much liked, and that for several reasons. In the first place he had made his fortune too suddenly. It had come to him from the clouds, by the intermediary of a notary—oh! not of this village, but of a long way off, over the mountains—an inheritance which had at once put him at his ease, and, he had increased this by dabbling in business.

For all that, he was close-fisted, spoke in a loud voice swaggered in the street, drank heavily, and had a following. When anybody wanted to unloosen his purse strings for a bowl of punch or a bottle of champagne, they knew on which side to deal with him. A man like him!—the king of the country! He wagged his head, and allowed himself to be taken in.

The thing, however, was not so easy as it had at first seemed to be. When the name of Pierret was pronounced before Locard, it evidently produced an unpleasant effect on that person's nerves. He disliked Pierret, that was clear. Well, everybody is free to like or dislike, according to his impressions, is he not Pierret, a pettifogger, an idler! No, no! he was not that; but even if he were, what had that to do with the greatest wonder that had ever been seen in the place? Besides, it cost nothing to look at it.

While talking, Locard had drunk a good deal. He began to get warm, saying "Yes," saying "No," and finally consenting to stroll as far as the clockmaker's shop, then withdrawing his consent.

Digitized by Google

"Why, anyone would say you are afraid to go to Pierret's——"

"Afraid? I? What do I care for Pierret? Come on."

The little watchmaker was at his bench, his magnifying glass in his right eye, bending over the works of a watch. Certainly he was not looking at anything that was going on outside his shop, yet he saw, very plainly observed, the approaching group, and something very much like a smile might have been seen to play about his lips as he did so. He hoped for a customer, and to a poor tradesman that must always be a pleasant feeling, must it not? Oh, doubtless. But of all possible customers Pierret hoped for one; and that one was now at the door.

Locard entered.

"Is that it?" he said contemptuously.

Pierret rose politely. Locard turned his back upon him—from hauteur evidently. In short he immediately agreed to give the twelve pounds, and threw down a five pound note on account, on condition that the clock should be that same evening installed in his dining-room at his house.

Who did not know Locard's house? In less than an hour the clock should be there.

"This evening, friends," cried Locard (of course he did not include Pierret), "we'll drink to my new piece of furniture!"

"At what hour?"

"Nine o'clock."

As soon as Pierret found himself quite alone, he burnt the bank-note in the flame of a candle. Then he went into the room behind the shop, and took up a small box, on which there were English labels pasted. Returning, he opened the case of the clock—no doubt to regulate the movement.

Within the promised time it was placed—prominently placed—amid the rich furniture of Locard's dining-room.

Round the table—from which, point upwards, a goodly array of bottles stand—Locard and his old friends drink, laugh, and sing. Eleven o'clock—the silver bell records the hour. What a voice—a song rather! One could listen to it through the whole night. Midnight—the voice puts forth all its delightful power.

Attention! One! two! Light the punch! The flame flits, obl n-like, over the surface of the bowl lapping it with upthrown tongues of yellow and blue. The sugar frizzles. Now put out the lamp. Huzzah! Hush! the clock is going to strike.

No, it speaks.

"Jacques Locard! Jacques Locard!"

"Eh? Who spoke? Who said that?"

"Jacques Locard! Confess! confess!"

"Locard! Locard! What jest is this? How very pale you are!"

The voice sounds as if it came from the cellar.

"Jacques Locard, you are a murderer!"

"It is false! Who has dared to say that?"

"Jacques Locard, it is you who killed old Pierret! Assassin!"

There were cries, groans. Locard had risen to his feet—lost, mad! He clutches at his cravat to tear it from his strangled throat. The voice still pitilessly continues—veiled, distant, as if coming from a tomb. It repeats, repeats, repeats the word "assassin!"

Locard falls upon his knees, rises, falls again.

"I confess! I confess!" he cries. "Yes, it was I who killed the old man and robbed him; but let that horrible voice cease."

It did not stop, but went on repeating its dreadful denunciations with the persistency of a machine in motion.

"It is the clock that speaks!" screamed Locard, seizing it, shaking it, dragging it from its place, casting it upon the floor. The works were scattered, and in their midst was seen a small cylinder covered with metallic paper.

Pierret, who had heard all, sprang into the room through the open window, and seized Locard by the throat.

"You are all witnesses that this man is the murderer of my father!" he cried.

* * * * *

Murder will out; but men who take the lives of their fellow men for gain always think their cunning more than a match for proverbial wisdom. So thought Locard and had not seven years' impunity justified his estimate of his own cleverness? No; it had only put him off the guard which the murderer must never for a moment cease to keep. The police had utterly failed to track him down—had not even associated him in any way with the crime! yet there had been a detective at his heels, as he now saw with horror.

A few years in the army do one of two things—sharpen or deaden the wits of a soldier; they sharpened Pierret's. The failure of the police left in his mind a deep and bitter sense of disappointment. His father had been cruelly murdered and robbed, almost in the light of day—a kindly but undemonstrative man respected by all his old townsmen; who was never known to have made an enemy; who had many friends, Locard among the number. Who but one of his friends could have known that he had, by the merest accident of circumstances, the whole savings of his life in his possession that day, in view of an advantageous investment to be completed on the morrow that never came for him? No stranger could have known of this.

No stranger? That idea haunted Pierret's mind day and night and goaded him to action. Step by step he pushed on inquiry. Bit by bit he came upon the history of all his father's old friends and associates; and at length suspicion pointed to the sudden and vaguely explained uprising of Locard, nearly simultaneous with the old clockmaker's assassination. There was the murderer's false reckoning of chances; too eager for the enjoyment of his murder-stamped gold, he surprised his acquaintances by his ostentatious display of means; but Pierret he provoked to make inquiry as to their origin.

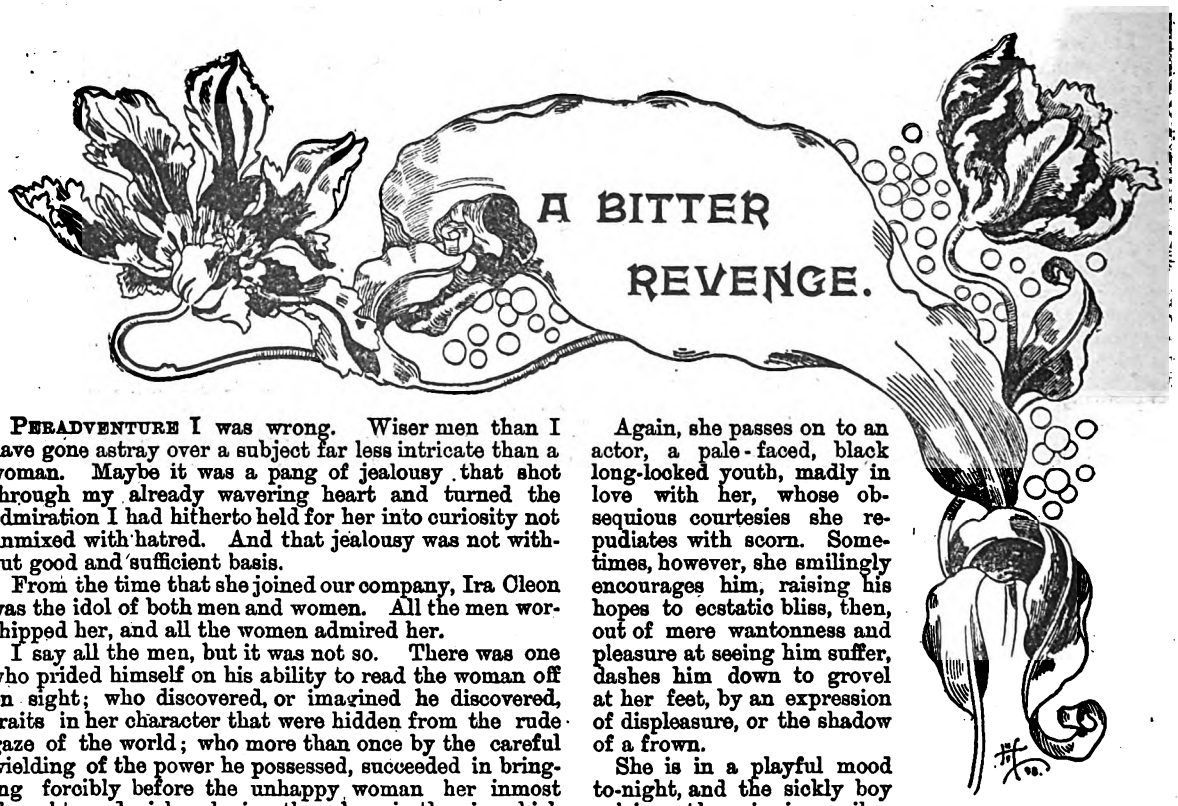
Still the proof, the legal proof, eluded the young man's search, though he had come close enough to it to satisfy the instinct of his heart; while the persistency which Locard, who had been an almost daily visitor at his father's house, avoided him was in itself a confession. It was at this stage of his search for justice that the idea of laying a trap for the criminal came into his mind.

* * * * *

"Gentlemen of the jury," said the prosecuting barrister, "you see here of what social utility is the progress of science. Was it not a trait of genius on the part of a poor clockmaker to have utilised, by adapting it to the mechanism of an ordinary clock, that immortal invention of Edison's, the phonograph?"

G. G.

Digitized by Google



PERADVENTURE I was wrong. Wiser men than I have gone astray over a subject far less intricate than a woman. Maybe it was a pang of jealousy that shot through my already wavering heart and turned the admiration I had hitherto held for her into curiosity not unmixed with hatred. And that jealousy was not without good and sufficient basis.

From the time that she joined our company, Ira Cleon was the idol of both men and women. All the men worshipped her, and all the women admired her.

I say all the men, but it was not so. There was one who prided himself on his ability to read the woman off on sight; who discovered, or imagined he discovered, traits in her character that were hidden from the rude gaze of the world; who more than once by the careful wielding of the power he possessed, succeeded in bringing forcibly before the unhappy woman her inmost thoughts and wishes, laying them bare in the air which surrounded her. I was that person.

Ira Cleon appeared amongst us when The Feud was about to be produced for the first time at Norman's Theatre. She came as leading lady. Our manager had picked her up in America, but she was not an American. She spoke several languages, but no one knew her history.

She was very beautiful, and I cannot do justice to a description of her. Yet with my blunt pen and dull wit I will make the attempt.

Her eyes were large, blue, and overhung with long silky lashes; her soft cheeks were tinged with the rosiest red; the full, rich lips, the pearly teeth, the short, curly hair, the white dimpled arms, the form of suppleness and grace—combine the whole with a strange union of masculine force and womanly sweetness, and you may be able to catch a glimpse of our lady through the misty and all too clumsy veil of prosaicness that I in my capacity have drawn round her beauty.

Thus, in such a form she is as near perfection as mortal woman could hope to be.

But, listen to her conversation, watch her stride, note the vile cigarette between those dainty lips, and hear in amazement the coarse jests that emanate from the small clouds of smoke that rise about her curly head.

Then you will, perhaps, get an insight into the character of this fair lady.

She rises from the box on which she has been sitting—carelessly, legs crossed—and strides over to the manager anxiously scanning a roll of manuscript. She claps him on the back with a loud "Ha! Ha!" that makes him start. It amuses her, but the oath that is on his lips is dispelled in a moment, for he knows full well she can give him back all that he is worth.

Again, she passes on to an actor, a pale-faced, black long-locked youth, madly in love with her, whose obsequious courtesies she repudiates with scorn. Sometimes, however, she smilingly encourages him, raising his hopes to ecstatic bliss, then, out of mere wantonness and pleasure at seeing him suffer, dashes him down to grovel at her feet, by an expression of displeasure, or the shadow of a frown.

She is in a playful mood to-night, and the sickly boy rejoices at her winning smiles, hoping against hope they are meant for him, and him alone.

"Ah, poor Turmole! she cried, nonchalantly, flinging aside the stump of her cigarette, and preparing a fresh weed. "You seem in good spirits to-night. Not quite so confoundedly groggy." And she laughs gaily as the gas jet, at which she obtains a light, radiates on the cruel, lovely face.

"'Tis but natural," comes the reply, with a dramatic flourish of the thin, white hand, "that I should feel the glamour of your presence, even as the world looks bright and cheerful beneath the warm and fruitful rays of King Sol."

"Then it's comforting to know I have a different effect upon you to what the moon has," she replies, with a slight dash of sarcasm, moving towards her next victim.

"Oh, pray, you misunderstand me," gasped the love-sick one, stretching out his hand supplicatingly after her in vain. He sinks back dejected, miserable, realising in its intensity the bitter fact that this woman he adores despises him.

And so she passes from one to another, treating them in much the same way, knowing all the time what pain and anguish she is causing the love-sick fools, and revelling in her heartlessness.

All the women admired her, too, even showing their appreciation of her talent by going so far as to beg a photograph of her in the costume of Prince Arthur.

She loved her profession; her whole heart was on the boards. She may have been good at the bottom; sometimes I almost fancy she was, and that I was too harsh in criticising her little excesses. More than once she told me I had no right to do so as a fellow actor.

Digitized by Google

"Let society be my judge," were her words; and society went mad over her, though beyond its kindly criticisms she cared nothing for society.

She always assumed male rôles, and few were able to bring out so fully and powerfully the features that characterise the stage hero.

There came a time, some months after she appeared amongst us, when the piece, which had met with a most successful run, was to be supplanted by another of an equally thrilling nature, the cast of which meant the addition of another member to the company.

This person took the form of a man named Ralph Masser, a tall, splendidly-built fellow, with a forcible and determined cast of countenance.

I shall never forget the night of the first rehearsal. How we all watched every movement of that lithe and muscular body, listened to the sound of that rich, deep voice, and applauded with genuine admiration as he stepped to the back of the stage at the conclusion.

I was near Ira as he finished, and she just clasped her hands in rapture, while a soft bravo! escaped her lips. Somehow or other I could not keep my eyes off her face, and I noticed that as she caught sight of him when he turned towards us, a deathly pallor overspread the features, while a gasp of amazement and terror issued from the white lips. No one else saw the little incident. It was soon over. But I am an observant man, and my suspicions were aroused. She must have known him before.

On one occasion I told her so. But she strenuously denied it. Then I became so positive that she admitted the truth of my assertion.

It so happened that Ira and the newcomer shared the honours of the celebrated duel scene in the new play. And she never acted so well as when with him, treating him with marked familiarity.

I watched them narrowly. No one else did; no one else had any reason for doing so. I had. True, every male actor in our company was madly jealous, but, after a time, resigned himself to fate, and gave up all hope of ever winning the love so palpably offered to another.

If tender actions may be taken as a sign of tender feelings in these matters, little doubt could be entertained as to whether or not the two loved.

He was ever by her side, whispering soft words to her willing ears, driving her to and from the theatre, championing her cause during her absence. She, too, laughed less often when he was near, never gave way to coarse jokes, accepted the little favours from him that she refused from others, and flushed slightly at his approach. These signs all came under my notice, and I had many opportunities of observing them.

Still, there seemed to me to be an occult something existing between them which it was impossible to unravel. They had reached a point in their love beyond which it appeared impossible to extend.

Once, at a morning rehearsal, I chanced to stumble unobserved into the green-room. There they sat, together, on a loung , her head resting on his shoulder. She was speaking, and as I turned to go, the words—

"My love, my only love!" fell upon my startled ears.

Then, as the days went by, her smile came less often, and the eyes became encircled with dark rings, her step was less sprightly than of old, while sometimes she became dazed and bewildered, losing all control of her movements and the thread of her discourse. The manager saw and noted all these developments for the worse in her disposition, and said that she studied too hard. No one could in common fairness gainsay that. She had worked hard ever since we had known her, and certainly a change would do her good. Rather than lose permanently so valuable a member of his company, he decided to finish up the run and send her off to America for a time with Masser. To this both agreed.

On the last night I was standing in the wings, awaiting my cue, when I heard them approaching. She was staggering slightly, with pale face and quivering body. He was supporting her. Some strange incident had taken place between them, of that I felt certain. When they got quite close to me she was better, though very white.

Ira went on first, and I had never seen her look more beautiful. The house fairly shook with rolls of applause, which burst out afresh as he entered from the opposite side.

With a small peaked cap set jauntily on the mass of golden curls, a light blue cloak hanging caressingly over her shoulders, and her shapely limbs encased in a pair of white breeches and top boots, our leading lady represented to perfection a champion of the age of chivalry.

By her side hung a small sword—a mere plaything—bright, glistening, and harmless. This she drew at the conclusion of a blusteringly delivered speech, and swung round her head, crying to the ruffian who stood before her:

"Defend yourself!"

With a well-practised, swift movement, his rapier leapt from its sheath, and steel clashed to steel.

How the people applauded! They were splendidly matched, these two, his six feet scarcely lifting him above her plume-covere l cap.

At last, as in all such battles, the hero, by a dexterous movement sent his opponent's sword springing across the greensward.

"Enough," she cried, holding her weapon aloft, then flinging it away with a gesture of contempt.

She approached him, and, as a hundred times before she had done, would have clasped his hand. But at that point she hesitated. A thrill seemed to pass over the delicate frame. The whole theatre was hushed in silence. A white hand was ungloved and thrust beneath the light-blue cloak. Another second, and Masser lay unconscious on the stage, while a thin blue ring of smoke curled unnoticed up and up till it vanished in air.

* * * * *

Masser was not mortally wounded; he recovered from the effects of his wound, and left the country before Ira came back to health and strength.

It was all explained a few months afterwards.

She was a Corsican, and had sworn to avenge her brother's death. Such was the issue of the battle between love and duty.

Masser had known her motive all the time; had known that she would attempt his life, sooner or later. And the strangest part of the whole thing was his connivance at it.

FRANK SYDENHAM.

A NUMBER of children were making a good deal of noise, and their mother, after rebuking them several times, at last said: "If I have to speak to you again I shall punish some of you."

At this the younger child rolled off the sofa, and, after gravely reflecting awhile, remarked: "Then, mamma, I'd advise you not to speak."

Digitized by Google

THE PEARSON IDEA

Is to give the public the most and the best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.

Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original introductions and notes.

It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

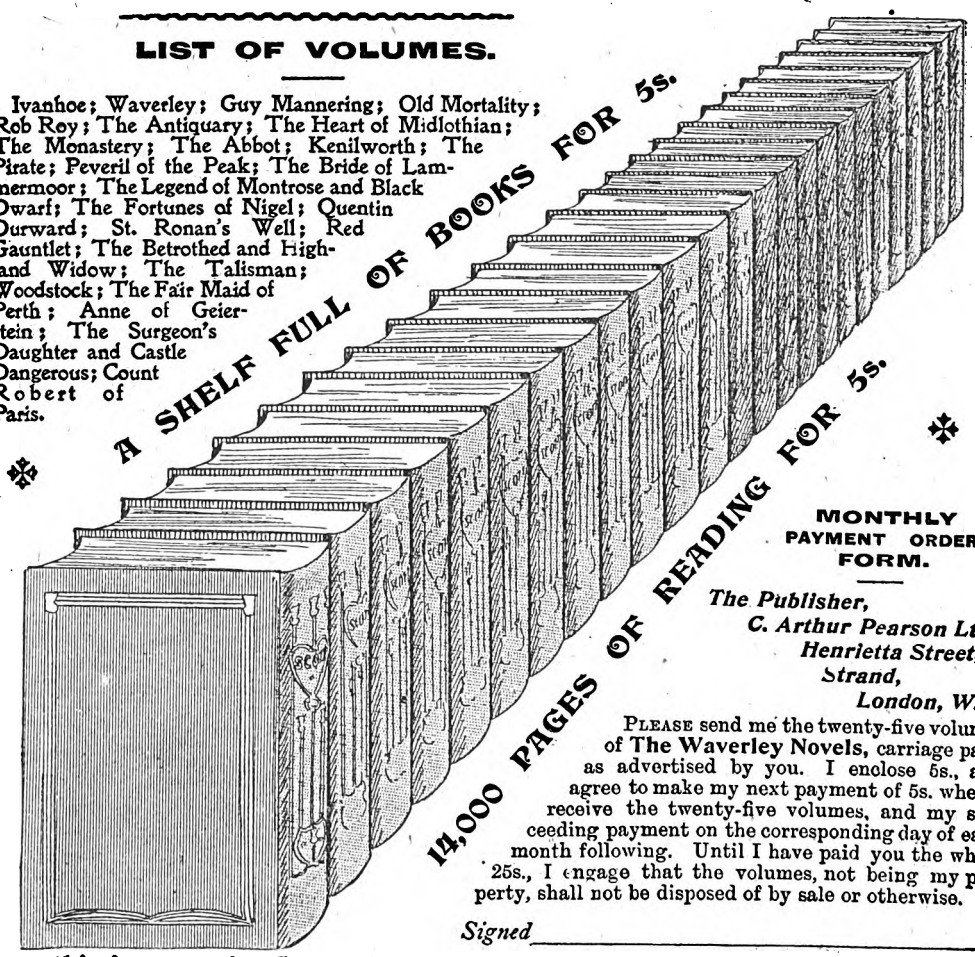
It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of Ivanhoe, or Flora Melvor of Waverley.

The Series consist of Twenty-five Volumes.

The cheapness, combined with the generous style of this series should render it an event to all lovers of class fiction, who ought certainly to find in it the edition of Scott which combines most advantages, including that of being the cheapest artistic edition ever published.

LIST OF VOLUMES.

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Anne of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.



All this is yours for 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

The Publisher,
C. Arthur Pearson Ltd.,
Henrietta Street,
Strand,
London, W.C.

Please send me the twenty-five volumes of The Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I enclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payment on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXVII.

England and the United States.

When Parliament met on the evening after the battle of Cardiff, it wore an aspect of serener dignity than its wont.

This was the only external sign of the elation born of the new turn in events.

The period of excitement had long passed away, and the popular Chamber no more had its moods. Representing truly the genius of the English people, the splendid calm of the House of Commons amid all the varying fortunes of the war, its phlegmatic pride, its stern attitude of quiet resolution, formed a striking example of the indomitable character of the Saxon people.

As day after day passed, each with its new and startling development, its record of heroism, its swift dramatic action, the House sat outwardly unmoved, betraying no emotion, grimly imperturbable.

To many who waited breathless in the galleries and witnessed the solemn scenes in which the great assembly received the daily reports of the Under-Secretary for War and, with scarce a word of discussion, rapidly passed measures of supreme importance and far-reaching consequences, it seemed as if history had unrolled itself, and a return to a period of national danger had produced anew an heroic type.

For the members of the House of Commons, faced by dangers so grave, made one by the overshadowing menace of ruin, had revived in themselves those stern Puritan virtues which have left so deep an impression on the character of England.

A meeting of the House was curiously like a meeting of that Long Parliament which sat through the Civil War.

There was the same inexorable purpose, the same equanimity, the same high moral temperament, the same majestic gravity—scarcely a ripple of emotion, scarcely a word of debate, scarcely a hint of disagreement—the House was in the truest sense a single and united body.

Even to the casual eye this fact became obvious. In the appearance of the Commons there was something novel that would have staggered a Rip Van Winkle of a month.

The Conservative party greatly outnumbered the Liberal, and the accommodation to the right of the Speaker was consequently very inadequate. Etiquette gave comfort to the Liberals and discomfort to the Conservatives. By tactic consent the term Unionist was dropped, as being no longer distinctive.

But a week or so before the great battle of Cardiff, Sir E. Ashmead Bartlett, coming into the Chamber whilst the First Lord of the Treasury was making an important statement, and seeing that there was not an unoccupied place upon his own side of the House, calmly walked across the floor to the thinner ranks of the Liberal party, and in a nonchalant manner took his seat upon the right of Mr. Haldane.

The incident—despite even the gravity of the moment—produced a little laughter and some applause. But the ultimate effect produced was extraordinary. It was felt that Sir Ellis's act had in it a touch of genius. Of what use etiquette of party when no party existed, or discomfort to the right when there was ease to the left?

Took his seat upon the right of Mr. Haldane.

And from that day, indifferent to points of custom, the members of the House proceeded to take their seats exactly where they found them. Liberal and Tory, Whig and Radical, Ulsterman and Nationalist were to be seen side by side as chance would have it, and for the first time in centuries the House of Commons presented externally no aspect of division or party.

Mr. John Burns was seen to slap General Goldsworthy on the back, whilst next to him Mr. T. P. O'Connor chatted amicably with Mr. Austen Chamberlain. A friendship which evoked much comment was that which suddenly sprang up between Tim Healy and the Serjeant-at-Arms.

Digitized by Google

"The whole Saxon race is against the rest of the world."

When Parliament met on the day succeeding the battle of Cardiff, there was no change in its attitude of dignified decorum. There was only a more crowded meeting and a subdued air of expectancy and unrest.

Amid deep silence, Mr. Balfour read to the house a communication received from the President of the United States, announcing the American declaration of war against the allies.

"This step," declared the message, "is taken with a full sense of the responsibility it involves. The American people have maintained their attitude of neutrality so long as hostilities appeared to be those of nation with nation. The intervention of Russia, however, transforms the war into a European conspiracy, in which the peace and prosperity of the whole world are involved. America regards it as a threat to the principles of liberty, and in so holy a cause she cannot hesitate. She will put forth her whole strength of wealth and courage, to assist England, and her armies, for the first time in history, are prepared to take the field—if not by choice in France, where old ties make such a step distasteful—at least in Germany, Russia, or any other country where joint deliberation may determine. The American people extend the hand of kinship and affection to the British nation, and are proud that the traditions of the great Saxon race are now to be defended and maintained by the peoples on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean."

It was in slow and impressive tones that Mr. Balfour read this telegram, and, as he concluded, he looked round upon the House and paused.

And then, in an instant, nobody knew how prompted or suggested, the whole House rose to its feet and uncovered. It was an act of welcome and gratitude to a new ally: an act more impressive than the most clamourous and turbulent demonstration.

Mr. Balfour then proceeded with his speech. He uttered an eloquent tribute to the generosity of the American people, and, in the name of Great Britain and Ireland, offered the thanks of the United Kingdom.

"There is no need, sir," he went on, turning to the Speaker, "to use extravagance of language, even at a supreme moment such as this, when our feelings are likely to over-balance our judgment. Let us look at this offer calmly and see what it means.

"Am I belittling it when I claim that it has not come at a moment of desperate need? The English armies are sore pressed, but they are unbeaten; they have swept their way into hostile countries and have not yielded a jot in the great scheme of invasion. Our fleets on all sides have vindicated the invincibility of England upon the seas. And it is my profound belief that, under the guidance and protection of Heaven, the British people would have forced their way to ultimate victory, alone and unaided though it be, against the three most powerful nations of Europe.

"Am I wrong in thus emphasising the proud belief in the destinies of Great Britain with which the humblest of her sons is animated—a belief in the eternal security of a nation which has, so far as human weakness permitted, based its acts upon the most sacred principles the world has known, the principles of liberty and of righteousness?"

There was applause at these words. Mr. Balfour continued:

"But the victory, let us confess, would be long delayed, lying, perhaps, far off in a dim and melancholy day, the passage to which would be filled with the groans of suffering, the lamentations of bereavement, the piteous cries of the fatherless and the widow; and stained, too, with misery, ruin, destruction, nay, even with famine and despair. This frightful passage we had entered upon without hesitation or misgiving, but let us be thankful that it is rendered shorter, lighter, easier to traverse, by the help and manly courage of another great people, the people who are of our own blood and lineage, who share our history, whose language is our own.

"Yes, sir, it is an alliance of which there should have been, could have been, no doubt whatever. It was ordered in Heaven. Nature herself called aloud for it; and if there interposed the mere chicanery of man, the interests of individuals, the narrow, selfish policy of ambition or of party, how futile and how powerless they have proved against the mighty and irresistible instinct of race, of family, of mutual blood! For America herself has risen in her strength and shaken off at a shrug the feeble manacles by which they sought to bind her; and over the ocean peals the great voice of our brethren, bearing a message of sympathy and help.

"Sir, is it unnatural? And am I right when I say that there could be no other issue of the desperate alliances amongst our foes?

"No; this is no mere struggle between one nation and another. As the American President has rightly said, there are deeper causes at work, there are principles fighting with each other, and in this stupendous contest seeking each the extermination of the other.

"This war means that the forces that have worked for selfishness, for aggrandisement, for slavery, for personal greed, are pitted against the forces that work for liberty, for progress, for peace. It is an old world fighting with a new; it is feudalism taking its last stand against democracy.

"Is the world to be the battleground of ambitious nations and cruel tyrannies; or is it to become a universal garden, smiling with peace, and ruled by temperate and beneficent wisdom?

Miss Lottie Collins .... appearing in the uniform of the Guards.

"That is the tremendous problem which this war is to solve. And solved it must be. It is a war of extermination; it is, in truth, the Final War.

"And, if this be so, how else can we regard it, save that if Europe attacks freedom and democracy, she attacks the peoples who support and maintain these principles, in a word, Britain and America, the entire Saxon race? The quarrel that Europe has with England she also has with the United States. America is our heir. If we passed away as an Empire in the death-throes of the fight, the splendid heritage that we have secured would descend in sacred trust to the United States, and it would henceforth be her mission to cherish, to guard, to protect it. That is why, surely, we had a right to expect the support of our brethren. The battle is once more between the West and the East; the whole Saxon race is against the rest of the world.

"It is our duty, then, the duty of the Briton, whether on this side or on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, to rally to the common cry, to overthrow the forces of evil arrayed against us, to demonstrate by might—as we are alas! compelled—our controlling power upon earth, and then with wisdom and benevolence to mete out the conditions of a new era, the golden era of peace, freedom and prosperity.

Digitized by Google

"One word more, sir. Let us not be too jubilant. The way is long yet, and dark and heavy with catastrophe. We are few against many. We strive with odds that threaten by sheer bulk to overawe and overwhelm us. America is rich in war and in resources, but her army is not yet formed.

"She has once more to create a splendid militia, such as that which, in the last war, won the admiration of the world. Let us, then, remember that a bitter struggle is still before us, that many a long day of sacrifice remains, and that there is need now as ever of the strong, patient heart of Great Britain to continue in endurance and in magnanimity."

Loud cheers greeted the conclusion of Mr. Balfour's great speech.

A few words of similar import were uttered by Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Dillon, and then a solemn and stately message of thanks to the people of America was framed and adopted.

If gravity and decorum prevailed in the House there was at least excitement without. Not the turbulent excitement that a sudden sensation causes, but a strong and passionate impulse of national pride.

This great people had been prepared to fight on and on single-handed, not in braggadocio or idle vaunting, but with the calm resolution of their self-contained nature. The sudden news that a kindred people had come forward to take their share of the struggle had filled the English nation with emotion, a grave, sober emotion, such as one man in deadly peril feels when another comes swift and silent to his aid.

Joy reigned on every face. For instinct was truer than argument, and every Englishman realised how absurd were the artificial barriers that sought to separate the two members of a great race.

England and America were not cousins, they were brothers. It was impossible that England should stand idly by and see America worsted. It was impossible that America should see England at bay before the world and be mute.

It was no alliance this. It was the reunion of one great family.

No less did the Americans in London feel the thrill of this new emotion. There were a thousand touching scenes in which the bond of union was manifested, as though it were the meeting of brothers after a long separation.

Fashionable London was present that night at Covent Garden Opera House. There had been no break in the continuity of pleasure. The imperturbable Englishman ordered his life as before, and although sorrow had closed many houses and there was ever present the sense of national calamity, still there was no such concession to the foe as would be implied in universal mourning.

The music-halls throve apace, and poets were busy on all hands in writing patriotic ballads which were set to music by inflamed composers. At the Tivoli Miss Marie Lloyd defied the allies every night at ten, and at the Palace Miss Lottie Collins created a sensation by appearing in the uniform of the Guards and singing a passionate song which told the world that:

When in their envy nations rise
And to each other call,
And coward-like in swift surprise
Upon Old England fall!
Roused in his wrath the Lion flies
And sweeps away them all.

Everywhere, on variety stage, in melodrama, from street band and hurdy-gurdy, pealed forth the strains of martial music, and life was made mournful to every earnest member of the Peace Society. Even Dan Leno linked his patter to patriotism, and no acrobat could leap from pole to pole without displaying upon his back the emphatic colours of the British ensign.

"Here, miss, a corpse reviver, please!"

On Friday night the management had announced Parsifal at Covent Garden. It was the first performance in England, for the copyright question had been settled and English prejudice no longer protested against a sacred work upon the decorous stage of the national Opera house. A huge and fashionable gathering had assembled, crowding every part, and the stage was filled with operatic stars of first magnitude.

It is to be feared that Wagner was little attended to that night. A constant buzz booming through the house plainly showed that the music of the future had less attractions than the politics of the present.

About ten o'clock it was observed that the curtains of the royal box were fluttering, and then, to the enthusiasm of all, the Prince and Princess of Wales appeared in the full view of the house.

The whole audience rose to their feet and cheered and cheered again, and the Prince, with smiles, bowed repeatedly, the Princess meantime standing at his side, her arm linked in his.

It was noticed, too, that the Prince's eyes were wandering over the boxes on the other side of the house as if in search of something, and then, as if satisfied, he withdrew abruptly and disappeared from view.

It was but for a few moments, however. What could express the delight and enthusiasm of the house when he was seen again in another box, bringing forward to the sight of all present no less a person than the American Ambassador.

There are some supreme moments when in mere vociferation the whole moral feeling of a people exhaust themselves. This was one. The two who stood there, the Prince and the simple American citizen, the heir to the proudest of thrones and the commoner of the greatest of democracies, were true symbols of the great event that had happened, the reunion of the old and the new England.

"Mr. Smith," said the Prince with a warmth that knew nothing of courtly ceremony, "your name is a fit one indeed for a representative of your country. We recognise her chivalry, and I thank you in the name of Britons throughout the world."

"Sir," answered the ambassador simply, "we are all Britons. America, I assure you, is prouder to-day when she shares your peril than when in the beginning she claimed her independence."

There was an opportunity for but few words, for the excitement in the House was not to be allayed. It was impossible to follow the tortuous passage of Wagnerian phrases through the entanglements of bewildering orchestration. Already the audience began to rise and move about, to gather its wraps, and to discuss with animation the dramatic scene they had witnessed.

The manager, with true tact, saw that the performance could not continue, and he ordered the curtain to fall. But a minute later it rose again. The entire company advanced to the front of the stage and sang, with a vigour and fulness which opera seldom knew, the National Anthem.

When the last strains died away there was a moment's pause, and then Madame Melba advancing started the American Anthem "Hail Columbia." The audience joined lustily in it, and the whole theatre rang with the simple refrain.

Digitized by Google

The audience flowed out to the buffets and there was an end to orderly speech. Everyone spoke to everyone else, and over a whisky and soda a reign of brotherhood began.

"I can't do much," said one of the crowd to his own circle of excited listners. "But blow me if I don't go in for American drinks. Here, miss, a corpse reviver, please!"

Never were the American bars so popular as through the next week or so. It was a tribute that the least might pay to a new ally!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The News the Spy Sent.

The people of England were now beginning to calm down to a grave appreciation of the dangers and difficulties of the war.

In the first wild days of public excitement, with their anger, their eagerness, their mad jubilation at the success of British arms, affairs had rushed forward in such a fierce and turbulent stream that a quiet survey of the situation was impossible and not to be expected.

But on the morning after the defeat of the Russian fleet by the United States force, the Times gave philosophical utterance to the national sentiment in its chief leading article.

"By the spontaneous action of our brothers across the Atlantic," said the great newspaper, "England and America now practically face the world in arms. The English-speaking race is called upon to fulfil its mission; to its hands are fully committed the future destinies of mankind. The duty to which we are devoted is noble yet awe-inspiring. We are no longer fighting a national quarrel, having become the trustees of human progress and civilisation.

"In this momentous struggle we represent the misgoverned and misled peoples of the Continent as completely as our own communities. When the stress and fury of combat shall have passed away our first consideration must be the claims of justice and tolerance and Christian charity. Let us pray for light and strength to guide and sustain us in our task."

These magnanimous words were directed by a kindly Providence.

By mysterious channels they found their way into France and Germany and far-off Russia. They planted fruitful seed in the hearts of the true patriots in those countries, and in due course they blossomed into a vigorous growth which largely dominated the arrangements for satisfactory and restful peace.

Puck exactly hit off the situation by its cartoon.

The Daily Chronicle, too, found cause in the situation to become contemplative. "Lest there be any misapprehension in the minds of sections of the English people regarding the attitude of the Liberal and Radical party," wrote the well-known organ of the Opposition, "it is our duty to finally and completely disavow all sympathy with what was once known as the Little England party.

"When our fleets are grappling with the navies of three powerful nations in all parts of the world, when our soldiers, in hundreds of thousands, are camped on the shores of Germany and France, when Australia is shaking off the wolves who would devour her, when our Indian army is tightening its accoutrements preparatory to invading Asiatic Russia, when the United States are impelled to cast in their lot with ours in the throes of this new epoch, it is no time to talk about Little England.

"The words in the past represented a policy, an honest endeavour to preserve the balance of power, a fair division of the yet unoccupied places of the earth's crust. To-day the mere jingle of the phrase is hurtful and ridiculous. We solemnly inter it. May it rest in peace."

Even Mr. Labouchere accepted the inevitable. "I can plainly see," growled Scrutator, "that the columns of Truth will be actively employed when this wretched business is finished in denouncing the grabbing and Maximising that will go on in Africa and Asia for a considerable time. Meanwhile it is not Grab but Holdfast that is a good dog, and I will bark with the loudest in this quarrel."

The Stock Exchange being closed, its members, such as were not actively engaged with the army, naturally had their little joke. They telegraphed to the chairman of the Wall Street Institution: "We welcome your fleet. Where are the excursion steamers?"

But the Americans got even with them. Soon the reply came: "Excursion steamers all engaged in protecting Cardiff."

The new policy of diplomatic openness, inaugurated by Mr. Chamberlain during the Transvaal crisis some years earlier, was now emulated by the United States Government with excellent effect.

Daily, almost hourly, messages were received at the American Embassy from State Departments at Washington, detailing the preparations for taking an active part in hostilities now being made all over the country; and these cheering items of news were immediately sent to the British Press.

Thus, one read: "Two army corps, of 100,000 men each, will be shipped from New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, in detachments of 20,000. They will each carry full complements of arms, horses, ammunition, and clothing, with large supplies of field stores, and may be expected to arrive

Digitized by Google

The coster was not a bad sort of fellow.

in England, or elsewhere as directed, between June 5th and 12th."

And again: "The first contributions of America's aid will consist of well-drilled troops, but a subsidiary army of 400,000 men is now being energetically mobilised. Volunteers are pouring into all the centres of enlistment."

Canada, too, had fulfilled her promises. Fifty thousand men were already at sea, shipped in every possible variety of steam vessel, and an equal number were preparing to embark when transports could be provided.

Puck, the famous New York weekly humourous journal, exactly hit off the situation, both political and social, by its cartoon, of which a small reproduction is here given.

England, by this time, had become one vast camp.

It was calculated by statisticians that the war expenditure by Great Britain alone exceeded two and a half millions sterling daily, while France and Germany were each piling up costs at the rate of a million sterling per diem.

Relatively the outlay of England was greater because she was maintaining fleets and armies at a distance from the base of supplies, but in every other sense it was impossible to estimate the tremendous losses the allies were suffering as the direct outcome of the campaign.

Cut off from their colonies, most of their warships sunk or captured, all their commercial marine swept off the seas, compelled to pay high prices for such American products as reached them—these now to cease entirely—the two great Continental nations had already received incalculable injuries, and were soon to undergo the loss of all save the commonest articles of food.

Trade, of course, was much disorganised in England, and almost at a standstill abroad.

But in this country the commercial stagnation was not so severely felt owing to the fact that the coal and iron and shipbuilding industries had never been so busy. In fact, owing to repeated representations from local authorities, Lord Wolseley directed Sir Redvers Buller to cease recruiting men from the great metallurgical and colliery districts, as the demand for labour was such that the urgent requirements of the Admiralty and private shipowners could not be met if skilled artisans and miners were taken away to swell the ranks of the army.

Some difficulty was experienced at first in dealing with the great number of prisoners of war, particularly Frenchmen taken at the capture of Havre and the battle of Yvetot, but this question was happily solved by sending them off in batches into the agricultural districts, where they earned food and money by useful work.

Indeed they settled down in their new quarters with suspicious ease for the most part.

It was in London, Birmingham, Manchester, Nottingham and other large towns not specially associated with the iron and coal trades that the total loss of the Continental market and the shrinkage of the export trades all round, caused a stoppage of employment which, under other circumstances, would have resulted in much misory and deprivation.

One of these birds being liberated at dawn.

But, as the direct outcome of the war, in which every Briton knew that he was fighting for his life, there sprang into existence a magnificent spirit of self-denial. Commencing individually, it gradually spread until it embraced all sections of society.

Every man was not content to have a sufficiency of food and raiment for himself and his family, but he deemed it a duty to see that his poorer neighbours were equally well provided for.

In London, for instance, the inhabitants of the West-End no longer held rigidly aloof from the people of Southwark or Poplar. It was necessary for the preservation of any that all should live, and when remunerative employment largely ceased, for the reasons already detailed, the Government started much needed public improvements, the rich spent as much money as they could afford in providing useful but otherwise unnecessary work, and public and private organisations took care that if man, woman, or child died through want of food or exposure it was absolutely the fault of individual ignorance or neglect.

During these brief weeks there was more practical Socialism to be seen in the internal economy of London and other important centres of population than had been dreamt or spoken of by philosophical reformers in as many centuries.

The general peril had caused the inhabitants of Clubland to realise that the coster was not a bad sort of fellow when you knew him, and the coster had been heard to declare that he never before believed "them bloomin' toffs had so much real good nater in 'em."

Marino . . . . accosted him.

Strange companionships these, it will be said, but a forest fire has produced stranger, and what belt of woodland ever blazed with such a flame as now lit up the Continent from Gibraltar to St. Petersburg?

It was a time of trial, of development, and of great achievement for England. The national character came through the ordeal purified and ennobled.

Public curiosity had been aroused by several paragraphs that had appeared in the press concerning Mr. Thompson, the electrical engineer, who was somewhat inconsequently dubbed "the Prince of Wales' inventor." But Mr. Thompson was adamant in his refusal to give information as to the nature or scope of his invention. All he would say was that it would be found valuable when the right time came.

The Prince, the Commander-in-Chief, and many distinguished officers had expressed their full confidence in its efficiency, and the troopers would require little previous instruction before using it with deadly effect.

Thus far were the reporters able to travel in their quest for this interesting news item, but the secret might have leaked out had not Lord Wolseley sent round a polite note to the newsagencies asking that no further comment might be made upon Mr. Thompson's work, as it might prove injurious to the national cause.

This was sufficient.

But it did not suffice for a certain quiet-looking person, who said he was an Italian, but was really a native of the South of France, who rented a top floor in Soho, and whose daily avocation was that of a waiter in a restaurant.

The man was far from servile or common-place in his appearance, but he discharged his duties efficiently enough and was never wearied in discussing the details of the war with customers.

Digitized by Google

He was so eager to ascertain the progress of events that he took home with him each night all the newspapers he could lay hands on, and the authorities would have been interested in his movements had they known that he wrote a précis of all he could learn in the smallest of handwritings upon the thinnest of papers, which was then folded very neatly, inserted in a quill and attached to a carrier pigeon, one of these bird being liberated at dawn every fourth day through a skylight in the man's lodgings.

As these pigeons flew to Boulogne, and as the messages they carried were forwarded to Paris without delay, it may be assumed that Pietro Marino was not his real name and that his ordinary profession had little to do with attending the beck and call of diners in a restaurant.

Marino, as he may be called, was very anxious to find out something tangible concerning Mr. Thompson's secret.

All the employés at work on the invention were fully aware of the importance of concealing their knowledge of its properties, but the spy determined that from one of them and by no other means should he get at the facts.

So he fell ill at the restaurant and had to obtain sick leave, which he devoted to stalking various individuals among the men as they left the factory placed at Mr. Thompson's disposal by the Government.

At last Marino chanced to follow three of the men into a public house, and over a glass of beer he heard the youngest of them complain of the dearness of good wines and delicacies which his sick wife required, but which he could not possibly afford to buy.

Him Marino followed and accosted as the mechanic was crossing Waterloo Bridge.

"You are employed at Mr. Thompson's electrical works?" he said, speaking in perfect English and coming straight to the point.

"Well, is that any business of yours?" said the Englishman, whose temper was not improved by the reflection that chickens and old port were impossible luxuries for a working man to buy during war-time.

"Yes, it is," replied Marino. "I believe Mr. Thompson has stolen my device, and I will give £50 to the man who enables me to prove it."

The man to whom he spoke was no fool. George Slater—that was his name—came to the conclusion that his interlocutor wanted to tempt him to no good purpose, and, notwithstanding his fluency, Slater believed him to be a foreigner.

"Fifty pounds is a lot of money to a poor man," he said.

The spy felt that his object was as good as gained.

"I will give you that sum now," he almost whispered, "if you will give me full particulars of the—of the article Mr. Thompson pretends to have invented."

Slater scratched his head as though in doubt, but he really required time for thought. At last he said cautiously:

"Let us go to a quiet hotel to get some paper and pens. I will then hand you all the information in full detail in return for the sum you name."

When employed in Lord Armstrong's works at Newcastle, the Englishman had once seen a new breech-action tested, of which the object was to enable dynamite cartridges to be used in small-bore weapons.

The result of the test was that several people, including the patentee, were severely injured by the bursting of the gun, and the guileless and easily-bribed Slater now proceeded to make drawings of this fine piece of mechanism with great care and accuracy, together with much written description.

"There," he said, when he had finished, "that's the complete idea. We're making thousands of 'em, and they'll give the French fits when we can arm our men with them."

The spy siezed the papers and eagerly examined them. "It is as I thought," he muttered in a fury, "this rascal has taken from me the labour of years. But I will be revenged on him yet. There is your money," he continued. "You have done a good evening's work."

"Yes, so have you," replied Slater laconically as he counted the notes, and found that there was, indeed, the amount named by his companion. "Now I must be off home to the missus."

The pair left the hotel coffee-room in which they had transacted their business, and separated at the door.

Marino hurried off to Soho, but he did not escape the earnest attention of Slater, who dogged his footsteps all the way, noted his residence, and then started to see a friend at Scotland Yard.

"If I thought that chap would make that breech-action himself, I would not bother any more about him, as he wouldn't have long to live," he said to himself, "but I'm blest if I don't think he's a spy. He was too quick to throw his fifties about."

Slater interviewed his acquaintance at the police headquarters, and then drove home in a cab laden with port wine jellies, soups, and chickens, all articles still to be easily acquired by those who could pay for them.

When he told his sick wife of the trick he had played on the foreigner she laughed so heartily that she already felt better. Marino had at least benefited one household by his enterprise.

He awoke . . . . to find himself in the clutches of two policemen.

It was late that night when he retired to rest, having copied all Slater's notes on to the thin slips of paper that alone were fitted to travel by so small an express.

When the quill was packed and sealed and securely fastened to the leg of the bird selected out of nearly thirty pigeons which he kept in an inner room, he set an alarm clock to wake him at 5.30 a.m., and then went to sleep, proudly conscious of having done a great service to the French Government.

But he woke somewhat suddenly at one a.m., to find himself in the clutches of two policemen, and for the summer months he was accommodated with quarters in Holloway.

The quill was opened and Marino's message read. A Foreign office clerk was found who wrote a hand curiously resembling that of the ex-waiter, so, with a fresh introduction, the description of the dynamite rifle was forwarded to France a day later, and so long as the supply of pigeons lasted the French War Office obtained some truly remarkable and veracious accounts of the sayings and doings of perfidious Albion.

(To be continued.)

THE PICTURE POST-CARD CRAZE.

THERE are, among the readers of Short Stories, a large number who are either collectors of the picture post-cards, that at the present moment are the craze in Germany, or they wish to become so. The Editor of Pearson's Weekly is in a position to help them. A gentleman is going out to the East, in the wake of the German Emperor, and will post to subscribers one prettily-illustrated post-card from each of the following towns, Venice, Athens, Constantinople, Cairo, and Jerusalem.

Each card bears a picture of the town from which it is posted. The subscription is three shillings for the set of five cards, and postal orders should be forwarded to the "Picture Post-card Editor," Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and the cards will in due course arrive at subscribers' residences.

It is necessary that subscriptions should be sent in at once, as the gentleman will not remain long in any one of the places mentioned above.

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up Estimates Free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Company, 186 Euston Road, London.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). Mgr., H. Myers.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS NON-INTOXICATING BEER

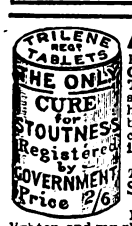
The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Miss HEYWOOD, 27 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13-st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS C. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

THE BEST HAIR DYE

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

10,000

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS AMOUNTING AT ORDINARY RETAIL PRICE TO £625,

Also £100 IN FREE MONEY PRIZES

WILL BE GIVEN AWAY

As follows:

1st Prize £50 To Competitor solving four or more of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.

2nd Prize £25 To Competitor solving three of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them

3rd Prize £15 To Competitor solving two of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.

4th Prize £10 To Competitor solving only one of the Puzzle words below correctly, or if more than one, then equally among them.

Having purchased the entire stock of a large Christmas Card Firm, at considerably less than half the original cost of production, as well as several other important lots at ridiculously low prices for cash, we have decided this year, for the first time, to deal direct with the Public instead of through the shopkeepers, and are making up monster packets (sold in the ordinary way for at least 3/6), containing one dozen choice assorted Christmas Cards, for 2/- per packet, Post Free to any address in the United Kingdom (Foreign Postage, 1/- extra). With each of these packets, by way of advertisement, we shall present gratis to every purchaser a most interesting, instructive, and amusing Christmas present. This article is sold retail at 1/3, and is in great demand for winter evenings.

In addition to this, the above £100 Free Cash Prizes will be given away amongst the competitors who can make out the correct names of one or more of the six stone fruits, which the following mixed letters will spell, viz.,

RRHYEC, EEEGGGANR, CHEAP, LUMP, TAPIOCR TARNICENE.

The only conditions Competitors have to comply with to qualify them to receive one of the above Christmas presents, and to compete for the Free Cash Prizes, are as follows: Send in your solutions, and enclose Postal Order for 2/- for our Monster Packet of Christmas Cards, together with stamped addressed envelope for sending your Prize Money at the close of the Competition. The packet of Cards, and the Christmas Present, will be sent upon receipt of your order, but the Prize Money will not be forwarded until a few days after the close of the Competition, which will positively be on Thursday, December 22nd, 1898. Competitors are advised to send in their orders without delay. Address: FINE ART COMPANY, 92A Isledon Road, Holloway, London.

Digitized by Google

NOTES OF INTEREST.

Result of Football Players' Competition will appear next week.

D. W.—One of the quickest possible ways of dispelling a nervous headache is to give some of the muscles—those of the legs for preference—something to do. Take a stiff walk, or a short bicycle ride if you can. Muscular exercise flushes the parts engaged, and so depletes the brain.

W. D.—The two biggest fire-engines in the world are in Liverpool. They are capable of throwing 1,800 gallons of water a minute, and a jet 140 feet high. You can realise the force with which the water is ejected when I tell you that the jet will kill a man at a distance of fifty feet.

M. A. T.—The "ingenious art of painting words and speaking to the eyes"—as the art of writing was called—was, according to an Egyptian legend, revealed to the god Thot and by him taught to King Thamos. The latter did not see the advantage of it; the young people had been taught orally and had to learn things by heart, and to render their studies easier by writing the wise things on papyrus or stone, so that they could "turn them up" when they liked, would have a bad effect. They didn't have a Royal Magazine for 3d. in those days.

S. O.—When the Soudan is properly developed, the quantity of corn that it will be possible to grow there will seriously affect the sale of American corn in this country. The soil will readily yield two heavy crops yearly. In 1878 the Soudan was as prosperous as it ever has been, but even then there were 150,000 square miles of arable land still uncultivated.

F. L.—Among the Swedish peasants the wedding festivity usually lasts several days, and some strange customs prevail. The bride's friends load her with all kinds of ornaments, which they hang round her neck, arms and ankles or place upon her dress, shoes, etc. It reads like a description of the marriage rite of some semi-civilised tribe to peruse an account of the struggle between the married and unmarried guests, the one side trying to prevent the bridegroom from taking possession of the bride and the other side assisting him in his efforts to seize her. The Swedish peasant rarely marries anyone from another parish than his own.

Luna.—When two pieces of cane sugar are rubbed quickly together, there is a slight but perfectly distinct flash of bluish-white light, which penetrates the substance far below the surface. If discs of loaf sugar be mounted on a lathe and a hammer be projected on the rotating surface, an almost continuous luminosity is obtained.

A Player asks: "What is the origin of the oval shape of a Rugby football?"——Football was played at Rugby School long before the indiarubber inflator was ever thought of, the bladder of an ox being used for the purpose. By inflating this gradually and rolling it for a considerable time on a smooth board while in a moist state, it attained an oval shape, and, as the bladder of an animal necessitated an outer covering or case of leather, that took the oval shape, too.

Birdie asks: "Where do the English swallows go for the winter?"——Some go to Rome, some to Nice and Monaco, some to Algiers and some to Egypt.

Ethel has been in the habit of keeping gold-fish for some time. Being of a tender-hearted disposition, she was very much perturbed the other day when a friend let fall a remark about the cruelty of keeping such pets. She therefore appeals to me to know what I think about it.——It certainly does seem as though there were some foundation for your friend's remark, for, according to an authority, half of such captives die from sheer want of rest. As fish have eyes so formed that they cannot endure the light, in a glass vessel they are in an entirely wrong place, as is evident from the way in which they dash about and go round and round until they are fairly worn out.

C. G.—The honour of inventing the first thermometer is claimed for three or four people, including Gallileo (about 1595) and Drebbel, a Dutchman (1609). Drebbel's instrument was a vertical glass tube with a bulb at the top and the lower end prolonged into a vessel containing water or some coloured fluid. When the bulb became warm, the expanded air drove back the water; when it cooled, the water rose again.

A. K.—The opinion has hitherto been that the majority of deaths have occurred during the early hours of the morning; that is, of course, deaths resulting from diseases. Dr. Riseri has, however, devoted some years to the investigation of this question, and states that most deaths occur during the afternoon, from two till seven. The idea that ailing people become very weak about four o'clock in the morning and were more likely to die at that time than any other, appears to be erroneous.

P. F. G. writes: "Most people know that the Russian Government blots out offending paragraphs in foreign journals or destroys those journals. But is there any instance of a book being seized in a foreign country—say in England—by the Russians?"——Well, they couldn't go to work quite in that style here, but they seem to have done the next best thing on one occasion. Some years ago, the celebrated Prince Kropotkin published a book in London concerning Russian prisons. A large edition was printed. That edition seems to have disappeared, even the author could not get a copy when he advertised for one a few months afterwards. He is of opinion that the agents of the Muscovite Government bought it up, which is very probable.

H. M.—A wasp is not exactly the kind of creature to make a pet of, one would think, but it all depends upon circumstances. Sir John Lubbock, whose study of these and similar insects is well-known, had a pet wasp once; he caught it in the Pyrenees, and succeeded in taming it. The creature used to take its meals out of his hand, and allow itself to be stroked. It was so great a pet that Sir John went to unusual trouble to prolong its life and was sincerely grieved when it died.

J. Y.—No; the poplin industry owes its origin to the immigration of the Huguenots after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The seat of the Irish poplin industry is Dublin. A century ago it was in such a flourishing condition that it was stated in the Irish Parliament that 11,000 persons were engaged in it; but in 1891 the number was less than 400. The trade is in the hands of the descendants of the Hugnenots, and very few outsiders are admitted. It is a cheap fabric, but there is now being made a white poplin of special kind that fetches £3 5s. a yard.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 1st, if intended for the Issue on sale Nov. 15th, and dated Nov. 19th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

DO YOU WANT

A £25 BICYCLE FOR NOTHING.

WE WILL PRESENT A BICYCLE FREE to EACH PURCHASER of a bottle of PETROLINE, the New Remedy for the Hair, who fills in correctly the missing letters in the following sentences relating to our PETROLINE.

1. P- - - - - - - E P- - - - - - S W- - - - - - S H- - R
2. D- - - - - - - - Y P- - - - - - - - E
3. D- - - - - - - - - - - - - Y R- - - - - - - - E
4. P- - - - - - S A- - - - - - - - - - N

PETROLINE, the NEW HAIR PRESERVATIVE,

Prevents waveless hair. It is decisively persuasive in its action, and the effect after use is distinguishably remarkable. Petroline promotes animalization, is free from Odour, not inflammable or injurious, and is invaluable for Dandruff, Scurf, etc.

THIS IS A GENUINE COMPETITION.

PERFECTLY FREE. NO ENTRANCE FEE.

What you have to do is: When you have found what you think are the (missing letters, write the words out on a sheet of paper, numbering them 1, 2, 3, 4, as above, and send same to us with a P.O. (not stamps) for 1/6 and stamped addressed envelope for results, and we will forward to you post free a bottle of PETROLINE, the New Hair Preserver. (Foreign orders, 3s., payable in London). We offer the above prizes to purchasers of our PETROLINE, in order to make this remarkable invention known to the public.

Remember, EACH ONE who correctly fills in the missing letters will receive a Beautiful Brand New £25 Gent's or £26 Lady's Windsor Cycle, fitted with the best pneumatic Unpuncturable Tyres. These machines are the very best sold by the Windsor Cycle Co. Ltd., of London, Glasgow, and Coventry, and cannot be bought for less than £16 16s. and £17 17s. cash respectively. All we ask you to do when you get the machine is that you pay the carriage on it. These elegant Cycles can be viewed at the Company's London Showrooms, 3 Great Turnstile, Holborn, W.C. As a guarantee, we print below a copy of the undertaking given us by the Windsor Cycle Co. Ltd. We are quite prepared to spend several thousand pounds on this scheme, as we believe it will do more to advertise our new Hair Preservative PETROLINE than if we were to spend this amount in newspaper advertising.

DO NOT DELAY, but send AT ONCE for a bottle of PETROLINE, and grasp this opportunity to win one of these beautiful Cycles. Write your name and full address very distinctly, and put the name of this paper on the top of your letter. Keep the number of your Postal Order in case it goes astray. This Competition will close on December 31st, 1898, on which date the correct solution, which has been sealed and deposited with the Fiction Press Agency Ltd., Crown Court, E.C., will be opened. Prizes will be awarded and results posted during the following week.

YOU CAN HAVE THE BICYCLE AT ONCE

before the Competition closes; full particulars regarding this will be sent you at the same time that you receive the bottle of PETROLINE.

COPY OF UNDERTAKING October 5th, 1898.

"We undertake to supply the Petroline Co. with whatever number of our best Ladies' and Gents' machines they may require during the next six months. "(Signed) for the Windsor Cycle Co. Ltd., 'The Manager.'"

Please address The PETROLINE CO., 39 GROSVENOR RD., HIGHBURY, LONDON.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vesicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

THE SALE NOW EXCEEDS SIX MILLION BOXES PER ANNUM.

Prepared only by the Proprietor, THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire, and sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere, in Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each. Full directions with each box. The 1s. 1½d. Box contains Fifty-six Pills.

BEECHAM'S MUSIC FOLIO

BEYOND CONTRADICTION BY FAR THE CHEAPEST AND BEST COLLECTION OF MUSIC YET PUBLISHED.

VOLUMES 13 AND 14 JUST ISSUED.

Beecham's Music Folio is lithographed from well-engraved plates on stout paper, and edited by an eminent professor of music, thus guaranteeing perfect accuracy. Each volume contains thirty different pieces of music, either old gems or some of the most popular songs of the day, some of which, being published at 2s., have been included at considerable cost. The songs have all the original symphonies and pianoforte accompaniments in full. A List of the Contents of each Volume may be had from most Booksellers, or from the Proprietor, post free.

The Volumes can be obtained from most Newsagents and Booksellers at TWOPENCE each, or will be sent, post free, for Threepence per Volume, from

THE PROPRIETOR OF BEECHAM'S PILLS, ST. HELENS, LANC.

Set of 14 Volumes post free for 2s. 10d.

Digitized by Google

£50 GOING BEGGING. DROP A POST-CARD FOR ONE.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 514. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 5TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

Good Appetite—Good Health.

How to Have a Good Appetite—how to have good Digestion—how to have good Assimilation—these are the cardinal points of successful Treatment of Debility or Ill-health. Ensure good Digestion by the use of Guy's Tonic and the good Appetite will come as a natural result, at regular intervals. This is because Guy's Tonic itself contains constituents of the Gastric or digestive juice, and that, furthermore, it possesses other properties which strengthen and invigorate the natural processes of Digestion, and which, among other things, enables the stomach to store up certain digestive ferments with which to digest future meals. In other words, the good Digestion of one meal helps to provide the wherewithal to digest the next, and this valuable preliminary digestion Guy's tonic enables to be done.

We Have Already Provided for two points out of three. Now as to the third. Assimilation means the conversion of digested food into Healthy Nerves, Flesh, Blood, and Strength—into Life, in fact.

Here Comes Into Play the beautiful recuperative and restorative powers of Guy's Tonic. It exerts a Vital influence for good upon the processes of the Body that make Flesh, Life, &c., from food, so that by its Tonic powers Guy's Tonic attains all three points required for successful Treatment of Disease. This is why Guy's Tonic does such a vast amount of good.

There is nothing haphazard or chance about it—the successful results are the gratifying outcome of the care, study and conscientious efforts to solve this difficult problem, and, as a matter of fact, Guy's Tonic was tested and watched in a West London physician's practice for years before it was offered for general sale. In other words, Guy's Tonic is a great success, because of its great merits.

"A Striking Illustration."

"5 Brunswick Terrace, Brunswick Road, Norwich.
"My Wife has been in delicate Health for some years, and was recently "attacked with Influenza, which left her very weak. I advised her to try a "bottle of Guy's Tonic. She now sleeps better, eats better, and is a living "Testimonial to your valuable medicine. "CHARLES T. MACE."

Guy's Tonic (now 1s. 1½d.), of all Chemists and Stores.

ALFOSCO Regd. — ALFOSCO Regd.

Allen Foster & Co

SOLE MAKERS OF

THE 'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES

The "Alfosco" Half-Guinea Costumes are recommended by thousands of delighted customers, who acknowledge them to be GREATLY SUPERIOR in MAKE, STYLE, and VALUE, to any costumes they have ever seen at anything approaching the same prices.

Design No. 455. 10/6

Design No. 455. 10/6.

BEAVER CAPE.

Design No. 69. 7/6

Design No. 69. 7/6.

A Great Bargain. The Cape for the Million. Price only 7/6, made in an excellent Beaver Cloth, with collar trimmed with extra wide real Mohair Chinchilla. Colours—Fawn, Brown, Green, Navy, and Black. Send for one. Securely packed, sent Parcel Post, 6d. extra. Our New Illustrated Sketch Book contains a number of the latest designs of Jackets and Capes. Sent post free on application.

Design No. 455. Half-a-Guinea.

Is a fashionable Costume for the Winter season. A wonderful costume for Half-a-Guinea. Made in the Allen Foster Specialite Serge. It consists of the stylish Reefer Jacket, with fashionably-made skirt. Costume Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6. Carriage paid, 6d. extra.

PATTERNS AND SKETCHES POST FREE.

Regular Stock Sizes of Costumes are 34, 36, and 38 inches round bust (under arms), the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 inches long in front. Large or Special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Each Costume securely packed, and sent by Parcel Post carriage paid, 6d. extra. Skirt only, 5d. extra. Please mention Short Stories.

NEW SKETCH BOOK OF FASHIONS, ORDER FORMS AND PATTERNS, POST FREE.

A Large Variety of Styles in our Famous Half-Guinea Indoor Costumes.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS BEER

NON-INTOXICATING

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 8d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

GOOD FELT HAT, Black, Navy, Brown or Grey. 2/6. Carriage 4d.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

are promptly sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and are made to look smart and yield faithful service.

TRIMMED HAT, as sketch, 5/11. Carriage 4d.

Model 984.

Exceedingly well-made and carefully finished Chesterfield Coat, and full-wide 10/6 Tailor Skirt. Price complete Costume, 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. Good quality.

Stylish blouse bodice and neat skirt. Bodice lined through, and made with prettily gathered 6/11 front and shaped belt, as sketch. Lengths and Prices:

35	38	42	46 in.	Car.
6/11	7/11	8/11	9/11 ea.	6d.

Lengths are from top of neck-band to bottom of skirt in front.

PRETTY MAID'S COSTUME Model 1016.

These Costumes are supplied in the following two good durable Cloths:
I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.
II. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth-surfaced and of lighter weight.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE,

together with the new 84-page Illustrated Fashion Book for Ladies and Children. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6yd. 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d. 7/6

COLOURS of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

THE THREE SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front.

Any other size can be specially made to measure 1/6 extra.

BANKERS: "London & Midland Bank Ltd." Please name "Short Stories" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager. Telephone, No. 5 Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PANN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 514. One Penny.

For the Week Ending
November 5th, 1898.

THOSE WHO FOUGHT AT OMDURMAN.

No. 6.—Officer of the Camel Corps.

All rights reserved.

And it Came to Pass.

"Oh, turn it off, Melrose!"

"I beg your pardon. Was I staring?"

"You have done nothing else for the last ten minutes," and Cyril St. Austen laughed in a quiet, lady-like way.

Lord Melrose pushed his cup across the table and gave a little apologetic shrug.

"What a curious fellow you are," he said, with an amused smile. "If I were in your place, by Jove! I should be drinking brandy laced with champagne instead of tea."

The wintry sunlight flooded through the mullioned window, giving a cheerful aspect to the luxurious little room; there were violets on the carved oak mantel-piece, and primroses on the cosy breakfast-table drawn near the fire.

St. Austen opened his brown eyes wide and stared at his companion.

"We have always been pals," he said; "I wonder how many more years it will be before you understand me."

"Upon my word, I don't know," Melrose answered, with a touch of irony. "Diagnosis of character is one thing; the interpretation of an enigma of your kind another."

"Thanks."

St. Austen got up and crossed over to the window. Piccadilly was only half awake, and a thick slush betokened the rain which had fallen during the night. With a little shudder he turned back towards the fire.

"Ugh! Fancy going out a day like this."

Cyril helped himself to a cigarette; his hand trembled slightly as he stooped down and lighted a cedar wood spill in the fire.

Digitized by Google

"There you go," said Lord Melrose, "shivering at the thought of turning out on a beastly morning, and yet you only steady your nerves with tea, when any other man would be white and haggard and——"

St. Austen interrupted his friend with a laugh.

"I assure you life is much easier if you never let anything worry you. Things always turn out for the best if you don't interfere. That's my creed. You think I'm a ruined man, and, by Jove! so I am if Isaacs has got out of bed the wrong side. But d'ye think I'd care if I was?"

The two men faced one another on the hearthrug. St. Austen's smooth, baby-like face and mild blue eyes contrasted strangely with the other's bronzed military appearance and long black moustache.

"I have seen pluck on the frontier," said Lord Melrose slowly, disarranging the violets to make himself a button-hole. "I have seen the V. C. won, but upon my word, old man, you beat the lot of us."

"Nonsense," said St. Austen quickly, "I'm like the coward who shuts his eyes and walks across the Strand, and hopes he won't get run over and generally doesn't. I'm too lazy to dodge the traffic, that's all."

He called his man and sent out for a cab and the Financial News. Then he turned to his companion.

"I say, old fellow, will you come with me?"

Lord Melrose declined promptly.

"Considering all things we'd better not meet just at present," he said. "Isaacs thinks I am in India, and the delusion is worth the best part of £5,000 to me."

And so St. Austen set out alone, and, as he went down the stairs Lord Melrose heard him whistling and occasionally smacking his hands together as if he felt the cold.

Mr. Isaacs' office in Jermyn Street was an elegantly furnished room with a thick Brussels carpet, and comfortable easy chairs scattered about. A cheerful fire burnt in the grate, and a small terrier stood with its paws on the fender, and its head turned away from the heat.

The Jew looked up when St. Austen entered, and by sheer force of habit rose from his chair.

"Ah. You got my letter then?"

St. Austin nodded.

"Made capital spills," he said, turning a cat off the chair nearest Mr. Isaacs' desk, and arranging himself slowly. "If you don't charge 6s. 8d. for writing them you might send me a few more. So you intend to summon me, eh?"

"I shall be compelled to take that course unless you pay back at least £20,000 before to-morrow."

St. Austen turned out his pockets and produced three pounds, which he held out mockingly.

"Will you have this on account?"

The Jew's dark face flushed.

"I am not joking, Mr. St. Austen," he said, shifting a pile of papers on his desk, and then getting up in an uneasy sort of way. "If it had ever occurred to me that your father might marry again I should never have advanced you sixpence."

"I don't suppose you would. That's where the joke comes in."

"And you will be still laughing at it when I summon you."

St. Austen stooped down and stroked the cat which was rubbing itself against his legs.

"What's the good of summoning me?" he asked.

Mr. Isaacs returned to his desk and twisted his chair round to his visitor

"I will tell you. I know as well as you do that you have not got a penny in the world. I know that you have got so-called 'debts of honour,' which make you wish you had; otherwise, you would have been off to America long ago."

"You seem tolerably well up in the subject," observed St. Austen, straightening himself with a little jerk. "Go on."

"When your name appears in the police reports your father will pay anything to save a scandal—for his wife's sake."

"Ah!"

The Jew's eyes fell in an embarrassed way before the other's gaze.

"I suppose if I told you that my father would do nothing of the sort, you would believe me."

"No I should not."

"Very well, then summon me."

St. Austen rose and picked up his hat. In another moment he was standing outside in the street. He had anticipated the worst and the worst had happened. Ruin stared him in the face.

Ten minutes later he pushed open his sitting-room door and Melrose threw down his paper and jumped up eagerly.

"Well, old man, is it peace?"

"He is going to summon me. You know what that means."

There was no sign of agitation on St. Austen's face.

Looking at the two men a casual observer would have said that Lord Melrose was the sufferer.

"And you don't care?"

This absolute stoicism annoyed Melrose inexpressibly.

"Of course I care. I'm not going to tear my hair though; or put on sackcloth and ashes. It's always best to let things run their course."

"By which you mean that something will turn up."

"Precisely; and if it doesn't what's the good of struggling against fate? Come and have a game of billiards till lunch time."

A telegram had been delivered during St. Austen's absence; he took it up as they went out and opened it on the stairs.

"Excuse me for a minute," he said, "I must read it because one never knows—hullo—look here," the pink form fluttered to the ground and St. Austen leant back against the wall.

Lord Melrose picked the telegram up and read it through.

"Your father is dying. Come at once. He has promised to sign a will in Mr. Phillip's favour. —HODSON."

"Phillip?"

"Mrs. St. Austen's son."

"How dreadful!" Melrose exclaimed. "Poor old chap, I am sorry for you."

St. Austen nodded his head gratefully.

"I can't help loving the old man in spite of everything," he said half apologetically. "Dear old Hodson, she always stood up for me."

"What are you going to do?"

"I suppose I must go down. I always anticipated this, but it is just possible he might relent if he saw me. Isaacs will be sold anyway. If I get the money he will be sorry he took out the summons; and if I don't he will have all the expense for nothing——"

Digitized by Google

"Never mind Isaacs now," interrupted Melrose. "Where do you keep your Bradshaw?"

St. Austen threw it to him, and sat down to write a letter.

"Look here, can't you attend for one minute?"

Cyril laid down his pen with a sigh. "All right; what is it, old man?"

"You have just missed the only train which makes the connection. By Jove! you'll have to take a special."

St. Austen turned round and went on with his writing.

"That's out of the question," he said calmly. "I haven't got any money."

"Will you leave off that writing for a minute, or I swear I'll go and leave you to yourself. You must get home to-night. What a confounded fool you are! A little energy, and you may save a fortune; and here you are drifting towards absolute ruin and disgrace, and wasting your time by writing a letter to some girl."

"My dear Melrose, please don't work yourself up like that.

"You've looked it up in Bradshaw and found there isn't a train, haven't you? Well, that settles it. What's the good of worrying? Now if you will just be quiet while I write this note I shall be free——"

Lord Melrose said afterwards he could have taken St. Austen by the scruff of the neck and shaken him with the greatest of pleasure.

"Take a special, man," he roared. "Look here, I'll lend you the money if that's all."

St. Austen shrugged his shoulders and got up from his chair.

"If there isn't a train I'm not going. If I was wanted down there the telegraph boy would have come here without stopping to play marbles on the way, and the wire would have reached me before I went out—in time to catch the mid-day train. All these things were arranged ages ago. It's no good fighting against our destiny. Now if you'll just be quiet while I write this——"

"Perhaps the programme arranged that you should take a special. Perhaps there is a goods train which wants to be smashed up; perhaps that's why the telegraph boy stopped to play marbles on the way; perhaps——"

St. Austen held up a deprecating hand. He had not thought of the matter in this light before and for a moment he was puzzled.

He thought it out slowly, drumming a little air on the table with his fingers.

"I call that legislating and not construing the law of Destiny," he said at last. "Now if you will only just be quiet while I write this note——"

"Listen, Cyril."

"No, no. For goodness sake let the matter drop. I can't be bothered with these things. The probability is if I took your advice I shouldn't be allowed to go into the house, or something like that. Besides I don't wan't to smash up any luggage trains. That's just the sort of thing which does happen when a man begins to interfere. Now if you'll just be quiet while I finish this note I shall be free to go out with you to lunch."

* * * * *

Old Mrs. Hodson was right. Mr. St. Austen was dying.

The doctor had told him years before that his end would come suddenly, and he faced death with a heroic fortitude which touched the hearts of all those who waited on him.

Mrs. Hodson persisted in hovering round him, hoping against hope that at the last moment he would forgive her darling.

Cyril's name however never passed his lips, and his last hours were drawing near.

Everyone had forgotten about a will until the doctor mentioned it. A telegram was sent at once by the second Mrs. St. Austen to the family solicitor in London. Hour after hour had passed since then, and still he did not come. A great fear seized her that after all the old man might die intestate; in that case she would only get one-third of his fortune, and Phillip would get nothing.

She was sitting alone in her husband's room. It was a large, luxuriously furnished apartment, and a huge fire threw fantastic wavering shadows on the walls and carpet.

Struck with a sudden idea she laid down her novel and stole quietly across to the massive mahogany writing table. Taking a half sheet of writing paper she drew out her husband's last will and testament, stopping every now and then to refer to a legal text book at her elbow.

The reading lamp threw a ghastly pallor over her face through its green shade. Occasionally the sufferer on the bed moved in a restless sort of way.

She read it through, nodding to herself and smiling, and then, taking a pen in her hand, she crept to her husband's bedside and roused him gently.

"Darling, you must sign this," she whispered, "or else everything will go to Cyril, and Phillip and I will be cast upon the world."

The old man turned restlessly, and raised himself on his pillow.

"Hush! I cannot bear to hear his name. Give me the pen."

Mrs. St. Austen slipped across the room and called softly to two maidservants who were making her bed in an adjoining apartment. They came to their master's bedside, their eyes filled with tears, and keeping close together.

The will was signed and witnessed; the girls crept back to their work, crying.

Mrs. St. Austen crossed over the room and held the half sheet of note paper to the fire. At last she was safe. Phillip would be one of the richest commoners in England before the grey light of morning crept through the shutters.

Mrs. Hodson's step was heard outside. With a guilty start of which she felt ashamed, Mrs. St. Austen slipped the half sheet of paper in the blotting pad and snatched up her novel.

An hour later the first gong sounded faintly. She laid down her book and went out into the passage.

The sufferer's face was growing more and more transparent; it was evident he had not many more hours to live.

Mrs. Hodson crept to his side.

"Sir, say you forgive Mr. Cyril. Say you forgive him."

The old man waved her away impatiently.

"No. No, I can't."

He stretched out his hand and the old woman took it and held it between her own, sobbing as if her heart would break.

"Won't you forgive Mr. Cyril?"

A sort of groan broke from Mr. St. Austen. He

Digitized by Google

tossed himself from one side of the bed to the other, and doubled up his knees.

"You must forgive him, sir. What will you say to his mother when you meet her up there to-night?"

With a cry the sufferer sat upright in his bed. The firelight lit up his drawn and haggard face.

"Yes—yes—you are right. I—I—tell him that I forgive him. Tell him, Mrs. Hodson. Promise you will tell him."

The old head fell back on the pillows, the eyes closed, the breathing seemed to stop.

Suddenly he moved again.

"Paper!" gasped the old man, "paper!" The housekeeper took a sheet from the blotter.

"Write it down, write it down." he murmured, pushing back the hair from his forehead. "I leave my son Cyril a thousand a year for his life—only for life," he added. "Witnesses"

Mrs. Hodson ran towards the door and flew down the stairs, passing Mrs. St. Austen on the threshold.

"Margaret," called the old man. "Is that you, Margaret? Good-bye, darling. Say good-bye to Phillip."

Mrs. St. Austen bent over and kissed him fondly on the forehead. As she did so her eye fell on the codicil lying on the counterpane just where it had dropped from the old man's fingers.

With a little cry she took it up and read it. Then with a defiant look at the expiring man she crushed it between her fingers and, crossing over the room, she threw it with a vicious little laugh in the fire.

* * * * *

A week later Lord Melrose was breakfasting again with Cyril.

"Upon my word," he remarked, tapping the top of his egg and yawning contentedly, "upon my word it's more than you deserve. It was the nearest thing in the world The odds were at least a million to one against. Gad! You ought to be just as ashamed of yourself as young Hastings who won every penny he's got at Monte Carlo."

Cyril laughed good-naturedly.

"It was all arranged ages ago," he said. "What's the good of bothering. If you want to get on in the world sit tight. That's my motto. It all comes right in the end."

For the will disinheriting Cyril had been burnt by his step-mother. Mrs. Hodson's codicil had by a strange freak of luck been written on the back of the self-same sheet of note paper.

And so it came to pass that in these days Cyril is the richest commoner in England, and Mr. Isaacs grovels mournfully and asks him to recommend his friends.

M. H.

CASHIER (of bank): "You'll have to bring some one here to identify you before we can cash this cheque. Got any friends in the town?"

Stranger: "No. I'm a tax collector."

HIGH-PRICED Doctor: "You are now convalescent and all you need now is exercise. You should walk ten, twenty, thirty miles a day, sir; but your walking should have an object."

Patient: "All right, doctor. I'll travel round trying to borrow enough to pay your bill."

RESULT OF DISTRIBUTION No. 2.

Three persons have this week applied for a sovereign each:

L. W. JUDD,
19 Stanton Road,
Barnes, S.W.

Mrs. F. W. FRYER,
12 Holker Street,
Barrow-in-Furness.

G. ROBERTS,
Dairy Supply Co.,
Museum Street,
London, W.C.

The names of the following people had been selected, but none of them applied, and, consequently, each is £1 the poorer by it:

W. S. Mathers, 15 George Street, Montrose, Forfarshire; Miss Clara Long, 102 Oxford Street, Great Grimsby; Richard Baglin, 5 Hungerford Street, Cheltenham; Miss Tilly Greenspoon, 42 New Street, Dublin; James Clifton, 9 Marted Road, Peckham; H. Boys, 200 North End Road, West Kensington; Miss Cookson, 33 Crown Street, Newark-upon-Trent; Mrs. Irvine, Lochfoot, Dumfries; Miss Capps, 13 London Road, Spalding; T. H. Melen, 3 Yoek Street, West Cliff, Ramsgate; Miss Brown, Springfield, Tirley, Glos.; J. P. Endered, Evesham Road, Headless Cross, Redditch; G. Clayton, 59 Cromwell Road, Bristol; Miss M. Abbott, York Villa, Norbiton, Surrey; O. H. Sharrott, Chestnut House, Tamworth; Mrs. S. Williamson, 42 Ordnance Street, Chatham; Thomas Davidson, 18 Granville Terrace, Edinburgh; J. Whitehead, 1 Willington Square, Harrogate; F. Pratt, 2 Wanderers Avenue, Wolverhampton; G. Tuck, The Limes, Victoria Street, Windsor; J. Webb, 61 Caversham Road, Reading; Miss M. M'Caughley, 34 Duncairn Gardens, Belfast; J. B. Batchelor, Elm Cottage, Military Road, Limerick; C. T. Frost, 11 Bosworth, Rugby; R. Luckin, Fortescue Hotel, Plymouth; Mrs. Green, 315 Oxford Road, Macclesfield; J. E. Watson, Magdalene Lane, Taunton, Som.; Arthur Gray, 48 Tasburgh Street, Grimsby; Charles Wilson, 303 Goldhawk Road, Shepherd's Bush; Walter Grimes, 6 Netherton Road, St. Margaret's, Twickenham; Mrs. O'Sullivan, 81 North Main Street, Cork; Joseph Broadbent, 12 Furness Street, Hyde, Cheshire; F. T. Gibson, 24 Elmwood Street, Sunderland; F. Morsfold, 5 Lansdowne Place, Upper Norwood; Miss M. Hughes, 25 St. Andrew's Road, Liverpool; Miss E. Cramphorn, 4 Wellington Road, Wanstead, N.E.; A. B. Lee, 160 Shaw Heath, Stockport; P. C. Grant, 135 Hoe Street, Walthamstow; A. Braham, 4, Ealing Road, Ealing, W.; Thomas Hilton, 12 Grove End Road, Woodford; Miss Tickell, 14 Lemon Street, Truro; W. Denmore, 22 College Street, Leicester; L. Stewart, 37 Carleton Road, Tufnell Park, N.; W. Meek, 15 Tait Street, Carlisle; A. J. Smith, Broadfields, Wylde Green, Birmingham; W. Cross, 74 Brixton Road, S.W.; W. Stanley, 157 High Street, Croydon.

Several readers have asked whether they may enter for the Home Notes, Athletic Record, and Pearson's Weekly distributions as well as Short Stories; if so, whether the applications may be made on the same postcard. Readers may apply in all or any of the distributions, but each application must be made on a separate card.

As a certain proportion of the names given above are those of people who are not readers of Short Stories, and as it may so happen that the names selected this week are those of people who are similarly unenlightened, I would point out the advisability of your saying a few words on the subject to your neighbour, or to the man you meet in the train. It can do you no harm; it may do them good. Ladies, particularly, have many opportunities for chatting on a subject of this kind, and it would be doing yourself and your friend and us a good turn to tell your lady acquaintances all about the scheme. A sovereign is always a welcome addition to a man's coffers or to a woman's dress allowance. What is there to prevent you from helping yourself and your friends at the same time.

Digitized by Google

THE LETTER WITH THE MONOGRAM.

It was towards the close of a dreary November afternoon. Outside, the wind was howling mournfully among the leafless branches of the tall elms.

The sky was a cold, dull grey, except in the west, where an angry streak of red stretched along the horizon, making a bright back-ground for the tall, naked elms that bordered the drive.

Inside, the scene was scarcely less dreary. A fire burnt slowly in the old-fashioned grate in the library, throwing its shadows upon the walls and ceiling, bringing into view the book-cases, crowded with richly-bound volumes, now leaping higher and higher, and casting its shadows among the oaken rafters that studded the ceiling; then, as if ashamed of its sudden uprising, sinking down almost into its embers.

The two occupants of the room were watching its fantastic movements, each, however, without a thought of the fire itself. He was standing with his elbow on the mantelpiece, his hand supporting his head. She was sitting on the opposite side, nervously twisting her handkerchief in and out through her fingers. Her face wore an indifferent expression, but it was with difficulty that she could refrain from every now and then glancing at that of her companion.

There had been a misunderstanding between them; not one of those trivial, inconsequential quarrels that make Cupid's heart weep for an hour or so, and afterwards brighter and happier for the little cloud, but rather one of those where love's sweet dream, cherished, it may have been, for years, is likely to be crushed.

She had accused him and he had explained, but to no avail. An awkward pause ensued; neither knew just what to say. Finally she broke the silence.

"Yes, I loved you. To be true to myself, I admit it. I loved you for what I thought you were, but now that I have found my faith in you is groundless, I release you."

Still he held his peace and continued to watch the fire, his mind busy with the past. His silence exasperated her. At last she arose, and, crossing over to the writing-table, opened one of its drawers and took from it a bundle of letters.

They were tied with a pink ribbon, and were, as he knew, those he had written since their engagement. She tried to untie the knot, but, being unable to do so, gave it a vicious little twitch, when the ribbon broke, and the letters scattered right and left.

He bent down, and, gathering them up, handed them to her.

"I do not want them. I was going to burn them but will leave that delightful task to you," she said, in a tone meant to display indifference and sarcasm, but which, as such, was a miserable failure.

He drew a chair up to the grate, and seating himself, began to read, as he finished each one dropping it into the fire. It seemed to her she had never seen him so cool and self-possessed before. It seemed as though her heart would break as, one by one, the letters she had longed for, loved, and cherished were dropped into the fire.

Outside, the wind still mourned in and out among the branches of the elms, whose creaking and twisting afforded a weird accompaniment. The room was almost in darkness, except for the light of the fire, whose flaring arms seemed to wave for joy every time the silent reader dropped a letter into its depths, and to spring up in a mocking, tantalising manner.

At last he came to one almost covered with monograms. Oh, how quickly it all flashed before her mind! That lovely summer morning, a year ago, when he had twined her initials with his and then blushed to find the combination spelt "L. O. V. E." Oh, he must not burn that one!

Slowly, and with an almost imperceptible sigh he replaced it in its envelope and consigned it to the fate of the others.

"Oh, how could you!" she cried, and darted forward, but ere she could save it the mocking flames claimed it as their own.

The young man was startled at this sudden outbreak and glanced up in unfeigned surprise.

Such a pitiful, pleading face looked down into his, the tears coursing down her cheeks, her two little white hands clasped in front, that it was no wonder he instantly forgave her all the unkind words and cruel thrusts that only a woman can give.

He reached out, and, taking both her hands in his, drew her down till her head rested upon his shoulder.

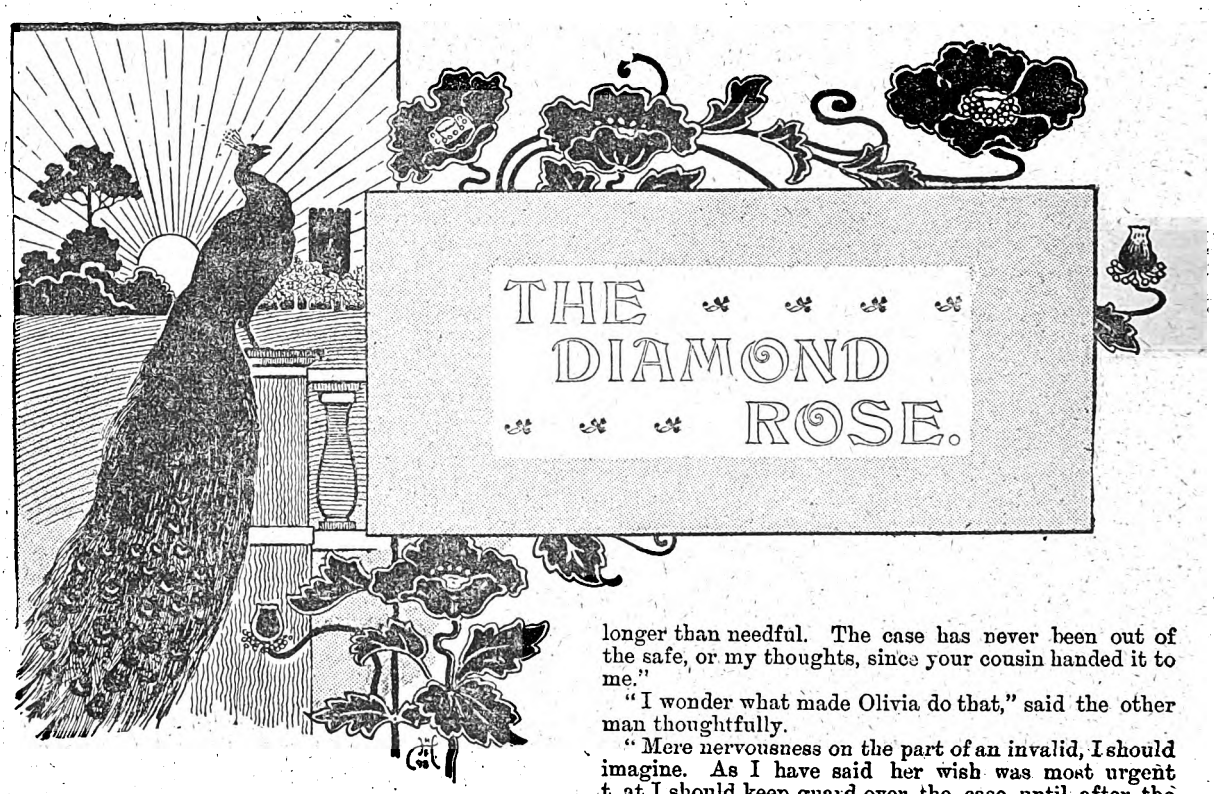
"No, dear, you need not tell me," as she essayed to speak. "I know you did not mean all you said. I know you love me; don't you, dear?"

And she who had pretended to be so cold and sarcastic, dignified and withering, nestled closer to him and whispered:

"Yes, Lionel, and you will forgive me?" While the treacherous, fickle fire now tossed it arms as joyfully as it had mockingly only a few moments before.

D. MILLAR.

Digitized by Google



THE clean-cut, good natured features of William Sebright, lawyer, wore an unusual expression of anxiety.

"He must have come in by this time," he said, half aloud; "I shall be glad to have done with the whole business."

Then he rose, went to the other end of the room, and unlocking a small iron safe, took therefrom a sandal-wood box fastened with clasps of antique silver: apparently a lady's jewel case. He re-locked the safe and left the room, carrying the box.

After traversing a long gallery he descended a flight of stairs without meeting a soul; a noticeable stillness reigned in the house, perhaps owing to the fact that only the previous day, its young mistress, Olivia Hennesey, had been laid in the grave, and now her cousin, John Hennesey, reigned in her stead.

Sebright crossed the hall, and opened a door of a room at the far side.

A tall man of about two-and-thirty was restlessly pacing within, and the face turned to greet the lawyer was worn with secret grief.

Sebright placed the sandal-wood box upon the table without a word.

"Ah, you have brought the jewels?" said John carelessly.

"Yes, and heartily glad I am to be rid of them; only waited until I felt sure you must have come in."

Hennesey threw himself into a chair by the fire.

"Ah, well, there is no need to look at them now. Stay and have a pipe."

"Honestly, I should be glad if you would satisfy yourself that they are there—right with the list. One does not care to have the responsibility of that sort of thing longer than needful. The case has never been out of the safe, or my thoughts, since your cousin handed it to me."

"I wonder what made Olivia do that," said the other man thoughtfully.

"Mere nervousness on the part of an invalid, I should imagine. As I have said her wish was most urgent t at I should keep guard over the case until after the funeral; the key remaining in your possession. Then, when we two were alone, I was to hand it over to you. Now I have fulfilled my charge I will go back to the deeds; but let me know that all is right."

The lawyer cultivated tact and ready sympathy; he had reason to think that John Hennesey would not care for a witness when he counted over the jewels inseparably associated with the vanished beauty of Olivia, his cousin, and, therefore, went back to his rooms.

Soon afterwards Hennesey entered the lawyer's room abruptly—startling him from his pipe and easy chair.

"Good heavens! Hennesey, anything wrong? What's the matter?"

"This is the matter," said Hennesey. He held out a small leathern jewel case, open; the case and the lining were both old, and upon the faded satin rested what was evidently a part of an ornament of rare design and workmanship.

It consisted of a stem of chased gold, fashioned like the stem of a rose, and bearing two leaves of fine-gold fretwork, veined with seed pearls, the serrations pointed with emeralds. From these leaves the stem rose and curved slightly, but had apparently been sharply cut or broken.

The lawyer leant forward staring, and holding on by the arms of his leathern chair.

"What—the rose—gone?" There was a moment's silence, then with an upward glance keen and quick, he added: "By Jove! Hennesey, you don't think——"

Hennesey laughed

"Oh, make your mind easy, the rose has been gone these three months, and it is I who am supposed to have taken it. Olivia died, believing that I stole it from her."

Digitized by Google

Sebright looked utterly mystified.

"I never heard a word of this."

"No, the poor child kept silence, thinking to shield me. There has been a cruel trick played upon me and upon her. It was her desire to shield me, even after her death, from awkward discoveries that made her place the jewel case in your keeping till I could receive it into my own. I found a letter inside here, where the rose should have been."

"Can you give me particulars?"

"Oh certainly; they must become public before long. She wrote as though the whole affair were foreknown to me, but I gather that some villain, by the aid of a mask and fancy dress, impersonated me at the ball given by the Seymours in May. He talked to Olivia for some time, and managed the business so cleverly, that she fully believed she was speaking to me, and allowed him to hold her cloak when she was leaving. As he was wrapping it round her, she turned to say good-night to someone. The diamond rose fastened some draperies on her left shoulder. As he was arranging the cloak, standing behind her, he must have leant over and contrived with his right hand to snap the rose from its stem. She saw the gleam of the diamonds in his closed hand as she turned back her head; but in her fear and horror she would not attract attention, or betray what she believed to be my crime. She only whispered an entreaty that I would come to her on the morrow. In the carriage she assured herself that her suspicions were correct, that the rose was gone.

"Of course I was never at the ball at all, but I had talked of going, and helped to choose her dress. My departure the next day and subsequent silence naturally deepened the apparent malice of my crime. I seemed to be trading on her forbearance. She feared to write me on the subject, but meant to take steps for the restitution of the stones, at her own expense, if needful, on my return, and implored me to fulfil her intent."

"Where were you on the night of the ball?"

"I never left my rooms. A press of work came in at the last moment. I was starting for Paris the next day and sent word that my going had become impossible to Margaret, my sister, early in the afternoon, and asked her to tell Olivia. I don't remember speaking of the matter to anyone else."

"And the dress worn by your impersonator, does Miss Hennesey mention it?"

"She does not refer to it; that, however, might be learnt from Mrs. Seymour. I had intended going as Romeo."

Afternoon deepened into twilight while the two men were still reviewing the bearings of the case; although beyond one or two points rendered evident by circumstances, little was to be gained by the discussion. The area in which the thief might be looked for was narrowed by the facts that he must be, at any rate, able to assume the bearing of a gentleman: that while his inches must approach those of John Hennesey, he must have considerable flexibility of voice, and an intimate knowledge of the family's affairs; even as Hennesey said, speaking to his cousin of personal matters which he had believed profoundly secret.

"One thing," he added, "materially increases our difficulty. I am personally a stranger to Mrs. Seymour, If she believed the man talking to Olivia to be her cousin John Hennesey, supposing, that is, that she noticed him at all, she would have some difficulty at this distance of time in establishing any points of difference, especially taking into consideration the change of dress."

Sebright flicked the end of his cigar. "You have positively no suspicions?" he asked.

"None; unless, indeed——"

"What?"

"A supposition so degrading to my cousin, that I could wring the man's neck if it were verified. Servants have opportunities of acquiring knowledge. I gave Lovett a holiday that night (the last of his stay in England) presumably to say farewell to his sweetheart."

"And probably that's what he did. Ah, my dear fellow, you're out of it there. We're too far advanced in the century to be robbed by our servants, we only rob each other. You must look higher than Lovett for the motive and design of a very clever trick."

The next evening saw Mr. Hennesey in the room of Mr. Wilson, who had been recommended by Sebright as the man likely to solve the problem.

The room, an ordinary top-floor back, was scrupulously neat. At his ease in an old leathern arm-chair, sat Mr. Wilson, reading by the light of a solitary candle, robed in a dressing-gown.

Hennesey was not favourably impressed, and remained standing, holding the back of the chair, and looking at the man before him.

It was hardly a countenance to inspire confidence, unless by its inscrutable ugliness. The skin was thick, unhealthy in colour, and flaccid, closely marked with lines which in places deepened until they became suggestive of folds. The eyes, half hidden by the drooping lids and the puckered flesh, shone as mere glittering beads in the heavy, repulsive face.

Mr. Wilson felt his visitor's scrutiny, impeded though it was by the dimness of the light.

"I suppose," he said, in a sulky voice, "you're surprised at having to mount to a three-pair back?"

Hennesey remained silent.

"I pass here for a commercial traveller. I come and go unnoticed, my visitors the same; there's no better place to conduct private and confidential business than a London three-pair back, provided the walls are thick and you don't talk over loud."

During this speech John Hennesey felt that his scrutiny had been lazily returned. His first sense of repugnance deepened, and but for Sebright's recommendation, and the assurance he had that day received from Scotland Yard as to the man's undoubted capacity when he chose to exert himself, instinct would have decided against further transactions. As it was, he sat down and stated the case as briefly as possible. As he proceeded, Mr. Wilson became alert and business-like.

"And on the night in question you remained—where?" was his first query.

"In my own rooms."

"Alone?"

"Alone."

"Ah! I see you were. Perhaps, now, you were playing the violin—something of that sort—that would make your presence known to your neighbours."

Hennesey started. Some idea of the drift of the apparently simple question, of the intent with which those keen eyes were fixed upon his face, crossed his mind; but he felt that hesitancy or anger would be the height of folly.

"I was finishing work for the press. I started for Paris the following morning."

"Yes, and when finished you went upstairs to bed; about what time?"

"I went into the adjoining room to bed at 2.30, my rooms being on the ground floor."

Digitized by Google

"Communicating?"

"Yes."

"The other inhabitants of the house—what might they have been about? No one there, I suppose, of whom you may have suspicion?"

"In the house? Certainly not. A barrister, I believe, lived in the rooms above me—a couple of clerks above him. I knew nothing of them, nor they of me."

"They weren't at home on that night?"

"I heard the barrister come in soon after I had gone to bed."

"And the landlady—where was she?"

"She lived, I believe, in the basement and slept in the attic. She brought me hot water, in answer to my ring at 9.30. Half-an-hour later I heard her go upstairs."

"Your servant slept out that night, I think you said?"

"Yes, he had twenty-four hours' leave, as he was leaving England with me the next day."

"Do you mind telling me where he slept?"

"In a small room at the end of the hall, adjoining my bedroom."

Mr. Wilson was growing more and more courteous.

"Excuse me; but a little awkward, was it not," he now said deferentially, "for a gentleman of your habits to dispense with the services of his valet the night before a lengthened absence? Many things must have required attention."

As the suavity of the man increased, Hennesey's temper rose. He left the last question without reply.

"But, of course, that is no business of mine," said Mr. Wilson at last, turning his eyes to the fire. "Facts, though, we are forced to ascertain. That letter, now, can you let me see it?"

"Impossible!"

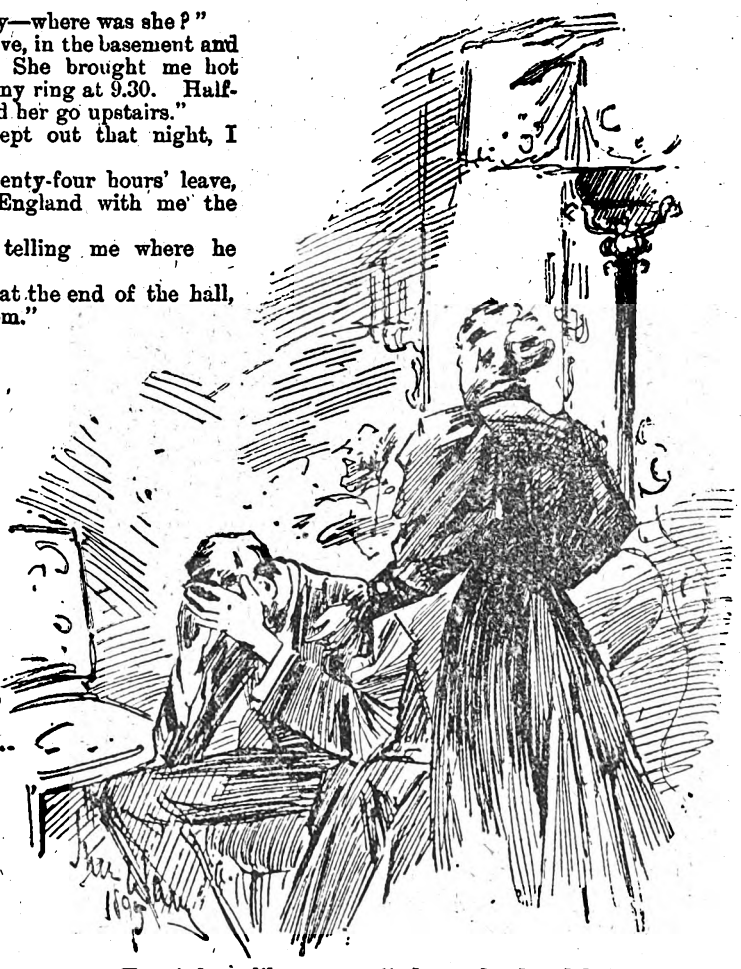
Mr. Wilson raised his eyebrows.

"I might obtain from it most important data."

"I have told you from notes every word that it contains bearing on the case."

Mr. Wilson leant back in his chair with closed eyes.

"Well," he said, in a voice that seemed suddenly dead and muffled, "you might go now. You shall hear from me in three days, that is, on Saturday. There is a candle—be so kind as to light yourself down. Disturbance of the body is fatal to the balance of the mind, as you may know. Good-night."



He sat down like a man utterly perplexed and lost.

John Hennesey's visit to George Street took place on Wednesday evening.

On the afternoon of the following Friday he called to see his half sister, Mrs. Winthrop—the daughter of his mother by an earlier marriage.

Mrs. Winthrop was at her house in Eaton Place for a week or two, on some special business, and, John, hearing of her arrival, lost no time in seeking her. He found her in her drawing-room, gay with roses from Winthrop—and, to his disappointment, not alone. He fancied that he saw a shade of constraint in her greeting, which, in his present mood, chilled and dismayed him.

"I don't think you have ever met Mrs. Hazel, John?"

He turned towards the stranger, whom hitherto he had seen dimly as a dark figure in the window among the flowers, and felt that he was favoured with a rapid, inquisitive glance, which subsided as quickly into indifference. He saw a pretty woman, with the complexion of a young untamed gipsy—warm, glowing, brilliant.

Hair soft and brown, full of natural curve and waves, and a childish, plaintive mouth that seemed pleading against something—perhaps too severe criticism of the rather startling and assertive style of beauty for which its owner could hardly be held responsible.

Hennesey had frequently heard of the young widow who, after devotedly nursing Squire Hazel Holt for two years, had been left to freedom and a jointure of £2,000 a year.

The girl of three-and-twenty had seemed honestly to mourn the elderly squire—perhaps she was not without gratitude towards the man who had raised her from the position of his sister's companion to that of mistress of Hazel Holt and life-long independence. But John Hennesey was not favourably impressed. That undeniably assertive flash of colour and effect was prejudicial, and armed him against her.

"I am so glad you have come, Jack," said his sister Margaret, "I am dying to hear the correct and true version of the diamond mystery."

Digitized by Google

"Your curiosity sha'l be gratified—in due time."

"Due time—nonsense! At once! Mrs. Hazel is as interested as any of us; she was at the ball and noticed the rose on poor Olivia's gown."

John turned sharply, eyeing the widow with renewed interest.

"Mrs. Hazel was there? Can she throw any light?"

"Not much, I fear, but if you will let us hear your version——"

"The tale is hardly a pleasant one, especially as I have an idea that I have already told it to my own disadvantage, and set a couple of detectives at my heels. I have something more than a suspicion that I have been watched since yesterday morning."

"Oh, Jack, what an abominable thing! You must have some bitter enemy in the background." She glanced nervously at Mrs. Hazel, and the widow flashed back a quick signal in reply.

"At any rate, Mr. Hennesey is safe here from misjudgment," she said warmly. "My desire to hear the story from himself springs from a hope that my memory of that night may be of use in arriving at the truth."

John Hennesey rapidly recounted the events of the past few days, and the two women listened in unbroken silence until he mentioned his visit to Wilson, by Sebright's advice.

"Wilson, 15, George Street, Gray's Inn Road," Mrs. Hazel repeated in some surprise, "and you never heard of him before?"

"Certainly not. Why?"

"Why? oh—why I thought everyone in town had heard of Wilson, the arch-discoverer—the refuge of the scandalous and the scandalised."

"Happily the present is my first appearance in either character," said John coldly.

The widow seemed about to make some further remark, when the sound of a fresh arrival brought an interruption from Margaret.

"John," she said uneasily, "I forgot to tell you—Clem is in town. I hear him coming now—he is in the hall—with Mr. Sebright, I think."

"Clem—in town? Why hasn't he been to see me?"

"Because—but come with me, quick, into the next room. I must speak to you before you meet. Violet, will you take my place?"

She opened a door leading to her private sitting-room, and drew John away, wondering just as those other steps reached the landing.

"John," she said, when they were alone, "I must tell you before you and Clem meet—you will find him in a strange mood—he has had a horrible letter, unsigned, type-written, full of malicious accusations against you, trying to stir him into action against you in his position of legal heir. It has staggered and upset him, but be patient with him—he is so young—inexperienced."

"Good Heavens! Margaret, you can't mean to say that my brother suspects me?"

"He seems under some strange influence—not like himself."

John sat down like a man utterly perplexed and lost—harassed by some new idea, which yet he must reject.

"Margaret," he said at last, "Clem is changed, you say; has it ever occurred to you?"

The sister covered her face with her hands.

"Oh, John, I know what you mean. It is wicked, cruel, yet how can one help thinking! Clem is in debt—he knew everything—you are alike—in voice—in height. I dare hardly think. This very letter may be a part of the plot, an attempt to avert suspicion."

John remained silent some little time.

"Margaret," he said gravely at last, "I trust and believe that the injustice to Clem of our thoughts is as great as the injustice to myself. The boy is misguided, that is all. We had better go back to the drawing-room. You can depend upon me, I shan't quarrel with the lad, whatever folly he may commit."

When they returned to the larger room they found the widow at the tea-table, the lawyer in a state of high complacency, lounging at her side in the most comfortable chair the room afforded, his tea-cup placed within easy reach of his hand.

In spite of his own preoccupation, John found time to feel amused at the expression with which the widow's deep-fringed eyes rested upon the lawyer, and to wonder whether the latter's manifest air of satisfaction and home-like ease in Margaret's drawing-room resulted from the attentions of Mrs. Hazel.

Clem stood upon the hearthrug, looking moodily into his tea-cup, and responded coldly to the greeting of the elder brother.

He was a fairly exact copy of John Hennesey, allowing for the difference in their ages and the downy markings of the upper lip, which with the elder had developed into a thick mous ache.

By tacit consent the subject of the diamonds was avoided. John strove to be cordial, and asked his brother to dine with him that night.

"Thanks, I dine with Margaret," was the curt reply, and soon after he left the house.

John, returning to his hote an hour later, pondered more than the occasion seemed to warrant upon the widow's somewhat sudden and apparent development of interest in Sebright. The offer of possible assistance to himself had not been renewed, and the stories of his troubles had failed to elicit any such signs of personal favour as she had bestowed upon the suave lawyer.

Nearly three weeks passed away and no definite clue to the impersonator of John Hennesey had been discovered.

Under pressure, Olivia's letter had been at length submitted to the police, and the testimony it contained—the absolute conviction of the dead girl regarding the falseness and crime of the man whom she had evidently loved with unchecked fidelity—was felt to be almost conclusive.

Clem's moody bitterness increased; he had received a second warning letter, which, however, contained no hint at blackmailing. Margaret affirmed a belief that he was under some sinister influence; but, if so, he was dumb to all betrayal.

Meanwhile, in spite of the widening of the breach between the brothers, and the undisguised hostility of the younger, John made no effort at reprisals, and gave no hint that might tend to avert suspicion from himself by throwing it upon Clem, yet one or two damaging circumstances came to light.

Clement had been in town at the time of the ball, with the object of borrowing money from Mr. Winthrop to meet some pressing debt, but had urged his sister to keep his visit and his difficulties alike secret from John, whom he knew, he said, to be powerless to help him. Clement had, in fact, been sitting with Margaret when the note came from John, explaining the sudden press of work which would both prevent his dining in Eaton Place and joining Olivia in the evening.

Digitized by Google

Winthrop had not had the required £200 to spare at the moment, but had advanced £50, and Margaret had heard no more of the affair.

In the midst of deeper anxieties she could afford to feel annoyed with her friend Violet Hazel, who appeared so ready to outrage all the canons of good taste by an absolute infatuation for William Sebright. She remained in town, prolonging a visit originally intended to be a flying one, long after the end of all ostensible reason. Sebright also stayed, detained by the interests of John Hennesey, and the widow's carriage was constantly to be seen waiting in Bedford Row. Her affairs must have been hitherto in a bewildering state of entanglement—so much explanation and legal assistance seemed suddenly required.

"Heaven knows that I believe in both my brothers!"

According to Margaret's notions, her friend was doing something more than encouraging a man, who, whatever his professional ability, was an insult to the memory of Squire Hazel, when viewed in the light of a possible successor.

As she sat one morning, expecting the arrival of the widow to luncheon, she pondered over the matter afresh, and determined that she would attempt one word of warning before it should be altogether too late. The expected knock at the door came nearly a quarter of an hour before the time fixed. Two minutes later Mrs. Winthrop found herself greeting Sebright, and feeling really exasperated at an appearance which she thought must be planned.

He looked even more beaming and self-satisfied than usual, and Mrs. Winthrop speedily learnt that any attempt at interference on her part would now be probably worse than useless. Violet Hazel had accepted the lawyer on the previous day; he had called to communicate the fact without delay to one of his oldest friends, and evidently in the express hope of being asked to remain and meet the widow at luncheon.

Margaret submitted with a very bad grace, offered her congratulations and the required invitation with as much amiability as she could master at the moment, and turned the conversation to John's affairs.

Sebright was honestly concerned for the difficulties of his old client, and became once more business-like and alert. He owned that Wilson seemed completely baffled for once.

"You know my devotion to your cause," said the lawyer: "yet you must own that circumstances——"

"Mr. Sebright," said Margaret, rising to her feet in her earnestness, "Heaven knows that I believe in both my brothers! Clem is foolish, but innocent of any guilt greater than his suspicion of his brother, I am convinced. Yet, of the two, sooner he could have done this thing than John, with the great love he bore and still bears for Olivia Hennesey."

A hand was laid upon her shoulder as she ceased speaking, and she turned to find Violet Hazel beside her. The widow had entered unannounced, and unobserved by Margaret, and must have heard her last words. Mrs. Winthrop, turning suddenly, was struck by the unusual pallor and pathos of the beautiful face and her kind heart reproached her. Was Violet already repenting her bargain?

"You startled me, dear," she said kindly. "I did not hear you come in; but you look half frightened yourself. Come and take your bonnet off, and let me give you congratulations, instead of this dismal talk. Mr. Sebright is going to stay to luncheon."

Mrs. Hazel's colour came back to her cheeks, but she did not quite recover her cheerfulness until the luncheon was nearly over, when she suddenly became inordinately gay.

Margaret grew correspondingly repelled, and, so soon as they reached the drawing-room, made some excuse for relieving the lovers of her society.

She remained absent nearly a quarter of an hour. When she returned there seemed some slight embarrassment, suggestive, Margaret thought, of what was under the circumstances an irritating stage of love-making. Mrs. Hazel was stooping ostensibly to recover a handkerchief dropped on the bear-skin rug but, in reality, Margaret thought, to hide some silly girlish confusion. Something she said quickly to Sebright made him desist from a natural and polite effort to assist her, and turn his attention to his hostess.

A moment later Violet Hazel came forward, still with heightened colour. She had in her hand a small flat jeweller's case, in which she had just replaced a sapphire pendant, a present from Sebright, bought that morning in Bond Street. The case had fallen on the bear-skin with the handkerchief when Margaret entered, and the entanglement of the fastening in the long fur had caused slight delay. Now Mrs. Hazel claimed her friend's appreciation of the jewels with an eagerness of delight which Margaret condemned as childish and irksome.

The widow left the house half an hour later with Sebright. From the stairs she ran back to the drawing-room door.

"Margaret, if you are alone to-night I should like to spend the evening with you."

"Come by all means. Sam is obliged to stay at Winthrop, I only did not ask you because——"

"Never mind why, I have asked myself. I, too, shall be alone and I wish to come."

Mrs. Hazel returned to Eaton Place, as she had proposed. During dinner Margaret thought her nervous, but afterwards, in the quiet of the drawing-room, the widow said, breaking a silence that was beginning to be awkward:

"Margaret, I never told you the history of that night of the ball as I knew it. It has been on my mind for some time."

"I understood that there was nothing to tell."

Margaret spoke rather sharply.

"I was on the point of detailing my impressions the afternoon that we were interrupted by Mr. Sebright and your brother Clem: afterwards I thought it best to be silent, but I must tell you to-night."

Digitized by Google

"If there is anything that can harm John—" began Margaret.

"You shall judge. You must hear what I have got to say, sooner or later, if not from me from someone else—so listen.

"When I first saw Olivia Hennesey that night, she was sitting alone in a small sort of ante-room, just a couple of lounges and some ferns in it. She had removed her mask and was leaning back with a strange fixed look upon her face. I thought she was ill, so I asked my partner to fetch an ice and went to her. She said however, that she was perfectly well, and had only come there, as I had done, for cool and quiet.

"Presently, by way of saying something, I remarked; 'I am so sorry your cousin is not coming this evening. It seems fated that I am never to meet him.'

"She looked at me in a surprised sort of way.

"'Who? Jack. Jack is coming.'

"'Margaret told me an hour or two ago that he had sent word it was impossible.'

"'Oh!—a message. Yes, I remember, but he is coming, for all that.' She smiled in such a satisfied, happy way, that I could not help saying: 'Ah, you have had later information?' just laughing a little.

"'No, I have heard nothing; but it is very odd, I know he is coming, I am waiting for him here. Do you never have strange presentiments—intuition?'

"'Very often, and they are invariably wrong.'

"'That will not be the case with mine this evening,' she said, with quiet conviction.

"Just then my partner returned with the ice, and soon after I was obliged to leave her. I thought her mood a strange one; I thought it stranger still, when, half-an-hour afterwards, looking into the ante-room, I saw her talking earnestly with a man in the dress of Romeo. Evidently Mr. Hennesey had come.

"I had no chance of speaking to him, he never left her side; but whenever I could I watched this Romeo with some interest. You had talked so constantly about your Jack, that you had roused my curiosity, and the whole affair struck me as peculiar.

"I had dined with the Sinclairs, and arranged to stay the night, instead of returning to Kensington. The carriage would not hold us all, and Mrs. Sinclair left first, and I with her. On reaching the house she told the coachman to drive back immediately for the rest of the party. I suppose the servants inside had not expected our return so early. At any rate, we were kept waiting a few moments on the step.

"It was a warm night, but dark. We must have been almost hidden by the shadow of the porch. While we stood there a man came up the pavement, and the light from the gas lamp—which did not reach us—fell upon him. He wore a long overcoat and a crush hat, yet the figure struck me as familiar. A hansom was crawling up the street from the opposite direction. He hailed it almost at our doorway; the street to him must have seemed otherwise empty.

"For a moment I saw his face distinctly as he lifted it to give the direction: 15, George Street, Gray's Inn Road. As he raised his arm to throw open the door of the hansom, the cape of the light Inverness fell back, and I further saw Romeo's starched sleeve which had been before my eyes for the last hour. Then I knew why the figure had seemed familiar. Evidently Mr. Hennesey had walked from the Seymours until he met a cab. I thought the address he had given an odd one, and I was disappointed in his face; both dwelt in my memory, also the tone of the voice.

"The incidents of the evening seemed suggestive of a sequel, but none came for some time.

"Mr. Hennesey remained abroad, and Olivia died; then I heard of the loss of the diamonds. Of course I held my tongue, but I came up to London all in the heat really to try and see John Hennesey and satisfy myself as to his identity.

"I did see him here that afternoon; but not until to-day have I been able to prove who the man under the lamp-post really was."

There was a sudden dropping of the sustained tones—a pallor and a drooping of the white lids, as of one who, having reached the end of a painful task, yet sees a sequel full of bitterness.

* * * * *

About the time that Mrs. Hazel reached this point in her narration, John Hennesey and a sergeant of police were mounting the stairs of No. 15, George Street. Hennesey's visit was an appointment of some days standing, made with the avowed intent of forcing the hand of the detective, to whose manipulation of his affairs he greatly attributed the growing hostility of general opinion. The additional presence of the police sergeant was an arrangement of a few hours.

Face to face with Wilson, however, Hennesey's views seemed to have undergone some modification.

He appeared to be in no hurry to bring his charge, and anxious not to raise Mr Wilson's wrath. For the first time he openly expressed doubts regarding Clem, which Wilson listened to with a polite smile of attention.

"You can hardly suppose you are suggesting a new idea to my mind, Mr. Hennesey, or that I have not admired your reticence about suspicions it was impossible for you to avoid. I may tell you that several circumstances have transpired that have an awkward look for your brother; but, naturally, I have felt some delicacy in approaching the subject with you. The temptation was, of course, a great one. The diamonds——"

During this speech the sergeant who had accompanied John had risen from his chair and gone over to the window, which was behind Wilson's chair, as though suffering from the sultry heat of the night.

A sharp turn brought him up close to the private detective, who was sitting easily, his arms resting on the sides of the chair. The sergeant suddenly leant forward and seized him a little above the wrists with a grip which made Wilson writhe round in a blaze of wrath and astonishment that yet seemed tinged with alarm.

"That's all very fine talking, Lawyer Sebright, but I shall have to trouble you to come along with me presently on account of those same diamonds which you know more about than either of the Mr. Henneseys, and wash that face of yours."

The man, pinioned in his chair, tried to struggle to his feet, but the sergeant had the advantage both in position and muscle.

"Come, now, don't," said he, unmoved and calm. "Don't ye force me to put them persuaders on. You're a clever fellow—clever as ever I did see, but the game's up, and swearin' won't help ye. Mr. Hennesey's here; he was only leadin' you on, bless you! just to keep you suspectin', and see how far you would go. I've a mate outside. I always did think that mug of yourn were plaster of Paris, but so long as you did our work and acted on the square it worn't no matter of consequence."

Digitized by Google

This speech was naturally spasmodic, in spite of the unemotionalism, owing to the struggles of the writhing figure in the chair. At its close the figure grew still; defeat was with it, and despair.

"Tell me," he said, "how have you hunted me down?"

The voice was no longer muffled, and its familiarity coming from the painted mask, struck painfully upon the heart of the man who had been wronged.

"Well, if you're bent on knowing," said the sergeant, "it was the lady as did it. She showed us the trick of that nice little safe of yourn."

There was a sharp cry of rage and pain, the first and last sign of weakness that Sebright showed.

* * * * *

"That he was not Mr. Hennesey I felt convinced that first afternoon," Mrs. Hazel was saying.

"Oh, Violet! And you have been silent all this time, when a word——"

"Be quiet. What proof had I but the cut of a sleeve seen in the dark? But to-day—only to-day—I have proved not only who the man was, but his identity with Romeo."

Margaret was struck with a fear hardly less alarming than that which she had just escaped, and which made further questioning impossible. She remained silent—waiting.

"He was Wilson, the detective," Mrs. Hazel said, still with that touch of final resignation.

Mrs. Winthrop was entirely taken aback. After the first throb of intense relief this seemed the wildest hypothesis, and untenable. Her mind could seize no line of connection with this man.

"Can't you see the deduction?" Mrs. Hazel went on. "Wilson stole the diamonds. Wilson, to avert suspicion, has secretly helped to keep it alive against Mr. Hennesey; he was probably the sender of the typewritten letters, and Wilson was recommended by Sebright."

"They are in collusion, then? Oh, my poor Violet!"

"They are one and the same. As you said yourself, the secret has been too well kept for more than one to be in it. As for me, why do you pity me? My own fear has been that I should overdo my part, that you would find me out. I was angry sometimes that you should think I should care."

Slowly Margaret realised the truth.

"Remember your own words, Margaret. Surely no cost is too great to save an innocent man and an honourable name. And I resolved to save your brother if I could. When Sebright came into the room that first day I recognised him. I led Sebright to say the address in George Street and any doubt I might have had was removed. Still I had no proof. I fooled and flattered him to the top of his bent, hoping to lead him to commit himself, but he was too clever for that. Then I led him to think that I was in love with him, and used my poor money as a bait. I soon found that he had considerable influence over Clem, and had lent him money, having him to some extent in his power.

"I grew very anxious to see Wilson, and wrote once or twice to appoint an interview. The detective was coy, and not anxious for the test; but I succeeded at last by intimating that I had important secret information to impart upon the Hennesey case. Then he called upon me at dusk. I had the lamps lit, and while he was there, moved one, and on some excuse raised the shade; but I frankly own that I gained nothing—the disguise baffled me.

"You can imagine that I was careful in what I said. I merely insisted on my conviction that John Hennesey, and no one else, had been at the ball and stolen the diamonds; but I think my friend was a little disappointed at the lack of anything that could be called evidence. He said, of course, that he had hoped to hear something that might tend to clear Mr. Hennesey.

"I began to see that my only chance was to get at Sebright's papers. At this stage I went to Scotland Yard and reported my impressions. I don't think they were taken very seriously; but as a result detectives were put on to watch Sebright and Wilson. And the counter suspicion delayed, I think, Mr. Hennesey's arrest. Of course, it was so manifestly impossible that I might be mistaken in everything but the address given by the man under the gas lamp, that the story was not held sufficient warrant for immediate official measures, and it rested with me to prove it. Wilson's transformations were so cleverly managed that up to yesterday his identity had not been established; from what I could gather there was a point of disappearance, where so far he had eluded all vigilance.

"In my visits to Bedford Row I noticed a portable iron safe fastened with a Chubb's patent, the key of which was never out of Sebright's possession. I made all sorts of plans for getting hold of that key. I even descended to a promise of marriage, and then chance favoured me. I asked him last night to bring me some of a particular kind of bonbon, and to-day he was so infatuated that he let me search for them in his coat pockets, knowing that I should find the sapphires. Of course, I stole the key, slipped it up my wide linen cuff, sheltered by the lapel of his coat.

"He carried it always in a small breast-pocket, with a note-book.

"In case he should miss it before leaving, I shook it down into the fur rug. Naturally, it was most important that he should not suspect me. I covered it afterwards, while you and he were talking. He had an appointment in West Kensington—a will case which I knew would occupy him for some hours, for he had told me about it. Directly he left me I ordered a carriage and drove to Bedford Row.

"He had a habit of never saying at the office the exact hour of his return, thinking this had a beneficial effect on the industry of his two clerks; and his caution now served me in good stead.

"I told the clerks that I had an appointment with their master at half-past four—that he would certainly return to keep it. They were so accustomed to see me there, treated as Sebright's most honoured client, that not the slightest demur was made at showing me to his private room.

"Once there, the door shut, the rest was easy.

"In my own mind I had arranged that should I fail to find anything compromising I would at once return to you and replace the key in the fur rug—where, when Sebright missed it, it would be found. I unlocked the safe, trembling with anxiety lest I should be discovered. At first I found only deeds and legal documents, coupons, securities—nothing bearing upon the case.

"But on opening one drawer, I saw a packet of letters addressed to Wilson, 15 George Street; almost at the top were my own, with pencilled notes written across which I dared not stay to read. Beneath I found a small sealed parcel, some jeweller's instruments, and some scraps of filagree gold, like that used in the leaves of the rose, also half-a-dozen letters written in cipher, and all bearing the post-mark of Amsterdam.

Digitized by Google

"Stowed away underneath was a small book of notes in Sebright's handwriting. It was just a series of remarks and memoranda, and I saw enough towards the end to assure me that I had succeeded. I fancy that book will afford some curious revelations.

"I quickly replaced everything. Then rang the bell and told the clerk I could wait no longer, something unexpected must have detained Mr. Sebright. I was sitting over by the window then, looking at the Times. I was bowed out and drove at once to the nearest office to wire to Scotland Yard. Within twenty minutes a detective arrived.

"Sebright had not returned. I gave up the key and left the man in possession. Voilà tout, I had a cup of tea, dressed, and came here."

Mrs. Winthrop would not let her friend leave her that night.

They were both nervous and overwrought. Margaret excited and thankful, yet feeling as a reproach her want of spontaneous gratitude, her inner shrinking from the part the widow had played. She wished that her husband was in town, or that John would come to relieve her of the burden, and supply her deficiencies.

John did not appear until the following morning. Then, if he felt critical over the audacity that had saved him, he was careful not to show it. Mrs. Hazel could have no reason to complain of the warmth of his recognition and gratitude, yet she was cross and almost rude in her disclaimers.

The trial of Sebright was effectually a cause célèbre. The Hennesey diamonds were found almost intact, he having been afraid to hurry them into the market.

It was from Clem, on the very afternoon of the ball, that Sebright had learnt that John would be unable to keep his engagement, and other particulars needful to the scheme for obtaining the diamonds which he quickly perfected. He owned that the idea had been spontaneous—springing from opportunity.

John caused the rose to be re-fashioned, and the diamonds re-set; but for a while it seemed probable that in his lifetime no woman would have the right to wear them.

After the excitement of the trial, Violet Hazel fell ill, and Margaret persuaded her to spend the winter with her in the South of France. Mrs. Winthrop had long since ceased to criticise her friend; both women were glad to escape notoriety and gossip; and Margaret, watching the widow's softened beauty, and shy, timid ways, wondered over her; and pondered to find the motive power that had transformed her into the daring heroine of an ugly adventure, formed her own conclusions.

"I wish John would marry," she said suddenly one day; "it is bad for the estate, for the family, especially bad for Clem."

Mrs. Hazel had risen, and was staring out of the window.

"What of the memory, Margaret; and your own words—the great love he bore, and still bears, for Olivia Hennesey! Who is worthy to succeed her?"

Margaret rose and put her arm about her friend's neck.

"Violet, I think that Olivia's answer to that question would be, the woman who saved John's honour and good name."

All the world said this would be a fitting ending to the romance, yet John himself was slow to see it.

Mrs. Winthrop tried gently to enlighten him, with results which were not unsatisfactory to those chiefly concerned.

PLEYDELL NORTH.

The Pearson Idea

Is to give the public the most and best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.

Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original introductions and notes.

It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of "Ivanhoe," or Flora Melvor of "Waverley." The series consists of Twenty-five Volumes.

The cheapness, combined with the generous style of this series should render it an event to all lovers of class fiction, who ought certainly to find in it the edition of Scott which combines most advantages, including that of being the cheapest artistic edition ever published

LIST OF VOLUMES:

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Anne of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.

14,000 PAGES OF READING FOR 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

The Publisher, C. Arthur Pearson, Limited,
Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

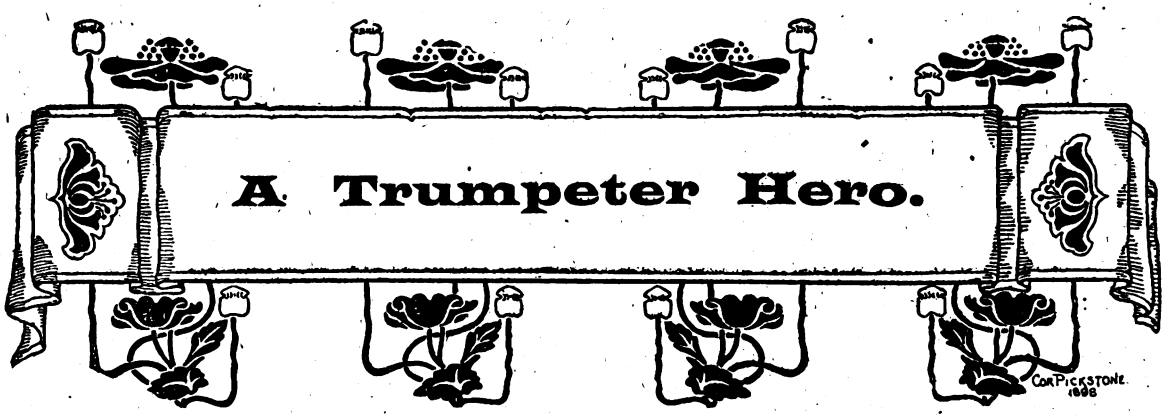
PLEASE send me the twenty-five volumes of the Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I inclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

A Trumpeter Hero.



He was under an unlucky star, this handsome trumpeter, this Jean Blouart, as he called himself, or Victoire, as his comrades called him. And everything smiled upon him in his little world; no one could sound the reveillé as loud, as long, or as joyously as he could sound it, and they were always able to recognise him, no matter how great the distance, by his alert and decided step.

He played it well, that loud-tongued clarion, for Victoire was a true musician, who had spent his childhood listening to the birds and fashioning, when guarding his flocks in the beautiful country of Touraine, strange instruments from the barks of the willows, to mingle their shrill or mellow notes with the thousand-and-one voices of Nature.

Naturally he was happy now that he possessed a real instrument, and every evening during his life in the garrison, and when the duties of the day were done, went to exercise it upon the banks of the Orne and to hear the echoes carried by the wind and reverberating from tower to tower of those grey old churches of Caen.

It was the hour of sunset, however, that Jean Blouart liked best of all, when the voices of the bells flung themselves into space in a gigantic concert, at first a soft, vague harmony, like a rocking cradle, then mounting and resounding tones, ringing and chiming and dying away upon the evening breeze, note by note, like the dropping pearls of a necklace.

Jean Blouart remained always a long while listening to this heavenly music, and from time to time adding to the melody a long and rolling blast from his own instrument.

In fact, he had had but one sorrow in the whole of his life—the leaving behind him in that same country of Touraine his old father, already far advanced in age and alone in that desolate dwelling. He consoled himself, however, with the reflection that time passed quickly, and that now but two years remained to him of service.

And sometimes, while listening to the voices of these bells, Jean Blouart fancied them the Angelus of his native village, and saw before him the humble cabin surrounded by its green trellises, and with the old father smoking upon the doorstep. But he was only twenty-two years of age, this handsome Victoire, and at that age, as everyone knows, everything seems so very gay and so very easy.

Besides, garrison life was full of distractions—talks with his comrades, meetings with the other buglers, the morning reveillé, the evening retreat, the passage through the crowded street, the blonde heads of the peeping demoiselles, and the rest under the shade of the trees when the exercises were over.

The days were truly going at a racing pace when one morning, as Jean Blouart got up as usual to sound the reveillé, he found that war had been declared.

* * * * *

They had been fighting all day long. Already the sun was low upon the horizon, and still they battled, for both sides had sworn to conquer, and no one dreamt of recoiling. And the trumpet rolled and cried its stirring music, sending its inspiring notes into the very heart of the mêlée, mingling its voice with the fracas of the cannon, the screaming of the balls, and the shouts and groans of the combatants.

Jean Blouart was always to the front, dragging at his heels the soldiers drunk with carnage and grimed with powder. They fought now hand to hand and body to body, Victoire, as if determined to justify the name his friends had given him, and, like a horse that has run away, literally throwing himself upon the enemy, still sounding the charge without relaxing.

All at once Jean Blouart saw no more about him the uniforms of the French regiments; instead, before him, behind him, upon every side of him, there rose a solid rampart of the opposing forces, a living wall of flesh and bayonets, through which he sought in vain to make a passage. Guns turned upon him from every direction, swords pricked him in the arm, the face, the sides—he had flung himself into the trap; it had closed upon him—he was a prisoner.

* * * * *

The sun no longer lighted the desolate country; night slowly descended from the heavens; the struggle for the moment was finished. Blouart, still a prisoner, walked in the midst of the encompassing soldiers, and saw as in a dream defiling before him the fields, the hills, and sombre forests. He walked mechanically, and always in his ears the fracas of that ended battle.

Before long they halted in the shelter of the forest, and lighted the camp fires. The flames cast a sinister light upon the trunks of the trees; the trumpeter threw himself upon the ground, and, overcome by fatigue, slept and dreamt.

A scene in his childhood. The sun shines, the birds sing blithely in the hedges, and he sees again his beloved home; this time his mother seated at the window spinning at her wheel. And he? Well he, a soldier then as now, has just arrived from school, a soldier three feet high, proud as a peacock, and with a splendid gun plucked from the hazel tree, borne upon his shoulder.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly a passing dog upon the highway stops to bark at him; he shrieks and runs with all his legs to bury his head in the lap of his mother.

"For shame!" she cries, "for shame, my boy! A true soldier runs from nothing!"

A true soldier runs from nothing! It seemed to Blouart that a voice repeated that in his ear. He rose quickly and looked about him. Everything slept beside him; everything slept in the silent forest. Even the step of the sentinel was dulled by the moss. The heavens, resplendent with stars, shone between the branches of the trees, and the breeze that always heralds the dawn came to his nostrils freighted with the perfume of the peaceful wood. Victoire passed his hand across his brow. He remembered now—he was a prisoner. He must rouse himself; he must save himself, or he must die. But he was watched; he could not stir.

The hours passed, the horizon widened, and he saw a road winding along the side of the forest, above him a chain of timbered hills. The road ascended abruptly. Beside it was a ravine, at the bottom of it a roaring torrent, and they gave the signal of departure. This time, however, it was not Victoire who gave it; no, and sorrowfully he regarded his silent instrument, henceforth dumb and voiceless.

A mad desire to die, to end everything, had seized upon him, but "a true soldier runs from nothing." The words persistently resounded in his ears, and he walked away between two soldiers who never took their eyes from him. No matter, the precipice was there beside him; it was deliverance; it was also death. No matter, again.

Victoire plunged forward; there was a cry, a crash, and the soldier at the edge of the abyss had disappeared into its depths. Blouart leapt at the same time—too late, a hand of iron had closed upon his arm, and the muzzle of a pistol pressed his brow. He thought of his father, alone, without a son, without love or care, and ending his days in tears over his desolate life. Jean Blouart no longer had the courage to die.

Meanwhile the officer in command had run forward and ordered the weapons to be lowered.

"Down with them!" he cried; "down with them at once! No harm must be done the prisoner!"

"No harm? Then what more terrible suffering," thought Blouart, as he heard him, "had they yet in store for him?"

And now the sun illumined the hills and valley. Along the roadway the oaks and beeches extended their nervous arms, from each leaf hanging a drop of dew, from each leaf a diamond, and all was brilliant and animated under the dazzling sky that gave them light and life.

But Victoire saw nothing of that which surrounded him. What to him was the splendour of Nature—to him, with anguish in his soul? Still he was young, his career before him; oh, no! one thing was certain, Victoire no longer desired to die!

Presently the top of the hill was gained, and the commanding officer again approached Blouart and ordered his hands to be untied.

"For now," he said to him, drawing him forward to the crest of the knoll, "you are going to sound your trumpet here where they can see you, those men below there in the plain—soldiers whom you are going to rally. When you have sounded as I bid you, freedom is yours!"

"And what soldiers are they?" asked Victoire quietly.

"What matters it to you?" coldly responded the officer. "You will do as I bid you or you are a dead man!"

And Blouart saw for a fact the muzzles of the guns menacingly trained upon him, and then the men about him were gone from sight, concealed in the bushes at the sides of the route.

"Sound!" cried the officer's voice; "sound, I command you! And you, you others, fire if he does not obey me!" and the answering click of the triggers was plainly audible in the stillness.

Victoire raised the trumpet to his lips, then lowered his eyes to the field below him, where in a little depression of the ground he saw a small encampment of men and horses—an encampment unmistakably of the French.

He knew at last what they meant him to do. They intended, those people who had taken him prisoner, to draw them into an abuscade, and he, in his uniform, and he, with his music, was to serve to this end.

"Play! Play, I tell you!" cried again the implacable voice.

And Blouart held the clarion to his lips and did begin to play, the joyous notes of the instrument ringing through the air like a merry song, but to Victoire like a cry of desolation and of death.

Still he played on, and the camp beneath him began to be agitated. They saw him, this friend that called to them from the heights above, and whom they gazed upon and whom they recognised with so much pride. He played on, and they, his people, began to move towards him; played with all his skill and strength, the notes following precipitately one upon the other, or with long and joyous rolls.

All at once, down in that little valley, a bell began to strike—a bell that was counting the hour of twelve. A veil of blood passed suddenly before Victoire's eyes; he heard anew in those muffled tones the Angelus of his Touraine village, the bells of Caen, and saw again the walk of chestnut trees, his cabin home, his father, and his beloved France, the France which now he was betraying!

Instead of sacrificing life and of yielding up his last drop of blood for her, he was willing to ruin her, helping her to die, and calling his comrades, his own blood brothers, to an ambuscade and to a shameful death.

In short, he, Jean Blouart, whose eyes had never fallen before the eyes of another, was a traitor to his country! And every rustle of the leaves, every twitter of the birds in the branches, every stroke of that distant but resounding bell, cried out to him the same thing:

"Traitor! traitor!"

He dropped his trumpet.

"Sound, I command you, sound again!" called that pitiless voice.

"Sound again!" began Blouart, but stopped abruptly; a thought had come to him. "Sound again? Yes, yes," he responded, "I am going to sound again!" and with all the strength that remained to him, all the pride and courage of his honest heart, he raised the bugle to his lips and sent forth, first, the wild, fierce notes of the call to arms, the alert, and the quick retreat. Far and wide the trumpet's voice rang through the air, and then there was a rattling volley, a shower of balls, and Victoire, the trumpeter, face downwards upon the ground, was dead!

E. H. POSENER.

Digitized by Google

A LAWYER'S ADVICE.

EDWARD BRETT was a bachelor. In one sense this fact added to his philosophical resignation of mind concerning his lack of clients. In another sense, it kept him in an unenviable frame of mind because he was denied, through his impecunious condition, the luxury of a wife and home.

Brett was always of a domestic temperament, fond of home comforts and caring little for the amusements that appeal to most men of his age. Still, if he were unable to keep up an establishment worthy of such a woman as he would choose for his wife, and worthy of his own personal dignity, it were better to remain single.

It was years since he had been called to the Bar, and, in reality, it did begin to look a little dark for his future prospects that business with him did not begin to pick up a little.

There was Jack Erwin, who had been at school with him—a few years of struggling in his chosen profession, medicine, and then unbounded success from every point of view; he had grown immensely wealthy, had married and settled down, so Brett had heard.

One morning in August, Brett was stretched out at full length on the leathern covered lounge with a cushion beneath his head, smoking a cigar and trying to forget his troubles, when there came a tap upon the door marked "Private."

He sprang up from his recumbent posture, laid down his cigar, and proceeded to open the door. As he did so his eyes rested upon the supple figure of a gracefully-formed young woman, who answered his polite greeting, and, advancing into the room, cast herself into the chair Brett indicated, glancing up at him with a little flash of coquetry in her look as she did so. He seated himself opposite her and waited for her to state her errand.

She was inclined to be very coolly deliberate, and bore his scrutinising gaze with marked self-possession, as she drew forth her card case, extracted a card therefrom, and daintily tendered it. He took the card and read "Elsie Manfield."

"You are Mr. Edward Brett, I presume?" she asked in a well-modulated, musical voice.

Brett courteously bowed assent.

"At your service. What can I do for you?"

She fixed her eyes on his face with a keen, searching look.

"I came to consult with you concerning a most important matter. I hope I do not intrude!"

"My time is entirely disengaged," replied Brett in his most amiable tones, "and I shall be most happy to advise you to the best of my ability."

She blushed faintly and prettily as she gracefully inclined her head, and Brett felt his heart give one or two sudden bounds.

"It is a perplexing subject," she began, a slight shadow crossing her face, "and I scarcely know what to say first."

Her hesitation gave Brett an opportunity to take a more leisurely glance at the lady's personality without appearing to so do, as her eyes were downcast.

She was young, not more than eighteen, and a pure blonde, with those exceedingly rare dark, velvety eyes and lashes that are seldom met with, but that accentuated her beauty greatly. Her figure was full-rounded, with graceful curvings, and her features were small and of cameo-like delicacy and as clear-cut. Her attire, together with the appearance of several costly rings upon her small and shapely hands, indicated wealth, and already visions of a liberal fee flitted before Brett's mental vision.

"I wish I could help you; perhaps the best way will be to plunge into the subject, stating the simple facts as plainly as possible," Brett ventured, with a smile of polite encouragement.

"Very true," she murmured, "if I but knew how. It is in reference to a will, and also to a very perplexing and annoying position in which I am placed relative to that will. You will understand the annoyance and my perplexity when I have proceeded further with my story. I am but a woman, with all a woman's frailty and helplessness to combat the cruel scheming and greed of those who are so placed as to be able to show their power over me."

Digitized by Google

Here the fair head drooped, and the dark eyes dimmed with tears, but these signs of emotion passed after a moment, and she continued:

"To tell you all I have been forced to suffer and endure would be impossible. You want the plain facts as briefly as I can give them to you.

"Not long since a near relative died, leaving a large fortune. I became chief beneficiary under his will, being the only person having any claim upon the deceased while living. This relative was always of eccentric disposition, and was fond of imposing difficult conditions upon people who sought his favour.

"Particularly disagreeable did he grow to be in all his associations with me, and to crown his peculiar whims he made certain conditions in his will whereby I must marry before August 30th of the present year, or forfeit the greater part of the fortune. In case of my forfeiture the money will go to another.

"Those are the main facts in the case." A rosy blush suffusing her cheeks, "what would you advise me to do? You can readily understand my anxiety, Mr. Brett," imploringly, with the dark eyes upturned to his.

"The 30th of August! The present month, and—why the thirtieth falls on—the thirtieth is to-morrow!" Brett gasped in amazement.

She nodded her head childishly, and drew forth from a small silk hand-bag a roll of parchment and handed it to Brett. "That is a copy of the will; please read it and tell me if there is any way out of this terrible difficulty."

Mr. Edward Brett unfolded the document and glanced carefully over the contents, his professional eye instantly comprehending its import, which was to the effect that the property willed to his would-be client was valued at £100,000 and the conditions imposed were that the girl and the property should be under the authority of guardians until she came of age, or until she married, in which case she must marry before August the thirtieth of present year or forfeit the estate.

Brett folded the document when he had finished reading it, and reflected. The girl had already told him she was but eighteen. He was a pretty good judge of a person's age by the appearance of the person, yet, in the case of women it is more difficult to form correct estimates. He glanced at her casually and placed her age at about twenty-four. Of course, she had told him correctly, however, there was no motive for deception in the matter.

Another fifteen minutes passed in the asking of questions relative to the conditions of the will, and they conversed for some time regarding it.

Brett could see but one way for his fair client to get out of her difficulties, but it was natural that the suggestion of that solution should be embarrassing to him.

He reflected again. The young lady's countenance betrayed extreme anxiety and agitation. Brett hesitated and then said, taking out his watch and glancing at it:

"It is now three o'clock. To-day is the last day."

A moan broke from the lips of the girl, "Oh, what shall I do, Mr. Brett—what must I do?"

"I see but one way out of it," he ventured. "I am a business man, my methods are business methods, understand; you came to me for counsel, and, unpleasant as my advice may be to meet, I advance it as comprehending and solving your rather remarkable situation——"

"And that advice is—" she broke in impulsively, "to——"

"To get married," Brett replied calmly.

"To get married!" she gasped, "but how can I? I have no one of whom I have ever thought of in that light, I——"

"My dear young lady, this is not a time for consideration of the matter from a romantic standpoint; it seems to call for very active measures in a very brief space of time."

He was slowly pacing the floor. Her eyes followed his every movement with nervous anticipation. She seemed to be trying to make up her mind to some action on her own part. She hesitated, a deep crimson blush mantling her cheek, then rose and advanced timidly towards him:

"Mr. Brett."

He cast a quick, questioning glance at her. She stood before him confusedly, the words she was trying to speak dying away upon her lips. It was becoming a painful ordeal for Brett, and he wished himself well out of the strange position he was being placed in.

"Won't you sit down here while we think matters over a little more?" he suggested, leading her to a chair by the window and seating himself close by her. Her agitation was apparent. Brett began to suspect that she had a suggestion which she did not quite like to offer after all.

"You won't, I beg, think badly of me," she began confusedly, "but—but—you see, it's this way. If I don't marry, somebody else will get the property?"

"Exactly," promptly assented the lawyer.

"And—I—I—don't want them to."

"Naturally enough."

"And I don't even know any gentlemen whom—whom I ever thought of marrying, except one, and he——"

"Except one. Ah, there is one, then! Have you known him long?" asked Brett, with increasing curiosity.

"No; only—only a very short time," she answered, her eyes dropping to the little chatelaine watch guard at her belt.

"Has he ever proposed marriage to you?"

"No, that's just it. I couldn't ask him, you know."

"Do you care for him?"

"I'm afraid—I do," she replied shyly, the blush on her cheek growing painfully hot and crimson.

She gave one swift, upward glance at Brett, and then her eyes fell again. That glance was an almost paralysing revelation to Edward Brett. He felt as if he were stifling for an instant, his heart seemed to suddenly stop beating and stand still. She saw that his lips had grown pale and were twitching nervously. He reached out his hand toward her with an impulsiveness that astonished himself:

"Miss Manfield, I love you. Will you marry me?"

A little sigh came from the girl's lips; a pallor swept over her face.

"You—surely—you do not mean it," she said. "How can you love me, me, whom you have never before seen?"

"It does look very much as if I were taking advantage of your helpless situation, but I am sincere in what I say. In this last brief hour I have learnt to love you. It seems strange to you, no doubt, but an irresistible attraction drew me to you from the first. I would not have dared presume to tell you this for many months to come, had not the conditions, that seemed so unfavourable to you, proved so auspicious to the love that possessed my heart at first sight, yet, if you cannot return that love, I swear to you never to betray the trust imposed in me. Should you marry me, that being a way out of your difficulties, you need not fear that I will in any way forfeit the confidence reposed in me."

Digitized by Google

"I know—oh, I know. I have already learnt your kindness. I cannot tell you more than I have already. That is not all the story, however; you ought to know it all, and then—"

"Never mind the rest; it can wait. I know enough. Can you trust me?" He held out his hands to her. She stood there before him, superb in her beauty.

"May Heaven help me," she said, with a little sob. "Yes, I do trust you. I will marry you. You will find me in my hotel at two this afternoon. You may come for me there."

Then the door closed and Brett was alone—alone to think over what had passed and ask himself if he were dreaming.

* * * * *

They were just returning from the registry office where the ceremony had taken place. Brett could not realize it all.

His head was in a whirl, and his heart was beating tumultuously.

He seemed suddenly to have lost his senses, to have taken up his being in another world. At length he found voice and spoke to her.

"I must leave you at your hotel and take the afternoon express for Bridgeton. A letter received from there demands my presence there to-morrow. Upon my return I will call on you and learn how further I may serve you. Be perfectly easy. Do not worry. Although speaking hastily, too hastily, in making an avowal of my love, let it be forgiven me inasmuch as I was sincere; that cannot prevent me being a steadfast friend to you, but I shall never obtrude myself upon you. Always remember that whenever you may need me I shall come to you."

She heard the half-sob in his throat as he spoke. She knew then, that, strange as it might be, he loved her.

"You will hear from me as soon as you return," she said simply.

The carriage had drawn up before the hotel; he had accompanied her to the ladies' reception room. He held out his hand in good-bye, and as she laid hers in his strong clasp her eyes met his for one brief instant, then fell before what she saw in them.

Her heart rebelled in one strange cry against this parting, and the sweet sensation of a still stranger love swept over her as, with clasped hands, they stood almost heart to heart; strangers, and yet husband and wife.

* * * * *

It was ten o'clock on the morning after Brett's strange bridal when he reached James and Burleigh's offices and was ushered into the private office of Mr. Burleigh, and that gentleman plunged immediately in medias res:

"You see we've just got round to this business of Erwin's—the late John Erwin, you know—schoolfellow of yours some years since. You know all about it, of course?"

"Erwin—Jack Erwin? Is he dead? It can't be!" ejaculated Brett, at a loss to comprehend what Burleigh was saying.

"Certainly—thought you were aware of the facts, of course; and, as I remarked before, we've been so very busy, we've just got to the will, you know. The matter has been in our hands for the last year, but slight complications having arisen, we have been all this time trying to get as far as the will. You are chief executor. He leaves his widow about £100,000. You know his wife, I presume—she was Miss Manfield—Elsie Manfield, and—why, what's the matter, man, are you ill? Here, sit here, and I'll get you a glass of brandy. Vertigo, I presume. Used to have bad attacks of that myself some years ago. Don't you call that pretty fair brandy?

"Well, as I was saying, Erwin married Miss Manfield—fine girl.

"Erwin was madly in love with his wife, and left her everything unconditionally, and—ah, excuse me for a moment—be back in a moment," as a call came from Mr. James summoning him into his office.

Brett finished his business with James and Burleigh in time to catch a late train back. When he reached his rooms, he received a letter that had arrived the evening before. Brett broke the seal and read the closely written page of large-sized note paper. It was from—his wife.

Brett felt as if he had assumed the identity of some other man, for he could scarcely recognise himself in the rôle of bridegroom as his eyes fell upon the first words of the letter:

MY OWN HUSBAND.—How strange it seems to write the words! How strange it will seem to you to read them! I scarcely know how to gain the courage to come to make the confession I must make; and still more do I wonder how I ever dared to take the step I did in regard to our marriage.

You said you loved me. I could hardly believe it possible that that for which I had prayed had come to pass; and yet some strange, strange influence has been drawing us together for years, yes, years. Before this time you have learnt a part of the truth: that I am the widow of Jack Erwin, your old schoolfellow. How often I have heard him talk of you and your college days together, and how little he knew what strange, strange fate was even then at work bringing us toward each other slowly but surely.

You have learnt this much from the lawyers, that he left all his money to me, unconditionally. And now comes my confession.

Edward, my husband, first of all let me tell you that longer than I dare acknowledge it to have been, longer than I dare remember, I have loved you with a blind, unreasoning, but pure love. I saw you but once, years ago, long before I married Jack, and at that one sight of your face I loved, I dare not say how much. You never even saw me, that you remember, before yesterday. I married Jack and tried to make him happy, and, I think succeeded. I never expected to meet you upon earth, but I could never have forgotten your face. It has haunted me through all these years.

Jack died, and I mourned him sincerely, but my sorrow and loneliness only revivified the love for you that I had tried to bury. I did not know how to reach you, or what to say to you after having found you, that would explain the state of my feelings, and yet not place me in an unwomanly light in your eyes, until the idea of writing out a false will occurred to me, and so I trumped up the story of my property and self being under guardianship, of my having to marry before a certain date, and all the rest of it. I thought you would do just as you did; you see I presupposed your chivalry, and everything worked beautifully! I have obtained through strategy the man I love, but you have acknowledged that you love me; you can't deny it!

I never would dare talk as I am writing, but love makes us bold. Can you forgive your wife's duplicity for the sake of the cause?—Yours for ever, ELSIE.

Mrs. Edward Brett, whose husband almost idolises her, by the way, often laughingly declares that, as far as her experience goes, consulting a lawyer is very expensive business, as she herself once gave £100,000 for a bit of legal advice. S. BAILEY.

Digitized by Google

Mohammed Ben Ali Fallen Among Thieves.

MOHAMMED Ben Ali to Ismail Mustapha, love that dieth not and greetings of great joy.

Behold, the wisdom of the land of sand and pomegranates hath stood me in great stead this day; whereof, I now sit me down to write unto thee the true and touching story. To-day I was walking in the street called Broad, because it is so narrow and crowded, when a benevolent-looking stranger, with a long, white beard, accosted me, saying:

"Hullo! Sheik Abdallah, how are you?"

"I am not the Sheik Abdallah," said I, "and I marvel that thou didst ever hear of him. I am simply Mohammed Ben Ali, a merchant of Bagdad."

"I beg your pardon," he said; "but you look just like the Sheik Abdallah, who used to travel with Barnum, many years ago."

I passed on, and had gone but a few yards when another benevolent looking stranger, wearing a large black moustache and a great diamond, accosted me, with a kindly smile, saying:

"Why, I am sure this must be the great Mohammed Ben Ali, of Bagdad."

"That is true," said I; "but how didst thou know it?"

"My friend, Boswell Poor, travelled in the East, and met you in Bagdad. If you will come round to my office, I'll send for him."

Now, Son of the Nightingale, my memory recalled no such man, but I thought it best to go. He took me through many streets, and at last to a small, poorly-lighted room, where we found another man sitting.

"Where's Boswell?" asked this man.

"I don't know," said my new friend, turning in his seat; "let us send for him."

So saying, he went to the door, and called in a loud voice into the hallways:

"John, go and tell Mr. Poor to come round at once."

I saw no boy in the hall as we entered, and when he had called, he closed the door and locked it. I was now suspicious, and I obtained possession of the key by means which thou knowest. My new friend sat down and whistled. Suddenly he said to the man at the table, as if by sudden inspiration:

"I say, Jim, shall we have a little game while we wait for Boswell?"

"I'll go you," said the other.

Then he produced some cards, and, selecting three, one of which was an ace, by a dexterous movement of the hands, spread them out, face downwards on the table. My friend bet a sovereign he could pick out the ace, and he promptly did so. This was repeated several times, and then, seeing that it was what they desired, I offered to bet.

The man with the cards distributed them clumsily, so that I could easily see which was the ace, and I won. This was repeated thrice. Then the man with the cards appeared to lose his temper, and bet me five that I could not do it the next time. Now, oh, Nephew of the Pomegranate, did I, as we are in the habit of saying in the mosque, scent the rodent; but knowing that I possessed all the magic of our people, I smiled and took the bet. This time the man distributed the cards very skilfully. Truly he must have studied this foolish art with long labour. I permitted him to win.

Then I bet him that I could do it the next time; and I did. He seemed a trifle disconcerted, and he laughed with difficulty. I was still £3 ahead. Once more I bet him, and this time I permitted him to win; the next time I won. This went on for a quarter of an hour, and I was still £3 ahead. The man with the cards began to perspire. We tried it once more with the bet increased to £5. I pointed out the card at the left as the ace.

"Wrong," said the man; "it's here."

And he turned up the card at the right. But it was a king. Then he turned up the one at the left, and it was the ace. I see thee smile as thou readest of my doing this old, old trick. But the man did not smile.

"There's some trick here," he said.

"Surely," said I, with great innocence, "no one could suspect trickery in this place."

I was now £8 a-head, but my manner re-assured my friend, and we went at it again, and again I won. The next time—I see thee smile again—no ace could be found at all.

"You duffer," said the man who took me there; "you've dropped it!"

They searched on the floor but could not find it. When they lifted their heads again, they beheld the ace standing on end on the table, and dancing. Brother of the Pyramids, I blush to tell thee that I practised this aged trick on these unsuspecting strangers; but I was anxious to measure their ignorance. They sprang to their feet and turned pale.

"What alarms you, friends?" I said. "There is a draught from the window which blows the cards about. Let us close it."

That re-assured them, and they closed the window. Then we began again. Once more the ace was missing. When they searched on the floor again, I determined now to bring to my aid our true art. The room began to grow dark. On the wall a luminous spot appeared. I bade them look at it, and, as they did so, I caused a large image of the ace to appear. The two men turned deadly pale. Then I caused aces to appear all over the room, of very many sizes, dancing and glowing.

"Holy herring!" exclaimed one of the men, with devout enthusiasm; "we've buncoed Old Nick!"

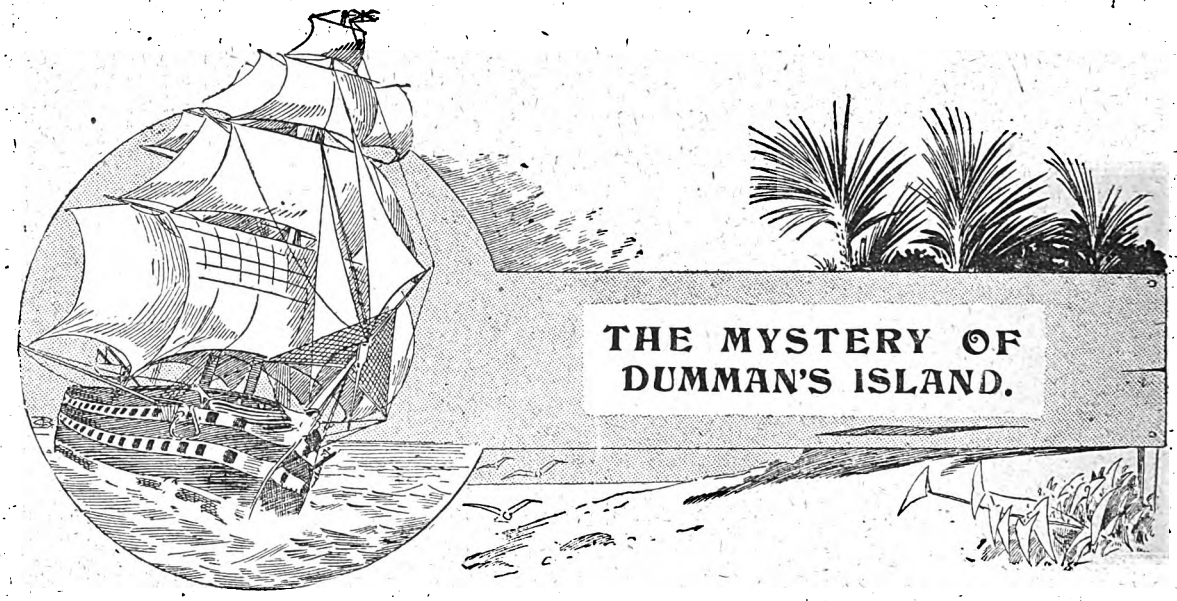
With that they made a rush for the door. But I had the key. The room began to fill with sulphurous smoke. The two men could not breathe. With a wild yell they hurled themselves through the window into the street, and, bleeding from many cuts, fled for their lives.

As for me, I put out the sulphur fire which I had kindled behind a chair, removed the wet handkerchief from my mouth, gathered up my cards and my mirrors, and departed in peace, £13 ahead.

Verily, Descendant of the Prophet, when thou goest abroad, always carry the apparatus of our Eastern art with thee, for mayhap it will be of goodly service.

A. C. BROWNING.

Digitized by Google



THE MYSTERY OF DUMMAN'S ISLAND.

In the heart of Wayne County, Pennsylvania, lies Lake Ariel, with alternating field and forests on its shores. Between hills to the north of it is the pretty village of Ariel.

The lake's southern bay bends sharply to the west, and just at this bend stands Dumman's Island, midway in the channel. This island, of not more than two acres, is covered with a growth of wild grass and stunted poplars. Why has the name of Dumman's Island been given to it?

The words are without doubt a corruption of the phrase, "Dumb Man's Island," and this is the story of its naming:

Towards the close of the last century, when the Miller and Purley families were hewing out farms from the hemlock forests south and east of the lake, a dumb man went to live on this island. Whence he came and how he subsisted no one knew, for no one ever visited his habitation. His known wish that people should avoid the island was respected.

The dumb man was seldom seen on the mainland. He was tall, straight, vigorous of motion, and was courteous to a nicety; but on looking into his clear eyes people instinctively felt that to cross his will would be dangerous. So he was left alone upon his island.

But there were two boys in the Jones settlement who resolved to visit the dumb man's island together, and explore the mystery of his habitation. The name of one of these boys was Robert Jones; the identity of the other was uncertain, but he is said to have been Will Purley.

Their opportunity came one afternoon when the dumb man visited the mainland, called at the house of Robert's father, and indicated his intention of going still further into the clearing. The boys slipped away, entered a boat, and paddled hurriedly across the half-mile of water to a gravelly beach on one side of the dumb man's island. Here they pulled their boat up, and left it under cover of some overhanging bushes.

It was in October, and darkness was already coming on, but the rising moon promised the boys sufficient light for exploration.

Towards the centre of the island, with a path leading up to it from the beach, was the dumb man's cabin—a rude stone structure pieced out with wood. The boys started towards it, but before they had taken half-a-dozen steps they stopped in amazement at the sound of a singing voice. They could distinguish no words, but the tune was familiar to them, and every note was plainly made out.

The voice was unlike any they had ever before heard. It was very sweet and very sad, and of a penetrating, tremulous, and unearthly tone.

The boys gazed at each other in dismay, and then, with one mind, retreated to their boat, which they drew into the shade of the bushes none too soon; for the next moment something emerged from the hut, and moved slowly in the dim light towards the beach.

It was a strange-looking creature, that partly rolled, partly dragged itself along the path, tumbling from side to side, stopping often as if for a moment's rest. If it had limbs they were invisible. It bore no bodily likeness to man or beast, save that once what seemed its white face gleamed for an instant in the moonlight.

The boys crept into their boat and seized their paddles to push off; but even as they did so they heard a faint splash of water on the lake, and, turning, saw the dumb man coming rapidly from the opposite shore. He sat with his back towards them rowing his boat. The lads, hardly daring to breathe, crouched down into the shadow of their little craft.

The strange figure on the path moved on with halting motion to the water's edge. The dumb man, with a few long, powerful strokes of the oars, sent the keel of his boat far up on the gravel of the beach. He leapt lightly to the ground, caught the strange object up in his arms, and kissed it. Then, most marvellous of all things, he talked to it!

The dumb man actually talked! The boys could not distinguish his words—at least, they were never able to tell what he said; but they knew that his voice was clear and musical, and they remembered that he spoke cheerfully and lovingly, and that once he laughed. They remembered, too, that the strange being answered, whether in words or not they could never say.

Digitized by Google

Talking to and caressing the burden in his arms, the man walked up the path from the beach and entered the hut.

The boys did not wait a moment to effect their escape. They pushed their boat off, leapt into it, and paddled away towards home as if for their lives.

When the wake of moonlit water grew long behind them they breathed more freely, but they did not feel completely at ease until they shot into the shadows of the eastern shore.

Before the blazing logs in the kitchen fireplace the boys that night told the story of their adventure to a family group of excited listeners.

The next day the strange tale, with exaggerations, went the rounds of the neighbourhood. The result was that fifteen men of the settlements met in the kitchen of Henry Jones' house three nights later to discuss the situation.

The general opinion seemed to be that the dumb man had given himself up to heathen practices, and that he kept on his island a strange and awful being whom he worshipped as a god. It was soon decided to visit his premises, with intent to expel the dumb man and destroy his deity, if examination proved their surmises to be correct.

"When shall we go?" asked one.

"Now! To-night! At once!" said several.

James Miller arose to counsel moderation and delay; but the magnetic impulse which sways larger bodies had already done its work here. With one accord the men seized their rifles and passed out into the night.

They hurried to the lake, embarked in three boats, and soon reached the beach at Dumb Man's Island. At the landing-place all was still. The moon was full, and the pale leaves of the poplar trees shivered white in the light wind.

Watching the bushes closely for an ambush, the men disembarked, drew up their boats, and gathered compactly to move on the dumb man's hut; but, before they could take one step forward, the dumb man emerged from the cabin door and came rapidly towards them.

They saw that he was armed. At fifteen paces from them he stopped, rested the butt of his rifle on the gravel at his feet, waved his hand towards them, pointed to the empty boats and then across the lake to their homes.

There was no mistaking his meaning. His face, white and haggard in the moonlight, was desperate with earnestness.

The men who faced him knew that he was in no mood for trifling; but they had come prepared for resistance, and were not to be turned back so easily.

Sam Purley stepped one pace to the front, and said:

"We have an errand here. When it is finished we will go back, not before. You have deceived us; you set yourself up to be dumb, but those are with us have heard you talk within the last four days. Those are with us who have seen you, on your island here, caress some strange creature in the form of neither man nor beast. Listen! We want no heathen gods among us, nor yet the worshippers of them. We demand that you bring out the thing that you keep here."

The form of the dumb man straightened and hardened till its rigid outlines seemed to inclose a thing of iron and steel. On his face were first the red marks of anger, then it paled with the white hue of pain.

Again he pointed commandingly to the lake and the eastern shore. When no heed was paid to his mute command he lifted his rifle to the level of his chin, and tapped the barrel of the piece significantly.

Then old Richard Miller, gaunt and bent, but hot-headed as in youth, cried out:

"Ay, you can fire! Fire if you will; but in one second from the time you touch the trigger you will be riddled with bullets. And what'll your heathen god do then, with your body dead on the sand? Answer me that."

The dumb man dropped his rifle in his hands, and lowered his head as if in painful thought. For the moment there was silence. No one stirred. All clearly heard the poplar leaves shivering, and the little waves that lapped the beach.

Suddenly, from the direction of the hut, came a sound strangely like and unlike a human voice, fine and thrilling, dying soon into a sad and tremulous wail.

A look of yearning and dread came over the dumb man's face as he glanced towards his hut. Throwing his rifle to the ground at his feet, he turned full upon his visitors, and reached out his hands to them beseechingly. Then at length he began to speak:

"Gentleman," he said, "it is true that I am not dumb I have imposed upon you, but I have done you no harm I am a man as you are men. I worship the God whom you worship. I have no heathen deity here. I have nothing here that calls for your disapproval. Believe me, I pray you, and go, that I may be alone."

Sam Purley again spoke up.

"If you have nothing here that is evil," he said, "no harm will come of our seeing what you have. Again we tell you to bring it forth."

The dumb man, for so he must still be called, since he was never known in that region by any other name, advanced a few steps and stood for a moment looking intently into the faces of the visitors. They could see the trembling of his lower lip and the glistening of tears in his eyes, for the moonlight fell full upon him. Then he said:

"Gentlemen, give me three days to myself. It is all I ask. At the end of that time come again. I shall be here. All that I have will be here. Then I will show you everything. I will tell you everything. But now I ask you to go. See! I fall on my knees and implore you to go. As you are men, with hearts in your bosoms, I beseech you, by the love you bear your children, to go and leave me with my own."

He was on his knees on the sand. His hands were clasped before him, his head was bowed to his bosom, and his strong frame was shaken with emotion.

The men who faced him looked at each other in silence. Then from the hut came again that unearthly cry. It was sharp and piercing now, and full of agony. It vibrated on the air till the moonlight itself seemed tremulous.

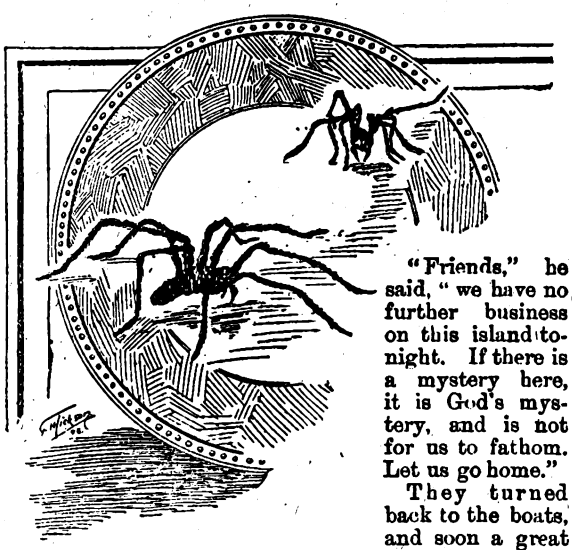
The kneeling man rose, turned his white face for one moment to his visitors, and then for one moment to the sky.

"Friends or foes," he said, "may the Heaven counsel you!"

Without another word he strode swiftly up the path away from the intruders, and disappeared in the shadows of his hut.

For a full minute no one of the intruders spoke; they were under the melancholy spell of that last agonised cry. Then Henry Jones stepped out to the front from among them, earnest and awe-stricken.

Digitized by Google



"Friends," he said, "we have no further business on this island to-night. If there is a mystery here, it is God's mystery, and is not for us to fathom. Let us go home."

They turned back to the boats, and soon a great expanse of moonlit water lay between them and the shadowed shore of the island.

Three days later the dumb man came, at evening, to the house nearest the lake. His eyes bore traces of long weeping, and his face was haggard and pitiful to look on. To the man who met him at the door he said simply:

"Tell the men who came to my island three nights ago that it is my wish that they shall come again to-morrow, after midday, and bring with them someone to perform the rite of Christian burial."

Then he went away.

Word was sent throughout the settlement, a minister was found, and the next day three boats grated on the sandy beach of the island. The dumb man met his visitors at the landing-place, and as they stepped ashore he grasped each man's hand and said:

"I thank you."

After a little while he told them the story. Standing before them with bared head, he said:

"My friends, we are in the presence of death. At sunrise yesterday a soul went up from that hut to Heaven. With my own hands I have coffined the clay and dug the grave. He who died was my child. His bodily form was not like yours or mine. To human eyes he was abhorrent. Thirteen years ago I brought him here, a babe, and kept from him the sight of all human beings save myself, that he might not realise the horror of his own deformity. The better to thwart the curiosity of others I deceived you with a feigned dumbness. For this I now ask your pardon."

He paused. Some one in the company managed to blunder out that he had done right, and need ask no one's pardon.

Tears came into the dumb man's eyes and a great tenderness into his voice, and he said again:

"I thank you. My friends, in that blighted body yonder there lived as sweet and beautiful a soul as ever passed to immortality. For thirteen years I have shut my eyes to all this fearfulness of form, and delighted in the strong and steadfast love of that loving child. I declare to you to-day that I have borne no cross save this cross of parting, and even that becomes a crown of gladness on my head when I think of that bright spirit freed from its dread imprisonment, as fair and glorious now as are the angels of Heaven."

His eyes were lifted upwards, his face was transfigured with joy, and those who looked on him said afterwards that he must have seen the spirit of his child.

From the rude casket smiled a dead face that was worthy of the sculptor's chisel or the painter's brush, so very beautiful was it as it lay there in the sweet serenity of death.

Tenderly the bearers bore the coffined body to its grave; tenderly were said the words of Christian burial.

When all was over the dumb man turned in his boat and looked, for the last time in life, on the rocky shores and yellowing foliage of his island home. Over the grave of his child for a hundred years the wild grass has grown and the leaves of the poplars have shivered in the wind, but no one now can mark the place of burial, and even the island's story is nearly lost and forgotten.

P. MANNERING.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS
GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☞ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 5 distribution must reach us by November 7th addressed to The 5th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the Second Distribution appears on page 589.

Digitized by Google

OUR CLIENT'S MONEY.

"THERE are some lives that are lived which in thrilling experiences savour more of drama than reality. I think I may consider some of my own actual experiences quite as sensational and dramatic as any set forth with the accompaniments of stage scenery," remarked Mr. Luscome, as he closed the door of his private office behind a client who had sought his legal services in a particularly sensational case.

Returning to his chair with a deep sigh of relief that his office hours were over for the day, he opened a box of choice cigars and pushed it towards me, lighting one himself and settling down for a quiet hour of relaxation and social chat.

"I remember," he resumed, "one instance particularly perhaps because it occurred while I was still young and impressionable and somewhat inexperienced; anyhow, I thought it thrilling enough at the time.

"I was about twenty and was reading law in the office of an old friend of my father's.

"One morning Mr. Evans called me into his private room, and told me that he had some business of a confidential nature that would necessitate sending me to a small village twenty miles out, at once. He then went to the safe and took out a box containing what appeared to be a large amount of money in notes of various denominations, which he ran over, counting rapidly.

"'Here, you count it also,' he said, indicating the pile of bank-notes and nodding towards a chair, which I drew up to the desk in front of him. I then began running over the notes slowly and carefully, he watching the operation.

"There was exactly five thousand pounds.

"'How much do you make it?' he asked.

"'Exactly five thousand,' I replied.

"'Precisely,' he returned. 'Now, I place these notes in your care. You are responsible for them from now on. Here, you'd better put them in this bag, and put the wallet into an inside pocket; and don't remove them until you have given them over to old Mrs. Harlow. Here's her address, and here is a time-table; make it as early a train as possible. That's all; be as quick as you can.'

"I thrust the wallet into the breast pocket of my coat, and walked out of the private office and made for my own desk.

"I knew the old lady, Mrs. Harlow; that is, I had seen her many times, she having been a client of the firm ever since I had been in the office, but I knew only this about her—that she was the widow of an old and eccentric gentleman who had died some five years since, and that the firm had been engaged, off and on, ever since, in arranging the affairs of the estate.

"The old lady herself was exceedingly fussy, and it did not do to displease her. This was probably why I was being rushed so in regard to getting the money to her at just such a time, although, for the life of me, I couldn't understand why the old lady must have that sum of money in such haste; but it wasn't my business to know or understand anything about it.

"I let the bag remain in the inside pocket of my coat, where I had first placed it, donning my overcoat and taking a cab to the station just in time to catch the one o'clock train.

"The day was raw and chilly, and the outlook from the car window was anything but diverting, as a slow, wet snow had begun to fall, and melted as it came, sifting and swirling and clinging to the window-glass, making a bleak, disagreeable blur of the landscape.

"When I reached Stillwell Station, I looked about for a fly.

"No sort of conveyance was in sight. I walked up to the porter and asked him the nearest and most direct way to Mrs. Harlow's residence.

"'It's a good bit up from here,' he replied, eyeing me curiously. 'Never been there before?'

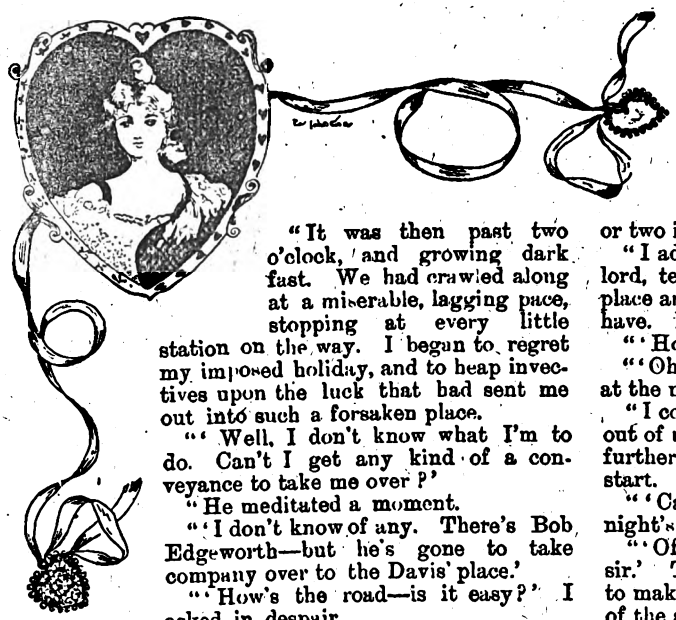
"I assured him that I had not, else I should not be asking questions about how to find the place.

"'About how far is it?' I repeated.

"'Oh, about six miles, I should say,' he replied.

"'Six miles!' I repeated aghast. Six miles in such weather!

Digitized by Google



"It was then past two o'clock, and growing dark fast. We had crawled along at a miserable, lagging pace, stopping at every little station on the way. I began to regret my imposed holiday, and to heap invectives upon the luck that had sent me out into such a forsaken place.

"'Well, I don't know what I'm to do. Can't I get any kind of a conveyance to take me over?'

"He meditated a moment.

"'I don't know of any. There's Bob Edgeworth—but he's gone to take company over to the Davis' place.'

"'How's the road—is it easy?' I asked in despair.

"'Yes, the road's all right,' the porter replied. 'You want to take that one that leads up the hill for a couple of miles or so.'

"And then he launched into a full explanation.

"I pulled my collar up about my ears, drew my hat down and started. I tramped steadily on until dark, when I came to the junction of the road as the man had said.

"Not a person had I met in all the way, nor seen any signs of life. The snow had stopped falling, and the afternoon or evening was keen and frosty.

"As I travelled on with hastening steps I came finally to a small, two-storey house, built in what seemed to me a queer sort of way, as nearly as I could see, with rambling balconies and grass plots. I had half a mind to call and make inquiries about a conveyance to take me the rest of the way, but seeing no light, concluded the place was unoccupied, and went on.

"Finally I came to a large open space of broken ground, and discovered that I had either lost the road or else that the road didn't lead any further, but stopped a little way back. I tried to retrace my steps, but in the darkness could not see many feet ahead, and concluded I might as well push on in the hope of at last coming upon some habitation. The whole country so far appeared to have been deserted.

"On and on I laboured through drifts, now up and now down into ditches, it seemed to me for miles. I began to feel nervous, as there flashed across my mind all the stories I had ever read of travellers becoming lost in blizzards, for the wind was rising again and the snow began to fall and was driven into my face till it nearly blinded me.

"At length a faint ray of light in the distance, shining out upon my weariness and desolation, revived my spirits and hastened my steps.

"As I approached, I found that the light came from the small window of a little hovel like place that might have served as the habitation of some crank of a hermit.

"I walked up to the door and rapped loudly.

"'Who is it?' a gruff voice asked.

"'A traveller inquiring the way,' I responded: whereupon the door was opened and the swarthy face of a man peered out. He bade me come in, and glad to get within any kind of shelter, I obeyed with alacrity.

"The place seemed to be a sort of bar-room. This, then, must be the the wayside inn of which the porter had spoken. There were four or five rough-looking men and a woman or two in the place.

"I addressed myself to the one I took to be the land lord, telling him I was on my way to Mrs. Ha low's place and asked if he had any kind of a trap I could have. No, there was not.

"'How far is it from here?' I asked.

"'Oh, 'bout five or six miles or so,' he replied, glancing at the men sitting at the further end of the room.

"I couldn't believe it possible. I had wandered miles out of my way then. It was impossible to try to go any further; I must wait till morning and make a fresh start. I was done up.

"'Can I be accommodated with some supper and a night's lodging?' I asked.

"'Of course you can; sit down and warm yourself, sir.' The men about the fire pushed back their chairs to make room for mine, which the landlord set in front of the stove.

"After I had sat down, the conversation which my advent had evidently interrupted, was resumed, and I took the opportunity to have a look at my companions. I didn't like the look of them. They were, as I have said, rough-looking customers, and evil of countenance. They evidently cared no more for me, for after scrutinising me without taking pains to conceal their curiosity, they turned their attention to each other and said little to me.

"One of the women present was bustling about preparing supper, the fumes of which were most agreeable.

"I sat half dozing before the fire until supper was announced, when we all sat down to the table together, as the landlady seemed in no wise inclined to make any distinction in her attentions, evidently regarding me as no better than the others.

"The supper tasted good, and I ate heartily. After the meal was over, we resumed our seats by the fire and sat smoking comfortably. After finishing my pipe I withdrew, asking to be shown my bed, explaining that I was extremely tired, and must be up and on my way early next morning. The landlord lighted a candle, took my overcoat upon his arm, and led the way up a narrow flight of unarpeted stairs to a small dark room, where he set the candle down upon a table, bade me good-night, and withdrew.

"I sat down upon the side of the narrow uninviting-looking bed, and gazed about me. The room was quite small, bare and cheerless, and had a damp smell about it. I discovered that there was no lock on the door. I determined to take a nap without undressing, so blew out the candle and lay down across the bed.

"It was cold and uncomfortable. I could hear the preparations for the night going on downstairs, such as doors being closed and locked, or barred. Finally, chilled through, I decided to go downstairs myself and get a glass of whisky to keep me warm. I started down in my stocking feet.

"The lights were burning dimly, but the sullen-looking individuals, together with the landlord, were still sitting, smoking, round the fire, and conversing in low earnest tones. The creaking of the stairs under my feet warned them of my approach; and, glancing up and seeing me, they ceased talking, while the landlord advanced urbanely to see what I wanted.

Digitized by Google

"He procured the whisky and I drank it and retraced my steps upstairs to my room, but with a new determination not to sleep. Something in the manner of the men had put unpleasant ideas into my mind, and made me suspicious.

"I ought to have known better than to drink the whisky under the circumstances. Again I threw myself upon the bed, while a pleasant sensation of warmth, comfort and drowsiness crept over me. Before I knew it I was off in a doze.

"I was awakened by a soft, rustling noise outside my door, and the sound of breathing. A thrill of apprehension shot through me.

"I am not, and never was, a cowardly man. I had heretofore never known the sensation of fear, but now my heart was beating wildly, and I began to tremble all over. I waited a moment or so until thoroughly awake and confident; then I got up from the bed as softly as I could, and felt about for some weapon of defence.

"The storm was evidently over, for the moon was shining directly into the uncurtained window. I peered about in the light of it, but there was nothing at hand with which to ward off a possible attack.

"I had nothing in my pockets except a small pearl-handled paper-cutter in a morocco case, a dainty gift of recent date, and a silver match-box.

"All was silent. I pressed my ear to the crack of the door and listened. Presently there was a whispered consultation, and I heard the words in what seemed to be a woman's voice:

"'There's the knife! Where's Bill?'

"'Keep quiet—you'll wake him. Bill's gone after the rope.'

"Then all was silent again. I must do something and that quick. An idea seized me—the matches!

"I reached the bed and grasped a sheet; snatching it off I hastily wound it into a small roll, and crept to the fireplace. The place was old, and the wind blew down in great gusts. I pushed the roll of calico into the aperture and applied a match to it.

"It blazed furiously, but now blew up and now down the chimney, and out into the room. The bed was near by.

"The smoke came puffing out into the room from the burning sheet in the chimney, and, as it did so, I lit another match and held it to the mattress on the bed. In an instant the bed was ablaze.

"Then was the time for the last move in my desperate game. I came on to my feet with a bound intended to be heard, and springing to the door shouted:

"'Fire! Fire!'

"The smoke was pouring out from every crack of door and window.

"Again I raised the cry of alarm. I heard the sound of scuttling footsteps, and knew my host and his amiable associates in a would-be hideous crime were trying to escape from the vicinity of my door without my discovering them.

"Then my cry was repeated from below, and they came rushing upstairs and into my room while I passed them on the stairs with a volume of black smoke pouring after me. It choked them and they had to turn back.

"'Water! water!' I cried wildly, and snatching up a pail I rushed out into the yard.

"The landlord was shouting to the others, and I heard someone say the fire had caught in the chimney.

"They rushed down and out with pails and buckets to the well, but before they could regain the second floor they were driven back by the flames that by this time were encompassing everything; besides, they were so bewildered and distracted that they scarcely knew what they were about.

"'My wallet!' I cried, frantically feigning the greatest anguish and despair, and pretending to make a dash up the burning stairs. 'In Heaven's name, my wallet! It was under my pillow! A hundred pounds to the man who gets it!'

"The man designated as Bill looked at me for an instant bewildered, and then rushed by me and disappeared in the smoke, then, an instant later, dashed out again blackened and burnt, driven back by the flames.

"I was wailing and wringing my hands excitedly, when the sound of galloping horses' hoofs drew near, and several men on horseback and in carts came upon the scene.

"But it was too late. The flames were licking up everything, and all of us stood by shivering and watching it burn. In an hour all that was left of the wayside inn was a mass of blackened and charred ruins.

"One of the men who rode up to lend their aid took mine host and his wife and associates home for the night, while I rode away with another.

"As morning broke, I hastily swallowed a cup of coffee, borrowed a horse, and resumed my journey to Mrs. Harlow, and delivered up the money to her in person.

"'Dear me!' she simpered, as she counted the bank notes and wrote out a receipt, 'there wasn't any such great hurry for the money. I only wanted to know that Mr. Evans had it ready in case I should happen to want it.'

"I returned to my respected employer, and although I didn't tell him the whole story out and out (for arson isn't an agreeable word, and I didn't wish to make any trouble for myself or him either), still he understood, and in some way gave the old lady to understand that I had played the part of a hero in order to save her money.

"Of course, you know that I became acquainted with the only niece of Mrs. Harlow shortly afterwards and that lady is now my wife. When we were married the aunt insisted upon making me a present of exactly five thousand pounds, and the firm took me into partnership."

J. CLARKE.

JONES: "Which travels the faster, heat or cold?"

JONES: "Heat, of course. You cannot catch heat, but you can catch cold."

"MAMMA, I dess you'll have to turn the hose on me."

"Why, dear?"

"'Tas I've got my 'tockins on wrong side out."

"I WON'T have you," said the leading lady tragically to the low comedian. "Never approach me again on the subject. My mind's made up."

"So's everything else about you," and then he fell through a garden scene to dodge the withering glance she shot at him.

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXIX.

A Secret Mission.

Quetta is lively enough at all times. Perched upon the hills in that narrow province which keeps apart two savage and mysterious countries, it seems to look down upon them both like an alert and fearless sentinel, ready at a moment to give the alarm and call to action the sleepless army that guards our Eastern Empire. Quetta is the Metz of India.

This British outpost felt the thrill of its own power, and like a strong man, was full of life and movement, as the English troops began to muster within the cantonment, and camp upon the hillsides.

It was an extraordinary spectacle, surely, which no country in the world but one could afford. The opulent East, with her infinite variety of race and tongue, seemed represented here in endless confusion; and over all dominated the watchful Briton, impartially supreme, holding firmly in his hand the ends of all this perplexed entanglement of humanity, the one being who gave harmony and unity to a bewildering puzzle.

At the headquarters' mess were gathered officers of all degrees known to the staff and of all regiments, and the crowded room was alive with animated talk, as men sat or stood around the table, snatching a hasty meal, too preoccupied to eat heartily, and flushed with the excitement which the near prospect of fighting roused in them.

Youthful subalterns, rejoicing in the sabre-tache of the A.D.C., with the splendid certainty of youth, planned out a brilliant campaign and won a hundred battles against unheard-of odds; while the older men, anxious, though scarcely less excited, applied the fruits of their experience earnestly to the situation and speculated on the plan of attack.

At one of the tables there came a moment's lull in the conversation, and Captain Bradley, of the 2nd Gurkhas, leaning over to Graham, of the 5th Lancers, asked:

"What has become of Adams all this time?"

This seemingly innocent question attracted to him in a moment the attention of all in the vicinity.

"Adams!" exclaimed Captain Graham, a little startled. "Yes, it's very queer. He got leave two months ago, and he hasn't been recalled yet."

"What makes it singular," said Bradley, "is that exactly the same thing occurred to Hutchinson of Ours. He had barely come back from England when he asked for leave and got it, although there were definite rumours of war about at the time, and he's an awfully valuable man."

"Did he go home?" asked a subaltern.

"No, that's the funny part of it. Then there's Haughton of the 36th Sikhs, and Anderson gave me four cases the other day where some of the best officers in different regiments had been granted leave, all at the same time, and in not a single case did there seem the slightest cause for it."

Graham stroked his chin reflectively and meditated.

"It's a devilish strange case," he said after this effort had brought him back again to dubiety. "Where are they all gone? Why don't they come back? Why are they not ordered to rejoin their regiments?"

"Yes; and why are they all such particularly valuable men?" added Bradley.

"It's jolly hard luck for them, anyhow. I wonder what Hutchinson thinks of being left out of the fun."

Snatching a hasty meal.

"But is he?"

It was a meek lieutenant who spoke, and Bradley turned swiftly upon him in surprise.

"Why, what do you think is up?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't know," was the modest answer. "But it seems to me to be just a little too peculiar for a coincidence. There are about twenty of the best officers in the army, all of them of experience and peculiar fitness. They all take a holiday when they don't want it; and they all disappear and leave no traces behind them. If you think it's an accident, why, you are entitled to your opinion; but I say there's something mighty cute going on somewhere, and, you mark my words, they're doing their work somewhere, and will turn up all serene, just exactly when they have done it."

Digitized by Google

It was indeed a curious affair, but, after vainly trying to solve the mystery, the group of officers gave it up, pronouncing it to be inexplicable save in the higher logic of the Sirkar.

Perhaps their perplexity would have increased had they been witnesses of a little scene that was then in course of transaction in a small and wretched native village some sixty miles north.

As the Sibi-Quetta railway drags itself with difficulty up the rough and hilly country which stretches to the borders of Afghanistan, it leaps a terrific chasm in the Pishin Range, and disappears just as it is reaching its final stage, into a tunnel. The traveller has had his last look at India, for when the train emerges from the famous Khojack Tunnel, it is brought to a stand in the little terminus of Chaman, and the Kandahar valley is at his feet. Here the great iron road ceases abruptly and almost reluctantly, and the civilised arts, thus pressed to the uttermost limit, are bidden back by the triumphant barbarism, holding its savage stage beyond. The engine gives place to the camel.

But where sleeper and bolt and chain and rail may not pass, the pick and the shovel have forced their way, and a broad level road carries on the tale to Kandahar.

And this artery of commerce at every step whispers promise of the iron rails, for it has been made to carry them; and when the time has come, suddenly and swiftly there will spring up a new permanent way which will carry the engine to the gates of the city.

It was here, at Chaman, and in view of the high road that penetrated the country of the Afghan, that Major General Galbraith, commanding the Quetta district, stood in conversation with a tall, distinguished-looking officer, whose charger's reins were looped through his left arm. At some distance, prepared as for a long and arduous journey, were four men, one an Englishman, and three of Indian birth.

There was an unusually grave look on the General's face as he addressed his companion, Captain W. J. Peyton, of the 7th Bombay Lancers, the man who had earned the C.M.G. for leading the Egyptian troops out of Harrar.

"I have kept to the last moment, by instructions from headquarters," he said, "the orders which I have to transmit to you. My duty is simple, and I cannot say that I can throw any light on most of the questions you have asked me. My instructions are to associate with you an officer of experience and special knowledge and three thoroughly reliable native officers, such as you would care to take on a dangerous mission. You are, I understand, satisfied?"

"Most satisfied," answered Captain Peyton with a glance at the adjoining group.

"You could not have better assistance," agreed the General. "Captain R. G. R. de Vismes, of the 10th Bombay Infantry, is an instructor in army signalling, he has the certificates for higher standard Persian and Pushtu, he holds one for French, he is a qualified interpreter of German, and has a passed certificate for Russian. These qualifications, I am instructed, will be invaluable to you."

The Captain looked puzzled at this extraordinary recital. The General appeared to have been specially coached in de Vismes' many acquirements.

"Then there are not three better native officers than Risaldar Shah Nawaz Khan, and Jemadars Musa Khan and Gurdal Singh. They are proficient in tongues, and all three brave men," went on General Galbraith.

"But what am I to do with them?" asked Captain Peyton. "And why this costume?" and he looked down at his attire, which was of semi-native character, half uniform, half disguise.

"I do not know," replied the General, "you will find out later. Meanwhile, I am to hand you this packet. You will ride as hard as possible to Kandahar, and there open it. You will find a second sealed letter and instructions for yourself with certain safe-conducts from the Amir and others. Everything is there explained. You are not to divulge the contents of your letter to anyone save to Captain de Vismes, so that in case of accident to yourself he may be able to act for you. If you both fail then the mission is to be intrusted to the senior among the native officers. I am only at liberty to tell you that you must be prepared for very many days of hard riding. You are each provided with a second horse and this will greatly facilitate your journey. For the rest, have patience; at Kandahar everything will be clear."

"And you shall run there, dog and liar!"

Captain Peyton took the packet and buttoned it closely beneath his tunic.

"I understand perfectly," he replied gravely. "I am thankful for the trust and for being appointed to this special service and post of danger. Whatever my duty is, I will do it as far as a man may."

"Good-bye," said the General as he held out his hand, not without emotion; "good-bye—and come back!"

In a few minutes the little company had ridden off along the great highway, and were lost to view.

* * * * *

Sir George White, Commander-in-Chief in India, took the field in person at the head of the 1st Army Corps.

This consisted of 50,000 men, who were strategically grouped to afford the utmost possible rapidity in concentration upon Quetta. The 2nd and 3rd Army Corps of 50,000 men each were equally well prepared in mobilisation and transport, but as they must be collected and forwarded from Bengal, the Central Provinces, Lower Bombay, the Madras Presidency, and even far distant Burmah, they necessarily required more time to reach the frontier of Afghanistan.

Commissariat arrangements for each corps were quite complete, but owing to the limited capacities of the Sibi-Quetta line and the Bolan Pass route, Sir George White decided that an interval of a week should elapse between the departure from Quetta of the head of each of the three great columns.

By arrangement with the Ameer of Kabul, whose wishes were most ably and energetically carried out by Sir Salter Pyne, his trusted agent and engineer, vast quantities of forage and such stores as the country afforded were dispatched along the Hazara and Hari Rud valleys to Kandahar and Herat, which latter place, it was calculated, the advance guard of the British Army would reach about the 28th of June.

From Persia, too, it was confidently anticipated that the acute merchants of Khorassan would send supplies of grain and provender when such a good customer as the Government of India was in the field.

Both Amir and Shah were fully aware that the conquest of England by the allies meant the prompt absorption of Persia and Afghanistan into the Russian Empire. Although the timorous Persian potentate dared not, at first, take active steps to assist the English by troops, he quickly made it known that caravans might, with all safety, use the Yazdin and Khaf trade routes, which was all that the British Commander required.

Digitized by Google

But Abdurrahman Khan, Amir of Kabul, was made of stronger metal.

Horse, foot, and artillery did he muster with all speed, placing them unreservedly at the disposal of Sir George White, and as a telegraph line now connected the Afghan capital with Peshawur, the Commander-in-Chief was, as we shall see, enabled to make use of these singular but valuable allies from the first moment that hostilities broke out.

The total British and native troops in India were 150,000, being almost evenly divided in racial numbers.

In addition to them were 60,000 Imperial Service troops, raised and armed by the different princes of high degree scattered throughout the Indian Empire.

The help of these levies, which for some years had been periodically inspected and approved by English officers set apart for the work, was promptly offered to and accepted by the Government.

From these sources, including the Afghan contingent, Sir George White calculated upon having nearly a quarter of a million of effective troops, all thoroughly seasoned to the climate and other conditions of Eastern warfare, under his command when he concentrated his forces at Merv early in July.

The loyalty of India had now been put to its first great test, and the country had passed through the ordeal exactly as most sensible men predicted would be the case.

It is not that the Mussulman and Hindu populations of that great dependency have, or pretended to have, any special reference for British domination.

If there be such a thing as patriotic feeling or national enthusiasm in the East—a very doubtful postulate—it could hardly be expected to burn furiously at the shrine of a strange land 7,000 miles away.

But that which certainly does obtain beyond the Exile's Gate is self-interest, and every personal and commercial instinct revolted against the idea of exchanging British for Russian Rule.

Every intelligent native of India laughed at the idea, and as the majority of the people neither know nor care who it is that governs them, the chance of Russian sympathies causing internal disturbances was slight indeed.

Nevertheless, to make quite sure, a number of Russian spies and some two thousand of the most dangerous fakirs were quietly lodged in gaol as a precautionary measure.

The only real danger to public peace arose from the budmash or disorderly classes among the population—that large and easily excited section of society which sees in rapine and revolution the opportunity for plunder.

Rich natives had more to fear from these gentry than the Europeans, as there is no pleasure in this world so keen for a Pathan dacoit as to cut the throat of a Bengali banker.

Special police precaution were necessary, and the volunteers, to the number of 28,000, were mobolised, armed with ball cartridge, and kept up constant patrols in the bazaars and along the main roads.

So successful were the measures taken by the authorities, that out of nearly 300 millions of people resident in the Indian Empire something like five-sixths of them never knew that a war had begun, or ended.

* * *

A commissariat of camels.

Lord Elgin was anxiously examining the transport and commissariat arrangements in company with the Military Member of Council, Lieut.-General Sir Henry Brackenbury, when the news came of the departure from Australia of the first contingent of 20,000 troops for home service.

"They are going by way of Vancouver and the Canadian Pacific," observed the Viceroy. "How long will it be before they reach England?"

"At best they cannot get there before the end of June," said the officer.

"And by that time Canada and the United States will have poured ten times the number of men into France and Germany," went on Lord Elgin.

"Yes," assented the military member. "These Cornstalks would be more useful to us, with our relatively small British forces than to England."

"Why should they not come to our aid?" cried Lord Elgin. "Arrange at once that the Governor of Hong Kong shall confer with Admiral Freemantle and Major-General Hutton with the object of diverting the fleet to Karachi and disembarking them there. Don't forget to promise the Australians that they shall have their fill of fighting before they see Moscow."

When the time came the Australian officers and men were delighted with the proposal. Thus it happened that Sir George White led into Central Asia the most mixed, and perhaps the strongest, armed force that the world had ever seen.

CHAPTER XXX.

The Crossing of the Helmund.

General Alikhanoff was the man ordained by fate to lead the Russian advance upon India.

Himself no Russian, being a Daghestanu named Ali Khan at birth, the Kismet of the East, which corresponds to Napoleon's Marshal's baton carried in the knapsack of every private soldier, led him to high command in Central Asia.

But the trusted representative of the Tsar must have a more distinguished title than ancestry provided, so Ali Khan became Alikhanoff, which is a fine-sounding name, and means a good deal on the Afghan frontier.

He was the central personage in Transcaspian politics, the wolf ever ready to pounce upon his prey, the living embodiment of the ceaseless creeping of Russia upon India.

But now the attitude of crouching watchfulness was abandoned.

Two words from St. Petersburg: "To Kandahar," set in motion the vast organisation which had of late been perfecting itself for the expected march, and the scar across Alikhanoff's forehead became livid with excitement as he gave the necessary order to his staff.

The imperial plan was boldly simple. No nonsense this time about armies crossing the Alps of the Pamir region, or cutting their way through the rocky fastnesses of the Balkh-Kabul route.

These things were well enough to serve as twister for the lion's tail in the piping times of peace. But when war with its rapid menace and fierce directness was meant, the easy, fertile, and well-watered country between Zulfikar, Herat, and Kandahar was the natural line of swoop for the human beasts of prey led by the ablest officer in Central Asia.

Transcaspian, Orenburg and Ural Cossacks, Turkestan and West Siberian artillery, the Third and Fourth Turkestan Infantry Brigades, with a number of picturesque looking cut-throats from Askabad, Merv, Ferghana, and the Syr Daria, formed the excellent irregular force of 100,000 men with which Alikhanoff made his dash from Zulfikar and Kushk upon Herat.

Nor did he pause there a day.

The small Afghan garrison fled at the mere news of his approach, and, disregarding the reports of spies who warned him of the massing of Afghan levies all along the Paropamisus and Sufed Koh southern watershed, he dashed onwards with impetuous haste.

Digitized by Google

For his absolute and final orders were to seize and hold Kandahar at all costs, and not to move a step further until the real offensive expedition, consisting of 150,000 regular troops under the command of the Grand Duke Paul, had reached Kandahar from the Caucasus and Moscow.

There burst upon them the whole strength of the Royal Fusiliers.

All was in readiness for the coup—trains, waggons, supplies, on the lines of railway and at depôts, steamers on the Caspian Sea to ferry the army of the Caucasus from Baku to Usum-ada.

It was a magnificent scheme. It had no defect in calculation of fact or detail, and it only assumed that the British lion was asleep until he was rudely awakened by the events of May 1st.

Now, a man may catch a lion asleep, but he who says he has entrapped a slumbering tiger should be disbelieved. India crouched, it is true, but it was that she might spring the farther.

Alikhanoff's rapid march through Sabzawar and Farah, the chief towns between Herat and Kandahar, was of more interest to him than to this chronicle of events.

That it was a magnificent performance is assured by the fact that in the early days of June his advance guard of Ural Cossacks cleared a cloud of Afghan horsemen out of Chorab, which is twenty-five miles distant from Giriskh, on the river Helmund, and Giriskh is 100 miles from Kandahar.

The Afghans had been troublesome of late. They buzzed round the columns like flies round a carcass, and many a nomad's saddle was emptied, and many a Kirghese warrior bit the dust as they straggled on the outskirts, ever in quest of forage or booty.

But General Alikhanoff knew he must pay this toll in human lives when he passed the Gate of India, and he smiled as he glanced over the reports of his staff, showing the excellent progress of the troops.

"My dear friends in St. Petersburg will be pleased when they hear that I am already within striking distance of Kandahar," he thought, and the parting of the thin lips over the firmly set teeth suggested unpleasantness, for the "dear friends" alluded to were they at that moment anywhere near Chorab. The Central Asian commander had no cause to love the Court sycophants at the capital.

It was prudent to halt a little while, and pull his corps firmly in hand before he attempted to cross the Helmund, where the Afghans would surely oppose him in force.

"They are mere pariahs, these Shia dogs," said Alikhanoff, "yet they can bite. I must dose them well with lead when I get them packed together."

Not until June 10th could even his impatient eagerness decide that all was ready for the important step.

Many spies informed him of a large gathering of trained Afghan troops on the further bank of the Helmund, and one man, a Hindu fanatic, warned him that the English were behind them.

"Yes, fool," cried the General angrily. "It needs no wise priest to tell me they are at Quetta."

"Not Quetta, honoured one, but at Singbur." And Singbur is but a few miles on the south side of the Helmund.

Alikhanoff knew that this thing could not be. The Indian army, at best, must now be concentrating at Quetta. A few squadrons of cavalry, with a couple of infantry regiments, aided and abetted by the Amir, might perhaps have dashed through Kandahar.

"What woman's tale is this?" he growled. "The *lal coorti at Singbur? Impossible!"

"Nay, it is true. They swarm on the hill-slopes and in the valleys. May they be accursed!" screamed the fakir. "You march to the sacrifice, O deliverer!"

"And you shall run there, dog and liar," thundered Alikhanoff, thoroughly incensed. A minute later the fakir was swinging from the bough of a tree as a warning to all spies who gave false news.

That night Giriskh was occupied and by daybreak the passage of the Helmund commenced.

Some Afghan guns and infantry that would have disputed the crossing were quickly silenced by the West Siberian and Turkestan mountain batteries. Cossacks from the Ural and Orenburg plunged through the three fords available at this place of season, and spread fan-like over the country in front and along the banks to the east and west. Infantry, guns, and transport prepared to follow.

This, then, was the passage of the Helmund so talked of by the English. How they boast, these Feringhis! Is there not an interval for breakfast?

Yes, an eternity, Alikhanoff.

Nearly one half of the Russian army had crossed the river, and in loose array advanced in the direction of Singbur. Before them the living dust-cloud moved, as the Afghans, with many a desperate Parthian shot, steadily retired.

And Alikhanoff, as he surveyed the advance of his troops and saw that already he held in his grasp the river which barred the way to Kandahar rejoiced in his heart.

"Raise your dust, ye Afghan vermin, the Cossack whip is scourging you!" he shouted in exultation, as he saw the slowly disappearing cloud.

But suddenly there was an uneasy swerve among these same Cossacks. Their loosely-knit ranks reeled as if from a sudden shock and came to a confused and disorderly halt. A new and terrible sound smote the air and came to the ears of Alikhanoff, a sound that must have been known of old and feared by him, for he started and changed colour.

For as the Cossacks pressed on wildly, the dust cloud parted to the left and right, and through the gap there came a frightful roar, and a hail of shrapnel rained upon the Russian advance, shattering it into ragged fragments.

There was no need to ask what new thing had happened. The English had arrived and now on the open plain were waiting to embrace the foe.

"It was no woman's tale after all!" exclaimed the Russian general as he ground his teeth. For he, Alikhanoff, subtlest of men, had walked into a trap. Half his army was helpless on the hither side of the river. And beyond it his irregular troops, in no settled order, and unprepared for serious action, were hemmed in between two deadly perils, the English guns and the dark flowing river of Helmund.

Perhaps this unexpected enemy was few in number.

He dashed along to the river, and made his way rapidly across, and then hastened to marshal his troops, throwing them out in a form best suited to meet attack, and to at least hold the enemy off till the remainder of his army had passed over the river and joined them.

But General Sir George White had no intention of assisting Alikhanoff in his admirable design.

The British army was not a large one. All told, the Commander-in-Chief had but 50,000 men, or one half the numbers of the enemy. But there were enough for his purpose. Generalship can dispense with multitudes when Asiatics are in front.

* Redcoats.

Digitized by Google

The day before he had carefully selected a cavalry brigade of 5,000 sabres, consisting of the 5th Dragoon Guards, the 5th Lancers, the 5th Bombay Cavalry, and other picked native details, and, putting them under the command of Major-General H. F. Grant, ordered them to debouch to the right, cross the Helmund a few miles up, and occupy a hidden position of observation on the Kala Musa route.

"You will take no part in the engagement," he told the General, "until we have dealt our blow. I count on you to convert a victory into a rout."

To experienced officers this manœuvre was perfectly intelligible, but there was no little astonishment when it was found that a second brigade, of half the strength, consisting of the 4th Royal Irish Dragoon Guards, the 11th Hussars, the 2nd Bengal Lancers, and the 13th Bengal Lancers, 2,400 sabres in all, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel P. K. Doyne, was ordered to the rear, in reserve, and that a commissariat of sowari camels, the most perfectly equipped of any that had ever been organised in India, was allotted to it. What purpose could this apparent waste of good men serve?

To the brigade itself the question was a bitter one, and there was much grumbling. For who that bears a sabre cares to see a fight afar off and stand like a child unable to taste of it. Colonel Doyle alone showed patience, as well he might, for he had his instructions, and much he smiled as he ran them over again and again with lingering fondness.

And now, as the Cossacks raced along, the main body of the army, hidden by the formation of the country, calmly waited their opportunity. It came when the wild Afghans, parting on either side, gave room for the British artillery massed in the centre.

The shock was terrible. As stream after stream of deadly shot poured impetuous into their ranks, the Russian lines reeled and fell. Nor did Sir George White give a moment's space for rallying. His infantry moved rapidly forward, sustained by the never ceasing guns, and flung itself with desperate courage upon the ranks of the enemy. The onset was as irresistible as it was unexpected. The Turkestan Brigades, without guns, unprepared for attack, broken up and disordered, hesitated a second, and then fell away in wild confusion. But there came no lull in the severity of the attack. The British infantry drove them back foot by foot, relentless and untiring, until, unable longer to sustain so deadly an onset, the Russians fled to the river and sought to cross it.

Alikhanhoff was in despair. Flinging himself wildly amongst the flying troops, he bade them rally at the ford.

"Dogs," he shouted, "are you to be beaten back by sticks?"

Stung by his words, a West Siberian regiment attempted to form up on the bank of the river. It was a desperate and useless effort. For like a thundercloud there burst upon them the whole strength of the Royal Fusiliers, who, at the edge of the bayonet, pierced through them and forced them into the river.

Crocodiles in the Helmund waxed fat for months.

And now the artillery, hastening up behind the infantry, took its place upon the shelving bank, and across the water there belched into the helpless remnant of the Russian army a storm of shot. Reply was useless. The Russian guns could only decimate their own ranks. Between them and the English was a panic-stricken border of flying soldiers, carrying with them the infection of their terror and breaking up the solid battalions, which, helpless and stricken, lined the northern bank.

It was impossible to withstand so deadly a storm; before the tireless British guns the remainder of the invading army, vainly struggling to retain its order, broke and fell away, and in half-an-hour it was in frantic and disorderly flight.

Now was General Grant's opportunity, and nobly he availed himself.

As the Russians spread themselves over the country beyond Girishk the 5,000 picked English and native cavalry dashed down from their post and precipitated themselves upon the enemy.

Mahomed Khan ran him through the heart.

It was the last and deadliest stroke. The Brigade struck the Russian force like a thunderbolt, splitting it up into a hundred helpless and scattered fragments. Disorganised, disunited, filled with the mad terror that knows no limits, caring only that it should be somewhere away from the terrific and unendurable onslaught, the once magnificent army of Russia betook itself to aimless and pitiful flight.

Sir George White, as he swept the scene through his glasses, could not help feeling a faint flutter of pity.

"Poor devils!" he exclaimed. "They had better have remained here."

For he knew the Afghan, and what manner of welcome was already prepared for the flying army amongst those treacherous hills and valleys to the north.

Foremost in the pursuit was Sirdar Mahomed Khan, who had been lent for the day to serve as native aide-de-camp to Major-General Grant.

The Sirdar was thoroughly enjoying himself. Every thrust and cut at a Cossack was accompanied by a choice expletive. "Sug!"* he roared as he drove his sword through the ribs of a gentleman from Orenburg. "Son of a pig!" and tumbled a Kirghese into a ditch. "Bazaar-born!" and a Ural nomad fell beneath his stroke.

At last his strong country-bred, sired by a Norfolk trotter from a half-bred Arab mare, brought him alongside a Russian officer vainly urging his tired horse to more strenuous effort.

It was Alikhanoff, desperate, pallid, frenzied with shame and rage, who, borne back through the Helmund by the press of the fight, now saw no alternative but to fly with the rest.

Mahomed Khan knew him in a second, even amidst the wild mélange of the rout.

"Din! Din!"† he shrieked. "Thou art running back to Penjdeh, then, O Ali Khan!" And he closed in to deliver a cut that should have cleaved the Russian commander to the chin had it struck him fairly.

Alikhanoff had no time to ask for quarter. But he tried to save himself. Rapidly wheeling his horse he disconcerted the other's aim and received the powerful cut on the forte of his sword. But the Sirdar was not to be denied.

By the force of his onset he was jammed up against his opponent. Quick as lightning he smashed the hilt of his sabre into Alikhanoff's face, and as the Russian reeled in the saddle beneath the blow Mahomed Khan ran him through the heart.

Calling two sowars the Sirdar bade them guard the corpse, but as he rode on he muttered: "I grow old, to use the point. There is more satisfaction in the cut!"

Meanwhile the cavalry brigade commanded by Colonel Doyne, now released from their inactivity, moved forward at the trot, crossed the Helmund, and advanced rapidly towards the north-west.

Many a fugitive Russian, seeing this compact force moving onward, and seemingly disregarding the pursuit, vaguely wondered, whilst he still had life, what its object could be, and when Mahomed Khan saw them he clapped spurs to his horse to rejoin his regiment. Russia heard of that brigade before she heard of Alikhanoff.

(To be continued.)

* The Persian for "hound."
† The Mussulman battle-cry.

Digitized by Google

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

Who would be without a

MUSIC STAND

Folding and Portable. Square legs, Gold bronzed, very durable.

3/-

3/- parcel post free. Two for 5/9, Three for 8 6. Carriage Paid.

Send for Catalogue A, Post Free, for Band Instruments, Fittings, Strings, &c.

Joseph Riley & Sons,

Constitution Hill,

Birmingham.

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL

METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plan, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsom Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top. Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops. 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 2lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 6 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.;
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd. Kilburn.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

WOULD YOU LIKE A

£25 GOLD "TIMES" WATCH (Or £25 in Cash) FOR NOTHING?

We will Give Away, Absolutely Free, one of these Celebrated Watches to EACH PURCHASER of the

"DIDO" TOOTH PASTE

(In Collapsible Tubes),

who succeeds in filling in correctly the missing letters in the following words which relate to our "Dido" Dentifrice

1.—D - - O B - - - - - - - - G D - - - - - - - - E.
2.—C - - - - S AND P - - - - - - S THE T - - - H.
3.—R - - - - - - - - S AND P - - - - - - S THE B - - - - H.
4.—R - - - - - S THE GUMS S - - - - - - - - S.
5.—D - - - - - - - - - - - Y P - - - - - - - - - - - Y.

The "Dido" Benefiting Dentifrice, in collapsible tubes, cleans and Protects teeth, refreshes and perfumes the breath, and renders the gums salubrious, it removes tartar, prevents decay, and is delightfully preservatory. "Dido" Dentifrice is made of the finest possible ingredients, and is the best tooth paste ever offered to the public.

THIS IS A THOROUGHLY GENUINE COMPETITION.

PERFECTLY FREE. NO ENTRANCE FEE. NO DIVISION.

WHAT TO DO.—When you have found what you believe are the missing letters, write the words out on a sheet of paper, numbering them 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, as above, and send same to us, with a P.O. (not stamps) for 1s. 6d. and stamped addressed envelope for results, and we will forward to you, post free, a collapsible tube of the "Dido" Dentifrice (Foreign Orders, 3s., payable in London). We offer the above prizes to purchasers of our Tooth Paste, in order to make this remarkable preparation known to the public, and we are prepared to expend some thousands of pounds on this method of advertising our Dentifrice. We may say we give you not only full value for your money, but for 1s. 6d. post free, you will receive a ½lb. of the finest Tooth Paste, the largest quantity ever offered at the price.

REMEMBER EACH ONE who correctly fills in the missing letters will receive one of these celebrated "Times" Gent's Watches, or if a lady, a "Royal" Watch, value £25. These Watches are English-made, keyless, 7-plate Levers, fully jewelled, in solid 18-carat Hall-marked Gold Cases, and are manufactured by one of the largest and best known firms of jewellers in the City of London. These Watches cannot be purchased for less than £25 each. As a proof of this, should you be a winner, you can have a Watch or the £25 IN CASH, whichever you prefer.

DO NOT HESITATE, but send AT ONCE for the "DIDO" DENTIFRICE, and avail yourself of this exceptional opportunity to obtain one of these beautiful Watches, as this offer may not be repeated. Write your name and full address very distinctly, and put the name of this paper at the top of your letter. Keep a note of the number of your Postal Order in case it goes astray. This Competition will close on December 31st, 1898. Prizes will be awarded and results posted a week later. The solution has been sealed, and deposited with Messrs. E. W. Seir & Co., 118 Fleet Street, London, E.C.

YOU CAN HAVE THE WATCH AT ONCE

before the Competition closes. Full particulars regarding this will be sent you with the Dentifrice. Address all letters,

THE "DIDO" DENTIFRICE CO., Sidney Avenue, Milton Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT TRUTHS.

SHAVER writes to ask if there is any health value attached to a beard. ——Decidedly; they are better respirators than science could ever make. The hair of the moustache not only absorbes the moisture and miasma fogs, but it strains the air from the dust and soot of our great smoky cities. It acts also in the most scientific manner by taking heat from the warm breath as it leaves the chest and supplying it to the cold air taken in. It is a respirator and a comforter as well, so that with a good thick, bushy beard, a man might face a blizzard with less chance of taking cold.

C. T. F.—The peculiarly offensive odour of eggs when they reach the stage in which they are considered to be most suitable for the purposes of public meetings is due to the combination of sulphur and hydrogen, as the result of decomposition, forming sulphuretted hydrogen, a gas which is both malodorous and poisonous.

BOOK-WORM.—Generally speaking, the best print for reading is that known as long primer. In the case of artificial illumination, a white light is to be preferred. The form of the letters is of less importance than the thickness of the strokes, and there should be a fair space between the lines. Most of the matter in S.S. is set in bourgeois.

P. G.—The highest lighthouse round our coast is that which stands on the Skerryvore rocks. It towers 138 feet into the air, is 42 feet in diameter at the base, and 16 feet at the top.

MISS G. wants to know of a suitable expression by which she can refer to her lover to mere acquaintances. She considers "my lover," "my friend," "my young man," and such like expressions "too awful for words." ——I quite agree with you, MISS G. Unfortunately there does not appear to be an equivalent in our language for the French "fiancé." Under the circumstances, however, I do not think you can do better than borrow from that language, unless you refer to the gentleman in question as "Mr. So-and-So."

W. D. G.—The Queen has thirty-six chaplains in her English establishments, who are known as "chaplains in ordinary to her Majesty." Besides these there are twelve "honorary chaplains." The monetary value of the appointment is merely nominal. Each chaplain receives £30 annually.

H.W.K.—The nest which is made into soup and eaten by the Chinese is that of a bird similar to the swift. The nests are made of a golatinous secretion from the mouth of the bird.

H. G.—No, the Japanese do not take to fiction; they consider life too short for that sort of thing. Of 27,000 books published in that empire in one year, only 462 were of that class. Works on philosophy, arts and science and religion stood the highest in the list.

BEAUTY.—Every description of veil affects the eyesight more or less. The most objectionable kind is the dotted veil, although the influence of this variety for evil is more marked in some samples than others. The least objectionable veil is that without dots, sprays, or other figures, but with large regular meshes made with single compact threads.

ROMEO asks why a strong emotion of any sort takes away one's appetite for the time being.——Because it stops the formation of the digestive juices, and the stomach for the time ceases to be an active and a craving organ. Why an emotion should have such an effect is unknown, but it seems to be an arrangement of Nature to prevent the stomach being overloaded when there is anxious work to be done by the body.

LIBRARIAN.—Twice as many books are printed in Germany as are turned out in France.

R. N. H.—The greater part of the cast-off uniforms of our soldiers find their way into the shops of dealers in second-hand clothing. The coats are then either cut up, sold to theatrical managers, or exported to Africa and elsewhere for trading purposes with the Kaffirs and other uncivilised people.

M. A.—It is very rare for a person with blue eyes to be colour-blind.

W. W.—The hardest wood used by the Japanese is kiyaki. It resembles oak in colour, and is capable of being very highly polished. It is employed for very fine work, and for boat-building and other purposes where strength is required. It is now becoming scarce.

H. H.—In Norway, where a broken-winded horse is rarely seen, a bucket of water is always placed within reach of a horse when he is feeding, and the animal alternately takes a mouthful of hay and a draught of water. You might do worse than imitate the practice.

DOWN.—More than 10,000lb. of eider-down is collected annually in Iceland, 7,000 of which are exported. The price at one time was a guinea a pound.

EPICURE—Those who have partaken of peacock declare that it is decidedly tough eating; the same may also be said of the flesh of the swan. The fact of the latter bird ever having been a favourite dish in this country speaks volumes for the digestive organs of our forefathers.

B. P. R. puts the question: "Why do we hear best with our mouths open?" ——Because we place the Eustachian tubes in free communication with the atmosphere through which the waves of sounds are propelled. This gives a freer and more equable vibration to the drum of the ear on which the waves strike.

GOURMAND.—Larvae or caterpillars eat more than any other creature in proportion to their size.

H. S.—You must carry a purse deep and capacious if you have any idea of travelling in China. For a start, if you exchange two English half-crowns for their equivalent in the money of the Celestial Empire, you ought to receive some twelve hundred brass coins of various weights and sizes, every one pierced with a square hole in the centre and strung on a string.

W. M.—The language with the greatest number of letters in its alphabet is the Abyssinian, which has 208 distinct characters.

M. P.—A very good plan to prevent sea sickness is to tie a shawl tightly round the waist and sit upright on the cabin floor or on the deck until the body has got accustomed to the sea air and the motion of the vessel.

FELIX.—No. It is a mistake to suppose that the tip of the tongue is the most sensitive part of the body. Those engaged in polishing substances that require a very high degree of smoothness always use the cheek-bone as their touchstone for detecting any roughness.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 8th, if intended for the Issue on sale Nov. 22nd, and dated Nov. 26th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

100 BICYCLE PRIZES!

All Prizes in Former Competitions have been taken up; eight machines not being claimed in time were passed on.

"We have examined the A.B. Cycles, and find them well made, high-class machines. The firm are thoroughly straightforward."—Cycling, August 6th, 1898.
"Knowing the method on which the A.B. Cycle Company's business is done, we can honestly recommend the firm."—Athletic Record, September 3rd, 1898.

Send Answers Early.

Make up the best sentence you can out of Seven words, the first letter of each word beginning with a letter of "BICYCLE" in proper order. Thus: "But, Indeed Cycling You Can Learn Everywhere." It will be seen that the initial letter of each word in the foregoing sentence spells the word "Bicycle." Make up a different sentence and forward to us.

AN ABSOLUTELY FREE COMPETITION. We ask you to buy nothing before allowing you to participate in the Prizes. Neither after you have won a Prize (if you are fortunate enough to do so), do we compel you to purchase any accessories. You pay nothing to enter, and even if you receive one of our regret notices—and we make no secret of the fact that hundreds are unsuccessful—you are only out of pocket for the cost of two penny stamps, which the Post Office get the benefit of. Thus we can truthfully assert of this thoroughly genuine Competition that it is ABSOLUTELY FREE TO ALL.

All Machines guaranteed for Twelve Months.

REMEMBER IT ONLY COSTS A POSTAGE STAMP TO TRY.

FIRST PRIZE £23 A.B. SAFETY, FITTED WITH A.B. TYRES.

The following ladies and gentlemen are amongst the number of persons who have recently received Free Bicycles, each of whom has signed a Solemn Declaration that he or she is in no way connected, either directly or indirectly, with this Firm. We will forfeit £1,000 if this statement is incorrect. A FEW FREE CYCLE WINNERS: Mr. George A. Haynes, 9 Windsor Street, Barrow-in-Furness; Miss Mary-Page-Henderson, 8 Lexham Gardens, Kensington, W.; Mr. A. Merrilees, Harvay, Orkney; Mr. Arthur J. Woolnough, 29 Thomson Street, Govan, Glasgow; Mrs. Maria Fraser, Haglefort, Shinrone, Ireland; Mr. Robert Hughes, Llanidan, Anglesey, North Wales; Mr. L. Horne, 101 London Road, Oldham; etc, etc., etc.

Second Class (9 prizes) £23 Cycle for £9
Third Class (12 prizes) £23 Cycle for £10
Fourth Class (15 prizes) £23 Cycle for £11
Fifth Class (18 prizes) £23 Cycle for £12
Sixth Class (20 prizes) £23 Cycle for £13
Consolation (25 prizes) £23 Cycle for £14

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE.—COMPETITION IS NOW OPEN and closes Monday, November 15th, 1898. Results will be declared as soon as possible, although it may be a fortnight afterwards before all replies are posted.

Winners of prizes must clear them within a week or ten days, otherwise machines unclaimed will be passed on to the next in rotation. Prizes may be considerably increased in all or any one class. Unless stamp (not a stamped envelope, as our catalogue is a large [outside] size) is enclosed for postage of Catalogue and Result of Competition, the Company will not guarantee to inform Competitors of their success. Prize-winners need not purchase any accessories with their machines, unless they so desire. As the majority of the competitors may not be able to call and inspect the machines, WE GUARANTEE TO REFUND THE FULL AMOUNT paid for a second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, or for one of our consolation prizes, IF THE OWNER IS NOT PERFECTLY SATISFIED with it on arrival. We cannot give any money or other prizes in lieu of cycles, and consequently cannot enter into any discussion relating thereto. One solution only allowed to each competitor. Disregard of this regulation renders any prize liable to forfeiture.

£100

We offer this Reward to any lady or gentleman able to prove that we have ever in the whole course of our existence sold our cheapest machines under £15 cash either to any ordinary customer, agent, dealer or shipper. We do not allow a shilling extra discount beyond the 34 per cent. off the catalogue price to anyone, and even if we had an order for one hundred of our lowest priced machines we should refuse to supply them unless we were paid £1,500.

MARK LETTERS "SHORT STORIES," ON TOP CORNER OF ENVELOPE, AND ADDRESS TO THE MANAGING DIRECTOR,

A.B. CYCLE CO. LTD., 59 & 60 CHANCERY LANE, HOLBORN, W.C.

NOSE MACHINES as worn by Royalty. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, 9/9 each. Red Nose cure, medically approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

LOOK HERE! To introduce our large Illustrated Catalogue of Novelties we will send for Four Stamps one pair SCISSORS and a POCKET KNIFE post free.
VARIETY COMPANY,
(Department 9) DALSTON, LONDON.

MASON'S The Only Painless Corn Cure.
Never known to Fail. KILLCORN
Sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., Price 1/- per bottle, or post free from the Proprietor, 3 Guildford St., Leeds.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.
DEVONSHIRE CREAM.—Really Genuine, in patent air-tight tins. ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1/4, 1½lb., 2/4; including tin and postage. Mrs. CONYERS, Moorhard Bishop, Devon.

GIVEN AWAY
HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A 300 HOUSE
LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.
CHANCELLOR SOAPS
Send 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

HAVE YOU SEEN OUR CATALOGUE OF CHEAP CROCKERY?
If not, please get a post-card, and send it to THE
PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,
And you will get it by return, together with particulars of the most Wonderful Package of Crockery the World has ever seen.
100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.
THOUSANDS SOLD ALL OVER THE WORLD.
A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.
Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the
PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY, STAFFS.

DIRECT FROM THE PATENTEE & SOLE MANUFACTURER TO THE CUSTOMER AT WHOLESALE PRICES.
THE WONDERFUL ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE.
☞ SPECIAL OFFER—A FOUR-GUINEA ORGANETTE FOR 35/-

By Royal Letters Patent.
A MERE CHILD CAN PLAY IT.
Size, 13in. long, 12½*in. wide*, 9½*in. high, weighs* 8lb.

3 STOPS

The very ACME OF MUSICAL INVENTION, an instrument with as much variety of tone as a £25 organ. Every Orchestral Organette has 28 FULL-SIZE AMERICAN ORGAN REEDS, controlled by THREE STOPS, viz., Flute, Expression, and Vox Humana, furnishing the GRANDEST OF CHESTRAL EFFECTS. THE RANGE OF MUSIC AND TONE IS PRACTICALLY NLIMITED. For HOME ENTERTAINMENTS THEY ARE UNSURPASSED. We REFUND THE MONEY AND PAY CARRIAGE to anyone not entirely satisfied after receiving it. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone, young or old. We will give a selection of MUSIC FREE with each Instrument. Send money by Registered Letter, Crossed Cheque, or Money Order. For 2s. extra the Organette will be sent carriage paid.

J. M. DRAPER, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.

EASY PAYMENTS. We have decided to sell a limited number on following easy payments: 10s. deposit and 5s. monthly. Price 40s. Full particulars on application.

KEATING'S LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENGES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.
Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

Digitized by Google

Tincture of Halberis

DOSE—Five to Ten Drops in half a wineglassful of water.

A Specific Remedy for Biliousness, Liver Inaction, Heartburn, Indigestion, Acid Risings, Constipation, Headache, &c., &c. Prices: 1/1, 1/10, 2 8 and 4 9, post free.

GILBERT & HALL,
Homœopathic Chemists.
Bournemouth and Boscombe.

"MATCHLESS"

WARNING to LADIES.

BEWARE of POLISHES containing injurious ACIDS which RUIN your metals & SPOIL your HANDS.

TEST

TRY IT ON A PENNY. Dab a small quantity of Polish on a penny & leave it overnight. If it contains ACID, it will turn quite green by the following morning. BUT "MATCHLESS" WON'T!

FREE FROM ACID POISON OR GRIT.

LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD

METAL POLISH.

PATON, CALVERT & Co. MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL.

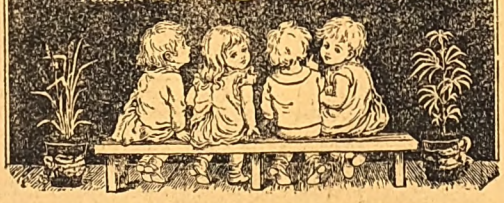
RED WHITE AND BLUE

SOLD EVERYWHERE

FRENCH COFFEE

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED PUREST & BEST.



"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

IT IS NOT Reckitt's PARIS BLUE

UNLESS RECKITT'S NAME IS ON THE WRAPPER.

Digitized by Google

READ THE FIRST STORY IN THIS NUMBER. YOU WILL LIKE IT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 515. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 12TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

NURSES AND DR. TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

GIVES GREAT SATISFACTION.

Nurse WILKINSON, 30, Russell Street, Clitheroe:
"Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa gives every satisfaction, and I shall not fail to recommend it to my friends and patients."

REFRESHING, STIMULATING, PLEASANT.

Nurse SUNDERLAND, Shewview Villa, Cheam Road, Sutton, Surrey:
"I have tried Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and find it a refreshing, stimulating, and pleasant beverage."

FOR EXCELLENCE.

Nurse GILKES, 11, St. Paul's Square, Southsea:
"I think Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is excellent, and very good for those who suffer from indigestion. This I know practically."

NO PRAISE TOO HIGH.

Nurse SAFFREY, The Cottage, Hoddesdon Road, Belvedere, Kent:
"I am pleased to say I think more of the merits of Dr. Tibbles' than even the praise already bestowed upon it."

FOR PHYSICAL AND MENTAL SUFFERING.

Nurse CLARE, "The Laurels," Langley:
"I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the value of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, as I find it most beneficial to persons suffering physically and mentally. It is most nutritive and extremely pleasant to take, and I shall strongly recommend it to my patients."

CAN BE TESTED FREE.

Address (a postcard will do):
60, 61 & 62, BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 8d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

The READIEST WRITER

. . THE . .

"RELIANCE" Fountain Pen,

Fitted with 14-carat Gold Nib (Iridium Tipped), Fine, Medium, or Broad Points.

Double Feed, Handsome Chased Vulcanite Holder.

THIS PEN WILL LAST FOR YEARS

EVERY PEN GUARANTEED.

WILL NOT GET OUT OF ORDER.

Sold at 10/6.

We send this pen, complete in box, with filler and directions, post free for 5/-

WONDERFUL VALUE.

THE RELIANCE PEN CO. LIMITED
26 IVY LANE,
PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Reduced Facsimile

REMEMBER, a 10/6 FOUNTAIN PEN for 5/-
Agents Wanted.

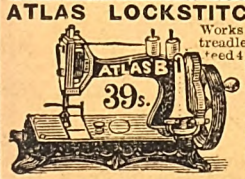
Reduced Facsimile

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

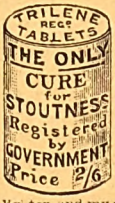
PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 23 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 16 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

MANDOLINES.

FINE ITALIAN MODELS, 13 Red Maple Ribs, 7s. 6d.; Brown and White Ribs, 10s. 6d.; GENUINE ITALIAN, with 15 Maple Ribs, 15s. 6d.; ditto. 17 Rosewood Ribs, 17s.; 19 Rosewood Ribs, Pearl Inlaid, 24s.; ditto, superior, Closed Machine, 30s. Magnificent De Meglio Model, Rosewood, 50s.; ditto, superior, 63s. Genuine De Meglio, finest-toned instrument made, £5 15s. For cases, strings and pick, see list post free. All with machine heads and bent sound boards. Crate and carr. free.

JOSEPH RILEY'S,
ON CONSTITUTION HILL,
BIRMINGHAM.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 515. For the Week ending November 12, 1898. ONE PENNY.

KING ELIJAH'S ACCESSION.

By ARCHIBALD MARSHALL.

The first story, describing how Elijah P. Jopp slew the Dragon, which had infested the country of Dummeleutia, appeared in the first number of The Royal Magazine.

I.

ELIJAH P. JOPP having slain the dragon that had infested the country of Dummeleutia, and having accepted half the kingdom as his reward, was crowned with the pomp that befitted his lofty station. He was cheered to the echo whenever he appeared in the public streets, and the Parliament of Dummeleutia carried a unanimous resolution that his bicycle should be cleaned and kept in order at the public expense.

The details of the coronation festival were carefully laid down and carried out by the Lord Chamberlain. There was some little difficulty about the crown, because there was only one, and that one King Ferdinand refused to give up under any consideration, even for the time necessary to put it on to Elijah's head, and take it off again. But Elijah said he did not take much stock in crowns anyway, and the one in use for pageants at the Theatre Royal would do quite well for him if it was rubbed up a bit, and the Court glazier was directed to replace the Koh-i-nor that had got mislaid some how, so that he need not have to wear it hindside in front.

Elijah said a few words after the coronation. This sort of thing was new to him, he said, and he hoped his loyal subjects would forgive him if he hadn't quite caught the hang of it (cheers). In the great country where he came from, monarchs were considered rather in the light of "funny business;" but he would say this, that he thought a monarch's berth would suit him very well, and that a little new blood in the concern would enable him and his partner to push things along a bit. He looked forward to a period of enlightened progress (cheers), and his subjects might bet their boots that their constitutional privileges, whatever they were, would be respected (loud applause and shrill laughter from a group of Members of Parliament). He would not keep them any longer from the entertainments provided for them, as they would probably have plenty of opportunities of hearing his views on subjects in general (renewed laughter from the Members of Parliament). He would only add that if they behaved well to him, he would behave well to them, and that now they might run away and play.

There was a scene of unparalleled enthusiasm. Elijah was hoisted on to the shoulders of four stalwart men, and carried round the town, somewhat to his discomfort, but as he said himself, a man wasn't crowned king every day, and he would put up with it for once. The band played "Was für ein lustige Kerl," and "Wir gehen nicht nach Hause bis Morgen." When Ferdinand and Elijah went home to supper the festivities continued.

The public holiday was an unmixed success, and the whole of the working portion of the populace went back to their business the next day thoroughly unsettled for the rest of the week.

With one exception. Elijah P. Jopp, who had been crowned King George VIII. of Dummeleutia, woke up the morning after the coronation alert and brisk, and eager to set about the task of raising his kingdom from a comparatively low place among the nations of Europe to a position which would enable its monarch to afford the expense of sending telegrams all over the world, and perhaps in time to gain a little piece of seaboard, so that Dummeleutia might build a ship or two and call herself mistress of the seas.

There was a great deal to be done. King Ferdinand had always played the part of a constitutional monarch for reasons which will shortly be explained. As long as his weekly allowance was paid to him regularly, and nobody interfered with his simple pleasures, which were not so very disreputable, all things considered, he allowed his counsellers and his Parliament to govern the kingdom. King George Elijah had very different ideas, and as he jumped out of bed the morning after the coronation he was all on fire to put them into execution.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

The first thing to be done was to come to an understanding with Ferdinand, so after a light breakfast he walked across from the hotel where he was still "located," as he would have said, to the Royal Palace to interview his brother monarch. The palace was one of a row of semi-detached villas, each with quite a nice little strip of garden behind it, situated in a quiet surburban road, not far from the public park. There was another palace in the country called Annaslust, but it was at present let furnished to a rich wine merchant. The reason for this state of things must now be explained.

King Ferdinand's father had begun to reign at a time when the kingdom of Dummeleutia was in the prosperous state alluded to above, and he had reigned for forty years. His father had been all that a king should be, and King Otto had begun his reign with two or three fine palaces, a handsome retinue, and sufficient means to keep up a considerable amount of state. He was only twenty-two when he came to the throne, and had immediately begun a career of folly and extravagance which eventually landed him in the bankruptcy court. He had mortgaged every one of his palaces, which all had to go, with the exception of Annaslust, which had been settled on his wife.

Elijah was hoisted on the shoulders of four stalwart men and carried round the town.

By the time the crisis came, King Otto had lost his place in the world's esteem. He had never taken any interest in the affairs of the kingdom, which went on very well without him. There was a talk of deposing him and running Dummeleutia as a republic, but the populace rose and vetoed that proposition. There was the usual state of jealousy in Dummeleutia between the classes and the masses, and King Otto, by his tastes and his social connections, had allied himself to the masses. The common people looked upon him as one of themselves, and they weren't going to have him deposed at any price.

However, they didn't want him raised again to such a pinnacle as to place him out of their reach, so eventually it was arranged that the semi-detached villa in Parkstrasse should be taken for him and the rent paid out of the taxes, and here he had lived during the rest of his reign, spending what money he could get and running into debt whenever he could obtain credit.

Here Prince Ferdinand had been brought up, and as he had never known anything better, was comparatively contented in the lower middle-class society, which was the best that was open to him.

II.

KING FERDINAND was not up yet, said the servant who opened the door. He had had his breakfast in bed and had sent it down almost untouched, with the exception of the tea, and he had ordered another pot of that, which he was drinking now. She never saw such goings on, she said, and if that was the way a respectable house was going to be conducted, she should find another situation, and so she told him, king or no king.

King Ferdinand did not look at all royal as he made his appearance a quarter of an hour later, in a shabby dressing-gown and slippers very much down at heel. He bore rather a battered appearance, and did not appear to advantage beside his brisk and dapper brother king.

"Excuse our late appearance," he said, as he came into the room. Elijah looked at him critically, and made up his mind to induce him to join the Young Rechabites No-Liquor League, of which he had been a member ever since his boyhood, in the near future. Just at present, however, there was more important business to be done.

"Come to talk shop?" he said shortly.

"Oh, don't," said Ferdinand, passing his hand wearily across his brow. "We can't stand it at this time in the morning; we can't really, brother King."

"Swaller some aerated water, and listen to me," said Elijah.

Ferdinand did as he was told, and resigned himself to listen with a melancholy air.

"You ain't been carrying on this business as it oughter been carried on," said Elijah.

"What business?" asked Ferdinand.

"The kingdom," said Elijah. "Look at you living in this yer low down hole. You ain't used your power."

"Our dear fellow," said Ferdinand, "we have no power; Parliament has got it all."

"Oh, has it!" said Elijah. "Presoomably it thinks it has. I guess it's going to find out that it's made a mistake. What do you draw?"

"What do we——?"

"What do you take a week out of the concern?"

"You mean how is our privy purse replenished?"

"You've hit it. What's the figure?"

"Well, Parliament allows us £2 a week and a furnished house. Then there's the rent of our royal residence at Annaslust; that comes to another £5 a week. That is all we have to live upon, and it's very little, George, very little."

The tears came into the king's eyes as he disclosed his state of dire poverty.

"Cheer up," said Elijah cheerfully. "I'm going to alter that for you. But ain't there any pickings?"

"No pickings," said poor Ferdinand pitifully.

"Oh, come now, what do you charge for making a dook?"

"We don't charge anything," said Ferdinand. "The Prime Minister settles who is to be ennobled, and we sign the patents."

"Oh, do you?" said Elijah, and he made his entry in his notebook. "Got many other papers to sign?" he asked.

"A great many," said Ferdinand. "It sometimes takes us a whole hour to get through the work."

Digitized by Google

"And you don't get nothing for that?"

"Only the £2 a week. That is what it is paid for. Nothing the Parliament settles can become law unless I sign the papers."

Elijah made another note.

"Now, I'll tell you what I'm going to do, Ferdy," said Elijah. "I'm going to act straight about this business.

The tears came into the King's eyes.

We go shares on what we make. You've halved whan you got with me, and it's worth more than you thought it was. It ain't legally in the bargain, but to show you what a white man's like when you come across one, I'm going to halve what I've got with you. And I'm going to do it right now. I figure out at a hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and there's a cheque for seventy-five of 'em made out to you." He took a signed cheque out of his pocket, and handed it across the table to Ferdinand, who took it with tears in his eyes.

"We didn't expect this," he said with deep emotion.

"Put it there," said Elijah, holding out a sinewy hand. Ferdinand gripped it.

"Now we're square," said Elijah. "You're worth seventy-five thousand dollars as well as your screw from the Government. You do what you like with your money. That's understood. But if you take my advice, you'll pay the best part of that cheque into joint account. I'll do the same with what I've got. There'll be plenty to do with it. And it ain't all the money you're going to get neither. With regard to these yere papers—I've got to sign them now as well as you, and I ain't going to do my part of the job under five dollars a sign. You stick out for the same, and we'll pick up a bit that way."

Ferdinand's eyes and mouth opened wide.

"With regard to dooks," continued Elijah, "there's going to be 'en more dooks made this day month at a thousand dollars a dook."

"Why, there'll be a revolution!" gasped Ferdinand.

"Jesso," said Elijah. "And we lead the Popular party. We ain't going to have no aristocracy lording it over us. This is going to be a free country, and King Ferdinand and King George are going to run it. Ever kissed a baby?"

Ferdinand rolled his head helplessly "We should like a little more money," he said pathetically, "but otherwise we're very well contented as we are. Don't upset things, George. Don't do it."

"Bosh!" said Elijah tersely. "You leave things to me. You've only got to keep quiet and spend the dollars when I get 'em for you. I'm going to put this business through, and you lay your boots I ain't going to make a mess of it. Not if you do what you're told."

"What are we told?" asked Ferdinand.

"Don't sign a paper unless I tell you to. That's one thing. Take me round and introdooce me to your pals; that's another. Keep your mouth shet. That's the third and last."

"We will do all that you tell us," said King Ferdinand.

"That's right," said Elijah. "We're going to forment this yer revolootion, and when we've put it through you won't be lowered any longer in a hundred dollar shanty in a black lot."

"We are deeply touched," said King Ferdinand, with tears in his eyes. "We will follow your instructions to the letter, George. We haven't been much of a fellow—we haven't had a chance. But restore us to our rightful position, and we'll try and make a new start. After all, we are the descendant of a long line of kings, and born to better things."

"That's all right," said Elijah kindly. "You're no nigger. And now I must set to work."

III.

THE Parliament of Dummeleutia was divided into two parties, the Aristocratic and the Popular. The former was in office at the time of Elijah's accession, and held the field by a large majority. The Prime Minister was a certain Count Pilsenheim, who was a young blood of about twenty-six, beautifully dressed, and possessed of a very fair idea of his own importance. He knew very little about politics; in fact, the business of the state was practically carried on by permanent officials; but Count Pilsenheim was a good figure-head, which was all-important in a community where royalty was socially non-existent.

Count Pilsenheim was sitting at breakfast in his town house one morning about a week after the conversation between the two Kings of Dummeleutia, already recorded. The Countess Pilsenheim was pouring out tea; the Prime Minister was reading the morning paper.

He handed it across the room to Ferdinand.

"I believe," said the Countess, "that new king is up to some mischief. Parker tells me that he and Ferdinand have been driving all about the town in a landau with a pair of horses, and the people cheer them wherever they go."

Digitized by Google

The royal summons was delivered to the Prime Minister by the club waiter.

"Let 'em cheer," said the Prime Minister. "I don't think Master Ferdy can do us much harm. I'll give him what for if he tries any of his little games on."

"I'm not so certain about Master George," said the Countess. "You know what these pushing Americans are. Parker's sister, who is a dressmaker and lives in the next house to Ferdinand's in the Parkstrasse, told her that George is boarding with Ferdinand now, and that people are going in and out all day long. She says that Johann Busch was there for the whole afternoon the other day."

Now Johann Busch was the leader of the Popular party in the parliament of Dummeleutia.

"The deuce he was!" said the Prime Minister. "I'll soon stop that. I've to go and see Master Ferdy this morning. Wellstein tells me that there are some papers that require his valuable signature. You might just drop him a line to say that I shall be there at eleven, will you? Tell him if I don't turn up by a quarter past to come round to the club. I'm going there to have a game of billiards, and I may not have finished in time. I'll take the papers with me."

When the Countess Pilsenheim's note reached King Ferdinand he was engaged with Elijah in drawing up a list of people who were to be ennobled—for a consideration received—when the present government should have been ousted in favour of one more in sympathy with royal aspirations. Johann Busch stood at the head of the list.

"He's a swollen-headed bag o' wind," said Elijah, "but he's got the people behind him, and he's going to do what he's told, although he don't know it yet." Johann Busch would not have dared to submit his own name for a title when he was in office, the people would not have liked it; but Elijah had promised that he should be ennobled during the premiership of Count Pilsenheim, and Johann Busch thought that that was rather a good joke, and well worth paying five thousand marks for. He had been so far won over by Elijah as to promise that if his party came into power the Government would bring in a Bill for making suitable grants to the reigning monarchs, and Elijah had promised in his turn that all available places at Court should be distributed among the Popular party. Ferdinand demurred at this, but Elijah explained that such a plan would break the back of the Aristocratic tyranny, and when they had learnt to behave themselves and accept the Royal supremacy, they might come back and be humble servants where they had been accustomed to consider themselves masters.

The Countess Pilsenheim's note was brought in by Ferdinand's housekeeper. It ran thus:

To His Most Gracious Majesty, King Ferdinand.

SIRE,—The Prime Minister will have the honour of waiting on Your Majesty with important documents of State at eleven o'clock. Should the Prime Minister not arrive at Your Majesty's house by a quarter past eleven, please go at once to Weiss's Club, Jacobstrasse, and inquire for Count Pilsenheim, who will wait on Your Majesty there when disengaged.

I have the honour to be,
Your Majesty's most obedient servant,
B. PILSENHEIM.

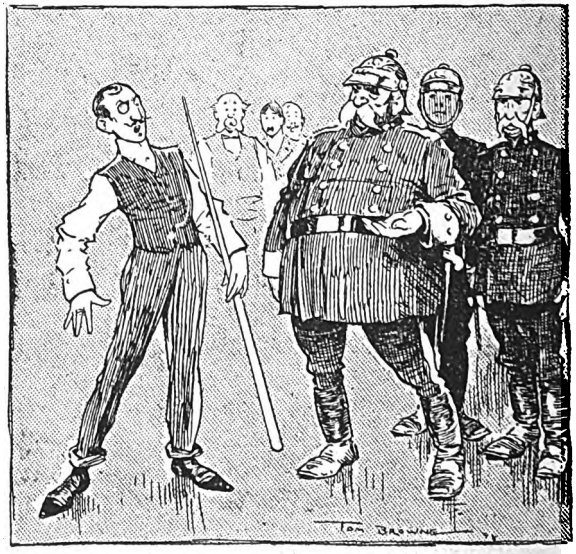
King Ferdinand read the note and looked nervously at his watch.

"It's half-past ten already," he said. "We wish he would give us longer notice. We don't believe there's a glass of sherry or a biscuit in the house. We bet Sarah hasn't dusted out the best parlour, and we haven't shaved this morning. We must go and see about it."

"Wait a minute," said Elijah. "Who is the billy-doo from?"

He took it up and read it.

"Well now, that's what I call real nerve," he said.



"I arrest you in the name of their Majesties the Kings."

"That young man is going to find out that he ain't so big as he thinks himself, not by some sizes. Say, Sarah, is that flunkey still on show on the sidewalk?"

Digitized by Google

But Count Pilsenheim's footman, having done his duty in Parkstrasse, had taken himself off to a more aristocratic quarter of the town.

"You put on your shawl and bonnet, Sarah, and carry

He found himself in the grasp of two policemen.

this note round to Weiss's," said Elijah. "We'll have my lord out of that in no time."

Sarah was not disinclined for a little outing, and went to prepare herself for her walk while Elijah wrote:

Their Majesties, King Ferdinand and King George, desire the attendance of the Prime Minister at their palace in Parkstrasse without delay.

"Do you think he'll quite like it?" asked Ferdinand anxiously. "He's a tremendous swell, you know, George. We should be careful if we were you."

"'Tain't me that's got to be careful, it's him," said Elijah, "and so he'll find out before he's half an hour older"

The royal summons was delivered to the Prime Minister by the club waiter as he was in the middle of a game of pool. He read it and threw it into the grate. "Oh, they do, do they?" he said as he prepared himself for his stroke. "Well, it won't do them any harm to go on desiring it for another hour or so. Tell the messenger to say I shall be round about twelve o'clock, waiter—or, no, say I'm too busy to come, but the Kings are to come round here in half an hour and wait in the hall till I'm ready. That'll take 'em down a bit, I think." Then he neatly pocketed the previous player's ball, failed to do the same with the nearest, but left himself safely up under the cushion and was glad.

The game went on tranquilly for another half-hour, when a considerable commotion was heard on the stairs outside. The door burst open, and a stalwart Inspector of Police, followed by two constables, entered the room and came straight towards the Prime Minister.

"Carl Pilsenheim, I arrest you in the name of their Majesties the Kings," he said, in a loud voice, and then in a lower key: "Warn you anything say now used evidence 'gainst you."

"What's the meaning of this?" exclaimed the astonished Prime Minister, while the rest of the players stood round in the utmost consternation.

"Ordered to take you at once into the presence of their Majesties," said the Inspector. "Better come quietly, sir. Got a cab outside."

"Presence of their Majesties!" exclaimed the irate Prime Minister, throwing down his cue. "By George, yes! That'll just suit me. Come along, Fritz. If I don't give Master Ferdinand and Master George——" but the rest of the right honourable gentleman's remarks were lost as he made his way down the staircase, two steps at a time, thirsting for the fray with his liege lords and masters.

The two Kings sat waiting for him in the dining-room of 8 Parkstrasse, Ferdinand quivering with excitement, Elijah cool and collected. Two tall policemen stood motionless just inside the door. The Chief Inspector of Police had been put on the list of those to whom titles were to be given at an early date, and the whole Metropolitan Police force of Putzenheim was now at the bidding of the Royal and Popular party. A cab drove rapidly up to the door, and the enraged Prime Minister jumped quickly out of it followed by his cousin young Fritz von Fiddledorf, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (£2,000 a year), and the police inspector who followed them into the house.

"Look here, Ferdinand," began the Prime Minister, furiously, as he burst into the room. "I'm blowed if I'm going to put up with your——" At this point he found himself in the grasp of the two policemen, one of whom laid a heavy and not over clean hand upon his mouth, while the calm but penetrating voice of Elijah was heard from the other side of the table.

"Look here, if you ain't pretty careful what you say, you'll find yourself locked up mighty sharp. Comprenny? I'm King of this country and so's Ferdinand "Make 'em out yourself!" he cried.

here, and we're going to be treated as such. Don't leave go of him, policeman, till I've said what I'm going to say. I've got to inform you, Mr Count Pilsenheim, that King Ferdinand and King Me are going to take up our positions as rulers of this yer realm right now, and disrespectful speech from a subject is going to be punished with imprisonment. Give him his head, Robert."

Digitized by Google

Something in Elijah's aspect—some hint perhaps of the divinity that doth hedge a king, even in Dummeleutia—took effect upon the Prime Minister. When the two policemen released him he did not break out into that torrent of abuse to which his outraged feelings and his contempt for Ferdinand prompted him. He stood and glowered silently instead.

The Prime Minister was led struggling from the room.

"Got the papers?" inquired Elijah.

"Yes," said the Prime Minister.

"Yes, what?"

"Yes, sire."

"Thank you. Fetch 'em right here."

Fritz von Fiddledorf handed the documents to his chief, and without any further preface the four men proceeded to business. Elijah took complete charge of it. The Prime Minister sulkily explained the purport of each paper, prompted by young Fritz. Sometimes he knew nothing of what the paper was about, and then Elijah told him to take it away, and find out, which did not sweeten his temper. Elijah signed what he had a mind to, and handed the documents on to Ferdinand, who did the same without asking any questions.

When the business was over the Prime Minister gathered up the papers, his lip curling, and his brow bent. He was evidently about to say something, but Elijah forestalled him.

"I've got another little job for you," he said. "Here's a list of dockships you can make out patents for, and let me have 'em by to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock."

The Prime Minister glanced at the list. The first name that met his eye was that of Johann Busch. He read no further.

"Make 'em out yourself," he cried, as he threw the paper down, "and be hanged to you! Think I'm going to be ordered about by a mere American showman? You come outside, and I'll mark you. I'll make things so hot for you, my fine fellow, that you'll find yourself over the frontier in a week's time, with your tail between your legs. And as for you, Ferdinand, let me tell you——"

But at this point the Prime Minister was once more gagged by the policemen, and, although he struggled furiously, he could only emit meaningless sounds which scarcely expressed the thoughts that burnt hot within him.

"Take him off to chokee," said Elijah cheerfully. "He'll revile his liege Majesty, the King, will he? We'll see about that."

And so the Prime Minister was led struggling from the room, and locked up in the city gaol.

"And now the fat's in the fire," said Elijah. "Ferdy, you and me have begun our glorious reign."

"The Laughing Princess" next week.

Digitized by Google

MISS JOHNSON'S PLAN.

One of the most striking characteristics of woman is her cheerful perseverance in looking under the bed for a thief. No man in his senses ever looks under his bed for a burglar but there are millions of women in this country who would find it quite impossible to sleep in any bed under which they had not previously searched for a concealed man.

Experience is lost upon them. The average unmarried woman, of forty years of age, has usually looked under the bed at least 7,500 times, without ever once finding the expected man; but she is not the least discouraged by so long a course of failure, and it would be easy to find women, eighty or ninety years old, who still nightly search for the man they have never found.

Miss Johnson will hereafter be famous as a woman whose long perseverance has been signally rewarded. It would be indelicate to inquire into her precise age—had she not described herself in a recent affidavit as having been born in the year 1855?—and we may therefore take it for granted that she is at least forty-three years old.

If we presume that she began to look under the bed at the age of fifteen, it follows that she has performed that ceremony more than 10,000 times.

Until the other Friday night, she never found the smallest fragment of a man under her bed; but on that eventful night her perseverance was rewarded, and the long-sought man greeted her astonished gaze.

Miss Johnson, being an unmarried lady, not wholly unconnected with the milliner's trade, and full of womanly independence, resides entirely alone, in a small house containing but three rooms—a kitchen, shop, and bedroom.

Dogs she despises, and cats she mistrusts; while, as for men, she regards them as poor creatures who may possibly have their uses in the time of hard frost, when water must be carted from the nearest stream, but who, as a rule, make more trouble about a house than their necks are worth.

Holding these views, it naturally follows that Miss Johnson lives alone, and the cool bravery with which she locks up her house at night, and seeks her solitary couch (no matter if a first-class thunderstorm is in progress) has for years been the admiration of the more timid of her sex.

It was about eleven o'clock on that Friday night when Miss Johnson stooped down and looked under the bed for a possible man, precisely as she had done on 10,000 previous nights.

Whether she was or was not astonished at perceiving a large-sized man lying under the bed, with the back of his head towards her, will never be known, but at any rate, she gave no sign of astonishment, and did not even inform the man that she saw him.

On the contrary, she resumed with great deliberation the nocturnal twisting of her back-hair, and even softly hummed, "Come into the garden, Maud," with as much distinctness as could be expected of a woman while holding a comb between her teeth.

Her back hair being finally finished, she opened her window, turned down the lamp until it gave forth a dim and modest light, and then stepped gracefully into bed, but not to sleep.

That sagacious woman was perfectly aware that the man under the bed, not suspecting that he had been discovered, would creep forth with a view to plunder as soon as he thought that she was asleep.

The bedstead stood in a corner of the room, and from the position of the man it was plain that he would creep out at the side of the bed. Miss Johnson, therefore, changed her usual manner of composing herself to rest, and lay, as she subsequently expressed it, "flat as a pancake," with her head projecting over the side of the bed at the precise locality where she expected the man to appear.

For at least half an hour she lay perfectly still, watching for the man with a steal hy vigilance that would have done credit to an astute and experienced cat.

Not a muscle or a hairpin of her frame moved, and her breathing was as slow and regular as that of a profound sleeper. At engthe man, confident that she was asleep, softly began to worm himself from under the bed.

Little did he imagine that a pair of pitiless grey eyes were awaiting for the appearance of his head, while a pair of lithe and nervous hands were ready to pounce upon his ears.

It was not many minutes, however, before each ear was suddenly caught in an inexorable grasp, and his head began to oscillate with remarkable speed between the floor and the edge of the bedstead.

Von Moltke himself could not have surpassed Miss Johnson's tactics. She had the man completely at her mercy, and he was helpless as though his head were in the stocks.

At first his captor maintained a grim silence; but after she had bumped him sufficiently to ease her mind, she addressed him on the wickedness and folly of seeking to rob her.

In vain did the man protest that his motives were innocent, that he had mistaken the house, and had merely intended to take a quiet nap under his own bedstead where the flies could not find him out.

Miss Johnson sternly told him that he could not make her believe any such nonsense, and that she would "let him know," and would also "show him."

These threats were carried out by a renewal of the bumping process, until the man yelled for mercy so loudly that the neighbours were aroused, and rushed to Miss Johnson's house with the firm conviction that a gang of burglars had murdered that excellent woman, and were quarrelling over the division of her spoils.

It was not until a strong force, armed with clubs and hatchets, had recklessly entered the room, that Miss Johnson surrendered her captive, with the remark that the sooner they took themselves off the better, and that if any other man would like to hide under the bed, she was entirely ready to knock a little sense into him.

Thus the intrepid woman not only defended herself with the most signal success, but she pointed out the true way to deal with a man under the bed. W. A.

Digitized by Google

HIS VINDICATION.

"LET'S see, Wilkins; it's about seven years since you left Mayton, is it not?"

"Yes, seven years this spring."

"I suppose that by this time you have become such an excellent newspaper man that you feel far above we country editors now, eh?"

"Oh, by no means, Grimes. Of course, the country newspaper business is not to be compared with metropolitan journalism, but it's a fairly good business after all.

"Country journalism is all right in its way, but a man could work on a country paper like the Mayton News for a century and never broaden out. The field is is too narrow; nothing about it to develop a man."

Mr. William Wilkins, of the London Daily Messenger, spoke with the air of a man to whom success had come. He puffed away at his cigar and looked rather disdainfully at his companion, Simon Grimes, editor of the Mayton Weekly News.

"That may be your idea, Wilkins, but it is a mistaken one," said Grimes.

Wilkins shook his head.

"Well, have your way about it, Wilkins. But you will doubtless admit that the lessons you learnt while serving your apprenticeship on the Mayton News were a great factor in the success you have met with in metropolitan journalism."

"Yes, I suppose it did help me a little. But my success is due to the fact that I worked hard and tried to succeed."

William Wilkins looked as if he were satisfied with himself, and as he sauntered down the one business street of Mayton he knew that he was the observed of all observers.

Members of the staff of the Daily Messenger had been heard to say that Wilkins was over-estimated, but this was laid to jealousy. That Wilkins had a high opinion of himself was beyond question, for he acted it. And when he went back to Mayton, the place of his birth, for a short visit, he felt that he was conferring a favour upon the denizens of that sleepy little village by giving them an opportunity of clasping him by the hand and calling him Wilkins, as they did in the years gone by.

Everyone thought a lot of him in Mayton, and when Grimes remarked that he was clever, but still had a lot to learn, people said Grimes was envious.

Each day, when Wilkins dropped into the News office, he would begin talking about the dignity of daily journalism, and Grimes, who had founded the News a quarter of a century before, would manfully defend the country editor.

"Look here, Grimes," said Wilkins one day, "for fifteen years your party has not been in it in this county, and the result is a ring at the county seat that is waxing rich off the taxpayers. If I had control of the News I would go to work and get up an exposure of the crookedness. There's a great field there."

"Yes, I rather believe there is some crookedness in county affairs, but I am not looking for fame in that direction."

"What will you give me, Grimes, if I go to work and get up an exposure of that court house ring?"

"Don't want it. If I did I'd get it up myself."

Mr. William Wilkins laughed loud and long. The idea of old Simon Grimes wr ting anything but little personal items was too humourous.

"Well, that's good, Grimes. I imagine that you'd get up a mighty spicy story."

"I fancy I could write one that would be interesting if I tried," was Grimes' calm reply.

"Well, if there is a murder in Mayton before I go back to London I'll write it up for you, old man," said Wilkins patronisingly as he prepared to go.

"Thank you for nothing," said Grimes.

"By-the-way, Grimes, I'm going home on Tuesday, and Colonel Waring is going to have a little social gathering at his home the night before in my honour. I want to write it up myself. It will be rather a swell affair for this village, and I want it done decently, especially as it is in my honour."

"All right, my boy," remarked Grimes. "We'll do it all right."

Colonel Waring, who was the wealthiest man in Mayton, occupied a handsome residence on the outskirts, and his home was the gathering place of all Mayton young folks. He and Mrs. Waring lived alone save for the companionship of a young girl who was more daughter than maid. Folks hinted that Mary Scott would inherit the Waring fortune, but Mary went about her household duties just like a servant.

The young people of the village, with true democracy, overlooked the fact that she was a housemaid, and Mary was a welcome guest at all the social gatherings.

Digitized by Google

When the Monday night came on which Wilkins was to be tendered a farewell reception, the Waring mansion was a blaze of lights, and by eight o'clock was filled with merry young men and women. Wilkins, the guest of honour, moved about with a condescending air and distributed his favours with an impartial hand. Simon Grimes was there, for Simon was a bachelor, and bachelors were eligible to Mayton society despite accumulated years.

"Good evening, Grimes," said Wilkins, when the editor of the News came in.

"All ready to make the write-up of your life, eh?"

"We'll get it up all right, my boy," was the cheery rejoinder.

And the evening was spent in merry games and laughter, music and good cheer, and the Mayton girls declared that Mr. Wilkins was just too clever for anything. Several went so far as to wish that a clever journalist like Wilkins would purchase the News. Old Grimes didn't know how to write up anything.

If Grimes heard these comments he said nothing, but patiently secured a list of names of those present, for the News always printed the names of the guests at Mayton's social functions.

And at last the guests had departed and the lights in the Waring mansion were extinguished.

William Wilkins walked home with one of the Mayton girls, and after bidding her good-night at the gate, went to the village hotel and retired for the night. He did not sleep well, for he was thinking that he would like to show these Mayton people how a live journalist could handle a great news item. And in a fitful slumber he dreamt of solving a deep mystery and receiving the plaudits of a wondering people.

Just as he was dreaming of being tendered a public reception for exposing corrupt practices, he was aroused by a loud knocking at his door.

"What's the matter?" exclaimed the half-awakened journalist.

"Get up, Mr. Wilkins," shouted the landlord. "There's been an awful murder committed."

"What's that!" shouted the now thoroughly aroused Wilkins. "Who has been murdered?"

"Colonel Waring, sir."

"Great Heavens!" ejaculated Wilkins, and he hurried into his clothes and down the stairs.

"I don't know anything about it, sir," said the landlord in response to Wilkins' inquiries, "any more than the Colonel was found in the library this morning with a knife wound in his heart."

Wilkins swallowed a hasty breakfast and hurried to the Waring mansion. Despite the early hour the news had spread over the village and most of the inhabitants were gathered about the place.

The village constable stood guard at the door of the house and refused admission to all. But when Wilkins appeared the constable opened the door for him to pass in. It was not often that a representative of a great metropolitan journal appeared in Mayton, and when one did appear he was to be treated with due deference. As he entered the door Wilkins saw Grimes walking about and conversing with the awe-stricken people.

"Here's my chance to show the old duffer how to work up a good story," muttered Wilkins.

Wilkins walked directly to the library. The Colonel's body had not been disturbed, The constable had given orders that it was not to be touched until the authorities had taken the case in hand.

Wilkins made a hasty examination of the room. In a bow window on the south side was the Colonel's desk. The old man had been stabbed while sitting in his easy chair at the desk. The head had dropped over upon the desk, disturbing a little pile of papers. In the Colonel's hand were some folded papers, and the other hand grasped the arm of the chair. Wilkins looked for the wound and found it.

From a rent in the left breast of the Colonel's coat a stream of blood had oozed, trickling to the floor and branching out into two or three small streams.

Wilkins saw at a glance that the wound was caused by a dagger of some kind, and that the blade had pierced the heart. Death must have been instantaneous. The young man gazed about the room, but saw no signs of confusion. The window blinds were drawn and the lamp on the Colonel's desk was still burning.

Wilkins examined the window fastenings and discovered that all of them were locked. It was evident that the murderer had not entered by one of the library windows. Then he stepped to the library door and called for Mary, the housemaid.

Mary, pale, but possessed, answered his call and the two stood in the hall, while Wilkins questioned her about the awful affair.

"Mary, when was the murder discovered?"

"A few minutes after six, sir."

"Who discovered the body?"

"I did, sir."

"Tell me all about it, Mary."

"Well, sir, it was just this way. After the people had all gone last night Colonel Waring told Mrs. Waring and me that he was going to take the 5.20 train this morning, and told us not to call him, for he would lay down on the couch in the library instead of going to bed. He bade us good-night and went into the library. Before I went to bed I fastened all the windows in the house and locked the doors."

"Are you sure the windows were all fastened?"

"Yes, sir. That was about the first thing I learnt to do after I came to live with the Colonel and Mrs. Waring."

"Were the doors locked when you got up this morning?"

"Yes sir."

"Well, go on with your story."

"I got up about a quarter to six and lighted the kitchen fire. While waiting for it to burn, I thought I would open the library windows and air the room. You know that's where the men smoked last night. You can see that the Colonel's desk is right across the room from the door.

"When I opened the door I saw him sitting at the desk. I said 'good morning,' but as he didn't answer me I thought he was asleep. I saw the lamp was burning and I thought I'd better blow it out, so I slipped across the room to do it. Just as I leant over to blow it out, I saw blood on the Colonel's clothes; and then I screamed."

As she spoke the last words, Mary covered her face with her hands and began to weep.

"Don't cry, Mary," said Wilkins. "Brace up and tell me the rest."

Mary dried her tears and told the rest of her story. She ran out of the library and called Mrs. Waring. Mrs. Waring ran to the library, and when she saw the body of her murdered husband, she promptly fainted. Mary dragged her into the hall and revived her, and then hastened out to give the alarm. That was all she could tell.

Digitized by Google

Wilkins walked into the library again and made a careful examination of the body. The Colonel's purse and watch were untouched, and it was evident that the desk had not been disturbed, as it was still locked. It was clear that the murderer had entered by one of the doors. But if that was the case the murderer had a key, for Mary was sure both doors were locked when she got up.

Wilkins left the house and hurried to the telegraph office to send a wire to the Daily Messenger. In a short time he received instructions to remain in Mayton and work up the case. When he returned to the Waring mansion he again saw Grimes walking about the grounds.

"Come in the house, Grimes, and examine things," said Wilkins.

"No, I think I've got all there is to get for a while," replied Grimes.

Wilkins muttered something about old fogies and clodhoppers and entered the house. A detective was on the spot.

Mary told her story to the officer just as she had told it to Wilkins, and Mrs. Waring corroborated it. The window fastenings about the house were examined and found to be locked, and there was no trace of the knife that had penetrated the Colonel's heart. But nothing more could be learnt.

Wilkins walked up to the News office and found Grimes writing away at his disordered desk.

"Well, Grimes, here's where you and I will have a chance to show which is best, country or town methods. I am going to remain here until this mystery is cleared up."

"I don't want to see you leave, my boy, but I hope it will be cleared up soon."

Grimes did not look up while addressing Wilkins, but went on with his writing. After resting a few minutes Wilkins went again to the Waring mansion and made a minute examination of the grounds. He could find nothing that offered a possible clue, and after spending an hour or more, went to the hotel and wrote a long story for the Daily Messenger.

The next day he made another examination of the house and grounds, and talked again with Mary and Mrs. Waring. But it was no use; the mystery only seemed to grow darker, and William Wilkins, special reporter for the London Daily Messenger, was puzzled. He went to the News office and asked Grimes if he had learnt anything.

"You certainly know as much about it as I do," said Grimes. "I've had to do a hundred things since the murder, while you have nothing to do but work it up. What have you found out?"

Wilkins was forced to admit that he had not discovered anything.

"That's strange," said Grimes. "A city newspaper man like you should have discovered the whole thing by this time."

Wilkins imagined that he discerned a covert sneer in Grimes' remark.

"I wonder if the old fossil has struck a clue," he muttered. "It would be just my luck if he stumbled on to the truth of the matter and upset my reputation here."

But if Grimes had a clue he kept it to himself. He refused to let Wilkins see a proof of the News' murder story when that worthy asked for them, and was even rude when Wilkins offered to help him write the murder report for the News.

In the meanwhile Wilkins had written a graphic account of Colonel Waring's life, and the Messenger had printed the Colonel's portrait and a picture of the Waring residence.

The managing editor had wired Wilkins to send something each day, and to remain on the spot as long as necessary.

Just before noon on the Friday after the murder, Grimes stopped Wilkins in the street and handed him a copy of the News, fresh from the press.

"You'll find the whole story of the murder in that paper," said Grimes.

Wilkins opened the paper—he fairly gasped, for there under black headlines that were truly metropolitan in appearance, was a long account of the Waring murder.

Wilkins read the story with an astonishment that brought forth strong words.

It was written by a master hand. It was rich in detail, and nothing seemed too small to be mentioned if it was in any way connected with the affair. It told the whole story of the murder. It began with an account of the reception in Wilkins' honour and told of everything that had happened.

The murderer (so it ran) had been a guest at the Colonel's home that night, but, for reasons apparent to all, his name could not be given. While the Colonel was bidding his guests good-night the murderer had stolen into the library and concealed himself behind a curtain at a window. He had heard the Colonel mention his trip of the following morning and knew that he would enter the library before taking the early train. He remained there until the Colonel came in and seated himself at the desk. Then the murderer had slipped up behind him and driven the dagger into the heart of the unsuspecting old man.

The motive? There was none. The murder was the freak of a maniac, and the fatal blow was struck with the strength of a madman. Drawing the dagger from the wound the murderer had calmly waited until the household had retired and then effected his escape. He had gone down to the hall and into the kitchen. Then he raised a trap-door that led to the cellar, and from the cellar had escaped through an opening.

While crawling out of the cellar he had left a small bloodstain. Crawling carefully round the house, the murderer hastened to the front gate, the knife still clutched in his hand. Hesitating before passing through the gate, the murderer stuck his knife into the gate post and, crawling on his hands and knees, peered out into the road. Seeing no one he had walked back and secured the knife and then disappeared in the darkness.

Wilkins could scarcely believe his eyes. But he rushed to the Waring mansion with the speed of a race horse and asked permission to examine the cellar. Yes, there was a faint bloodstain. Then Wilkins examined the gate post and found the mark where a knife had been stuck into it. Back to the News office raced Wilkins.

"Grimes, tell me who it was that killed Waring."

Grimes looked up from that morning's copy of the Daily Messenger and smiled.

"I can't do it now, my boy. You'll have to wait till to-morrow morning."

"How on earth did you find that bloodstain on the cellar opening?"

Digitized by Google

"I didn't find it, my boy."

"Who told you it was there, then?" asked Wilkins.

"Nobody. Look here, don't ask me any more questions. Come to the office to-morrow morning at seven o'clock and I'll tell you the name of the man that murdered Waring. I won't say another word till then."

"But I want to get it into the Messenger to-morrow morning," urged Wilkins.

"The Messenger will have to do just as you will have to do—wait," said Grimes.

Bright and early in the morning, Wilkins hastened to the News office. The front door was open but there was no one in. Wilkins walked back to the door leading into the press room and opened it.

He started back with a cry of horror, for in a chair in front of the door sat Simon Grimes. There was a gaping wound in his left breast, and in his right hand was a long dagger dripping with blood. It was a clear case of suicide. The body was still warm, but life was extinct.

Wilkins made sure that the old editor was dead before giving the alarm. When the astonished inhabitants crowded in there was a perfect bedlam of noise. Wilkins was the only cool man in the lot. He laid the body out on the floor and closed the dead man's eyes.

As he folded the dead man's hands across the breast, he saw a note in one of them. Taking it from the stiffened fingers Wilkins saw that it was addressed to him.

He walked into the front office, and while the crowd waited he read it to himself.

"I killed Colonel Waring," ran the note. "I have been editing the News for more than twenty years, and I have always tried to make it a good local newspaper. You, William Wilkins, after learning your profession under me, come back after a few years of city life and taunt me with your superior ability. You ridicule the country editor's business and make sport of country papers. I believe the country editor is the peer of the town editor, and the country newspaper a mightier engine of right than the city newspaper with its columns of sickening details of crime.

"In your metropolitan egotism you cast reflections upon me and my profession, and I sought to show you that you were a cad; that you were not such a great newspaper man as you imagined yourself to be. How could I do it?

"The question bothered me until the night of Colonel Waring's reception in your honour. Just as I was ready to leave the house it flashed through my mind.

"I went out of the front door, but entered again by the back door and made my way to the library unobserved. The rest you know. The knife that killed Waring is in my hand. With that knife I vindicated the honour of country journalism and humbled the pride of a haughty metropolitan journalist.

"People will say that I was crazy. That is not true. I only offered my life as a sacrifice for the honour of my profession."

Wilkins silently handed the note to one of those present and hastened to the telegraph office.

"Poor crazy fellow!" muttered Wilkins.

But the special representative of the London paper did not feel particularly proud of the figure he cut in the Waring murder mystery.

W. MAUDSLEY.

The Pearson Idea

Is to give the public the most and best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.

Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original introductions and notes.

It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of "Ivanhoe," or Flora Melvor of "Waverley." The series consists of Twenty-five Volumes.

The cheapness, combined with the generous style of this series should render it an event to all lovers of class fiction, who ought certainly to find in it the edition of Scott which combines most advantages, including that of being the cheapest artistic edition ever published

LIST OF VOLUMES:

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Anne of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.

14,000 PAGES OF READING FOR 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

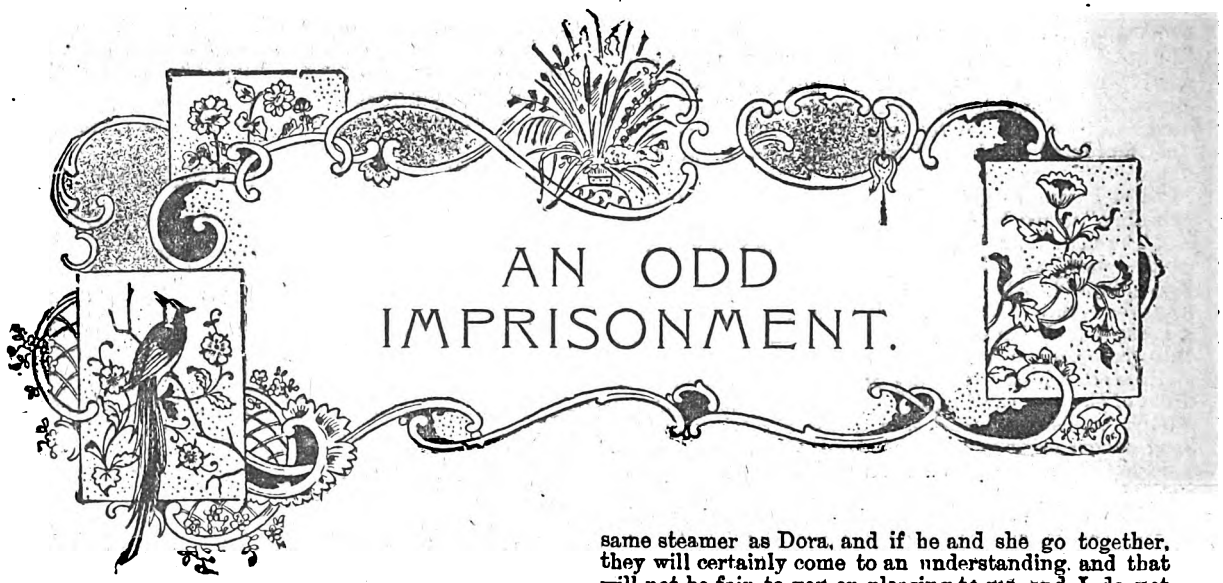
The Publisher, C. Arthur Pearson, Limited, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

PLEASE send me the twenty-five volumes of the Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I inclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

*Signed*_____

*Address*_____

Digitized by Google



AN ODD IMPRISONMENT.

I AM a young physician of limited practice and great ambition. At the time of the incidents I am about to relate my house in London was shared, greatly to my own pleasure and convenience, by a clever young German whose acquaintance I had made in the hospital, and to whom I had become, in the one short year in which we had practised together, most unreasonably attached.

I say unreasonably, because it was a liking for which I could not account even to myself, as he was neither especially prepossessing in appearance, nor gifted with any too great amiability of character. He was, however, a brilliant theorist, and an unquestionably reliable practitioner; and for these reasons, probably, I entertained for him a profound respect and, as I have already said, a hearty and spontaneous affection.

As our specialities were the same, and as, moreover, they were of a nature which did not call for night work, we usually spent the evening together. But once I failed to join him, and it is of this night I have to tell.

I had been to Ealing, for my heart was sore over the trouble I had had with Dora, and I was resolved to make one final effort towards reconciliation. But, alas for my hopes, she was not at home, and what was worse, I soon learnt that she was going to sail the next morning for Madeira, where some relations of hers were staying.

This news, coming as it did without warning, affected me seriously, for I knew if she escaped from my influence at this time I should certainly lose her for ever, for the gentleman concerning whom we had quarrelled was a much better man for her than I, and almost equally in love. However, her father, who had always been my friend, did not look upon this same gentleman's advantages with as favourable an eye as she did, and when he heard I was in the house, he came hurrying into my presence with excitement written in every line of his fine face.

"Ah, Dick, my boy," he exclaimed joyfully, "how opportune this is! I was wishing you would come, for do you know Appleby has taken passage on board the same steamer as Dora, and if he and she go together, they will certainly come to an understanding, and that will not be fair to you or pleasing to me, and I do not care who knows it."

I gave him one look, and sank quite overwhelmed into the seat nearest me. Appleby was the name of my rival, and I quite agreed with her father that the tête-à-têtes afforded by an ocean voyage would surely put an end to the hopes which I had so long and so secretly cherished.

"Does she know he is going? Did she encourage him?" I stammered.

But the old man answered generally:

"Oh, she knows, but I cannot say anything positive about her having encouraged him. The fact is, Dick, she still holds a soft place in her heart for you, and if you were going to be of the party——"

"Well?"

"I think you would come off conqueror yet."

"Then I will be of the party," I cried. "It is only six now and I can be back at my place at seven. That gives me five hours before midnight, time enough in which to arrange my plans, see Richter, and make everything ready for sailing in the morning."

It seemed wild, this scheme, but I determined to pursue it. I loved Dora too much to lose her, and if three weeks' absence would procure me the happiness of my life, why should I hesitate to avail myself of the proffered opportunity? I rode on air as the train I had taken shot from station to station, and by the time I had arrived at Paddington my plans were all laid and my time disposed of till midnight.

It was, therefore, with no laggard step that I hurried home, nor was it with any ordinary feelings of impatience that I found Richter out; for this was not his usual hour for absenting himself, and I had much to tell him and many instructions to give. It was my first check, and I was fuming over it, when I saw what looked like a package of books lying on the table before me, and, though it was addressed to my partner, I was about to take it up, when I heard my name uttered in a tremulous tone, and turning, saw a man standing in the doorway who, the moment I met his eye, advanced into the room, and said:

"Oh! doctor, I have been waiting for you an hour; Mrs. Warner has been taken very bad, sir, and she prays that you will not delay a moment before coming to her. It is something serious, I fear, and she may have died already, for she would have no one else but you, and it is now an hour since I left her."

Digitized by Google

"And who are you?" I asked; for though I knew Mrs. Warner well—she was my best patient—I did not know her messenger.

"I am a servant in the house where she was taken ill."

"Then she is not at home?"

"No, sir; she is in St. John's Road."

"I am very sorry," I began, "but I have not the time."

But he interrupted eagerly—

"There is a carriage at the door; we thought you might not have yours ready."

I had noticed the carriage.

"Very well," said I, "I will go; but first let me write a line."

"Oh, sir," the man broke in pleadingly, "do not wait for anything. She is really very bad, and I heard her calling for you as I ran out of the house."

"She had her voice, then," I ventured, somewhat distrustful of the whole thing, and yet not knowing how to refuse the man, especially as it was absolutely necessary to see Mrs. Warner that night and get her consent to my departure before I could think of making further plans.

So, leaving word for Richter to be sure and wait for me if he came home before I did, I signified to Mrs. Warner's messenger that I was ready to go with him, and immediately took a seat in the carriage which had been provided for me. The man at once jumped up on the box beside the driver, and before I could close the carriage door we were off.

As we went the thought came, "What if Mrs. Warner will not let me off?" But I dismissed the fear at once, for this patient of mine was an extremely unselfish woman, and if she were not too ill to grasp the situation would certainly sympathise with the strait I was in and consent to accept Richter's services in place of my own, especially as she knew and trusted him.

When the carriage stopped it was already dark, and I could distinguish little of the house I entered, save that it was large and old, and did not look like an establishment where a man-servant would be likely to be kept.

"Is Mrs. Warner here?" I asked of the man, who was slowly getting down from the box.

"Yes, sir," he answered quickly, and I was about to ring the bell before me when the door opened and a young German girl, curtseying slightly, welcomed me in, saying:

"Mrs. Warner is upstairs, sir, in the front room, if you please."

Not doubting her, but greatly astonished at the barren aspect of the place she was in, I stumbled up the faintly-lighted stairs before me and entered the great front room. It was empty, but through an open door at the other end I heard a voice saying, "He has come, madam." And anxious to see my patient, whose presence in this desolate house I found it harder and harder to understand, I stepped into the room where she presumably lay.

Alas, for my temerity in doing so! for no sooner had I crossed the threshold than the door by which I had entered closed with a click unlike any I had ever heard before; and when I turned to see what it meant, another click came from the opposite side of the room, and I perceived, with a benumbed sense of wonder, that the one person whose somewhat shadowy figure I had encountered on entering had vanished from the place, and that I was shut up alone in a room without visible means of egress.

This was startling and hard to believe at first, but after I had tried the door by which I had entered, and found it securely locked, and then bounded to the other side of the room, and tried the opposite one with the same result, I could but acknowledge I was caught.

What did it mean? Caught! and I was in haste—mad haste! Filling the room with my cries, I shouted for help and a quick release, but my efforts were, naturally, fruitless, and after exhausting myself in vain I stood still and surveyed, with what equanimity was left me, the appearance of the dreary place in which I had thus suddenly become entrapped.

It was a small, square room, and I shall not soon forget with what a foreboding shudder I observed that its four blank walls were literally unbroken by a single window, for this told me I was not in communication with the street, and that it would be impossible for me to summon help from the outside world.

The single gas-jet yet burning in a fixture hanging from the ceiling was the only relief given to the eye in the blank expanse of white wall that surrounded me, while as to furniture the room could boast of nothing more than an old-fashioned black walnut table and two chairs, the latter cushioned but stiff in the back and generally dilapidated in appearance.

The only sign of comfort about me was a tray that stood on the table, containing a couple of bottles of wine and two glasses. The bottles were full and the glasses clean, and, to this appearance of hospitality, a box of cigars rested invitingly near, which I could not fail to perceive, even at the first glance, was of the very best brand.

Astonished at these tokens of consideration for my welfare, and confounded by the prospect which they offered of a lengthy stay in this place, I gave another great shout, but to no better purpose than before. Not a voice answered, and not a stir was heard in the house.

But there came from without the sound of suddenly moving wheels, as if the carriage which I had left standing before the door had slowly rolled away. If this were so, then I was indeed a prisoner, while the moments so necessary to my plans and perhaps to the securing of my whole future happiness, were flying by like the wind.

As I realised this, and my own utter helplessness, I fell into one of the chairs before me in a state of perfect despair. Not that any fears for my life were disturbing me, though one in my situation might well question if he would ever again breathe the open air, from which he had been so ingeniously lured.

I did not in that first moment of utter downhearted-

Digitized by Google

ness so much as inquire for the reason of the trick which had been played upon me. No, for my heart was full of Dora, and I was asking myself if I were destined to lose her after all, and that through no lack of effort on my part, but just because a party of thieves or blackmailers had thought fit to play a game with my liberty.

It could not be, there must be some mistake about it. It was some great joke, or I was the victim of a dream, or suffering from some hideous nightmare. Why, only half-an-hour before I was in my own house, among my own familiar belongings, and now—but alas, it was no delusion. Only four blank, whitewashed walls met my inquiring eyes, and though I knocked and knocked again upon the two doors which guarded me on either side, hollow echoes continued to be the only answer I received.

Had the carriage, then, taken away the two persons I had seen in this house, and was I indeed alone in its great emptiness? The thought made me desperate, but notwithstanding this, I was resolved to continue my efforts, for I might be mistaken; there might yet be some being left who would yield to my entreaties if they were backed by something substantial.

Taking out my watch I laid it on the table; it was just 7.45. Then I emptied my trousers pockets of whatever money they held, and when all was heaped up before me I could count but £3, which, together with my studs and a seal ring which I wore, seemed a paltry pittance with which to barter for the liberty of which I had been robbed.

But it was all I had with me, and I was willing to part with it at once, if only someone would unlock the door and let me go. But how make known my wishes, even if there were anyone to listen to them? I had already called in vain, and there was no bell.

Yes, there was; why had I not seen it before? There was a bell, and I sprang to ring it. But just as my hand fell on the cord I heard a gentle voice behind my back saying, in good English, but with a strong foreign accent:

"Put up your money, Mr. Atwater; we do not want your money, only your society. Allow me to beg you to replace both watch and money."

Wheeling about in my double surprise at the presence of this intruder, and his unexpected acquaintance with my name, I encountered the smiling glance of a middle-aged man of gentlemanly appearance and courteous manners. He was bowing almost to the ground, and was, as I instantly detected, of German birth and education, a gentleman, and not the blackleg I had every reason to expect to see.

"You have made a slight mistake," he was saying; "it is your society, only your society that we want."

Astonished at his appearance, and exceedingly irritated at his words, I stepped back as he offered me my watch and bluntly cried:

"If it is my society only that you want, you certainly have taken very strange means to procure it. A thief could have set no neater trap, and if it is money you want, state your sum and let me go, for my time is valuable, and my society likely to be unpleasant."

He gave a shrug with his shoulders that in no wise interfered with his set smile.

"You choose to be facetious," he observed. "I have already remarked that we have no use for your money. Will you sit down? Here is some excellent wine, and if this brand of cigars does not suit you I will send for another."

"Send for the hangman!" I cried, greatly exasperated. "What do you mean by keeping me in this place against my will? Open that door and let me out, or ——"

I was ready to spring, and he saw it. Smiling more atrociously than ever, he slipped behind the table, and before I could reach him had quietly drawn a revolver, which he cocked before my eyes.

"You are excited," he remarked, with a suavity that nearly drove me mad. "Now, excitement is no aid to good company, and I am determined that none but good company shall be in this room to-night. So, if you will be kind enough to calm yourself, Mr Atwater, you and I may yet enjoy ourselves; but if not——"

The action he made was significant, and I felt the cold sweat break out on my forehead through all the heat of my indignation. But I did not mean to show him that he had intimidated me.

"Excuse me," said I, "and put down your revolver. Though you are making me lose irredeemable time, I will try to control myself enough to give you an opportunity for explaining yourself. Why have you entrapped me into this place?"

"I have already told you," said he, gently laying the weapon before him, but in easy reach of his hand.

"But that is preposterous," I began, fast losing my self-control again. "You do not know me, and if you did?"

"Pardon me, you see I know your name."

Yes, that was true, and the fact set me thinking. How did he know my name? I did not know him, nor did I know this house or any reason for which I could have been beguiled into it. Was I the victim of a conspiracy, or was the man mad? Looking at him very earnestly I said:

"My name is Atwater, and so far you are right; but in learning that much about me you must have also learnt that I am neither rich nor influential, or of any special value to a blackmailer. Why choose me out, then, for your society? Why not choose someone who can talk?"

"I find your conversation very interesting."

Baffled, exasperated almost beyond my power to restrain myself, I shook my fist in his face, notwithstanding I saw his hand fly to his revolver.

"Let me go!" I shrieked. "Let me go out of this place! I have business, I tell you—important business which means everything to me, and which if I do not attend to to-night will be lost to me for ever. Let me go and I will so far reward you that I will speak to no one of what has taken place here to-night, but go my way, forgetful of you, forgetful of this house, forgetful of all connected with it."

"You are very good," was his quiet reply, "but this wine has to be drunk." And he calmly poured out a glass while I drew back in despair. "You do not drink wine?" he queried, holding up the glass he had filled between himself and the light. "It is a pity, for it is of most rare vintage. But perhaps you smoke?"

Sick and disgusted, I found a chair and sat down in it. If the man were crazy there was certainly method in his madness. Besides, he had not a crazy eye; there was calm calculation in it, and not a little good nature. Did he simply want to detain me, and if so, did he have a motive it would pay me to fathom before I exerted myself further to insure my release? Answering the wave he made me with his hand, by reaching out for the bottle and filling myself a glass, I forced myself to speak more affably, as I remarked:

"If the wine must be drunk, we had better set about it, as you cannot mean to detain me more than an hour, whatever reason you may have for wishing my society."

Digitized by Google

He looked at me inquiringly before answering; then tossing off his glass, he remarked:

"I am sorry, but in an hour a man can scarcely make the acquaintance of another man."

"Then you mean——"

"To know you thoroughly, if you will be so good, I may never have the opportunity again."

He must be mad—nothing else but mania could account for such words and for such actions—and yet, if mad, why was he allowed to enter my presence? The man who brought me here, the woman who received me at the door, had not been mad.

"And I must stay here?" I began.

"Until I am quite satisfied. I am afraid that will take until morning."

I gave a cry of despair, and then, in my utter desperation, spoke up to him as I would to a man of feeling.

"You don't know what you are doing; you don't know what I shall suffer by such cruel detention. This night is not like other nights to me. This is a special night in my life, and I need it—I need it, I tell you—to spend as I will.

"The woman I love"—it seemed horrible to speak of her in this place, but I was wild at my helplessness, and madly hoped that I might awake some answering chord in a breast which could not be devoid of all feeling, or he would not have the benevolent look in his eye—"the woman I love," I repeated, "sails for Madeira to-morrow. We have quarrelled, but she still cares for me, and if I can sail on the same steamer we will yet make up and be happy."

"At what time does this steamer start?"

"At nine in the morning."

"Well, you shall leave this house at eight. If you go directly to the steamer you will be in time.'

"But—but," I panted, "I have made no arrangements. I shall have to go to my lodgings, write letters, get money—I ought to be there at this moment. Have you no mercy on a man who never did you wrong, and only asks to quit you and forget the precious hours you have made him lose?"

"I am sorry," he said. "It is certainly quite unfortunate, but the door will not be opened before eight. There is really no one in the house to unlock it."

"And do you mean to say," I cried, aghast, "that you could not open that door if you would, that you are locked here as well as I, and that I must remain here till morning, no matter how I feel or you feel?"

"Will you not take a cigar?" he asked.

Then I began to see how useless it was to struggle, and visions of Dora leaning on the steamer rail, with that serpent whispering soft entreaties in her ear, came rushing before me until I could have wept in my jealous chagrin.

"It is cruel, base, vile," I began. "If you had the excuse of wanting money and took the opportunity of wringing my all from me, I could have patience; but to entrap and keep me here for nothing, when my whole future happiness is trembling in the balance, is the work of a fiend, and——" I made a sudden pause, for a strange idea had struck me.

What if these men and this woman were in league with him whose rivalry I feared, and whom I intended to supplant on the morrow. It was a wild surmise, but was it any wilder than to believe I was held here for a mere whim, a freak, a joke, as this bowing, smiling man before me would have me believe?

Rising in fresh excitement, I struck my hand on the table.

"You want to keep me from going on the steamer!" I cried. "That other wretch who loves her has paid you."

But that other wretch could not know that I was meditating any such unusual scheme as following him without a full day's warning. I thought of this even before I had finished my sentence, and did not need the blank astonishment in the face of the man before me to convince me that I had given utterance to a foolish accusation. "It would have been some sort of motive for your actions," I humbly added as I sank back from my hostile action. "Now you have nothing."

I thought he bestowed upon me a look of quiet pity, but if so he soon hid it with his uplifted glass.

"Forget the girl," said he. "I know of a dozen just as pretty."

I was too indignant to answer.

"Women are the bane of life," he now sententiously exclaimed. "They are ever intruding themselves between a man and his happiness, as, for instance just now between yourself and this good wine."

I caught up the bottle in sheer desperation.

"Don't talk of them," I cried, "and I will try and drink. I almost wish there was poison in this glass. My death here might bring punishment upon you."

He shook his head, totally unmoved by my passion.

"We deal punishment, not receive it. It would not worry me in the least to leave you lying here upon the floor."

I did not believe that, but I did not stop to weigh the question then. I was too much struck by a word he had used.

"Deal punishment," I repeated. "Are you punishing me? Is that why I am here?"

He laughed, and held his glass to mine.

"You enjoy being sarcastic," he observed. "Well, it gives a spice to conversation, I own. Talk is apt to be dull without it."

For reply, I struck the glass out of his hand. It fell and shivered, and he looked for the moment really distressed.

"I would rather you had struck me," he remarked, "for I have an answer for an injury like that; but for a broken glass——" He sighed and looked dolefully at the pieces on the floor.

Mortified and somewhat ashamed, I put down my own glass.

"You should not have exasperated me," I cried, and walked away beyond temptation to the other side of the room.

His spirits had received a damper, but in a few minutes he seized a cigar and began smoking. As the wreaths curled over his head he began to talk, and this time it was on subjects totally foreign to myself and even to himself.

It was good talk—that I recognised, though I hardly listened to what he said. I was asking myself what time it had now got to be, and what was the meaning of my incarceration, till my brain became weary and I could scarcely distinguish the topic he discussed.

But he kept on, for all my seeming and, indeed, real indifference—kept on hour after hour in a monologue he endeavoured to make interesting, and which probably would have been so if the time and occasion had been fit for my enjoying it

Digitized by Google

As it was I had no ear for his choicest phrases, his subtlest criticisms, or his most philosophic disquisitions. I was wrapped up in self and my cruel disappointment, and when, in a sudden excess of frenzy, I leapt to my feet and took a look at the watch still lying on the table and saw it was four o'clock in the morning, I gave a groan of final despair, and throwing myself on the floor, gave myself up to the heavy sleep that mercifully came to relieve me.

I was roused by feeling a touch on my breast. Clapping my hand to the spot where I had felt the intruding hand, I discovered that my watch had been returned to my pocket. Drawing it out, I first looked at it, and then cast my eyes quickly about the room. There was no one with me, and the doors stood open between me and the hall. It was eight o'clock, as my watch had just told me.

That I rushed from the house, and took the shortest road to the steamer, goes without saying. I could not cross the ocean with Dora, but I might yet see her and tell her how near I came to giving her my company on that long voyage, which now would only serve to further the ends of my rival.

But when, after torturing delays and incredible efforts to pierce a throng that was equally determined not to be pierced, I at last reached the wharf, it was to behold her, just as I had fancied in my wildest moments, leaning on the rail of the ship and listening, while she abstractedly waved her hand to some friends below, to the words of the man who had never looked so handsome to me, or so odious as at this moment of his unconscious triumph.

Her father was near her, and from his eager attitude and rapidly wandering gaze, I saw he was looking for me. At last he spied me struggling aboard and immediately his face lighted up in a way which made me wish he had not thought it necessary to wait for my anticipated meeting with his daughter.

"Ah, Dick, you are late," he began effusively, as I put foot on deck.

But I waved him back, and went at once to Dora.

"Forgive me—pardon me," I incoherently said, as her sweet eyes rose in startled pleasure to mine.

"I would have brought you flowers; but I meant to sail with you, Dora. I tried to; but wretches—villains—prevented it, and—and——"

"Oh, it does not matter," she said, and then blushed, probably because the words sounded unkind. "I mean——"

But she could not say what she meant, for just then the bell rang for all visitors to leave the ship, and her father came forward, and, evidently thinking all was right between us, smiled benignantly in her face, gave her a kiss and me a wink, and disappeared in the crowd that was now going rapidly ashore.

I felt that I must follow; but I gave her one look and one squeeze of the hand, and then, as I saw her glances wander to his face, I groaned in spirit, and stammered some words of choking sorrow, and was gone before her embarrassment could let her speak words which I knew would only add to my grief, and make this hasty parting unendurable.

"Scared off by a frown? I wouldn't have believed it, Dick."

I shook my head, but could not tell him just then that it was not through any lack of pluck on my part that I had failed him.

When I left the dock I went straight to a restaurant, for I was faint as well as miserable, not having had any supper the night before or any breakfast this morning. But my cup of coffee choked me, and the roll and the eggs were more than I could face.

Rising impatiently, I went out. Was anyone more wretched than I was that morning, and could anyone nourish a more bitter grievance?

Should I let such an interference as I had received go unpunished? No; of that I was determined.

Turning aside from my former destination I went immediately to a police station, and when I had entered my complaint was astonished to see that all the officials had grouped about me and were listening to my words with the most startled interest.

"Was the man who came for you a German?" one asked. I said "Yes."

"And the man who stood guarding over you and entertained you with wine and cigars, was not he a German, too?"

I nodded acquiescence, and they at once began to whisper together; then one of them advanced to me and said:

"You have not been home, I understand; you had better come."

Astonished by his manner, I endeavoured to inquire what he meant, but he drew me away, and not till we were within a stone's throw of my house did he say:

"You must prepare yourself for a shock. The impertinences you suffered from last night were unpleasant, no doubt, but if you had been allowed to return home you might not now be deploring them in comparative peace and safety."

"What do you mean?"

"That your partner was not so fortunate as yourself. Look up at the house; what do you see there?"

A crowd, that is what I saw first; but he made me look higher, and then I perceived that the windows of my room, of our room, were shattered and blackened and part of the casement of one had been blown out.

"A fire!" I shrieked. "Poor Richter was smoking——"

"No, he was not smoking. He had no time for a smoke. An infernal machine burst in that room last night, and your friend was its wretched victim."

I never knew why my friend's life was made a sacrifice to the revenge of his fellow-countrymen. Though we had been intimate in the year we had been together, he had never talked to me of his country, and I had never seen him in company with one of his own nation.

But that he was a victim of some political revenge was apparent, for though it proved impossible to find the man who had detained me, the house was found and ransacked, and among other secret things was discovered the model of the machine which had been introduced into our room and which had proved so fatal to the man it was addressed to.

Why men who were so relentless in their purposes towards him should have taken such pains to keep me from sharing his fate is one of the anomalies in human nature which now and then awake our astonishment. If I had not lost Dora through my detention at their hands, I should look back upon that evening with sensations of thankfulness; as it is, I sometimes question if it would not have been better if they had let me take the chances.

Have I lost Dora? From a letter I received to-day I begin to think not.

Digitized by Google

The Bite of the Pichu-Guate.

CLEARLY Claudio was tired, and it took a deal to tire this big, rough-headed young Mexican. But it was not to be wondered at after his morning's work. The lambs in his barns are now five days old, and at that age a New Mexican lamb is smart enough in body and impish enough in mind to upset the most patient-minded man.

Then the mothers, whose age might have been expected to give them discretion, were as crazy as the lambs. To add to the worry, the snakes were beginning to come out of their winter nap.

The opening of May at the 8,000 feet altitude of San Miguel is rather early for these long sleepers; but the spring was unusually warm, and though none had been seen, yet there was no doubting their presence. The hungry sheep were wild for the tender blades of grass that began to show about the mouths of the prairie dogs' burrows, and nowhere else.

But in some burrows were other tenants than prairie dogs lying in the sunny mouths of the holes, and savagely resentful of interruption. Already that day Claudio had found three dead ewes, lying close beside a burrow, fearfully swollen, and upon the nose of each were two tiny black marks such as one might make with a tattooing needle.

Late in the afternoon the ewes, with a chorus of strange whistles, went tearing and galloping over the hillside and disappearing over the brow of the ridge, as if the very wolves were after them.

Claudio started in pursuit, but the lambs hung at his heels, in spite of a bombardment of words and pebbles that he directed at them, and whenever he paused they pranced up to him and snuggled against his legs, and dropped contentedly at his very feet.

Pulling off his coat, Claudio swung it vigorously about him to clear a space, leapt over the backs of a few loiterers, and went running up the slope at a pace it was a wonder to see.

The coat dropped from his hand as he jumped a gully, and as the lambs came stumbling along several tripped on it, and finding it warm, promptly sprawled upon their knees and began to nurse at whatever rag or tag they first found. And the others, fancying that they were being robbed of their dinner, crowded and jostled about, butting, falling down, and clambering over one another.

Claudio might have laughed at the sight; but when he came back fifteen minutes later, he saw about the coat only a lot of little white patches, smeared with blood. Here and there a lamb was to be seen, wandering disconsolately about or fallen exhaustively over a shrub. And over the further hillside was just disappearing a big, dark, shambling figure with two white objects shining on it.

It was all plain enough. The ewes, scenting the bear from afar as he sneaked through the woods, had fled incontinently; for the actual presence of no other wild beast so terrifies sheep as the mere smell of a bear. And taking advantage of Claudio's brief absence, Bruin had sallied from the junipers, played havoc among the lambs (which were too stupid to fear even him), and were now making off with a couple "for future reference."

The bear, like bears always, was only anxious to get away, if he decently could, and ran his best. Ordinarily that would have been far better than Claudio's best—or a very fair horse's best, for that matter. But greediness is costly, even for bears. The lamb in his mouth was no handicap whatever; and having eaten two or three besides, he might have been contented with that.

But the one he persisted in carrying hugged under his forearm did seriously impede him. Even then, in the long run, he was more than a match for his pursuer. When Claudio came in full view of him and only a hundred yards behind, he whipped from his belt the revolver he carried in lieu of a rifle.

"Throwing down" in the swift, instinctive motion of those who really know how to use a revolver and never stop to ask whether it has sights or not, he sent a leaden proxy running for him. It was a good shot, tired and out of breath as he was, the kind of shooting one has to learn on the frontier, and cannot learn in a gallery.

The bear turned a complete somersault; and gathering itself again, began biting viciously at its rump.

Claudio had not stopped at all; but now, when he was within thirty yards, he halted and watched for the brute to give him a shot at a vital part. But at that very instant the bear, with a snuffle of rage, wheeled and came galloping at his late pursuer.

Claudio sent a square shot at the skull—not by any means under the impression that he could bore that sloping forehead, but hoping the rap might startle the beast into rising, so that he could get a chance at the throat, the best of all shots at a bear. But the heavy ball merely ploughed a red furrow up the skull, and the bear came lurching on. It was worse than useless to run. Slender as was the chance of life now, it all lay in standing firm.

Digitized by Google

When it was within six feet, the huge brute reared upon his haunches, and, springing back a step, Claudio was bringing down his weapon like lightning to "let go" when it should be on a level with that mighty throat, now fully exposed. But the bear was no innocent; and cleverly judged as was Claudio's move he had met his match in quick wit. Even the sweep of his swift arm was slow beside the flash of that great paw as it swooped far forward, met his descending hand with a calculation an Indian eye might have envied, and sent the heavy revolver spinning forty feet, going off as it flew. And in another instant the shepherd was on his back, and the bear upon him.

The great claws had struck only the revolver, and Claudio's hand was unhurt, save where the violent wrenching of the trigger had cut and twisted his fingers; and instinctively he gripped deep in the thick fur where his hands first lighted. Neither had he been hurt by the fall, for here was soft grey sand—which a little relieved, too, the fearful pressure upon his legs. But none of these things comforted Claudio; and he fought only as a man fights blindly to the end. His last faint hope had gone when the revolver went whirling far beyond his reach.

The bear, which had gone to bed in his cave in the canyon of Acebache, rolling fat, in November, had but a few days ago come forth from that long nap, the shadow of his proper self. His long heavy fur was sadly rusty, and his huge frame lean as a rail. He had been interrupted in the first square meal he had enjoyed in five months, and from that long fast came two strange results.

One was, that he was not half himself in strength, and that the powerful young Mexican was therefore, something more that a puppet in his paws.

Of the end, certainly, there could be no doubt; but meantime Claudio wrestled mightily, and even succeeded in struggling to his feet hugging close, to give those paws no chance for one of the swipes that would make an egg-shell of his head. His face he snuggled into the bear's chest, and so kept clear of the dripping jaws. And despite the fearful pressure under which his ribs creaked and sprung, he hunched and tugged and swayed blindly and desperately, as if he were wrestling with some tall man whom he might hope to pitch at last. But it was not for long.

Finding the close quarters unsatisfactory, the bear brought up its muscular arm, and clapping its paw upon Claudio's mat of hair, forced his head resistlessly back. The great claws were buried in his scalp, and little streams of red spurted out. The bear's left arm was round his waist, while the right was giving him the "break hold" as scientifically as any wrestler could have done.

And now a villainous, warm breath came sickening in his face, and he could see the red jaws and white teeth within six inches. He even noticed, with that strange inconsequence which comes upon one in these moments, that blood from the scalp wound had run down and tinged the froth which dripped from that great mouth.

In a frenzy of terror he made a clutch under the throat, to hold back that terrible head, and the strongest man could scarce have bent against Claudio's desperate arms; but the big jaws, working grimly, drew nearer. A deadly faintness began to spread over him, and Claudio shut his eyes.

Just then a sudden jerk ran through the body of the bear, and there was a sharp snort as of rage and pain.

Claudio opened his eyes. He could see nothing but the demoniac face, but in it he fancied there was a new expression.

Then there was a sickening movement of the great claws which had sunk deep into his back and scalp. Surely they were relaxing!

Their withdrawal was far more painful than their entrance had been; but even with the faintness of the new pain, a sudden wave of joy swept through the shepherd—for the first time, now, he hoped, though he knew not why.

He shook his head savagely to clear the blood which streamed down over his eyes (the paw had dropped from his scalp), and dug his fists into the deep furred throat, and fought with the strength of two Claudios—fighting no longer as a dying rat fights, but like a man for hope of life.

Then a very wonderful thing befel. The bear was groaning and panting heavily; and suddenly it lurched and fell to the ground, carrying Claudio with it. But it was no longer trying to get his head between its jaws. For a moment it lay upon him, writhing and grinding its teeth, and then flung itself to one side biting up a great mouthful of sand.

Claudio leapt to his feet, ran to his revolver, and fell upon it, crying like a child. It was ten minutes before he could get up, for the loss of blood—and, more than all, the frightful strain—had left him limp as a rag. At last he staggered to his feet, clutching the weapon, and walked unsteadily towards the bear.

Laying down his revolver he caught the heavy fur of the rump, to turn the bear over. Ordinarily he would have succeeded. Four hundredweight is no fool of a lump, but Claudio, as you have seen, was an uncommonly powerful young man. Now, however, worn out with his fearful struggle, and with nerves so unstrung that he trembled all over, it was too much for him.

Still the mystery would not let him rest; and hunching his shoulder against the bear's back, he ran his hand under, feeling for the wound. He groped and groped, but suddenly in a hollow felt the touch of something very different from fur or sand, and in the same instant an inconceivable pang. And when he jerked his arm away a tiny snake less than a foot long, grey-backed, an coppery on the stomach, was hanging from his thumb.

The last vestige of colour faded from the brown face and left it as grey as ashes between the drying streaks of blood—for Claudio knew the pichu-guate, the only real asp in the New World, the deadliest snake in North America.

So he had escaped the bear only to die by this tiny foe—for never yet had one been known to recover from the bite of the pichu-guate. A rattlesnake was nothing; but this, well see what it had done for such a monster as the bear, and in the space of less than a minute!

Evidently in their struggle. Brain had stepped too close to this unsuspecting danger—that great lump on his hind leg explained all. Had he carried his usual coat of fat, the venom would have taken far longer to operate, and he would have had abundant time to settle accounts with Claudio. But he no longer looked gaunt.

Digitized by Google

He was still swelling—already he looked fat, as if July were here.

Claudio was reeling. Fearful pains shot up his arm and went forking through his body. Upon the thumb were only two black dots, right at the tip, but the hand in these five seconds had become double its size. If he could only cut it off! But alas! his knife was in his coat—and before he could get half-way to that he would be a dead shepherd.

All this had taken not so long as it has for you to read it—nay, scarce the time in which one might spell the longest word in it; for in those crises things and thoughts move swiftly, and one lives fast.

Claudio was still squeezing his thumb and crying aloud for a knife, when his eye lit on the revolver. Quick as a flash he sprang and caught it up and cocked it. There was just one cartridge left.

His nerves were steady now. He held his hand arm's length before him, the wounded thumb erect; drew the revolver back right up to his eye, that the ball might not mangle too much, and thus stop the blood, which must flow; and with a hand as firm as if it had been carved of stone, pulled the trigger.

There was a dull, numb sensation, hardly a pain in all that side, and when the smoke cleared from his eyes, his right hand was black and bleeding. The thumb was gone clean at the lower joint.

There is one man in New Mexico who has been bitten by the pichuguate and lives to tell of it—a tall, powerful, good-natured shepherd, with four grim grey furrows in his hair, and the thumb of the right hand missing. But Claudio seems rather proud of these disfigurements, and often says:

"Who talks of bargain? For so cheaply I bought my life twice in an hour."

H. R. BENTLEY.

ONE of the new schools, that which does not permit of the use of adjectives which do not date back to the thirteenth century, claims that the young widows were buried with Scribes. This claim, however, is totally without foundation, as the statistics will triumphantly show.

What I know is that there was still one a short distance from here not long ago in a hotel of the Rue Nonceau—a hotel ten metres square, entirely hidden by a clematis vine. Her name was Louise and the marriage ceremony had made her the Comtesse de Viry.

The Comtesse was twenty-two years of age. Her principal accessory was a little white and curly dog, the sole nourishment of which consisted of a lump of sugar in the morning and a biscuit in the evening. This dog's name was Bally.

It was four o'clock in the afternoon. Louise was skimming along the gravelled walk in the garden, circling about the rose bushes like a butterfly, and pausing from time to time to breath through her pink nostrils the delicate perfume of a newly-blown flower.

Bally, full of joy, was pursuing his mistress with merry barks; he seized with all his teeth the ounce of the blue muslin dress, which Louise seemed to have cut out of a rainbow, and, propping himself on his claws, pulled away to the full extent of his strength.

It was at the height of these amusements that M Jacques de Beauchamp entered the garden. The little widow, on perceiving him, hid herself behind an orange bush, but Jacques ran to her, and, surprising her, kissed her on the forehead.

"Oh, M. de Beauchamp!" cried she, "that's really too bad."

Louise was of medium height. How well she bore her title of widow, and in a way to do herself honour. The young girl is generally timid and stupid. She blushes, following her mother's directions, at a word that is said to her, and always lowers her eyes at the proper moment, which is bad for those who don't like to study eyebrows. The widow, on the contrary, has the right to hear everything, and when one talks to her of love she, at least, knows what love means.

Louise leant on the arm of M. de Beauchamp and they went into the parlour, followed by Bally, who cast jealous glances upon his mistress's suitor.

Louise and Jacques made a fine pair and the marriage was settled. Still, they had each a defect: M. de Beauchamp was jealous and Mdme. de Viry was a coquette.

"Louise," said he to her, "you fill me with despair. You say that you love me; that confession has come from your cherry lips; but how can I believe you when you smile on everybody? You have too kind a reception for the first man who comes along, and when I see you in Society, lively, vivacious, and gay, always laughing heartily in the midst of a circle of eager flatterers, it is impossible for me to say what tortures and agonies I endure."

Digitized by Google

"What can be done, my friend?" responded Louise. "I am gay, that is true; but is that a crime? And why should I snub men who approach me, and say things agreeable to be heard?"

"You are a coquette, and your laughter completes my despair, for if you laugh thus persistently it is only to show your teeth. You know how adorable you are when, laughing affectedly, you display your snowy throat by throwing back your head."

"But what must I do to prove my love to you? It's distracting; that's the whole of it. Ask of me what you will, but don't ask me not to laugh."

M. de Beauchamp assumed a solemn air.

"You told me one evening," said he, "that you would sacrifice your life for me. I do not ask so much as that of you; but, you see, will you make me the happiest of men?"

"You have but to speak."

"Even at the price of suffering?"

"Even at that price."

"Well, make me the sacrifice of one of your teeth."

"Do you know what you're asking? It's a piece of barbarity."

"A single tooth—the very smallest—in front, and afterwards you can laugh as much as you please."

"But you'll think me ugly. You won't have anything more to do with me!"

"I swear to you that there is no other means of assuring my happiness!"

The Comtesse rang.

Saint-Jean, her valet de chambre, took her order and returned, a quarter of an hour later, followed by a gentleman who carried a box of instruments.

"Who is that person?" demanded M. de Beauchamp.

The little Comtesse answered:

"He is Mr. James the English dentist."

The little Comtesse passed into her boudoir, Bally followed her with drooping tail, as becomes a dog when it is aware that something grave is about to happen.

Louise returned a little later, ashamed and humiliated, and handed M. de Beauchamp a small tooth as white as milk, which the latter raised to his lips and covered with kisses. Then she fled and shut herself up in her chamber.

Jacques had the tooth framed in a tiny medallion and wore it religiously about his neck like a sainted relic.

From that day on the little Comtesse was so gloomy that they took her for a nun. Very rarely did even a faint smile light up her countenance like a furtive ray of sunshine during the rain. She fled from Society, and when by chance she ventured into it she was soon apart seated in a corner, as serious as an owl, with her mouth shut as closely as a prison door.

Jacques no longer recognised her, and, to tell the truth, she was unrecognisable.

"The poor Comtesse is ageing," said malevolent people. "She has greatly changed; she is as solemn as a funeral procession."

And Jacques felt his love flowing away drop by drop, like the water from a vase of flowers.

He realised that what he had loved in her were, above all things, her smiles, her sprightliness, and her gaiety. And he also grew gloomy. Then he made efforts to retain his fleeting love; then he sought to reason with himself and intoxicate his brain, but only the more did he realise that he himself had slain his passion.

One day he reached Mdme. de Viry's house in a state of complete desperation.

"Louise," he said as he cast himself at her feet, "do you still love me?"

"I have sworn to love you always," answered she.

"Will you prove to me the sincerity of your word?"

"I ask nothing better."

"Well, if you love me have your tooth put back."

"What folly is this?" said Louise, weeping. "I told you that you would love me no longer. You're just like all the rest of the men. And yet they reproach we women with being capricious."

"Louise, I supplicate you to pardon me. I revile my blindness—my idiocy."

"So you deplore the weakness with which I consented to yield to your caprice?"

"I am filled with sorrow, tortured by remorse beyond endurance."

"You admit the cruelty of your exaction?"

"I shall reproach myself with it until the day of my death."

"You would have been happy had I disobeyed you?"

"I would give anything, no matter what, had you done so."

The little Comtesse gave a hearty laugh, which disclosed all her teeth, not one of them was missing.

"What does this mean?" demanded M. de Beauchamp, turning about with his fingers the medallion in which was encrusted like a sainted relic, the little pearl of sacrifice.

The Comtesse opened Bally's pouting lips, saying as she did so:

"Behold the victim."

"Ah," cried M. Beauchamp, "you never loved me, Louise, I see it plainly now. You never loved me."

They never married.

C. SUTHERLAND.

Now, Mr. Smith, is the Time to Try for One of Pearson's Fivers!

THE Editor of Pearson's Weekly is offering five £5 notes to all those named Smith. Applications must be made on post-cards addressed to the "Note Editor" of Pearson's Weekly, and must reach the office of that paper by November 12th at latest.

Of course it may happen that the note is not addressed to you at all; on the other hand, it may be that your name is lying in the editorial safe in an envelope containing one of those crisp and crackling £5 notes, the possession of which makes life so pleasant.

WE all admit that marriage is a lottery, but we are also all convinced that we know the lucky combination.

HAL COUNTER: "So she did not accept you?"

Sam Shoeseller: "No—got down on my knees to propose—then forgot what I was there for and asked her what size shoe she wore."

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXXI.

A Stab at Russia.

A hundred miles in twenty hours is not a bad performance over such a country as Afghanistan, even if the road be a good one like that which links Chaman with Kandahar.

Both men and horses were weary when Captain Peyton announced that they would make their first prolonged halt on a wooded slope which commanded a view of the famous Afghan city.

Under the peculiar conditions of travel all distinctions of rank disappeared in this small party. The leader attended to his two chargers as zealously and thoroughly as did the junior Sikh jemadar, and by rapid arrangement Englishmen and natives equally divided the other duties of the bivouac. The unusual circumstances of their yet unknown mission rendered it imperative that self-help and equality of labour should be the order of the day, and all shared alike in mounting guard, cutting wood, and the rest.

Culinary operations were the most difficult. The two Mussulmans necessarily ate by themselves, the Hindu soldier made shift to observe caste prejudices, and when dinner came to be thought of, Peyton and de Vismes gazed blankly at each other.

"Do you know anything about cooking?" said Peyton to his companion.

"Lots—theoretically."

"Ha!" The qualification sounded suspicious.

"I have learnt the names of various dishes in ten languages," explained de Vismes. "For instance, the Russian for Irish stew is——"

"Look here, old chap," broke in Peyton. "I will cut a double share of grass for the gees, if you will undertake the stew in any language you like."

"Agreed," cried de Vismes. "To-day it shall be Étuvée à la Kandahar."

A young goat which they had bought at a village for a few annas supplied the meat, and the Mohammedans had already secured some sweet potatoes, of which de Vismes obtained a share. Salt they had brought with them, and the result of an hour's assiduity produced an excellent meal and a liberal supply of grass-roots for the horses.

It was then that Peyton was able to open his sealed packet and learn the full extent of the task intrusted to him. An autograph letter from Sir George White was quite explicit.

"You will proceed," wrote the Commander-in-Chief, "with the utmost possible dispatch to Turbat-i-Shaikh-Janni, on the Herat Meshed road. There you will find Captain Adams of the 5th Lancers, who is awaiting you. If not he, Captain Hutchinson of the 2nd Gurkhas will be in his place. Should you arrive safely, either of these officers will acquaint you with the intentions of the Government of India. You will be in supreme command, and it is left to your discretion to act at the right moment. This you will easily determine when you have reached your destination.

"Communicate the contents of this letter to the British officer selected to accompany you, so that in the event of accident to yourself he may fulfil your mission. In the latter event the command at Turbat and during subsequent operations will be settled by seniority.

"Should it be an open question whether or not either of you can reach Turbat, your destination only must be told to the native officers in your party, so that if any one of them gain the desired end of the journey, the officer he meets will understand what has happened, and may be trusted to do what is best fitted in his judgment.

"The native officers should be individually instructed to deliver a message to that effect.

"When you have read this document to your companion, burn it. I inclose a sketch map of your best route, with all possible information marked thereon by the Intelligence Department, and you will also find herewith safe conducts signed by the Amir of Afghanistan and the Shah of Persia.

"You must allow neither your own life, nor the lives of your companions, nor of your opponents, to stand in the way of the accomplishment of this mission.

"I have only to wish you success, and to assure you of the keen appreciation that will be manifested by the Government of India, if you and your companions are able to fully carry out their desires."

Peyton read this remarkable document twice slowly, and then he called de Vismes, and went through it again, aloud.

"We seem to have got a tolerably tall order," was de Vismes' comment.

Digitized by Google

"Why do you think so?" said Peyton. "There surely need not be more than ordinary difficulty in getting through to Turbat-and-the-rest-of-it—unless——"

"Yes. Unless the Russians are already in the way. That's exactly what the chief expects; hence your burning the letter in case it should fall into their hands."

"The presence of a few sotnias of Cossacks between us and the frontier of Persia will certainly complicate matters," replied Peyton with a smile. "Meanwhile pass a cigar. I am going to burn this thing, and we must not waste matches."

"It seems to me," went on de Vismes thoughtfully, "that even when we reach Turbat the business is only beginning. We have got a great chance, old man. Let's have a look at the passports."

Peyton . . . went through it again aloud.

He examined the two documents whilst the cigar and the letter were being ignited. They were written in the Persi-Arabic character, which he readily deciphered. Then he laughed.

"These safeguards are typical of the men," he explained. "The Shah uses a lot of circumlocution and flowery phrases, and explains that we are engaged, so far as he knows, on a peaceful mission, the nature of which he doesn't state, but he enjoins all his servants to help us with food and forage for the horses if necessary. The Amir, on the other hand, comes to the point at once. Here is what he says: 'The bearer is my friend. He who refuses to assist him is my enemy. Signed,—ABDURRAHMAN KHAN.' Quite explicit, isn't it?"

"Yes, to those who know the ways of Kabul," said Peyton, and the two officers then carefully scrutinised the map. By travelling fifty miles a day, which would be a phenomenal performance in such country, they would be in Turbat-i-Shaikh-Janni in eight days. And the Cossacks were already in Herat—but this they did not learn until later.

Their second halt was at Maiwand.

The swiftly-flowing waters of the treacherous river, though sparkling and iridescent in the declining light of the hot May evening, did not fail to evoke bitter thoughts in the hearts of the Englishmen, whilst the natives condemned the stream in the choicest phrases of the Urdu language—a tongue particularly rich in the vocabulary of objurgation.

Indeed they were relieved to quit the place and its painful memories of British disaster when the first faint streaks of dawn gave light to show the road. Thence they crossed the Helmund at Haidrabad and took the direct if difficult route to Taiwarah.

By this means they hoped to gain Kuhsan on the Persi-Afghan frontier by an unfrequented road and without attracting undue observation.

Towards the close of the fourth day, whilst they were travelling rapidly through the valley of a tributary of the Farah-Rud river, one of the horses fell dead lame. He was stripped, his trappings thrown into a nullah, and turned loose, but the poor beast continued to hobble after them, and was not driven off until the rissalder had laid about him with a heelrope.

They halted in a tope of trees about a mile farther on, and as was their invariable custom, selected a spot which commanded a good view of the surrounding country.

Not expecting any immediate danger, they were about to kindle a fire when the Sikh uttered a warning cry, and at once the eyes of the whole party were riveted upon an irregular crowd of horsemen coming down the valley on the watershed of which they had bivouacked.

Peyton knew that he and his companions were hidden from observation by the trees, but as a precautionary measure the horses' girths were tightened again, and then the proceedings of the new-comers were watched with interest.

They did not long leave the British soldiers in doubt as to their identity.

"Cossacks from the Ural," whispered de Vismes. "I know their head-dress well, as I once lived among 'em for a month."

"Then the Russians are advancing on Kandahar," said Peyton. "Thank Heaven our fellows will be there to meet them!"

The enemy came momentarily nearer, and were evidently about to pass them at a distance of half a mile, close to the banks of the shallow river which ran north-west towards the Farah Rud.

"It's a jolly good job they don't go in for scouting on the hillsides," murmured Peyton. "Otherwise we should be in trouble."

The Cossacks had reached the nearest point to the concealed party when the unexpected happened. The discarded charger, who had made his way to the water, seeing a troop of horsemen, had cantered off to them on three legs, and whinnied his delight at again falling in with his own kind. Instantly the three native officers sprang to their blankets in order to smother the cries of any of their animals that might choose to give tongue in reply, but, old campaigners as they were, the other troop-horses were too busy with their feed to indulge in conversation.

The Cossacks halted at the somewhat singular encounter, and some of them dismounted to examine the prize. At once a great deal of gesticulation and excitement arose in their midst.

"They have found the regimental number on his hoof," growled De Vismes.

"Yes," said Peyton grimly. "We must spare no more lives," and he thought of the concluding words of the Commander-in-Chief's letter.

"It's a good job we didn't shoot him."

"True, but we might have stabbed him. I trust they won't find the saddlery."

Dismounted to examine the prize.

The Cossacks deliberated for some time and then pushed on rapidly southwards, whilst they now detached scouting parties on the hills.

"That was a close call," observed De Vismes, drawing a deep breath.

"Very. In half-an-hour's time we will drop over into the next street," said Peyton, meaning that they would traverse the ridge and try the neighbouring valley as a safer route.

Nothing happened that night or the next day when they crossed the track leading from Herat to Zulfikar. As the evening of the seventh day came on they cautiously, approached the Kuhsan Pass. Once safely through this they had only two days of hard riding before them, as they would be in Persian territory.

But although the goal was so near, Peyton resolved to leave nothing to chance.

The country was well wooded up to the mouth of the pass, so he halted his little company in a secluded spot some two miles distant from the cleft in the hills through which ran the caravan route, and sent Gurdal Singh forward on foot to reconnoitre.

The Sikh was absent three hours, and Peyton was becoming anxious; darkness came, and there was still no sign of the jemadar. At last he returned, breathless but imperturbable.

Digitized by Google

"What news, jemadar?" said the Commander.

"Ill news, sahib," was the reply. "A hundred Cossacks are eating round their fires about a quarter of a mile from the pass, and a sentry is placed where the road enters the hills."

The annoyance and amazement of the two officers at these tidings were best signified by silence. At last Peyton said: "We must get through to-night."

"Of course," answered de Vismes. "But how? To attempt to rush it means death for the lot of us."

"We must think of some means," said the other, and he called to him Rissaldar Shah Nawaz Khan, who knew this part of the country thoroughly, having served on an escort for a boundary commission in the locality.

The Mohammedan, having questioned the Sikh, explained that the Cossacks were encamped on a piece of level ground on one side of a small stream which issued from the pass. It would be possible in the night to reach unobserved the entrance to the pass by the other side of the stream, crossing the water at the nearest point, and making a dash for the road.

But there was the sentry.

"Leave him to me," said Shah Nawaz Khan, with a complacent grin. "I have often crept into a keddah, sahib, when a boy, and thrown a noose round the leg of an elephant. A Cossack's neck is not nearly so thick."

"This sounds deuced like murder," said Captain Peyton in English. "Remember, Shah Nawaz Khan," he continued, "I would not have the man killed if it can be avoided. Can you disarm and gag him quietly?"

"Protector of the poor, it is done."

Shortly before midnight the five men, having selected the best of the horses, and hobbled the others to prevent them from following, reached the further side of the stream, whose noisy progress effectually drowned the sounds of the horses' feet. They cautiously examined the Cossack encampment, which was plainly visible in a flood of brilliant moonlight. They could also see the sentry, and whilst they were arranging their final plan of action the relief was effected.

"His hour has not come," murmured Shah Nawaz Khan to his compatriot, as they watched the Cossack whose turn of duty had expired returning to the bivouac.

An idea now occurred to Peyton. Not only must they get safely into the pass but the Cossacks must be sent off on the wrong scent, or the gagged sentry must soon be discovered and a pursuit established.

"Gurdal Singh," he said to the Sikh. "Take your horse and return. Cross the stream lower down, and in half-an-hour ride openly toward the encampment. Go as near as you can with safety, fire your carbine at them, yell as loud as you are able, and then do your best to escape. Here is a letter from the Amir if you fall in with any Afghans. You must endeavour to return to Kandahar and report our progress. I will see to it that you are rewarded."

"Salaam, sahib!" returned the Sikh gravely, and he led off his horse without another word.

At the same moment Shah Nawaz Khan slipped away into the shadows like a ghost, having divested himself of his boots and most of his clothing. He only carried a heel-rope and a knife.

A cloud passed over the moon, plunging the landscape into darkness, and for fifteen weary minutes the others waited in ill-sustained suspense.

Then a dark form crept up from the river bank and a gruff voice said:

"It is done, sahib. Give me a minute to clothe myself."

"Is he bound and gagged?" said Peyton, leaning towards the place where Shah Nawaz Khan was wriggling into his accoutrements.

"He is bound, sahib, but the gag slipped." Then, after a tug at a boot, the rissalder added. "Nevertheless he will not speak."

Peyton remembered the Commander-in-Chief's instructions and asked no more questions.

To cross the stream and quietly glide into the gloom of the pass was now an easy matter. This was hardly accomplished when a couple of rifle shots rang out in the still air in quick succession, and they could plainly hear the shouting of the Cossacks as they sprang to arms.

All armed and mounted.

Silently and doggedly the four soldiers urged on their tired horses. The ascent was short but steep. By two o'clock they were nearing the summit of the pass when they heard an unmistakable sound some distance in the rear. The crack of the Cossack whip, and cries of encouragement to animals as a party of pursuers rode after them, came up from the cavernous depths of the defile.

"They have found the sentry," said Peyton. "Only a few of them must have followed the Sikh."

"Allah has permitted it," said Shah Nawaz Khan, "but the prophet himself could not make their sentry tell that which he saw."

Then the full and terrible significance of his orders came to Peyton's mind for the first time.

"You must remain here and bar the way as long as you can," he said to the two Mohammedans.

"It is done," they both replied.

Shah Nawaz Khan continued, without the slightest tremor in his voice: "I have a wife and three little ones in the cavalry bazaar at Shikarpur."

"My aged father and mother live at Delhi," said Jemadar Musa Khan, "and I send them a quarter of my pay every month."

"They shall not want whilst the Sirdar reigns," replied Peyton, choking down his emotion. "May God guard you!"

"Salaam, sahib," cried both men, and they dismounted.

The last that Peyton and de Vismes saw of them they were striving to prise a big rock into the middle of the narrow and precipitous mountain path, which here overhung a steep gorge.

The officers rode forward in silence, and in a little while they heard rapid firing in the rear. This continued in a desultory manner for some time, and then died away; but there appeared to be no further pursuit.

"The majority of those shots were from Lee-Metford carbines," said de Vismes.

"Well they might be," replied Peyton, who was bitter with grief at the loss of the two brave men he had been compelled to leave to certain death.

"The last shots certainly were," persisted the other.

"It is impossible that they should escape. Why, there were probably fifty Cossacks!"

"True, but the fifty don't know how many they are facing."

Further conversation was, however out of the question. The road in the descent became momentarily worse. Fortunately the sky had cleared again and the moonlight enabled them to pick their way, else they would inevitably have blundered down into the rocky abyss through which a new stream was now threading its way into Persia. Judging by the roar which came up out of the depths, there must be a considerable volume of water, and it was evident that several torrents, converging from other spurs in the hills, had here found a common channel.

Their horses were now almost dead beat, and they were practically in the same condition themselves, but they kept doggedly on until dawn came, and they neared the Persian end of the defile. But who can picture their dismay, when, on emerging into a comparatively open valley, they plainly saw another Cossack encampment about a mile distant.

Digitized by Google

"Alikhanoff must have had some inkling of a counter move from Persia," said de Vismes. "He has evidently seized every caravan route."

"It is to stop supplies reaching our troops from this side," said Peyton. "There is nothing for it but to cross the river and try to escape towards the north before we are seen. It will be a nasty job, especially with horses so done up as ours are."

True enough, this was their only resource. Taking advantage of the cover of some trees they boldly advanced into the stream, and their chargers, freshened by the water dashing against their flanks, gallantly essayed the difficult passage.

In such a turbulent and fierce rushing current it was useless to dismount and cling to mane or tail. They must either gain the other side with comparative ease, or be swept away by the force of the swirling and eddying river.

For a few moments all went well. Then de Vismes' horse, slipping on a loose stone, plunged violently, rolled over, and Peyton saw animal and rider hurled headlong by the current into a vortex of foam. They disappeared momentarily, but he caught glimpses of them as they fought madly for life when they rose again many yards further on.

Horrified beyond expression he seemed to lose all muscular power, and would infallibly have met the same fate if his gallant Waler had not scrambled into safety on the opposite bank.

It was hopeless to think of helping de Vismes, or seeking for him. One of the five was left, and he still had sixty long miles before him.

Peyton rode forward as in a dream until he reached a friendly wood, where he fell rather than dismounted from his charger, and lay for a little while on the ground utterly powerless.

And the only concrete idea he possessed seemed to be fixed in his brain in letters of fire. Had not the Commander-in-Chief written:

"You must allow neither your own life, nor the lives of your companions, nor of your opponents, to stand in the way of the accomplishment of this mission."

* * * * *

"Chicken broth and warm milk are all very well, old chap, when a man is as fin de siècle as you were on Wednesday, but I think the time has really arrived when a peg would do you good. I have saved a whole bottle of the best for three hot weeks in expectation of your coming, and there's half-a-dozen of soda swinging in wet towels in the veranda."

It was Captain Adams, of the Royal Irish Lancers, who spoke, and he affected a merriment he was far from feeling as he gazed at Peyton, stretched listlessly on a charpoy beneath an awning rigged up in front of the principal abode in Turbat-i-Shaikh-Janni.

Not a word had Peyton spoken for thirty-six hours after he fell senseless at Adams's feet muttering before consciousness fled: "Russia—war—come from Quetta—search for de Vismes—carried away river."

By careful treatment the lancer had succeeded in saving Peyton's life, and believing that some tragedy had occurred, he sent out a large party of Persian horsemen to scour the country, but they returned to report that they had discovered nothing save the presence of some Cossacks at the mouth of the Kuhsan pass.

It was now the evening of Sunday.

Peyton was much better and able to grasp the tremendous importance of his journey when Adams had explained why he and nineteen other British officers had been living for six weeks on the Persian frontier, close to the Central Asian Railway.

"Come," said Adams, "a small dose of whisky and soda will give you an appetite. I must pack you into a *palki to-morrow, and carry you off to Mahommadabad, which we have made our centre. There you will find six or seven other men, who have charge of sections. It is a great scheme, I can assure you."

"I will be ready," said Peyton. Then he added gravely: "Is there any news of de Vismes?"

"Not the slightest. Heaven knows where that beastly river would carry him to. It runs into nowhere."

Whereby Adams meant that the torrent was one of those numerous Central Asian streams which, rising in the hills, finally lose themselves in the midst of desert wastes of sand.

Peyton was much cast down for a while. But thorough soldier as he was, he knew that his brave comrades, Englishmen and natives, had succumbed to the lottery of war.

He declined the proffered peg, but asked for a cheroot. Adams and he were lighting their cigars when they noticed three wretched-looking men, attired in a remarkable manner, and mounted on small ponies, coming through the bazaar, attended by a furious crowd.

Peyton suddenly forgot his weakness. He leapt to his feet and yelled: "By——, its de Vismes and the two sowars!"

And it was.

De Vismes had been deposited on a sandbank, and had thence crawled, with a sprained wrist and a bruised knee, to a Persian village, where he lay quite prostrate for the best part of two days.

Here he was found by the Ris aldar and Musa Khan, who had driven back the Cossacks by first firing at them briskly in the darkness, and then causing their own two chargers, by lashing them with their sabres, to gallop madly down the narrow path and precipitate nearly a dozen of the astounded pursuers into the ravine, where they were found by the kites next day.

Some 70,000 men were placed on board transports.

The two Mohammedans crossed to the north of the stream higher up than the officers, and thus escaped the second batch of Cossacks in their turn.

And these things formed but a feeble prelude to the events that followed.

CHAPTER XXXII.

The Bridge over the Oxus.

Russia is popularly supposed to be impregnable and unassailable. Vast though her bulk, she apparently offers few openings for attack. Napoleon once drove an army like a lance into her breast, but the lance was shattered by its own blow. England and France and Turkey combined, spent all their strength against a puny peninsula in the Crimea. Russia, therefore, say the people who make war in words, cannot be invaded.

In India, however, a different opinion prevails. There, in the past, it was sufficient for a place to be impregnable to render it a fitting locality for a British cantonment. Chitral was unassailable until Colonel Kelly and his sepoys dragged guns through six feet of snow and over a 12,000 feet pass in order to mount them upon the fort of that name.

England was not, as we have seen, unprepared for sudden attack by the Continental powers, and when the Government of India were apprised of the threatened danger they

* A covered litter.

Digitized by Google

at once took steps to checkmate any move on the part of the only foe they had reason to suspect.

Twenty British officers, fully conversant with the Russian and Persian languages, were dispatched early in April to Khorassan, viâ the Persian Gulf and the Karun River. They were accompanied by a trusted representative of the Foreign Department, who used some remarkably convincing arguments with the Shah, as that excellent descendant of the Prophet thenceforth professed the utmost ignorance of any events occurring on the Meshed-Astrabad frontier.

The range of hills running from the Caspian to the north-west corner of Afghanistan is occupied by Persian and Turkoman robber tribes. These, for the most part, have been driven out of Russian territory by successive wars and the vigorous application of the knout.

They are a nomad population, all armed and mounted, and all ready to enter into any scheme wherein bakshish, pillage, and a reasonable amount of throat-cutting are judiciously blended.

For twenty Englishmen, skilled in the manners of the East, and well supplied with money, to rapidly gain considerable ascendancy over these easily-led people was a simple matter of time and careful treatment.

When Captain Peyton reached Mohammadabad, therefore, he found that he was commandant of an irregular but mobile force of some 40,000 horsemen, each batch of 2,000 being under the special care of an English officer, and the whole body filled with malicious glee at the thought of striking an effective blow at their hereditary enemy.

The force was scattered at considerable intervals along a line of country which ran parallel with and some sixty miles south of the Transcaspian Railway, and the sealed orders delivered to the commandant by Adams, instructed him to advance upon the railway, sieze simultaneously as much of its length as was possible between Dushakh and Kizil Arvat, and endeavour to hold the two latter places.

If the strength of the enemy was such as to render the concluding part of this programme impossible, he was to retire, having thoroughly destroyed the line before relinquishing it.

His attack was to be timed to fit in with the destruction of the first Russian Army Corps, the advance of which upon India he would be certain to hear of.

If able to maintain his ground, he should strengthen both ends of his extended line of operations, and remain immovable until help came from India.

The principle underlying the scheme was at once apparent to an able soldier like Peyton.

By capturing or destroying Russia's means of rapid communication with the Afghan frontier in the neighbourhood of Penjdeh, and assuming that her Asiatic provinces were practically denuded of troops to supply the first expeditionary corps for the descent upon India, her European and really reliable army in the Caucasus was placed in a far worse position for quick movement than the Anglo-Indian troops at Quetta.

In a word, the battle-ground was shifted from Herat and Kandahar to a vulnerable portion of Russian territory.

Lord Wolseley and Sir George White had other cards to play after winning the first coup.

The Commander-in-Chief at home, as a precautionary measure, communicated with Lord Roberts as to the state of affairs in France.

That gallant officer replied that he could do without reinforcements until after the approaching battle on the outskirts of Rouen, as the supports could not possibly reach him in time to be of any use in this engagement, and if things happened to his liking he thought the French would be satisfied until he was a little nearer Paris.

Over one half of the Third French Expedition, as it was called, was converted into a fifth Army Corps for attack upon Russia. Some 70,000 men were placed on board transports and sailed for Gibraltar. Of the Canadian troops 25,000 were diverted off Queenstown for the same destination, and a South African contingent of 15,000 men was also sent there by cabled instructions, which reached the commander at St. Helena.

A number of British ships left Gibraltar, and, by way of preliminary, threatened Marseilles and Toulon.

Peyton himself led the first squadron.

It was consequently believed in France that all these preparations, which, in due course, became known, foreboded a second invasion of the southern provinces, and Germany and Russia shared this view.

They were, however, all mistaken.

When the Viceroy cabled home the tidings of the battle of the Helmund, Lord Wolseley, in conjunction with the Admiralty, issued orders to the following effect:

The strong fleet at Gibraltar, now nearly doubled in numbers by reason of the captured ships of the enemy having been hastily repaired, was to advance through the Mediterranean with the transports containing 110,000 home and Colonial troops. The regiments at Malta and in Egypt were to be picked up en route, and the force must then pass the Dardanelles, with or without the consent of Turkey.

The Russian Black Sea fleet should be either captured or driven into Sevastopol and held there, whilst the expedition proper must proceed to and occupy Odessa, thence forcing its way along the Danube and seizing the railway to Tiraspol and Balta.

Contemporaneously with these events, a combined American and Canadian Corps would cross the Pacific and attack Vladivostock, in Eastern Siberia, and preparations would rapidly be made for a determined assault upon St. Petersburg and the Neva by an Anglo-American naval and military force.

It will be seen that the words of a sporting subaltern were fully justified when he said that we were going to "serve it up hot for Russia."

Fortunately, Commandant Peyton was not embarrassed by any knowledge of the gigantic scope of the project of which he was such an integral factor.

He set about his business promptly and effectually.

Having accurately gauged the date of the encounter between Alikhanoff's host and the British, he ordered that all arrangements should be made for a forward movement on June 11th, to culminate on June 14th.

To de Vismes he assigned the command of the right attack, that is, upon Dushakh.

Rightly judging that this would be a vulnerable point by reason of a possible Russian advance from Merv and the Oxus, he sent two divisions, those of Adams and Hutchinson, to effect the capture.

He personally decided to be carried by bearers, so that he might fully recover from his fatigue, to the extreme left, at Kulun Kalassi, where he would lead the advance on Fort Poltawskoe, and thence strive to reach Kizil Arvat.

It would be necessary to travel in a litter night and day in order to gain Kulun Kalassi in time, and he dispatched mounted messengers to warn all the officers en route to meet him and discuss details.

Peyton was distinctly a man of action. He conferred with each of the remaining officers whom he had not seen at Mohammadabad, gave them their instructions, and in case of success, told them to proceed to right or left, as the case might be, along the line to strengthen the two bases.

Digitized by Google

Rolling-stock and engines were to be carefully preserved, but, above and beyond all else, at the first note of danger, after the original design had been achieved, the line must be completely destroyed.

The two Mohammedan cavalry officers accompanied Peyton, and at midday on the 11th the little party reached Kulun Kalassi, where they found Captain Applin, of the 7th Bombay Infantry, expecting them.

This was the first contingent of his strange command that Peyton had time or opportunity to inspect, and he was immediately impressed with the marvellous effect which a few weeks of skilled European training had had upon the motley crew which he anticipated meeting.

Drawn up in five regiments of four squadrons each, the Goklan Turkomans, who composed this particular detachment, constituted a really excellent body of irregular horse. They stood stolidly in their ranks as Peyton rode up and down their lines, proud of their unwonted steadiness and parade-like uniformity.

They blurted out all the information they were asked for.

"How on earth did you get those chaps to obey you?" he said to Applin.

"Well, you see, I came here six weeks ago, and at once called a meeting of the elders. I lied like a Chinaman. I said that a great Jehad was to be declared against the Russians, who, by-the-way, drove this crowd out of Geok Tepe in Skobeleff's time, and promised them plenty of bakshish and loot if they followed my advice. More than that, I gave their palms a liberal greasing at the start, and said that this was nothing to the treasure which would flow when the Queen came to see the Shah. And this is the result."

"It's all very well, Applin, for you to put it that way," said Peyton kindly; "but it is easy to see that you have almost worked miracles to lick them into such shape in so short a time. I only hope that every other man on the frontier has been as successful."

The younger officer flushed with pleasure at hearing these words from his senior.

Orders were given for an immediate start. When a moment's interval occurred for a mouthful to eat, Applin said:

"By-the-way, I've been out of the world for over two months. What's the favourite for the Derby?"

"Rothschild's horse, I believe."

"Good, I've backed him. It's time the blue jacket had a turn; and I've taken ten tickets in the Turf Club Lottery."

Applin's mind was now at ease. He had "got on" at a good price, so he devoted his energies with much cheerfulness towards assisting the downfall of Russia.

After a three days' march through the hills the force came within striking distance of Poltawskoe. The night of the 14th had been appointed as the time of the combined attack, if possible, at midnight.

Rissaldar Shah Nawaz Khan and Jemadar Musa Khan were detached at the head of a flanking party to the west, with orders to stop any train which might be proceeding towards Kizil Arvat, but not to interfere with one coming into the interior. They were also to prevent mounted messengers from reaching the next station on that side, Aschaman.

Precisely at twelve o'clock Peyton himself led the first squadron at the gallop into the station, and his first care was to unship the telegraph instrument.

At the same moment Applin dashed at the fort, where, beyond a mere scuffle, there was no fighting. The garrison, such as it was, consisting of a couple of elderly staff officers and a few Russo-Turkomans, could not have been more unprepared for attack if a meteorite had fallen on top of them.

Within five minutes Peyton and Applin were expressing their astonishment at the completeness of the surprise, and whilst they were talking the whistle of an engine sounded across the desert.

They were standing in the station, and they compelled the station master, under pain of instant death, to properly adjust the signals, whilst they disposed their men on both sides of the rails, there being no platforms, to capture the train when it drew up.

Here again the operation was simplicity itself.

The Russian engine-driver and native stoker were too astounded to do anything when Peyton jumped on to the engine. They were promptly seized and bound before they knew that an enemy was at hand.

The rest of the train contained, as it transpired, commissariat officials who had been convoying stores to Geok Tepe, Askabad and Merv.

In their amazement they blurted out all the information they were asked for. Both Peyton and Applin had difficulty in restraining the expression of their joyful surprise when they learnt that the accumulations of months of secret preparation by Russia had fallen into their possession, if the attack had been similarly successful all along the line to Dushakh.

It seemed, too, that the rolling stock blocked the way, and it was with difficulty that two trains daily now traversed the system.

The Russians detailed these highly important facts without hesitation, apparently believing that refusal to answer would mean summary execution, and, indeed, it was with some difficulty that the British officers made their fierce followers understand that they must not strangle or behead every Russian they encountered.

A wild project now entered Peyton's head, and he in vain strove to repress it.

Why, if a nominally fortified place merely requiring walking into in order to be at his mercy, should not the whole line be seized to its Caspian terminus?

At last he communicated the idea to Applin and the latter agreed that, unless unforeseen obstacles, such as the presence of a strong body of troops at Kizil Arvat or Usun-Ada, were encountered, two hundred men could do the job quite as efficiently as two thousand.

The outcome of their deliberations was that in a couple of hours' time, Applin and a selected body of his levies started in the train for the west, with the native stoker, bribed beyond his wildest dreams, acting as driver.

Not until thirty hours later did the train return, bearing the following note from Applin:

"After being nearly annihilated by those two Mohammedan ruffians you brought with you, I at last was able to make them understand that we, and not the Russians, were in possession of the train. They are useful fellows, so I took the liberty of bringing them along with me. I have captured no end of places whose names I can't remember. Kizil Arvat is one of them. My principal occupation was in kicking station-masters to make them comprehend the situation, and in unfixing telegraph instruments. I am now in Usun-Ada where I have seized fourteen fairly-sized steamers. It appears that every available man has gone with Alikhanoff, and the line has been given up entirely to transporting stores and ammunition prior to the arrival of the Grand Duke's army. If he puts in an appearance I am afraid that my 250 vagabonds won't last long. I would, therefore, suggest immediate reinforcements. Fortunately I got to the submarine cable office before any news was sent to Baku. I have found a native here who swears he will wire anything I tell him, and translate all messages received. I must trust him, because no news at the other end would be almost as bad as the actual facts. So I propose to amuse the Grand Duke a bit before the thing leaks out from the Bokharan side. By-the-way, I do believe they have no telegraph line northwards from the frontier except that which passes through here. If so, we are in luck. There are some Frenchmen in the employ of the Caspian Maritime Company, whose steamers I have seized, and they have given me no end of trouble. My cable expert says he can get some men to repair the telegraph line, and work the instruments. I am sending them back on a smaller train; they will put things straight as they go, and you may expect them some hours after you receive this."

Digitized by Google

Within three days Peyton, with 10,000 of his strange auxiliaries, was in Usun-Ada, and started constructing earthworks to defend the harbour, whilst Applin sent long messages to the Grand Duke Paul, detailing the magnificent progress made in the forwarding of stores, and imploring him to expedite the departure of everything but men, as the line was not ready for the passage of troops yet. Besides, there was no news from Alikhanoff.

* * * * *

(To be continued.)

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☞ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 6 distribution must reach us by November 14th addressed to The 6th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the Third Distribution appears on the next column.

RESULT OF No. 3 DISTRIBUTION.

FIVE persons have this week successfully applied for a sovereign each. Their names and addresses are as follows:

W. WILLIAMS, 459 High Road, Tottenham, N.

G. JONES, 26 Yorkington Street, Edgeley, Stockport.

TAYLER WILCOCK, Danes Avenue, Roundhay, Leeds.

H. WOODYARD, 53 Longfellow Road, Walthamstow.

W. WEDGBURY, Church Cottages, Chelmarsh, near Bridgnorth.

Below you will find the names and addresses of those who would have had a £1 each if they had applied:

J. A. Robinson, The Glen, Torquay Road, Newton Abbot; W. Winter, 24 Rhondda Street, Swansea; C. B. Stokes, Belle Vue Terrace, Malvern Link; J. Allan, 12 Sydney Street, Glasgow; J. B. Corner, 8 Mathieson Road, Glasgow; Miss Freeman, 5 Beauchamp Avenue, Leamington; E. E. Garman, 5 Surrey Grove, Norwich; A. Rooke, 13 Egerton Road, Plymouth; Tho Wilson, 39 Plymouth Road, Penarth; Mrs. Spicer, 19 Richmond Road, Worcester; W. Hall, 43 Burnaby Street, Splotts, Cardiff; R. Loan, 3 Farley Terrace, Truro; S. Houlson, Alverton Street, Penzance; John Marshall, 167 Bank Street, Coatbridge; J. E. Keates, 5 Holmer Street, Hereford; W. Page, 44 Warwick Street, Wolverhampton; A. R. Ward, 13 Maria Street, Neath; W. Mair, Albany Place, St. Andrews; Chas. Lloyd, 37 St. Mary's Street, Bridgnorth; Miss M. E. Wycherley, 10 St. Julian's Friars, Shrewsbury; W. Thomas, 8 Richmond Terrace, Aberavon; W. Scott, 9 Shrubbery Street, Kidderminster; W. H. Adams, 37 Randall Street, Sheffield; C. Const, 101 Victoria Buildings, Clerkenwell Road, E.C.; W. Gibbons, 7 Church Grove, St. Andrew's Road, Small Heath, Birmingham; J. P. Endered, Evesham Road, Headless Cross, Redditch; Thos. Boddy, Heighington R.S.O., County Durham; W. J. Lavers, Fortescue Hotel, Plymouth; Geo. Philip, 3 Sandquay Terrace, Dartmouth; R. Davis, 15 Smith Street, Hanley, Staffs.; G. V. Wood, 2 Woodside Terrace, Onchan, Isle of Wight; H. Boston, 407 Old Chester Road, Rock Ferry; W. M. Garner, 5 Gladstone Terrace, Brighton; W. Eaton, Holm Villa, Cathcart, Glasgow; Mrs. Williams, 2 Picton Place, Haverfordwest; J. Matthews, 2 Elmfield Villas, St. Mary Church; J. Hazeldene, Middle Class Schools, Sheffield; Robert Leslie, 6 Albert Street, Shrewsbury; E. F. McCalmont, 115 Sugarfield Street, Belfast; Rev. Alex. Brown, 94 Hamilton Place, Aberdeen; W. Collins, 24 Oglander Road, Maxted Road, E. Dulwich; Chas. Hayes, Laurel Cottage, Norwich Road, Bournemouth; J. Mitchell, Lerryn, Lostwithiel; W. F. Campton, 49, Upper Townsend Street, Belfast; G. Gordon, 18 Hartland Road, Kilburn, N.W.

TO EVERYBODY NAMED JONES!

I shall have something of importance to say to you next week.

To Everybody who is not Named Jones.

Take this copy of SHORT STORIES and show the above paragraph to all your friends named Jones.

Digitized by Google

The Blood Mirror

"WHAT in the name of goodness is this thing, Grant?" asked Alden, holding up an oddly-shaped thick vial, stained on one side with some dull red colour, and covered with the accumulated dust of years. The elder man lowered his newspaper and directed his quiet gaze at the article which had excited his friend's curiosity, and which he had come upon while rummaging in Grant's cabinet of odds and ends.

"There; hold it a little more in the light, old man," said the latter, and then, as his guest did so, a quick frown passed over his pleasant face, and he added: "I thought that infernal thing was destroyed long ago. It is all that is left of my blood mirror."

"Your what?" asked Alden, in mild astonishment, turning from the vial to the man.

"My blood mirror—the one Venzeni once had. Did you never see it before?"

"Never," replied Alden decidedly, replacing the vial carefully, and observing it from a respectful distance. "What is a blood mirror, if I may ask?"

"A blood mirror," returned Grant shortly, "is an abominably artistic invention of a most savage set of men—the Maoris of New Zealand."

"Come," said Alden, drawing up a chair to the table and preparing to listen, "this sounds interesting! What is the story? I can see one in your eyes, and the title is certainly gruesome enough."

"Perhaps so; but not half so gruesome as the last experience I had with the mirror," returned Grant grimly. "Do you care to hear about it?"

"Oh, no," replied Alden, with mild, friendly sarcasm; "I never care to hear your stories; you ought to know it by this time! I only let you tell them so you'll be amused and not break the furniture, or mark on the walls, or pull the cat's tail. If you think I——"

"Very well," said Grant, interrupting and smiling good-naturedly at the younger man, "you shall have it then. You remember, perhaps, poor Venzeni's body-servant—that howling dervish, half Maori, half Zulu (though how he became so I never knew), and wholly a crude magician of no mean order. He died the same night that Moore murdered Venzeni, and, among the other strange contrivances of his art, he left this mirror. And as Venzeni had willed me all his things, or nearly so, and because no one else wanted the savage's dried skins and bones and other disagreeable things, I took them, the mirror along with the rest. And having heard of the marvellous power attributed to the uncanny thing, I determined to try it some night.

"The power which this mirror possessed, according to what Venzeni had told me, was that of reflecting events as they happened, anywhere in the world, for the person who looked into it, and who willed it. The absurdity of this was so evident that I only laughed when he mentioned it. But Venzeni was always a hot-tempered chap, you know, and this made him flash up like powder in the pan. 'If you will come here to-morrow night,' said he, 'I will have him prove what I say, for your amusement.' But though I promised to do so, to smooth his ruffled feelings down, he was called away that afternoon, and, by the time he returned home, we had both forgotten the incident.

"One day, while reading, I came across a little article on this very subject, written by as firm a believer in the occult as ever Venzeni had been, however, and there I learnt the unnatural heathenish manner in which these mirrors are manufactured. It seems that the blood used is that of an enemy killed in a hand-to-hand conflict, and after a lot of disgusting conjuring, it becomes endowed with its wonderful power. Some other liquid is also put with it to prevent its evaporation, and it is tightly corked, and there you are. Of course, horrible as the whole thing was to contemplate, this interested me, and, thereupon, I got out my specimen of a savage magic, and pouring it carefully into a saucer, I passed my hands over it, once or twice, thought earnestly of a certain street-crossing, and looked into the mirror.

"The result, I acknowledge, startled me, for there, before me plainly as if I were looking at the scene itself through the wrong end of an opera-glass, say, was the street I had thought of, with cabs and drays passing up and down, and pavements lined with people, and everything just as I knew it would be at that time of night. Suddenly, however, as I stared down, fascinated by this new, if uncanny, toy, I observed a strangely familiar figure turn the corner, and, looking steadily at him, I recognised—myself.

"Before I could begin to puzzle my own mind as to the meaning of this, however, two maddened horses attached to a carriage seemed to dash wildly down the street, and, in endeavouring to save a child I saw crossing it from being run over, the miniature figure of myself sprang in front of the excited animals, and the next moment I was being trampled beneath their feet.

Digitized by Google

"Then the mirror cleared, and I saw nothing but the dark, dully-shining blood before me.

"To say that I was satisfied with my experiment would hardly be truthful, for I was not. the thing worried me, and when, two weeks later, this very scene that I had looked upon really happened, as I was being carried bruised and pretty well done up, to my rooms, I remembered with very little satisfaction that Venzeni had had once said this particular mirror was different from the usual sort.

"Evidently it was, for not only did this little pool of blood shadow what had happened, but, in my case at least it had foretold the future, and had I been smart enough at the time and given to taking hints, I would probably have been more careful. Thinking thus, I mentally resolved to let the uncanny affair severely alone, and then fell to patching myself up as best I could. In a few days I was fully recovered, and, having dropped the accident from my mind, I soon forgot both it and the mirror. A month passed and another, and then one night that weird possession of mine fairly thrust itself upon me, and in an unlucky hour I took it out again. Would now that my hand had withered as I touched it, for it cost me the best friend of my life!

"You will remember Kenneth Hardesty, I know; kind-hearted, good-natured, noble old Kenneth, with a soul as big as his athletic body, and friends by the score. But none of these loved him as I did, and for years we had been inseparable. We were hard working young fellows then, and life was not a bed of roses to either of us, especially him, for not only was his salary small and the work hard, but the poor chap was desperately in love with a girl who couldn't have appreciated him had she lived twice as long as she did.

"One night he came to my room with a more than usually tired look upon his handsome face, and, dropping into the chair, he said:

"'Grant, I'm about done for. This strain is killing me, and I can't see the end anywhere. The work grows harder and harder, and though, Heaven knows, I try my best, I don't get on—I don't get on! For one look into the future I'd sell my very soul, I believe.' As he spoke some miserable thought suggested that mirror of mine, and without answering him I took it out, poured the liquid into the saucer, and set it before him.

"'Look into it then!' I exclaimed.

"'What is that stuff?' he asked, drawing back instinctively. Then I told him about it as briefly as possible, and showed him how to manipulate the things; and, though he laughed at what he chose to call my imagination, he passed his hands over it and looked down. And a moment later Kenneth Hardesty was realising his idle wish.

"I watched him curiously as scene after scene shifted in rapid succession before his eyes; and from the deep breathing and the intense expression on his face. I knew that he had overcome his momentary repugnance of the mirror, and was reading with spell-bound fascination the story the dull liquid before im related. Presently he looked up, with a great sigh, however, and passed his hand over his face in a dazed way, 'It is wonderful! wonderful!' he cried, springing to his feet. Then, with a quick wring of my hand, and murmuring something about being everlastingly indebted to me. he rushed out of the room and up the stairs, where I heard him whistling and singing softly for hours after he ought to have been in bed.

"From that hour Kenneth was a changed man. Where he had been moody and dreaming of late, he was now alert and quick, cheerful, hopeful, making more friends than ever, and creeping steadily up in his business. Once or twice I wondered if, after all, that strange little vial contained the elements of happiness for some mortal; but I did not ask Kenneth's opinion on the subject.

"The fact was, his actions began to trouble me now. Every evening, as regularly as the clock struck ten (as he had done ever since the first night I put the thing before him), he walked into my rooms, and, with a hazy greeting for me, walked straight to where the vial stood, and, pouring its contents out into the saucer, fell to studying it as if his very life depended on it. Once or twice I tried to draw him away from it, but he always shook me off impatiently. Plainly enough my poor friend was bewitched by the mirror. And then one night, a month after he had first looked upon it, there came a change.

"He had been bending over the little pool of blood not more than half-an hour, when I saw him turn white suddenly, and, rising quickly, he muttered something about a lie, and passed hastily out of the room without his customary good-night. I followed him to the door, but he did not hear my question as to what was troubling him, and went upstairs to his own room, where I heard him pacing restlessly up and down for the greater part of the night. There was evidently something radically wrong with him, and I worried long and uselessly that evening over his strange conduct for the last month. The following night I learnt the cause of it.

"Ten o'clock came and Kenneth did not put in an appearance.

"Eleven, and half-past that hour, crept by and still he did not turn up. This was unusual, and from the odd manner in which he had been acting, I feared something serious might have happened to him; so, taking up my coat and hat, I was just starting out in search of him, when the door was suddenly thrown open with a violent motion, and a man strode into the room. It was Kenneth; but what a terrible human being he was now!

"His clothes were torn and disarranged, as if he had just left off struggling for dear life with an enemy, and his usually immaculate shirt front—he was in evening dress—was covered with drops and splashes of blood, while his rumpled hair and pale face were flecked with the same red stains. One look into his deep-sunken, blood-shot eyes, told more than all the rest, and my heart sank within my breast. Poor boy, he was mad! And the first words he spoke confirmed the insane look in his eyes.

"'Where is it?' he asked hoarsely, shutting the door with a quick motion, and striding across the room to where I stood. 'Where is this mirror of yours? Where is it, I say?'

Digitized by Google

"His voice fairly rose to a shriek as he spoke, and my blood ran cold. But I knew that in calmness lay my only hope, and pointing to the mirror which rested on the top of the cabinet, I said:

"'It is there, Kenneth. But what do you want with it, and what does this—and this—and this mean?' I asked, touching his blood-stained shirt and coat and face.

"'It means that I have killed him—I have killed the wretch, the scoundrel—do you understand?'

"I confess I did not; but it was no time to argue the point with a madman, so, stepping back a few paces, to where I might reach the poker when the attack I felt sure was coming should be made, I waited for him to go on.

"'Where? Where?' he asked more quietly, passing his hand over his face again as if to tear an invisible veil away from his eyes. 'Where did you say it was? Let me have it, Grant, let me! It has never lied to me; it was a good friend, a good kind little friend, and—and—what am I saying? It told me of the work I would do, and I did it. It told me I would succeed, and I have. It told me everything I asked it, and you—where were you, Grant? I haven't seen you for ten centuries and fifty days! But, no matter, the mirror was here, the kind little mirror, and then it told me—ah, what then——.' and his head dropped suddenly upon his blood-spattered breast for a moment in silence. When he raised it again he was calmer, and for a fleeting minute I think he spoke rationally.

"'Grant,' said he, in a changed, dull voice, 'I am mad, I think. I have been so for how long you only know—I do not; but to-night I have done murder—foul, foul murder. Yet it was not I—it was the mirror. It told me that she would be false to me, and I swore it lied! but it did not, Grant, it did not. To-night I found them together, she in his arms, and I stabbed them both there—to the heart—with this!'

"As he spoke he drew from his inner breast pocket a small stiletto, and, as it flashed in the lamp-light, I saw its blade was covered with streaks of half-dried blood. For awhile the room seemed to reel about me as I realised the awful crime my friend had just confessed; but I was brought to my senses by his moving to the cabinet again.

"Looking up, I saw he held the little mirror for a moment in his trembling fingers, and a few drops from it were creeping slowly down the saucer and running over his fingers.

"'Yes,' he said, 'you showed me; you told me it would be so, and that I should kill them both together, and though I said you lied and swore I would not doubt her, you did not lie. I have killed her—him and her—him and her'—he paused for a second as if his mind were clouding again, and when he went on, I somehow felt the end was near, 'and I buried them side by side,' he said, 'where no one will ever find them, until their bones poke up through the dirt and shine in the sun. One good stroke, and another, and there they lay, writhing in each other's arms and trying to speak, while I and Death stood and watched them and laughed and laughed. And are you satisfied? Is this enough, or shall I look again and see myself going out into the unknown to meet them? Shall I?' No. I have seen enough, and you—you shall never spoil another life as you have spoilt mine!'

"As he spoke he raised the saucer and hurled it straight at the window. I turned to see it go, and in the crash of broken glass as the hard porcelain was dashed through the pane, leaving the red liquid dripping down the glass in great heavy drops, I did not hear the fall of the heavier body behind me. But as I turned to look at Kenneth again, I found him stretched out on the rug before the fire, the dagger buried in his heart.

"'And that is why,' concluded Alden's host abruptly, "I dislike the sight of that vial you have just brought to light. Please drop it into the hottest part of the fire, and let us get on to more cheerful subjects. Blood mirrors may do in New Zealand, but I don't want any more about my house."

"I don't blame you," said Alden thoughtfully, as the vial began to melt and run slowly down between the glowing coals. "It would be strange if you did!"

E. G. H.

RESULT OF "FOOTBALL PLAYERS'" COMPETITION!

No one succeeded in sending in a correct result in above competition, the nearest being three sets with six mistakes. We are therefore jumping the first three prizes together, and forwarding £3 to each of the following:

CHARLES V. WALKER, 46 Chester Street, Oxford.
MRS. RYAN, Manfield, Darlington.
E. COOMBS, 18 Kingscote Road, Birmingham.

A prize of £1 has been sent to

A. HUTTON, 3 Lapage Street, Bradford, Yorks.,

whose attempt was the neatest of those containing seven mistakes.

To the following, twenty-three books have been forwarded:

Emily Counter, 19 Northcote Road, Bournemouth; Mrs. Carpenter, 17 Bridge Avenue, Hammersmith; J. Edwards, 101 Victoria Buildings, Clerkenwell Road, E.C.; A. Wright, c/o E. Bishop, 2 St. Andrew's Hill, City; A. Clarke, c/o E. Bishop, 2 St. Andrew's Hill, City; E. Coombs, 18 Kingscote Road, Birmingham; G. Beiver, 83 Drakefield Road, Nunhead, S.E.; A. Goodwin, 2 St. Andrew's Hill, City, E.C.; J. A. Floyd, 47 Trinity Road, Southwark, S.E.; T. West, 16 Boston Rd, Boundary Road, Walthamstow; A. Winner, 2 St. Andrew's Hill, City, E.C.; A. Wentworth, 10 Cardwell Street, Liverpool; H. Buxton, 63 Leicester Street, Norwich; R. Webster, 19 Hatton Hall, Hatton Garden; Miss E. Cramphorn, 28 Woodlands Road, Leytonstone; Miss E. Parish, 28 Woodlands Road, Leytonstone; C. Cramphorn, 56 Granleigh Road, Leytonstone; A. Cramphorn, 28 Woodlands Road, Leytonstone; T. M. Child, 55 Rhondda Street, Swansea; Mrs. E. Const, 101 Victoria Buildings, Clerkenwell Road, E.C.; C. Const, 101 Victoria Buildings, Clerkenwell Road, E.C.; Miss R. Const, 101 Victoria Buildings, Clerkenwell Road, E.C.; A. Luck, c/o Purvis, 495 High Road, Leytonstone.

Digitized by Google

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT FOR CURING CORPULENCY.

TWO POUNDS OF FAT REMOVED IN TWENTY-FOUR HOURS.

Extreme Obesity becoming a Thing of the Past.

CORPULENCE—INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

A MR. RUSSELL, author and specialist in obesity, has experimentally tried the effect of administering large doses to moderately lean persons of his well-known herbal discovery which is so marvellously effectual in reducing superfluous fat, with the result that there is not the slightest alteration or diminution of weight recorded, thereby proving conclusively to our minds that it is only the unhealthy adipose waste tissue which is destroyed, for after dispensing a few fluid ounces of his remarkable vegetable compounds he succeeds in destroying the diseased fatty mass at the rate of from 2lb. to even 12lb. in seven days. There can be no ambiguity about it, for any persons can test this for themselves by standing on a weighing machine. He explains that all lean persons carry a certain amount of fat necessary for the natural production of heat in the body, but Nature has only stored up her requisite stock in the healthy system which she most jealously guards, and thus declines to part with an ounce to the persuasions of Mr. Russell's vegetable tonic, however immoderate the dose may be, which testifies abundantly to the effect that it is only a chemical solvent of insalubrious adipose tissue. There is no doubt that the inventor of the composition must have possessed a profound vegetable knowledge in selecting this simple but peculiar combination. Those who resort to the pernicious products of the mineral kingdom, or even the deleterious sections of the vegetable world, doubtless can decoct something powerful but injurious in its action; such, however, require no laudatory commendation; but Mr. Russell (we herewith append his address: Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., the author of "Corpulency, and the Cure," 256 pages, price 3d., stamps, post free) makes no secret of the simplicity of his treatment, and avers that the decoction can be drunk as a refreshing summer drink, pleasant to the palate, yet having sufficient effect, although perfectly harmless, to remove generally 2lb. or more in twenty-four hours. We think stout persons would do well to send for this book, which can be obtained at the address given above.

The following are extracts from other Journals:

A SPANISH COUNT REDUCES HIS WEIGHT 34lb. IN 22 DAYS.

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. There has recently been issued a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only threepence), published by Mr. F. C. Russell of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid—'My son, Count——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos = i.e., 34lb.' Another writes—'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes—'I am just half the size' A fourth—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lb. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes—'A reduction of 18lb. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says—'It reduced me considerably, not only in body, but all over.'" The author is very positive. He says—"Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lb. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations."—Cork Herald.

CONSTITUTIONAL STOUTNESS AN ERROR.

It is a matter for congratulation that obesity is taking its proper place as a disease, and is receiving that scientific attention which it has long lacked. It does not follow that a person need to be the size of Sir John Falstaff to show that he is unhealthily fat. According to a person's height so should his weight correspond, and this standard has been prepared by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Bedford Square, London, W.C., so that any one can see at a glance whether or no he is too stout. People in the past have been wont to regard fatness as constitutional, and something to be laughed at rather than to be prescribed for seriously; but it is evidently an error, as persons whose mode of life has caused a certain excess of flesh require treating for the cause of that excess, not by merely stopping further increase, but by removing the cause itself. It is astonishing how long we go on perpetuating error, and how difficult it is to make people disbelieve anything, no matter how palpably false the principle, if it has become at all fixed in the public mind. These facts with regard to obesity, however, are so obvious that there ought to be no difficulty about their acceptance when once they become known; and, as a matter of fact, the immense number of persons who have already acknowledged their truth by recording the benefits received from Mr. Russell's treatment is simply wonderful. It is marvellous how this "Pasteur" and "Koch" of English discoverers can actually reduce as much as 14lb. in seven days with a simple herbal remedy. His book (256 pages) only cost threepence, post free, and he is quite willing to afford all information to those sending as above. It is really worth reading.—Southport Visitor.

Digitized by Google

IN FRIENDLY CONVERSE.

T. P. H. asks: "Why does a wetting with sea-water so seldom result in a cold?" ——— Because salt water does not evaporate so quickly as fresh, the loss of heat is therefore slower and the body has time to recuperate before any evil effects are felt. The presence of the salt acts as a counter irritant or stimulant, preventing the pores from modifying to any injurious extent their wholesome action on the animal economy.

H. T.—The German Emperor seems to be anxious to imitate the great Frederick William of Prussia by enlisting big soldiers. One such soldier goes with him on his Eastern tour; the man is 6ft 10in. in his stockings. About ten years ago, he had a lieutenant who measured just 7ft. This officer looked over a garden-wall more than 6ft. high, and asked a girl to tell him the way to a certain place. She told him to "ride" to the right, etc., fully believing that he was on horseback.

X.—It was in 1605 that Dowe left a sum to pay for the tolling of the bell as a condemned criminal left his cell in Newgate on his way to execution. A handbell was also to be rung as he passed the church—criminals were not executed at the prison then. The handbell was discovered some years ago in a chest in the vestry, and hangs in the church. The charity is now diverted from its original purpose, and is used for the relief of the poor.

H D.—The most common name for a place in England is Newton; there being no fewer than seventy-two towns or villages of that name.

WEARY WILLY was much struck when travelling by rail through a certain part of India by the fact that for miles, while running through myriads of gorgeous tropical flowers, the railway embankments were covered with clover, buttercups, and daisies, similar to those that may be seen in England in the springtime. ——— The presence of these simple little flowers in such a country would naturally surprise anyone who was unaware of the fact that English grass seed is sown on railway embankments the whole world over for the purposes of keeping the embankments firm. It is so tough and lasting, and strikes root so easily, that the most flimsy earthwork becomes, as it were, cemented together by it.

J. T.—The Canadian government issued stamps with the Queen's head in a widow's cap. They are not worth much; some will fetch 1s. 6d.

J. H.—Church bells are tuned by chipping the edge till the proper note is obtained.

C. N.—The Mop Fair is a Statute Fair instituted for the hiring of servants, chiefly. The Stratford-on-Avon fair is the best instance; it has been in existence for several centuries. The old character of the fair is, however, almost obsolete, although the hiring of servants is still carried on. Contracts made at the fair are legally binding for twelve months.

CAT-LOVER.—It is estimated that there are seven million cats in England, and sixty-nine varieties. Their value is much enhanced if they possess the black markings on the chest, known as "The Lord Mayor's chain." The owner of a cat of this sort has been known to refuse an offer of £500 for it.

AMBIDEXTROUS sends us a post-card to inquire why the majority of people are right-handed. ———A certain professor, who has made the question a subject of study, says that infants use both hands alike until they begin to speak. The motor speech function controls the right side of the body, and the first right-handed motions are expressive motions, tending to help out speech. As speech grows, so does right-handedness.

M. S.—To clean your pipe take a shallow cork—or, still better, a rubber stopper—through which a hole is bored large enough to enable it to fit tightly on to the nozzle of a soda water siphon, and fit it into the bowl of the pipe. Insert the nozzle, the mouthpiece being directed into the vessel, force about a wineglassful of soda water through, and the pipe will be clean.

M. B.—It is a fact that several of the best known musicians and singers have taken to the rearing of live stock as a hobby or employment for their leisure. Two instances are furnished by Jean de Reszke and Paderewski. The former breeds horses, while the latter turns his attention to Scotch cattle.

RETINA.—The theory that the retina of the eye of a dead person retains a picture of the object last seen, and that this could be utilised in the detection of murderers, is very old, and has been the subject of much discussion. Investigations and experiments recently carried out tend to prove that it could be done only in exceptional circumstance and by means of an elaborate process.

PAUL thinks that a certain friend of his was "getting at him," to use his own expression, when he informed him that he once knew a chemist who converted an old linen shirt into sugar and alcohol. "Surely," he writes, "such a thing is impossible!" ——— Not at all, Paul. It is quite within the bounds of possibility to convert, by means of a series of chemical operations, linen into sugar and alcohol. By merely immersing the fabric in cold, strong sulphuric acid, the cellular tissue of which it is mainly composed gradually dissolves itself into glucose. The glucose so formed may be recovered by neutralising the excess of acid with chalk, and from the ordinary product so obtained alcohol may be prepared by the ordinary process of fermentation.

G. F.—The only instance of a Speaker of the House of Commons being found unworthy of the office is that of Sir John Trevor, who was elected in 1685. After a time it became notorious that he "had his price," and ten years later, a committee reported on his conduct. He had, among other things, been guilty of taking a bribe of 1,000 guineas to hasten the passing of a local Bill. By an irony of fate, he himself had to put up the motion declaring that he was unworthy the office. He pretended to be ill after that, but it did not save him from expulsion.

BELLE.—The method adopted by one lady, well known in Society, for preserving freshness and buoyancy in age, is to lie in bed for one day and two nights right off, once each month. During that time she does not speak. She also refuses at all time to read letters, and she peruses only light and elevating literature. Whether such a course would suit you, is for you to decide.

D. K.—When a tree is struck by lightning, it is not the electricity which tears it, but the explosion of water suddenly converted into steam by the heat of the electric fluid.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Back blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 15th, if intended for the Issue on sale Nov. 29th, and dated Dec. 3rd. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE 'ENGLISH' ORGANETTE.

WITH EXPRESSION STOP EASY PAYMENTS. 4s. MONTHLY

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Reels, Hornpipes. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. No musical knowledge required. A mere child can play it. Most marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

4/- MONTHLY

Price 30/- Terms: 4/- deposit and 4/- monthly. Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. Mention this paper.
J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN

NOSE

MACHINES as worn by Royalty. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, 9/9 each. Red Nose cure, medically approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.—Really Genuine, in patent air-tight tins. ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1/4, 1½lb., 2/4; including tin and postage. Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

£100 in Prizes

1st Prize, £25; 2nd, £20; 3rd, £15; 4th, £10; 5th, £5; and 25 Prizes of £1 each.

CASH PRIZES, as above, will be given away as an advertisement for PRAIRIE POWDERS, the unequalled pleasant and harmless remedy for Headache, Neuralgia, Nervousness, Rheumatism, and Tic, among competitors who succeed in turning into the names of five common ailments the following letters:

ACHEHEDA, GANRLEUAI,
ESNUOVSRENS, HEMSATIMUR, ITC.

Post your solution, together with a Stamped Addressed Envelope, for result, to

THE PRAIRIE POWDER CO.,
Dept. 40, 19 Borough, London, S.E.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up Estimates Free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (250 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Company, 186 Euston Road, London.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). MGR., H. MYERS.

THE BEST HAIR DYE

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vesicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

GIGANTIC AUTUMN SALE, 1898.

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE, if mentioning Short Stories 12/11/98 when writing.

A Stock of 10,000 PATENT WADDED QUILTS, TORALIUMS, OR BED COVERS
(as Illustration).

Covered with Oriental Reversible Soft Sateen with double border. Size 54in. by 60in. These Quilts are offered below anything in the Wholesale Trade, and cause the greatest consternation to the buyer, wondering how they can be produced for the money.
SPECIAL OFFER.
Three Quilts for 10/-, or Six for 19/6, or Twelve for 38/-

Sale Price 3/6 Each.
Post Free Gl. er.

At an Enormous Reduction to Clear Out.

The Dowager Lady GUISE writes: Leyden Dene, Bournemouth, Dec. 19th.—Please send three more of the wadded Quilts for 10/-, cheque enclosed.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.
Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household

Sale Price. 2/- HEARTHRUGS Regd.

In REVERSIBLE RICH TURKEY PATTERNS, measuring 6ft. long, and 3ft. wide. These HEARTHRUGS have gained a world-wide reputation for MAGNIFICENCE, CHEAPNESS, and UTILITY, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. SPECIAL OFFER.—Three for 5/9; Six for 11/3; Twelve for 22/-

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are patronised by Royalty, Nobility, and Clergy from all parts of the Empire.
Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS (Reg.)

Trade Mark on all Goods. Beware of Imitations.

Admittedly the Cheapest in the World. Woven without seam Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

6ft. by 9ft.	7/6	REDUCED SALE PRICE.	10½ft. by 12ft.	18/0
8ft. by 9ft.	9/0		12ft. by 12ft.	21/0
6ft. by 12ft.	13/6		9ft. by 15ft.	15/6
9ft. by 9ft.	11/0		12ft. by 13½ft.	22/0
9ft. by 10½ft.	13/6		12ft. by 15ft.	25/6
9ft. by 12ft.	15/0		12ft. by 18ft.	30.0
9ft. by 13½ft.	16/6		12ft. by 21ft.	35/6

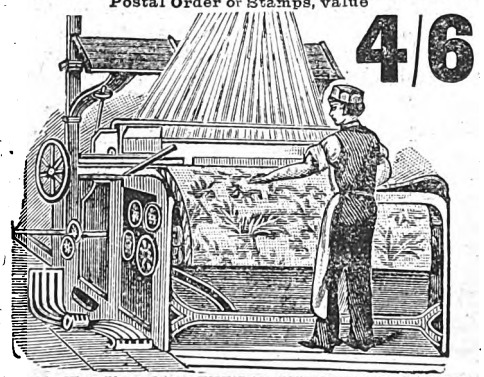
Octagon Villa, The Lizard, R.S.O., 15/8/98.—J. CARWARDINE, Esq., writes: "I am very pleased with the Carpet you sent me. I have saved 50 per cent. by giving you the order. I paid half as much again to a local tradesman for Carpets the same quality a year ago. I have never been so pleased of any former purchase."

Also RICH VELVET PILE STAIR CARPETS, bordered to match, 18in. wide, 1/8 per yard; 22½in. wide, 2/- per yard; 27in. wide, 2/3 per yard.

OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes, Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

H.R.H. Prince L. of Battenberg. Sir Henry de Bathe. H.I.H. Eugénie de Christoforo. Duchess of Wellington. Archbishop of York.
H.R.H. Prince K. Bigis Siam. Sir Henry Bellingham. Princess Paleologco Nicephorœ Marchioness of Brendalbane. Princess de Croy.
Marquis of Breadalbane. Sir E. H. Blair, Bart. Commence. Marchioness of Hastings.

To Readers of "Short Stories," 12/11/98, on receipt of Postal Order or Stamps, value 4/6



(Regd.) We will send you THE LARGEST GENUINE REVERSIBLE CARPET in BRUSSELS PATTERN WITH RUG ever sold at the price, direct from the Looms to any address on receipt of amount. Suitable for drawing-room, dining-room, bedroom, etc., bordered and woven in Brussels patterns, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember these are woven, and are made of a material almost equal to wool. Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.
SPECIAL OFFER—2 CARPETS and 2 RUGS, 8s. [Cut this out.]

Colossal Sale of Rich Velvet Pile Real Sale Price

BRUSSELS HEARTHRUGS 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, weight and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.
SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Rugs, 16/-; 6 for 31/-

"Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.
The Right Honourable The VISCOUNTESS MELVILLE writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 39/-, one ditto 60/6 to match them. Cheque £3 14s. inclosed."

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE

REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS

Extraordinarily Heavy, very Best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST.

4½ft. by 7ft.	11/-	VELVET PILE BRUSSELS CARPET SQUARES.	9ft. by 12ft.	38/-
6ft. by 9ft.	18/-		11ft. by 12ft.	47/-
7½ft. by 9ft.	23/-		12ft. by 13½ft.	59/-
9ft. by 9ft.	29/-		12ft. by 16ft.	69/-
1ft. by 10½ft.	33/-		12ft. by 18ft.	77/-

Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel of excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Ramsden, Charlbury, 4/8/98.—Lady HICKS BEACH writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson and Son send her one of their 'Queen's Royal' Carpets, 9ft. by 9ft., 11/-? Cheque enclosed. The other parcel received safely, and I am pleased with it."

TURKEY PATTERN CARPETS (Regd.)

Reversible, woven throughout, bordered, richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 9ft.	4/9	REDUCED SALE PRICE.	9ft. by 15ft.	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	5/11		12ft. by 12ft.	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	7/6		12ft. by 13½ft.	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	8/6		12ft. by 15ft.	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.	9/6		12ft. by 18ft.	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft.	11/6		12ft. by 21ft.	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8/-, or Twelve for 15/6, sterling value.

PRODIGIOUS SALE of the "PRUDENTIAL."

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE, if mentioning Short Stories when writing.

We rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders despatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates. Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Telephone, No. 918.
Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

Short Stories CARPET COUPON. 12/11/98.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.
(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

SPECIAL 1898.

SPECIALLY REDUCED INTRODUCTION SALE PARCEL WITH FREE GIFT

enclosed, consisting of 1 Magnificently Rich Cream-Coloured Curly Sheepskin Hearthrug, average size 6 feet by 3 feet, perfection in quality.

1 Beautiful Reversible Art Crimson Plush Bed Rug, Sofa Cover, or Table Cover, double warp, very heavy, size 50 inches by 78 inches.

2 Beautiful Silver Goatskin Door Mats, lined woollen cloth throughout, pinked edges, best finish, ornamental to any room.

1 Elegant Hair Brush, highly finished, with mirror back.

THE LOT 10/6

Postage 9d. extra.

"Given" Away.

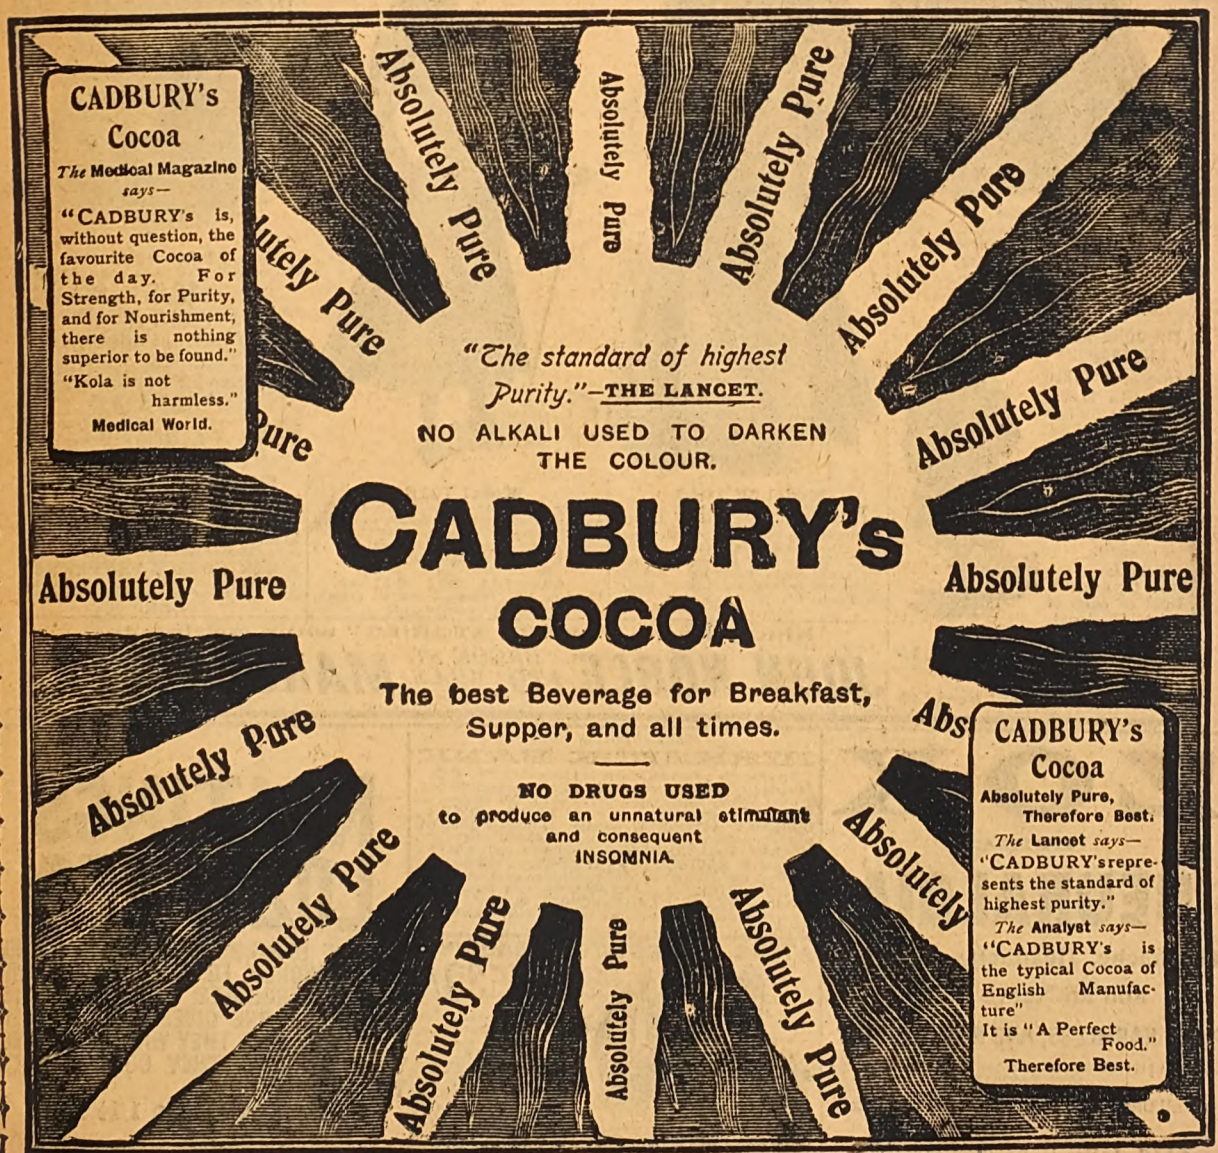
Providing SHORT STORIES Coupon, 12/11/98, is quoted, a FREE GIFT will be enclosed—a very handsome Electro Silver Plated "OWL" PEPPER STAND with coloured eyes and gilt feet. Cash returned if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

SOMETHING OF IMPORTANCE TO PEOPLE NAMED JONES. See page 651.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 516. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 19TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.



Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Good Felt Hat, trimmed as sketch, 2/6 Postage, 4d. Black, Brown, Navy, or Grey.

THE John Noble HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Promptly sent by Parcel Post direct from

THE LARGEST FIRM OF COSTUMIERS IN THE WORLD.

Supplied in the following two good durable cloths: I. JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, weighty, and weather-resisting. II. JOHN NOBLE COSTUME COATING, smooth-surfaced, and of lighter weight.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE, together with a new 84 pp. Illustrated Dress and Drapery List for Ladies and Children.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6 yards 52 inches wide) for 7/6; carriage, 8d. 7/6

THESE GARMENTS not only look well, but wear well, & yield loyal service.

3 GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

Model 984.

A thoroughly well-made and Tailor-finished Chesterfield Coat, and full wide latest style. 10/6 Skirt, in the Price 10/6 complete Costume; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model W 1048.

The Countess Waterproof. A stylish, up-to-date garment, as sketch, or with plain Sacque back. Art check proofing. Guaranteed odourless. Bishop sleeves and two pockets. In Black, Blue, Brown, Light and Dark Fawn Paramattas, or in Fawn Covert Coating at 12/11. Carriage, 5d. 12/11

Model 1016.

Very well-made Bodice, with prettily gathered front and shaped belt, and a full well-cut Skirt. The bodice is well lined.

LENGTHS (from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front) and PRICES:

35	38	42	46 in.
6/11	7/11	8/11	9/11 each.

Carriage, 6d. Trimmed Hat, as sketch, 5/11; carriage, 4d.

Model 999.

The smart Bodice has a well-cut back and full front; saddle and sleeves lined. 10/6 Price only 10/6 complete; Carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; Carriage, 5d.

COLOURS of all COSTUMES are Black, Navy, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Grey, Moss, Fawn, Purple, and Electric.

THE THREE STOCK SIZES are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Any other size can be MADE TO MEASURE, 1/6 EXTRA.

THE JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS

Made in strong Serge, with saddle-top, full sleeves, and pocket.

21	24	27	30in.
1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-
33	36	39	42in.
3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-

each.

Lengths are from top of neckband to edge of skirt in front. Carriage, 4d. extra.

WARM WOOL CAPS (as sketch), 1/-

A HANDSOME REAL SEALSKIN CAP supplied for 2/11; Girls' size, 2/6. Postage, 1d.

LADIES' OWN DESIGNS MADE UP by skilled Dressmakers in any kind of fabric at moderate cost.

A BOX OF 1,000 PATTERNS of all kinds of Winter Dress Goods lent to select from, and sent POST FREE.

Bankers:
"London & Midland" Bank Ltd.

Kindly name "SHORT STORIES" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK ST. MILLS, MANCHESTER.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.;
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

KEATING'S LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENCES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 516. For the Week Ending
One Penny. November 19th, 1898.

The Laughing Princess.

By ARCHIBALD MARSHALL.

I.

There was great rejoicing in the kingdom of Rosalia. King Henry had at last found a desirable suitor for the hand of his daughter, the Princess Rosalie. Prince Charming, the eldest son of the King of Salubria, had seen a photograph of the Princess, and promptly fallen in love with her. as well he might, seeing that she was the sweetest and prettiest princess that was ever seen outside a fairy book, or inside it for that matter. So transported with love was he that he had not rested until he had persuaded his father to send an embassy to King Henry, proposing an alliance.

King Henry was delighted with the idea, and had entertained the messengers royally before sending them back to Salubria with a cordial invitation to Prince Charming to come and stay a fortnight and court the Princess himself.

Princess Rosalie had seen Prince Charming's photograph, which he had sent by the messengers, and as he was as beautiful in his way as she in hers, everything seemed to point to the happiest and most satisfactory of marriages. There was nothing to mar the perfect equanimity of all parties interested in the affair, and a speedy termination to Prince Charming's suit would undoubtedly have taken place, if King Henry had only remembered to square the Fairy Malefica.

It was such a pity. He had always managed to keep on good terms with the lady hitherto, although it had been hard work, because she was naturally anxious to pick a quarrel if possible. So far, however, he had given her no chance. She had been the first person to be

Edited By C. Arthur Pearson

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

invited to the christening eighteen years before. She had not wanted to come, of course; she had hoped to have been able to take that opportunity of throwing in a blighting spell. She had half made up her mind to make the fact of her not having been asked to stand as godmother the excuse for doing so, but she had let the opportunity go by, thinking that other occasions would probably arise during the childhood of the Princess which she might turn to advantage.

At the entrance to the hall stood the Fairy Malefica.

Besides, the Princess had made her appearance on the scene rather before she was expected, and, to tell the truth, Malefica was unprepared with a curse which should do full justice to the occasion and thoroughly keep up her reputation.

Eighteen years had gone by, and as yet she had been given absolutely no opportunity to carry her baleful designs into effect. She was getting rather tired of it. She had been as rude as possible to the King and all the royal family, but they were so afraid of her that they seemed incapable of taking offence.

Presents of game and fruit had poured in upon her. She had been asked to dine at the palace regularly once a week, and no entertainment of any importance had ever taken place without her being invited and treated as the most honoured of all the guests. She had no excuse at all to make herself objectionable, and had bottled up her spite and malice for so long that her powers were beginning to become atrophied with disuse, and she felt that if an opportunity of expressing herself did not arise very soon, she would have to retire from business altogether, and then there would be nothing for her but to go on the parish, for she was improvident, and had laid by nothing out of the handsome income she had made out of her professional engagements.

Prince Charming was to arrive in a fortnight, and preparations to entertain him were going on night and day. The King was so absorbed in these preparations that all thoughts of Malefica, who had been very amiable of late, had gone out of his head. She ought to have been the first person to have been advised of what was to happen, but not a word was said to her; and, worse than all, through a most unfortunate oversight on the part of the Court official who sent out the invitations for the banquet which was to be held in honour of the Prince on the first night of his arrival, the Fairy Malefica was not invited.

She could hardly believe her good fortune when it first began to dawn on her that she had been overlooked, and that her opportunity had come at last. Her transports of joy when the time went on and no invitation came so alarmed her cook, who had been with her a great many years, that she thought her mistress was going out of her mind and gave her a month's warning.

Malefica retorted by casting a spell on the cook which would render her permanently distasteful to all policemen, and spent her time in thinking out a thoroughly workmanlike curse which should settle Princess Rosalie once and for all. King Henry, although he was fairly contented himself, had no happier subject throughout his dominions at that time than the Fairy Malefica.

The time went by, and Prince Charming arrived, attended by a numerous retinue, and proved himself to be all that the most exacting father or the most romantic princess could possibly desire. It has been related how the Court of Rosalia was in the habit of arraying itself in all the colours of the rainbow. Prince Charming and his followers had adapted themselves to this custom. The Prince made his appearance at the banquet in a suit of white satin embroidered with gold. Princess Rosalie sat between him and her father, and thought she had never in her life seen anybody so handsome.

Just after they had gone in procession into the banqueting hall, preceded by the minstrels, and had taken their places at the board, King Henry looked round on the glittering assembly and missed the evil face and rusty clothes of the Fairy Malefica. A shiver of apprehension went through him, his ruddy, smiling face became pale and serious.

"I say, Doppelmann," he called out to the Lord Chamberlain, "where's Malefica?"

The Lord Chamberlain cast a hurried glance at the chair which the fairy was accustomed to occupy. It was empty. Then his face went white.

"My liege!" he faltered, "she has not been invited."

"Oh, Rosie, Rosie," groaned the King, "it has come at last. We are undone."

"Why, what's the matter, father?" said the Princess in great surprise, while Prince Charming wondered what on earth the disturbance could be about.

"Here, Doppelmann!" cried the King, rousing himself, "take a royal carriage and go at once to Malefica's house and say you've come to fetch her. Say you forgot to put a stamp on her letter; say anything you like, but for goodness sake keep her in a good temper, or I don't know what will happen."

The Lord Chamberlain hurried off with a scared face, and the King turned to his guest.

"Excuse us, your Royal Highness," he said with an attempt at a smile. "An old family friend—it will be all right. Let us cast care to the winds and be merry. Gentlemen, a toast!"

Digitized by Google

The King rose with his gold cup in his hand and looked down the great hall over the bright array of revellers and retainers. He made a gallant attempt to appear at his ease. He opened his mouth to speak, but his jaw dropped and his hand fell, for there at the entrance to the hall, with the most evil leer on her face, stood the Fairy Malefica.

II.

THE Fairy Malefica was not dressed for company. She had never given in to the Rosalian custom of rigging herself out as if she was a character in a play, but preferred to go about as a respectable German Frau. But on this occasion she had been so excited at the chance that had come to her at last, that she had not even taken the trouble to put on her Sunday clothes. There she stood amongst that glittering throng, her bonnet awry, a loose strand of grey hair falling from under it, and two or three buttons off her gloves, which she had pulled on hastily as she came along. But if her appearance was commonplace, not to say slatternly, there was no doubt about the baleful glare of her eyes as she stood and faced the terrified King and his bewildered guests.

She pointed her finger at him.

There was an instant's dead silence. King Henry was trying to summon up a voice to assure Malefica that they had waited for her half-an-hour, and couldn't make out why she didn't turn up, but the malevolent gleam of her eye and the sneer on her face deprived him of all power of speech, and he could only gulp down in his throat the words that refused to come any further. His own subjects stared in fascinated horror at Prince Charming and his followers in utter bewilderment. Malefica also went on staring as hard as she could. She enjoyed this dumb tribute to her powers and wouldn't have cared how long it lasted. She was so brazen-faced that she could have stared all of them out of countenance.

But the silence was broken by a little silvery peal of laughter that made everybody jump. The only person in the hall who was not in the least upset by the appearance of the bad fairy was Princess Rosalie, and she only saw a very untidy and rather cross old woman for whom she didn't care the snap of her finger.

"Oh, what an old fright!" said the Princess, and laughed again.

A look of rage and malice passed across Malefica's face. She raised her umbrella and pointed at the Princess.

"I'll teach you to laugh at me, miss," she said in an awful voice. "And I'll teach you, Henry, to give a dinner-party without inviting me to it."

She paused and drew herself up in order to give full effect to the terrible curse she was about to launch: but before she could get her words out the Princess laughed again. She seemed to find Malefica very amusing.

"Go away, you silly old woman, and put your bonnet straight," she said. "You're not fit to be seen."

"Aye, foolish jade, laugh away," cried the bad fairy in a sudden access of fury,

"Laugh waking, laugh sleeping,
Laugh drinking, laugh eating,
Laugh when you're merry and laugh when you're sad,
Laugh when you're sorry and laugh when you're glad,
Laugh away, girl, I shan't take off the curse
Till you have laughed yourself dead and into your hearse."

Exception might have been taken to the fairy's speech viewed in the light of poetry, but nobody was inclined to apply criticism to it, for its effect was instantaneous. Peal after peal of hysterical laughter broke from the Princess's rosy lips. She lay back in her chair and laughed so loud and so long that the tears poured down her cheeks.

Malefica rubbed her hands with glee at the success of her curse, and poor King Henry, overtaken by misfortune at last after escaping it so long, sank back into his chair, laid his arms on the table and his head on his arms, and blubbered like a child. The sight would have melted the hardest human heart, but it did not melt the Fairy Malefica's. It seemed to rouse her to yet greater heights of malignity. She pointed towards the poor King, whose fat shoulders were heaving with sobs under his doublet of crimson satin.

"Aye, fool, you may well weep," said the fairy. "I've got a little curse for you, too."

But the King started up and spread out his hands towards her in piteous supplication.

"No, Malefica, no—not another!" he cried. "I've been a good friend to you, you know I have. It was quite a mistake, 'pon my word it was, your not being invited. It was that fool Doppelmann—he's so very careless. I'll sack him—I'll promise you I will—and I'll give you anything you like if you'll only not put a curse upon me, and take off the one you have put on Rosie. For goodness' sake, child, leave off that beastly noise; I can't hear myself speak." For the Princess was still laughing away with all her might as if it was all the best joke in the world. "Take her out!" said the King. He was of a peppery disposition, although kind-hearted, and the Princess was led away by her ladies-in-waiting, still laughing, and already showing signs of exhaustion.

Malefica looked at him thoughtfully.

"I was going to say that you should go on weeping without stopping," she said.

"Weep waking, weep sl——"

Digitized by Google

"No, no, not that!" pleaded the poor King, the tears already beginning to trickle down his face, "although I'm sure I shall if you don't take the curse off Rosie.

The Lord Chamberlain told them the news

Think of all I've done for you, Malefica. Show a little gratitude—do now, there's a good woman!"

The fairy paused. Perhaps she was touched by the King's appeal. Perhaps she only thought that if the Princess had to go on laughing without stopping and the King had to go on crying, they would die of exhaustion before long and rob her of half her fun.

"Well, then, I'll alter the curse," she said. "I can't bother to put it into poetry"—"Thank goodness," muttered Prince Charming, who was beginning to find his wits—"but it will act just as well without. You shall weep at everything until you see or hear something so funny that you can't help laughing, and Rosalie shall laugh at everything until somebody succeeds in making her cry. And I don't think either of those two things will happen in a hurry," she added to herself as she made her way out of the hall.

III.

"COME now," said Prince Charming, when Malefica had left the hall. "That's better. We ought to be able to remove the curse pretty easily now. Don't cry, your Majesty. We've got just such another tiresome old woman attached to the Court of Salubria. We always buy her off now; it comes cheaper in the end. There's a certain sum appropriated to that purpose in the estimates every year. Can't you square the old lady?"

"No, there's no chance of that," said King Henry with a fresh burst of tears. "We're done for—up a—boohoo—tree."

"Well, I don't know what a boohoo tree may be," said the Prince. "We don't grow them in Salubria. But don't take on so about it. We'll soon have you laughing fit to break your sides. Look here, did you ever hear that story of the man who went into a shop and——"

"I've heard all the stories about men going into shops years ago," said the King, weeping bitterly. "Don't make it harder to bear than it is."

"Oh, all right," said the Prince in a huff. "If you like turning yourself into a running tap, I don't mind. You look a jolly big fool sitting there blubbering like a baby, that's all I can say. I shall hook it. I don't like my dinner swimming in salt water."

"Oh, how unkind you are!" wailed the King. "Why was I ever born?"

"Can't think," said the Prince. "I'll have a chop and mashed potatoes served up in my private apartments please, Mullstein," and he left the hall attended by his equerry.

"He's offended already," wept the King when Prince Charming had disappeared. "He might have had a little more consideration for us. I think. I didn't want to hear his beastly stories. Fetch Rosie down, somebody. I shall be under the curse all my life, I know, but I should think the sight of her poor father in this state would be enough to make her cry if anything would."

So Princess Rosalie was brought down again. The King was still sitting at the table sobbing as if his heart would break. Directly the Princess came in and saw him she pointed her finger at him and doubled herself up with laughter.

"Oh, you do look so ridiculous, papa," she said, "you funny, fat old thing! Your face is like a damp tomato with puffy little slits for eyes. Oh, dear, dear, take me away, somebody, or I shall die of laughing!"

And the Princess was led upstairs again in uncontrollable merriment, while the poor King was sunk into the most desolate state of grief by the behaviour of his undutiful daughter.

The next day some guests were to arrive at the palace, the two Kings of Dummeleutia, George and Ferdinand, with the Queen and their suite. King George was an American, whose name was really Elijah Pollixenes Jopp, and King Ferdinand had recently married the Lady Anne of Rosalia, King Henry's sister.

"We must do something before they come," said Count Doppelmann, the Lord Chamberlain. "If his Majesty goes on like this we shall be flooded out of the palace, and as for the Princess, it's as bad as living in the Zoo."

So the morning was spent in trying to remove the curses. They told Princess Rosalie that her father was dead. It was rather cruel of them, but she didn't seem to mind a bit. She said they would have the stunningest funeral as ever was, and she would be chief mourner and go in a salmon pink frock. In fact they thought she would have a fit, she was so entertained by the information. Then, as she seemed so pleased at the idea, they told her he wasn't dead at all, and she laughed all the more because of the relief to her feelings. Then her nurse, who had been with her a long time and was a privileged person, suddenly slapped her face, under orders. The Princess didn't cry, but the nurse did, for Rosalie slapped her back so hard that it gave her the toothache, and that, of course, was an excellent joke.

Being very beautiful, Princess Rosalie was rather fond of dress. They took away all her pretty clothes and said that Prince Charming was coming to see her. When she couldn't find anything to put on she said she would receive him in her dressing-gown, and the idea appeared to her so humorous, although her attendants thought it only indelicate, that she went off into another burst of laughter at their shocked faces. Then they dressed her and sent for the Prince. He came in with a very grave face, and she laughed at him. He did not like that, for he was rather a vain young man, although very nice if you knew how to treat him.

Digitized by Google

"You funny little boy," said Princess Rosalie. "What fun we'll have when we're married, won't we?"

She looked so pretty with her smiling face that Prince Charming forgave her instantly.

"Yes," he said, "but I can't live with a laughing jackass, you know."

It was a rude speech—there was something wanting in the Prince's manner, although he was very handsome—but Rosalie thought it only amusing, and showed such appreciation of his wit that he was quite pleased, and made up his mind to repeat the joke to the King to see if it would make him laugh.

"You've got a smut on your nose," said the Princess.

Prince Charming hastily took out his handkerchief, wetted it, and rubbed his nose.

She sat down on a sofa.

"There isn't any black on it," he said, alluding to the handkerchief.

"No, it was a white smut," said the Princess with a shriek of laughter.

"What a beastly stupid joke!" said the Prince sulkily. "I could make a better one than that with my hands tied."

"Did'ums get angry, then?" said the Princess, still laughing at him. She never left off teasing him all through the interview, and he got crosser and crosser.

"Look here, Rosalie," he said at last, "you like me and want to marry me, don't you?"

"Of course I do," said the Princess. "Won't we have larks?"

Prince Charming got up and stood facing her.

"No, we won't," he said slowly, nodding his head at her. "Do you want to know why? Because—I'm—not—going to—marry you—so there!"

And he stalked out of the room with unapproachable dignity, while the Princess lay back on a couch and laughed till her sides ached.

They didn't fare any better with the King. He had the blinds of his bedroom drawn down, and sat there plunged in inconsolable grief. He refused to stir out of that room; he said it was a good enough place to die in, and he knew he was going to die. They brought the Court jester to him. The poor man did his best, but the King ordered him to be beheaded after his second riddle, which was something about a schoolboy and a postage-stamp, and then wept copiously at the thought of what a brute he had been.

Somebody put a bandbox on a chair, and then sent for the Lord Chancellor with instructions to sit down on it. He did so, but the King was not in the least amused. He only said that they were all against him and seemed determined to break up his happy home. They got him out of his bedroom by-and-by, and engaged a travelling company which happened to be in the neighbourhood to perform a Rosalian adaptation of Charlie's Aunt before him.

Princess Rosalie laughed all through the performance, which encouraged the actors wonderfully, but the King said that the way they knocked the poor old lady about was one of the most pathetic things he had ever seen in his life.

At last they gave him up as a bad job, and let him mope as he liked until the arrival of Elijah, in whom the whole Court had great confidence, for the fame of his previous exploits had spread all over the country.

IV.

THE Royal party from Dummeleutia arrived in the afternoon. The Lord Chamberlain met them with a long face and told them the news. Ferdinand opened his eyes but said nothing. He was not a man of resource. Queen Anne said she would go and see her niece. "I flatter myself that there is nothing particularly ridiculous about me," she said haughtily. But Princess Rosalie seemed to think otherwise, and drove her aunt out of the room in a huff after about five minutes' conversation. Elijah asked to be taken to see the King, who fell on his neck and implored him to help an afflicted man.

"Cheer up, twenty-stone," said Elijah. "We'll soon put this right for you. What's the lady's address?"

"2, Mahatma Villas," said the King. "Do you think you can really induce her to take off the curse?"

"She'll take it off mighty quick when I've seen her," said Elijah, and he went straight out of the Palace to pay the Fairy Malefica a call.

A spirit of cheerfulness began to diffuse itself round the Palace when it was known that the famous King of Dummeleutia had taken matters in hand, and infected everybody except the lugubrious Monarch of Rosalia.

Elijah sent in his name, and was shown into Malefica's drawing-room, where the bad fairy soon joined him. He was looking at the pictures on the wall when she came in. He turned round towards her, and instantly fell back in pretended amazement.

"Excuse me, ma'am," he said, "I want to see the Fairy Malefica."

"I am she," said Malefica, with great dignity.

"Why," exclaimed Elijah, "they told me you were an ugly old woman! You can never believe half you hear."

The fairy's face darkened.

"They dared tell you that!" she exclaimed. Then she simpered, "Then I am not quite what you expected, your Majesty?" she said with downcast eyes.

Digitized by Google

"Well, I should smile," said Elijah. "What they can see in that pink and white Princess when you're along, ma'am, beats me. Will she swallow that, I wonder?" he added to himself in some anxiety. But the digestive powers of Malefica's vanity was ostrich-like in their capacity, and made nothing of assimilating the compliment. She began to think that Elijah was a very agreeable man. She sat down on a sofa, and he sat beside her.

"Capital curse that you worked off on 'em at the Palace," said Elijah.

"Yes, wasn't it?" said Malefica, much gratified. "Oh, they can't play fast and loose with me, and so I'll let 'em know."

"Howdjer do it?" inquired Elijah.

Malefica looked at him.

"You won't tell anybody if I tell you, will you?" she said.

"Me, ma'am?" exclaimed Elijah. "What do you think?"

"Well, then, I will tell you," said Malefica. She unfastened the top button of her dress and took out a little clear white stone which was suspended from a chain encircling her skinny neck. "When I wear that," she said, "if I tell anybody to do anything they've got to do it."

"Shucks!" said Elijah in some alarm.

"Would you like to kiss my hand?" said Malefica coyly.

"Yes, ma'am," said Elijah boldly, but with some inward shrinking.

"Do it, then," said Malefica, holding out her hand, and Elijah did it. He felt somehow that he had to.

He was considerably surprised, but he was careful not to tell Malefica so.

"That don't amount to much," he said. "Tell me to do something I don't wan't to."

"You like sitting here by me, don't you?" said Malefica.

"Like it!" echoed Elijah. "Why——"

"Go out of the room," said Malefica.

Elijah got up instantly and went towards the door.

"Come back," said Malefica laughing, before he had reached the door. "It works all right, doesn't it?"

"It beats Edison," said Elijah. "Let me have a look at it, ma'am."

"No," said Malefica with great cunning, "I don't let it go out of my hands."

"Then you don't trust me," said Elijah. "Good morning, ma'am," and he got up to go.

"Come back," said Malefica, and Elijah felt there was nothing for it but to obey her.

"Yes, you can make me stop with you;" he said, "but you can't make me want to."

To his surprise the bad fairy burst into tears.

"You've hit it," she cried, rocking herself to and fro. "Everybody's afraid of me, but nobody loves me for myself—boohoo—and—and yet you said I was beautiful—at least I think you did—did you?"

"I implied it ma'am," said Elijah.

"Then why can't you love me for myself?" sobbed Malefica. "I'm worth loving, ain't I?"

"You are, ma'am," said Elijah, "but true love cannot exist without trust."

"If I were to trust you with the stone do you think you could——"

"I'm sure of it, ma'am," said Elijah promptly. "Try me."

"Here, take it, then," said Malefica. "Oh, the weakness of a maiden's heart!"

Elijah pocketed the stone.

"I'll give it you back when we're married," he said.

Malefica hid her face in coy alarm.

"Oh, how fast you go!" she said. "I really don't think I ought to listen to you. When will it be given out?"

"Come to the banquet at the Palace to-night," said Elijah. "Don't wear those rusty old clothes. Princess Rosalie knows how to deck herself out. Dress yourself like her."

"I will," said Malefica with fervour. "If she can stand it, silly chit, surely I can."

"'Course you can," said Elijah. "Now I'm off. You don't want me to stop any longer."

"No, no—go," said Malefica. She forgot that Elijah had the stone and was anxious for him to depart, which he immediately did, chuckling to himself as he made his way back to the Palace.

V.

When Elijah got back to the Palace he met Prince Charming mooning about the garden.

"Well, young fellow," said Elijah cheerfully, "how do you find yourself?"

"I am getting tired of it," said Prince Charming. "I shall be off home to-morrow morning."

"What, and leave the Princess!" exclaimed Elijah.

"I don't know that I'm so very keen on the Princess," said Prince Charming. "She's very pretty, of course; but—well, you see how it is, don't you?"

"Yes, I do," said Elijah. "I see you ain't fit to black her boots. Nice sort of a gilded popinjay, you are—forsake the poor girl when she's in trouble!"

"Funny sort of trouble," retorted the Prince, "grinning like a Cheshire cat all day long!"

"But she wants to marry you," said Elijah. "Her taste ain't worth two cents in my opinion, but she wants to."

"Do I want to marry her? That's the question," said Prince Charming.

"No, it ain't the question," said Elijah. "Still it's got something to do with it. And you do want to marry her. Do you hear? You want to marry her right now."

"Why, of course I do," said Prince Charming with a sudden access of cheerful energy. "Where's the Archbishop? Let's have a wedding at once."

"You don't mind her laughing, you know," said Elijah, still looking at him keenly.

"Mind it!" exclaimed Prince Charming. "Why, I like it. What a merry home we shall have to be sure."

"Well, you wait till the banquet to-night," said Elijah. "Everything will be put right then. You ain't good enough for her, and that's a fact. Still, if she wants you, that's enough for me, and she shall have what she wants, pretty dear."

Then he went into the Palace. "No doubt about the charm acting," he said to himself.

The hour for the banquet came round. The King was still in the depths of woe and Princess Rosalie laughed at everything and everybody. There was an air of constraint over the whole assembly, and the feast promised to be very unlike the usual hilarious entertainments for which the Palace was notorious. The soup had gone down (King Henry had spoilt his by crying into it) and the fish was on the table before the Fairy Malefica made her appearance. She generally came late in order to make an impression.

Digitized by Google

On this occasion the impression she made was undoubted. She had herself announced by a royal footman, who could hardly get his words out, so astounded was he at her appearance. She stood at the entrance to the hall, her evil face wreathed in smiles, while the company stared at her in undisguised amazement. She had dressed herself exactly like Princess Rosalie. She wore a girlish frock draped with festoons of pink roses. No jewels lightened the arid waste of her skinny neck and arms. She had stuck a red rose in her hair which she had dyed a sort of dusty primrose. Her appearance was enough to make the stoutest heart quail as she stood grinning in the doorway, a grizzly travesty of youthful innocence.

There was a dead silence which was broken by a ringing laugh from the Princess. Malifica's grin changed into her usual malignant scowl as she turned towards her, but much the Princess cared for that. "What a ridiculous creature!" observed Queen Anne of Dummeleutia, and began to laugh, too. Gradually a hum of amusement began to creep all round the hall, which expanded into roars of laughter, and soon the rafters rang again with the boisterous merriment which Malefica's appearance evoked. Only King Henry still sat sunk in Stygian gloom and wept unaffectedly at the miserable spectacle.

But Elijah was whispering at his ear. "Look at the old fool," he said. "Djever see such a sight? Ain't it the funniest thing you ever set eyes on?"

A watery smile gleamed through the King's tears.

"Do you think it is really funny?" he asked hesitatingly.

"Funny!" echoed Elijah. "Why, man, it's great! Go on—let yourself loose. Have a good laugh at her. It'll do you good." And he dug his royal host in the ribs.

King Henry's sorrow took wings and fled for ever. He lay back in his chair and led the chorus which filled the hall, his fat sides shaking like a jelly, his shouts becoming more and more like the crowing of a wheezy cock as his appreciation of the absurd spectacle increased. The curse had been removed, and the joy of his loyal people rose to an indescribable height as they realised that their jolly monarch was himself again.

In the meantime Malefica's rage at the effect her entrance had caused increased beyond all bounds. She gnashed her teeth and rolled her eyes, and if Elijah had not had her charm safe in his pocket, there is no doubt that the whole Court of Rosalia would then and there have been changed into all sorts of disagreeable monsters as a punishment for their temerity. But Malefica was powerless. She made her way on to the dais where Elijah sat, and put her hand on his shoulder.

"You will protect me from their impertinence, won't you, my love?" she said. "Wither them! Blight them! Ugh!"

"No, ma'am," said Elijah calmly. "I've undertaken this contract, and it will be carried out in my own way I don't stand interference."

"Gimme back my stone!" yelled Malefica. "Give it me at once!"

Elijah took no notice of her request.

"Kneel down and beg his Majesty's pardon for the way you've behaved," he said.

The bad fairy did as she was told, and she looked more horrible than ever with the tears of mortification making furrows in her painted cheeks.

"Oh, that's all right," said King Henry. "Let bygones be bygones. Sit down and make yourself comfortable."

By this time everybody had left off laughing and sat watching the development of affairs, all except Princess Rosalie. The joke of Malefica's entrance had not yet ceased to amuse her, and her laugh rang out from the expectant silence.

"Here, wait a minute," said the King. "Take off the curse from that poor child first."

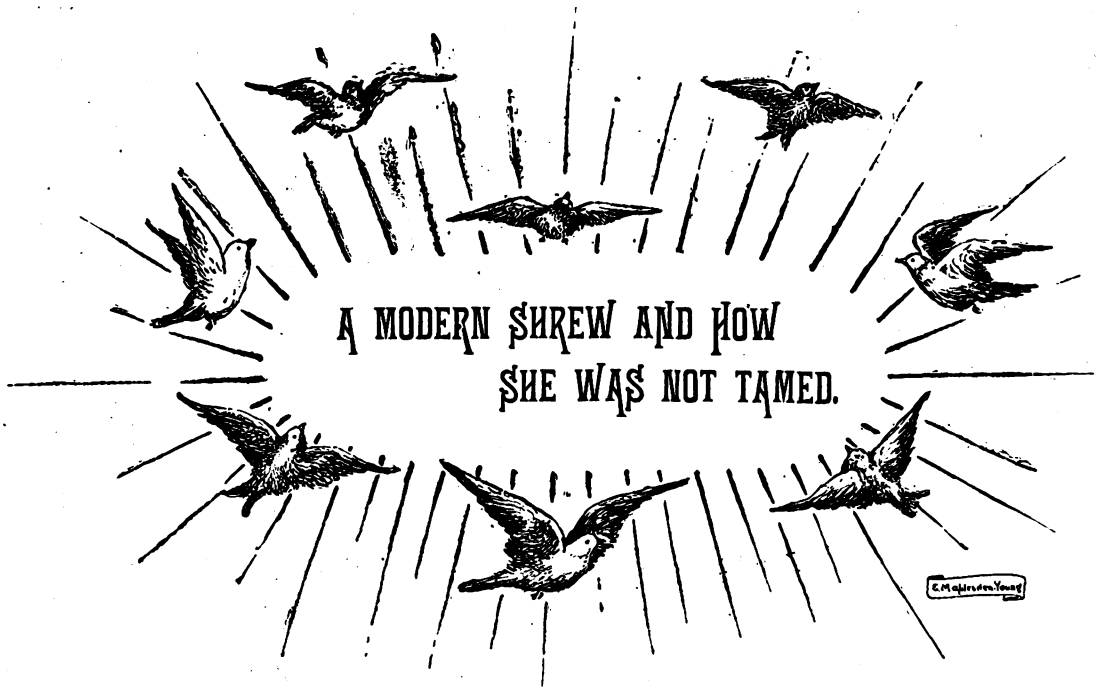
"I can't," wailed Malefica. "This cheating, swindling, perjured——"

"Now then," said Elijah, "steady there please, ma'am, and hold your tongue." Then he rose in his place. "She can't, Henry, but I can," he said. "Here, miss, chuck it! You've laughed enough. The world ain't a bad sort of place, but it ain't so humourous as all that."

All eyes were turned on the Princess. The laughter died slowly out of her face, and she gave a long sigh. "I feel as if I never wanted to smile again," she said. But she did within five minutes when Prince Charming, whose character improved in flavour when things went right with him, embraced her before them all, and asked her to come and reign over the kingdom of Salubria with him, informing her that his father was on his last legs, and it wouldn't be long before they two ascended the throne.

The Prince and Princess were married with great pomp a week later, and are very happy. Malefica is a reformed character, and earns an honest living by telling fortunes at charity bazaars. She still thinks Elijah behaved badly to her, as perhaps he did; but that great man is quite unruffled by the charge, and still retains possession of the charm, which is of great use to him. King Henry is once more his old, merry self, and eats and drinks more than ever.

Digitized by Google



I REMEMBERED him passing backwards and forwards between his room and chapel at college. There was the same serious, injured look, a look in which, to those who knew him best, who understood his eccentric views and absurd methods, there was something comical.

He had been devoted to the stage. When a new company came to Cambridge he would be found among its audiences from the first to the last. He would rather see a bad play than no play at all; and when he was not at the theatre he read plays.

Notwithstanding his peculiarities, all of his set loved him. He was kind-hearted, impulsive, generous. His face was a mirror for his feelings, and no one saw it reflect aught except what was genuine. This was the man I had parted from five years before.

Now he was a new man—a new man—and yet the same old Peter Brown. He was married. He had just entertained me at dinner. The wife, a decided-looking little woman, sat at the board, plainly its mistress. There was no wine, and when we left the table we left it altogether and without a suspicion of the odour of tobacco.

We had chatted perhaps half-an-hour in the drawing-room, when Peter rose and signalling me to follow him, led the way up three flights of stairs to a little chamber with one window. All the furniture it contained were two easy chairs, a table, and a cupboard hanging against the wall. The door closed, Peter drew a long sigh. Then he went to the cupboard and took out a bottle, some glasses, and a box of cigars.

"Come, Peter," I said, lighting a weed he gave me, and throwing myself back on the cushions, "tell me all about it."

"About what?"

"I see that conviviality is restricted in your house. I am curious to know why."

His expression was very sad.

"Madam objects?" I queried.

"Madam objects." He cast a rueful glance round the apartment.

"And, like a good husband, you submit."

"Yes, I submit."

"And gracefully?"

There was some hesitation.

"My submission was not exactly graceful originally."

"Well, tell me about it."

He lit his cigar and began to relate an attempt which for originality and ingenuity had never been equalled by any of his extremely remarkable freaks while in college.

"You remember how fond I used to be of the theatre? Well, I've got over that, but it took a terrible experience to cure me. Of all the plays ever put on the stage my favourite used to be The Taming of the Shrew. To me Petruchio's method of curing his wife's temper, by feigning to be more violent than she, was a model of cleverness; and before I was old enough to have a wife I vowed that, if she should be a shrew, I would be a Petruchio.

"I first met my wife at a tennis party. She was my partner, and looked very pretty in a loose tennis jacket, a striped skirt, and a jaunty cap.

"With me it was one of those cases when a man's heart flies out of his bosom like a tennis-ball from a racket, and lights on the girl. We played very well together, and were neck and neck with our opponents near the end of a game, when a fault was served to my partner, which she sent back.

"'That's a fault!' I exclaimed.

"'What do you mean?' she asked sharply.

"'It fell out of the court.'

"'No such thing.'

"'I beg pardon,' I replied politely; 'it looked so to me.'

"'I'll be obliged if you'll play your own game, and let me play mine,' she returned angrily.

Digitized by Google

"'I beg pardon,' I said apologetically, and the game went on.

"There was something about the bare-faced assurance and dictatorial manner of the proceeding that attracted my attention. Somehow I became dazzled by the girl's angry eyes. I could see nothing but a pretty face, a petite figure, a striped skirt, and a jaunty cap. I went away from the tennis party with the little termagant buzzing about my thoughts like a bumble-bee among the hollyhocks.

"I secured an introduction to her father's house; quarrelled with her at my first call; made it up on the second by retracting everything I had said; found myself cut by her a few days later; apologised for something I had not done; tried in every way I could think of to please her, and finally found myself madly in love with a girl who promised, if I should win her, to make my life a pandemonium.

"I went on a trip, to be gone a month, to try and forget her, but returned in a week thoroughly convinced that I couldn't get on without her. I proposed. She would probably have refused me had not her father told her that he wouldn't have a man for a son-in-law who 'languished under such a theatrical drawl.' That settled it. I was accepted.

"There was now nothing for me but a life of misery with a stubborn, quarrelsome woman. No man could live in peace with her unless he could break her. But could I do this? I thought of Petruchio, and sat down and read over The Taming of the Shrew for the hundredth time. I noticed that Petruchio first got the lady into his power and then commenced his training, I resolved to be married at once.

"The next day I went to my lady-love and told her that owing to business engagements which would require my absence, it would be impossible for me to claim her within a year. She informed me that unless I could find it convenient to claim her the next week I could look elsewhere for a partner. I had scored one point. I accepted the terms, and we were married.

"We went through the honeymoon pleasantly, for I determined not to cross her in anything, waiting till we should be comfortably settled at home in the house her father had given her in the same street in which he lived and only a few yards away. Then I proposed to commence a modern instance of the taming of the shrew.

"The honeymoon ended, and we arrived at home. I had engaged the cook myself, and by promising a large reward, had secured her to my plan. It was understood that she was not to give my wife food without my permission. I didn't rely much on this part of the programme—to starve her into submission—but I thought I'd try it with the others.

"We sat down to our first dinner at home. My wife sat opposite me, looking so pretty, so exceptionally good-natured, that my heart almost failed me. After all, wouldn't it be better to wait until she should provoke me?

"No, I had laid the plan, and I would carry it out. All our future depended upon it. The servant placed before me a smoking joint. I took up the carving knife and sharpened it on the steel savagely. My heart beat like a kettle-drum. Somehow it struck me that I was about to make a fool of myself; but I thought again of all that was at stake and began my training.

"'Jane,' I burst out, addressing the servant, 'what's the matter with this meat?'

"'Nothing, sir, that I know of,' Jane answered, opening her eyes.

"'The meat is burnt,' I exclaimed, feigning anger which I didn't feel. 'Take it away.'

"To say that my wife was astonished wouldn't alone indicate her feelings or her appearance. She turned deadly pale.

"'Take it away,' I repeated.

"By this time my wife had partially recovered her equanimity. I expected every moment to feel the decoration of fragmentary glass about my brow. I was disappointed.

"'Take it away, Jane,' she said in a soft voice.

"I was delighted. It was plain she had seen an evidence of will-power that she daren't oppose. With difficulty controlling my agitation, I rose from the table. My wife followed me into the drawing room. I passed on into the hall, and, taking my hat and stick, turned towards her and said:

"'I am going out. I will return at eight. We will then keep our engagement at your father's.'

"She stood looking at me; her face betokening alternative wonder and amusement with an occasional shade of anxiety. Then there came a sudden spasmodic little laugh, followed by as sudden a flash of lightning in the eye. Had I delayed a moment the storm would have burst. But I didn't delay. I went out and shut the door after me.

"I went directly to my club. Taking my old seat in the dining room I ordered a good dinner and a bottle of wine. I felt that thus far all had gone as well as could be expected. The ball was opened. My wife was at home, and no dinner. I was at the club with plenty to eat and a bottle of excellent Margaux.

"By the time I had drained the last glass I felt quite equal to the remainer of the ordeal before me, and resolved firmly not to depart one iota from my model Petruchio. Having finished my dinner and tossed off a glass of brandy to put a capper on my courage, I returned to my work.

"I was surprised to find my wife quite calm. She was ready to go with me to her father's. She quietly took my arm, and we walked slowly up the street. The full moon, rising, stood in the east, large and round.

"'How large the moon looks!' she remarked. 'It is full to-night, I think.'

"'The moon?'

"'Yes, the moon. I said the moon.'

"'It's the sun. The moon never shines at this time of day.'

"'Oh—is it?' Her tone didn't imply conviction.

"'I tell you that's the sun,' I blustered. 'Do you mean to contradict me?'

"There was an ominous pause.

"'Oh, no; I wouldn't think of contradicting such an astronomical prodigy. Of course it's the sun.'

"Her tone made me shudder.

"'Then I say it's the moon.'

"'Do you? I knew when I married you that you weren't clever, but I supposed you could at least tell the sun from the moon.'

"The conversation terminated at this point. I was not getting on, and was glad when, a few moments later we reached her father's house. We were received with open arms of course.

"'How well you both look!' and 'Do you find everything comfortable at home?' and 'Was the dinner nicely served?' 'You must be like two kittens on a feather pillow.'

"I think this last remark, made by Mrs. Brown's little brother contained a trace of irony.

Digitized by Google

"Two cats, I thought.

"No sooner were their greetings over, and we had kissed and been kissed all round, when my wife and her mother disappeared.

"'What's that?' I asked myself.

"From the dining-room, separated from where we were only by a door, I heard my wife's voice mingling with the clatter of dishes.

"I leaned back in my chair, a trifle discouraged. The starvation part of my plan was surely a failure. But then I hadn't counted much on that.

"Mrs. Brown spent the whole evening in the dining-room, and then sent me word that she would remain all night with her mother. This was an avenue that I had not thought of. I winced. There was nothing for me to do but go home alone. I did so and went to bed—less hopeful than I had been since the commencement of hostilities.

"The next evening, when I returned from business, I found my wife at home and in the hands of a dressmaker. She had been provided with an elaborate trousseau; but one dress, designed to be worn on her reception days, had been left unfinished. She was standing before the mirror in the gown, the skirt of which the dressmaker was arranging to hand more evenly. I advanced and took the fabric between my thumb and finger.

"'What rotten stuff is this?' I asked.

"'It's silk, sir,' faltered the dressmaker.

"'Silk? This silk?'

"'Costly silk, sir.'

"'It's a base imitation. A mixture of poor silk and cotton. And this?'

"'Lace, sir.'

"'Do you tell me this is lace? My wife shall wear no such stuff. She must be dressed as becomes her matchless beauty.'

"My wife stood staring at me in mute wonder. Was it fear or anger that first blanched her cheek, and then flushed it hot as fire? I shuddered at the first word she would speak. But it was not spoken. Beckoning to the dressmaker to follow her, she strode out of the room, and passing into the adjoining chamber locked the door.

"I descended to the dining room. It was dinner time and I was very hungry. I waited for an hour for my wife to come down and dine. I waited in vain. At last I resolved to dine alone.

"'Get me a bottle of wine, Jane,' I said to the maid.

"'Madam has it under lock and key, sir.'

"I took my hat and went to the club and dined there. I sat alone at my table thinking over the situation.

"I went home at twelve, midnight. I was tired and sleepy, but purposely delayed so that my wife might have time to think—to arrive at the conclusion that she must sooner or later come to me vanquished and beg for terms. Then I proposed to take her to my arms, explain my strange conduct, and bid her be a dutiful wife, whereupon all such evidence of my displeasure would be avoided in future.

"When I went upstairs I found our bedroom door locked and bolted. I had especially arranged it myself for safety against burglars, and knew I couldn't force it. I must either beg to be let in or stay out. The former would be fatal; the latter I did. I went to another room, it was locked. I tried another and another; all were locked.

"I aroused the servants and demanded the keys. They were all in madam's possession. I went into the library. I had turned out the lights when I went up, and it was pitchy dark; I stumbled over the coal-skuttle and fell, striking my head on a sharp corner of the mantel-piece. Throwing myself on a sofa, I caught the flow of blood in my handkerchief. I lay awake all night and fell asleep after daylight.

"I was awakened by my wife in the morning opening the library windows. I saw the bloody handkerchief lying on the floor, and caught it up in time to prevent her seeing it.

"'Did you rest well, my dear?' she asked.

"There was a modulation in her voice I dreaded more than harshness. It maddened me. I was really angry now, and it required no acting to play my part. Without noticing her I arose and went upstairs to make my toilet. Then I passed down and out of the house to get my breakfast at the club.

"As I sat eating my chop and sipping my coffee, I made up my mind that before the day was over I must either conquer or be conquered. When I went home to dinner I resolved to take advantage of any excuse to be violent, and be as violent as possible. As I opened the front door with my latch-key I saw my wife standing in the parlour. She had been out, and had not yet removed her hat and gloves. I remembered Petruchio's attack on his wife's cap. Here was my chance.

"'What have you got on your head?' I asked harshly.

"'My bonnet, dear.'

"'It doesn't become you.'

"I confidently hoped that, to avert the storm she must see was brewing she would at least take off the obnoxious hat and lay it on the table. She did no such thing, but stood regarding me with the same mute wonder as during my former efforts.

"Again and again I demanded the hat's removal, but received nothing in reply but a cold stare. At last, giving away to all the violence I felt, and a good deal I did not feel, I raised my stick, and, sweeping it sideways, laid the hat, a mass of velvet and feathers, without form and void, at the other end of the room.

"What followed was so unexpected, so singular that I never could distinctly remember how it occurred. At any rate, at a call from my wife, two men entered from another room and seized me by the arms. One was my brother, and the other my wife's cousin.

"'What does this mean?' I asked, dumfounded.

"'Take him to the next third storey back room,' my wife said calmly to my captors. 'We will keep him there until we know how the disease turns. If he isn't better to-morrow we shall have to send him to the asylum.'

"Heavens! She thought I was insane.

"'My dear!' I cried.

"'My dear, you don't mean—Arthur—Tom——'

"'Don't mind what he says, he's not responsible.'

"By this time I was at the first landing, I struggled; but it was of no avail. My captors were both strong men, and they carried me to the third storey.

"'Go in there,' said one of them, pushing me into the room, from which every article of furniture had been removed. 'You can't hurt yourself there. Stop, let me search you.'

"He took my pocket knife to make sure I could do myself no injury with it; and then shut the door and locked it from the outside.

"Locked up for a lunatic in my own house and by my own bride!

"I passed three hours in a state of intense mortification and disappointment, and three hours more in despondency and repentance. I began to get hungry Nothing since lunch and it was now 11 p.m. I peeped through the keyhole and saw my wife's cousin guarding me.

Digitized by Google

"'I want something to eat,' I called.

"'No orders for it,' he replied.

"Great heavens! was my wife going to starve me? I ran over my conduct towards her since we had returned from our wedding trip, and remembered with horror my efforts to starve her.

"It took me just one hour more under the reducing influence of an empty stomach to make up my mind to capitulate.

"'Call Mrs. Brown,' I called to my keeper. I heard him pass the word to the waiting maid below.

"A light step was on the staircase, a quiet, but determined voice to the attendant, 'You may go now, Arthur; much obliged.' Then the same voice to me:

"'What is it dear?'

"'I haven't been ill.'

"'You seem more rational. I do hope you won't have another attack.'

"'Come, come,' I said, trying to assume a trifle of unconcern. 'Let's have no more fooling.'

"'I am not quite sure it would be safe to release you yet.'

"'I want to ask you,' she continued presently, 'if you are convinced of the folly of your proceedings?'

"'Well—yes. I think I can say that I am, rather!'

"'And you won't do so any more?'

"'Not during my present happy alliance with you.'

"'That's very sweet of you. And you'll attend to your business and let me manage the house?'

"'Yes.'

"'Now promise me three things.'

"'What are they?'

"'First to go with me to church regularly.'

"I groaned. 'I promise.'

"'Second no wine on our table ever.'

"'I promise.'

"'Third, no smoking below the third storey.'

"'Thank heaven, that's three. I promise.'

"'Now, my dear, if I let you out, will you be good and not do so any more?'

"'Open the door, I've had enough of this nonsense.'

"She turned the key. I stepped out and she threw her arms about my neck and covered my face with kisses. That was the end of my playing Petruchio."

"Peter," I asked, after we had finished, "is this the room of your confinement?"

"Yes, it was stipulated at the time that I was afterwards to be free only here."

"Your effort was not very wise."

"Not wise?" he asked, much hurt at the remark. "Then what has the world for two centuries seen in The Taming of the Shrew to admire? Was Petruchio a fool?"

"I give it up."

A BRUTAL young man is one who would tell a girl who offers to mend his gloves that there is a hole in her father's coat.

HE: "No matter how good a man's head is, it is only good when on his own shoulders."

She: "Ladies who have had some men's heads on their shoulders think differently."

RESULT OF DISTRIBUTION No. 4.

THREE of the people whose names were selected have applied for the sovereign. They are:

R. WELLS, High Street, Uppingham.

Mrs. MAY MONTMORENCY, 31 Camden Hill Road, Upper Norwood, S.E.

Staff-Sergeant ALFRED JENKINS, Army Pay Corps, The Barracks, Cardiff.

The following would have received a sovereign each had they applied:

T. V. Dickens, 16 New Street, Daventry; T. Ainsworth, 10 Raglan Street, Barrow-in-Furness; Thomas Young, 7 Brook Street, Kingston-on-Thames; Mrs. Reid, Roosmore Villas, Stanwell Road Swinton, Manchester; Mrs. Barrington, Kirk Langley, Derby; George Yates, 15 Wilson Street, Bury; A. Day, 57 East Street, Horsham; Mrs. Evans, 5 Florence Terrace, Falmouth; Miss Adams, 1 Camden Gardens, Shepherd's Bush; Mrs. Nuttall, 94 Arkwright Street, Bolton; Mrs. Pierpoint, 5 Palmyra Square, Warrington; Mrs. W. E. Battie, 79 Spring Street, Darlington Street East, Wigan; Mrs. Oldfield, The Elms, Yorkshire Street, Rochdale; B. Croft, St. Margaret's Bury, Ware, Herts; Geo. Jenkins, Dafen House, Dafen, Lanelly, South Wales; Miss Wyatt, Stokeleigh, Roehampton Lane, Roehampton; Mrs. Oddy, 3 Theatre Street, Norwich; Mrs. Leitch, Castle Street, Broughty Ferry; C. Ashleigh Wright, Queen's Road, Norbiton; A. Thurston (Grocer), Old Felixtowe; W. Rees, 16 Alexandra Road, Broadstairs; John Naseby, 42 Wansbeck Road, West Hartlepool; Rev. H. R. Jennings, 9 Strangways Terrace, Truro; R. Keddy, 94 Milbourne Street, Carlisle; D. Laird, 66 Ann Street, Dundee; Mrs. Miller, St. Thomas Road, Launceston; A. Nicholas, 26 Harrison Place, Newcastle-on-Tyne; E. G. Snow, 53 Western Road, Brighton; Jos. Turner, 104 Denmark Road, Lowestoft; C. W. J. Bartlett, 27 Springfield Road, St. James, Exeter; J. Ferguson, 7 Tulloch's Buildings, Inverness; Mrs. Dance, 5 St. Mark's Street, Peterborough; S. Cottle, Clandowns Broadway, near Bath; J. C. King, R. I. Constabulary, Maryborough, Queen's County; Miss Low, 10 Airlie Terrace, Perth Road, Dundee; Miss E. Malone, Lissadale, Sligo, Ireland; Geo. Pool, 61 Ashley Street, Carlisle; Chas Rix, 33 Valinger's Road, Lynn; Sam Stork, 47 Eldon Street, Sunderland; F. Masson, 44 Oakfield Street, Altrincham; J. Parker, 23 Castle Crescent, Kendal; Harvey Smith, 52 Vincent Parade, Balsall Heath, Birmingham; Chas. Porter, Lynn Road, Ely; O. H. Sharrott, Chestnut House, Tamworth; Mrs. Emma Cartledge, 120 Blandford Street, Ashton-under-Lyne; Mrs. Eyre, 43 Castle Road, Bedford.

MR. JONES, YOUR EAR!

IN the distribution which finishes on November 28th the Editor proposes to select twenty-five names from the great Jones family, and to set aside for each of them a bright new sovereign. Therefore, good Mr. Jones, tell your friends of the same name what the Editor proposes to do in this matter, and tell them to send along their post-cards some time between Tuesday, November 22nd and Monday, November 28th.

£50 For Mothers, Daughters, Sisters, Cousins, and Nieces!

THE Editor of Pearson's Weekly is offering £50 to ladies only, in the Great Distribution Scheme instituted by that paper. He has selected the names of ten ladies, written them on envelopes, and inclosed in each envelope a £5 note, which he will forward to the fortunate persons on application only!

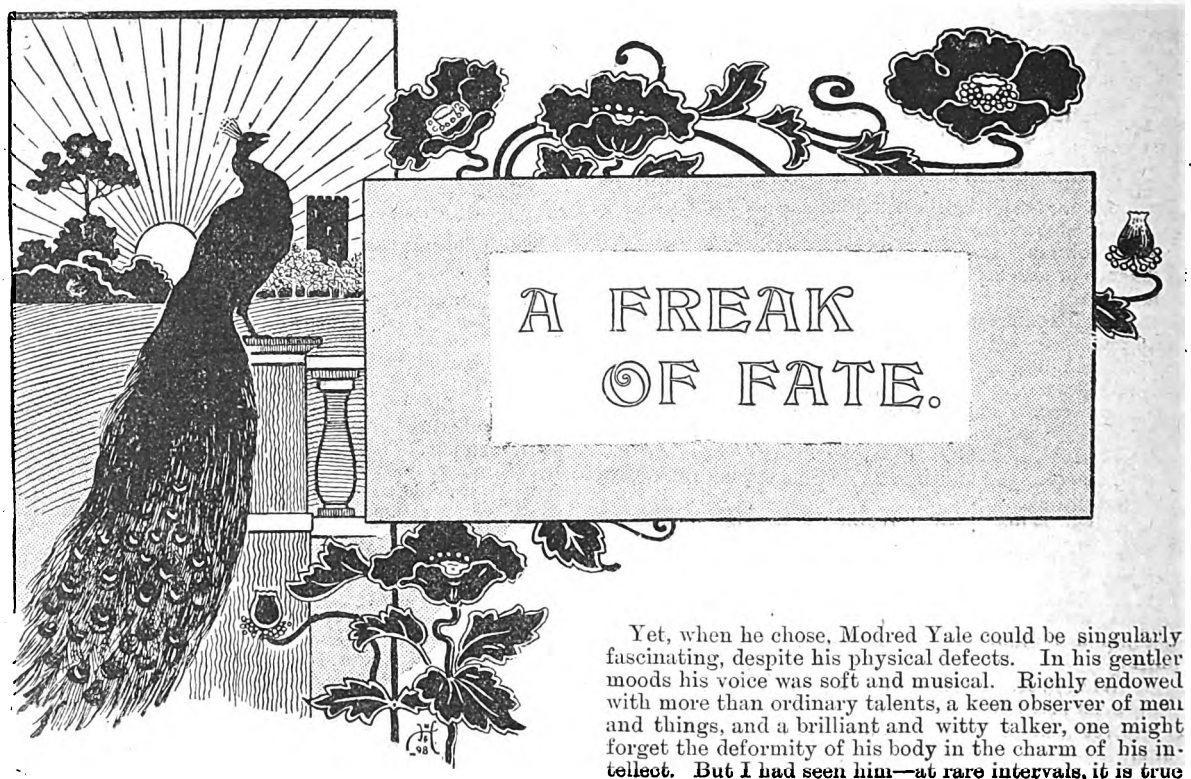
Digitized by Google



A FREAK OF FATE.

"He has made me a formal proposal for your hand, Cecile."

"But I cannot be his wife, father. I dread and dislike him."

"Listen, Cecile," said my father, and as he raised his head from his hand I saw how pale and haggard his face had grown since the receipt of the letter which lay upon the table before him. "Hitherto I have kept the truth from you; but it is necessary that you should know it now. You believe we are rich. In reality we are beggars. Not an acre of this estate is ours. This house and all in it belongs to another—Modred Yale."

"But how?" I asked, with a growing sense of terror.

"I do not know," answered my father helplessly. "I needed money, and he lent me it. I gave him mortgages. They brought me papers to sign, and I signed them. I am no man of business, Cecile. I don't know how it all came about. But everything is his, and at a word he could turn us out, homeless and penniless."

"And would he have the heart?" I exclaimed angrily.

"We have no claim upon him, Cecile," said my father, "unless you become his wife."

I remembered Modred Yale perfectly, though I was but a mere child when he went away to travel in the East. I had always shrunk from him with an instinctive repugnance; for he had seemed to my fancy something uncanny—not a man, but a gnome. With a face whose pale, cold beauty was marred by an habitual sneer, his body was deformed almost out of semblance to humanity. He was a dwarf with twisted limbs and hunched shoulders, and arms of enormous power, hanging almost to the ground as he walked.

Yet, when he chose, Modred Yale could be singularly fascinating, despite his physical defects. In his gentler moods his voice was soft and musical. Richly endowed with more than ordinary talents, a keen observer of men and things, and a brilliant and witty talker, one might forget the deformity of his body in the charm of his intellect. But I had seen him—at rare intervals, it is true—when it seemed as if the very spirit of evil had taken possession of him; when his voice rose to a harsh scream, and his face darkened with the rage and malice of a demon. This was the man who demanded my hand in marriage.

"He will be here to-night or to-morrow," said my father, looking at me anxiously.

I arose and went out. I was sick and trembling in every limb, and I wished to be alone, to think—to seek some means of escape from the fate which seemed impending over me. Modred Yale's wife! As I went slowly along the quiet lane under the cool shadow of the old oaks, the thought grew more and more incredible and abhorrent, like a nightmare of which one is half conscious, yet which will not be thrown off.

"Cecile!"

I turned with a glad cry; and the load seemed lifted from my heart as I saw the handsome, boyish face gazing at me over the stile, with that look in the frank, blue eyes which I knew so well.

"Sylvan!" I exclaimed. "Oh, I am so miserable!" and I rested my forehead on the fence between us and burst into tears. He sprang over the stile and stood beside me.

"What is it, Cecile?" he said, taking my hand. "What has happened?"

I related the interview which I had just had with my father. As I went on his face darkened with an expression of anger and alarm.

"But this cannot, shall not be," he exclaimed impulsively. "I have never spoken before, Cecile, because I believed you were rich. But now I have a right to, Cecile." His voice grew very low and tender. "I love you, and I have often hoped that you returned my love. Is it so, dear?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes," I answered, forgetting all reserve in the sweetness of the moment; "I love you, Sylvan."

"Then I will work for you and your father, and you may defy this man to do his worst!"

"A very pretty scene," croaked a harsh voice near at hand. "Quite idyllic."

We started away from each other and looked round. There, at the distance of a few feet, gazing at us with a mocking leer that distorted his features into a repulsive mask, stood a dwarfish figure that I recognised but too well. It was Modred Yale.

At his side was another shape, hardly more hideous than himself. It was that of a huge ape, almost as tall as his master. By the wicked gleam of his red eyes and the grin that displayed his yellow fangs, the brute seemed to understand and share the dwarf's malicious humour.

With a low bow which the ape imitated—as he did all his master's movements—Modred Yale drew nearer, and, speaking in the same harsh, mocking tone, said:

"If I were an artist now, I should consider myself fortunate in having chanced upon so picturesque a group, and should lose no time in transferring it to canvas. But, pardon me, I am addressing Miss Cecile Ayre, I presume?"

I bowed silently, for I was unable to speak at the moment.

"I am Modred Yale," he resumed, with the same exaggerated air, "whom you remember, of course. But you have forgotten to introduce me to your friend."

"Mr. Sylvan Gainford, a neighbour," I stammered.

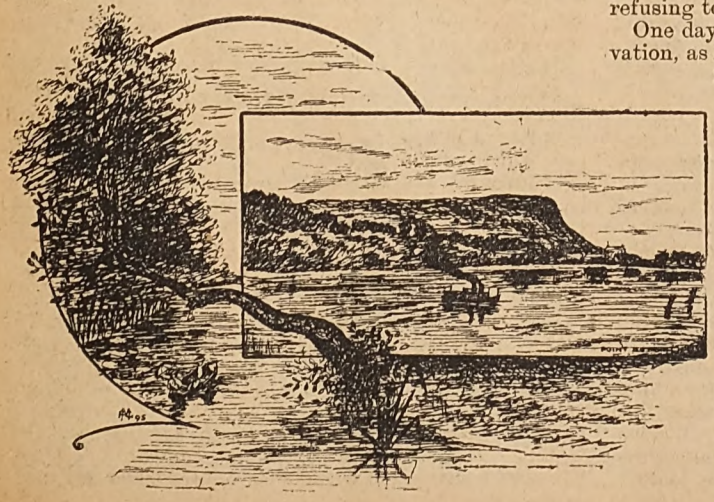
He returned Sylvan's distant acknowledgment with a salutation that was almost insolent in its grotesque extravagance.

"I must not forget my friend, my constant companion and adviser, Gordon," he said. "Come here, you brute, and make your bow."

He struck the animal a violent blow with the stick he carried, as he spoke. With a grin of ferocious hatred at his master, the ape shambled up and ducked his head at us. I was so full of vague terror that the scene had no humour for me.

"And now," added the dwarf insinuatingly, "my dear young lady, will you graciously conduct me to your good father? Mr. Gainford will, I am sure, be kind enough to excuse us.'

Was there something of the master in his tone already?



I thought there was, and so did Sylvan; for I saw his cheek redden and his hand clench.

Fearing an altercation I bade him a hasty good-bye, promising to see him soon again, and joined Modred Yale.

I hardly know how to describe the days that followed, so full of strange terror and suffering were they. With Modred Yale's advent there was an immediate change in our hitherto peaceful household. Almost from the first he assumed an air of authority, all the more repugnant from the mocking politeness with which he treated my father and myself.

My father seemed completely cowed. He rarely spoke in the presence of the dwarf, and when he did, it was with a timidity and hesitancy that were painful to see.

But the strangest and most terrifying thing was the mysterious relation that seemed to subsist between Modred and the ape Gordon. The two were never separated for a moment during the day, and at night the animal slept on a lounge in his master's room. Whenever Modred was out of doors or in, there also was the ape, chattering and grinning.

He insisted that the animal should sit at table with us, which it did, despite my indignant protest, Modred affirming, with his usual mock suavity, that Gordon was a perfect gentleman in manners, and should receive due courtesy.

So the hideous creature had its place beside the dwarf, devouring its food with a grotesque imitation of his master's movements.

Strange to say, the two appeared to hate each other with a savage malignity. Without the slightest visible reason Modred would beat the animal with the stick he always carried twenty times a day. On his part, Gordon would grin and glare at the dwarf with a ferocity that sent a chill through my blood.

Since Modred's arrival he had not spoken openly of his intention of marrying me; though I was convinced that he was only biding his time, perhaps the more effectually to strengthen his hold upon my poor father and myself. I had seen Sylvan but two or three times in the interval. Without appearing to do so, Modred had maintained a close watch over my movements. I could not leave the house for any purpose, but the dwarf, accompanied by his ugly companion, would be at my side, politely insisting upon escorting me in my walk, and refusing to be shaken off.

One day, however, I had managed to elude his observation, as I supposed, and, hurrying down the lane, met Sylvan at the stile. We had hardly shaken hands, however, when we were startled by the voice of my persecutor, who, with his grim companion, had stolen upon us unperceived.

"How deeply I regret the necessity of interrupting this interesting interview," he said, with a smile that was like an unspoken insult, "but I am compelled to warn my young friends that it is contrary to custom for a lady who is about to become the wife of one man to hold secret interviews with another."

"What do you mean?" responded Sylvan haughtily, while I held my breath in dismayed expectancy.

"Merely, my dear young gentleman," said the dwarf suavely, "that Miss Cecile will shortly honour me with her hand. Don't apologise, I beg," he added, with a wave of his hand. "You were not aware of it, of course, hence there is no offence. I simply wish to call your attention to the fact."

Digitized by Google

"It is a lie," returned Sylvan hotly. "Marry you! She would sooner marry your ape. He is less hideous than you in her eyes."

For an instant the dwarf gazed at him with an expression that froze my blood; then he turned to me with his unvarying smile.

"I will accompany you home, my dear Cecile."

"No," I replied, my anger getting the better of my terror. "You have no right to control my actions. You are nothing whatever to me. My father owes you money which he cannot pay, and you may turn us out into the world without bread or a roof to shelter us, if you will. But I will never marry you."

"Do not lose your temper, dear child," he said imperturbably. "If our friend will excuse us, as we walk home together, I think I can convince you that I have spoken the truth."

There was something so sinister in his tone and smile that I yielded, and, bidding Sylvan a trembling adieu, went with Modred and his hated ape.

"You spoke," said he, as we proceeded, "of your father owing me money, intimating that therein lay my power to force you to marry me. That would be, indeed, a power which you might easily defy. But what if it were in my power to send your father to prison for a term of years?"

I started and looked at him in horror.

"My father—in prison?"

"Yes," he answered, "just that. In his ignorance of business—let us be charitable—he was unfortunate enough to mistake his legal right. Just a mere signature, nothing more! But quite sufficient to constitute felony in the eyes of the law."

"But he is innocent!" I cried, clasping my hands in agony. "My poor father a felon? Oh, have you no pity, no mercy?"

"Who has had pity or mercy for me?" he exclaimed, showing the only trace of real feeling I ever saw him exhibit. "I, misshapen, hideous, a mock of nature. I who"—here he broke off abruptly, and added in a voice of forced calmness, "I trust, dear child, that you will spare no expense in the preparation of your trousseau. Our wedding should do honour to our family names."

* * * * *

Yes, it was so. Unsuspicious of the trap laid for him by the wily dwarf, and ignorant of business as a child, my poor father had done that from the consequences of which I alone could save him.

I did not hesitate.

How I passed the intervening period I cannot say, but waking out of what seemed a long dream of misery I found myself at the eve of my wedding day. I had told Sylvan the truth and bidden him a last sad farewell. I had prepared myself for the ordeal, and now only awaited the final sacrifice.

Alone, dazed, tearless, I sat in my chamber, counting the slow hours as they passed.

Suddenly as I sat so, a terrible cry rang through the house, a cry so awful in its pain and horror that the hair arose upon my head. Then there was a sound of feet in the passage, the opening and shutting of doors, loud exclamations, and wild confusion.

I found myself, how, I do not know, with many others in Modred Yale's room. He lay upon the floor with his eyes starting from his head, and with an expression of terror and rage upon his features that I shall never forget—dead! On his neck were the black marks of powerful fingers. The ape Gordon had disappeared.

The superstitious say that Modred Yale had sold his soul to the Evil One, that the ape was a familiar spirit sent to watch the doomed man; and that this familiar had at last claimed his bargain, and Modred Yale's soul had gone to its master. The wiser ones say that, driven to frenzy by the dwarf's cruelty, the animal had at length turned upon him and strangled him to death. No traces of the ape were ever found.

Sylvan, my husband, professes to hold the former belief.

LEIGH HALL.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS
GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☛ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

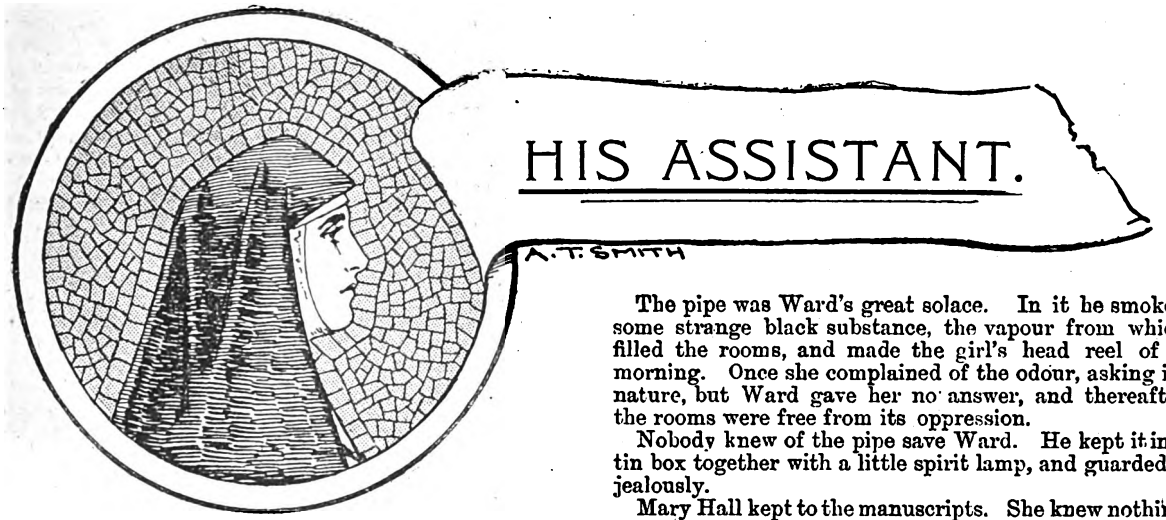
No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 7 distribution must reach us by November 21st, addressed to The 7th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the Fourth Distribution appears on page 651.

Digitized by Google



HIS ASSISTANT.

THE door-plate of the room 41, Albany Chambers, London, bore nothing more startling to the minds of the reading public than the words:

DAVID WARD, LITERARY BUREAU.

David Ward was a little man whose age it was not easy to guess. Sometimes the girl, his assistant, felt sure that he was at least fifty years old. At other times, particularly when he smiled, which was not often, he seemed quite young, almost boyish, in spite of his grey hair. As a matter of fact, he was thirty-seven.

He was the mere skeleton of a man. His clothing hung upon his hook-like shoulders in a loose, dangling fashion, and his face wore a yellow, shrivelled look, much like some of the manuscripts stacked in heaps about the little back office.

Mary Hall did not mind his peculiar make-up. She usually looked at his eyes, which were deep and brown; and watched for the occasional smile, which revealed uncommonly fine teeth.

No. 41, was Ward's home as well as his office. It was characterised by that orderly disorder which somehow dominates a real bachelor den.

Besides the horse-hair couch and easy chairs, there were in the room various stands and book-racks, a tea-table, Ward's desk and the desk at which the girl worked.

On the easterly wall, where the shadows kept tryst with one another and the sunshine seldom fell, was a picture of "Solitude," and on the opposite wall was a lurid painting of the Battle of Waterloo.

There was another painting which hung over Ward's desk, that of a sweet-faced woman, with eyes like Ward's eyes, and soft, brown hair. It had been copied from an old daguerrotype which Ward carried about in a gold locket in the upper pocket of his grey waistcoat. He never, by any chance, wore any other colour than grey.

He was forgetful at times, but there were two things which he never forgot. One was to transfer the gold locket, when, of necessity, he purchased another suit, from the waistcoat pocket of the old to the corresponding pocket of the new suit. The other thing was to keep the mysterious pipe out of the girl's range of vision.

The pipe was Ward's great solace. In it he smoked some strange black substance, the vapour from which filled the rooms, and made the girl's head reel of a morning. Once she complained of the odour, asking its nature, but Ward gave her no answer, and thereafter the rooms were free from its oppression.

Nobody knew of the pipe save Ward. He kept it in a tin box together with a little spirit lamp, and guarded it jealously.

Mary Hall kept to the manuscripts. She knew nothing of Ward's domestic affairs, but she fancied that sleep occupied but little of his time. He never complained of ill-health. He was simply a bundle of nerves, a perfect working machine. There was a strong suggestion of perpetual motion about him, and the girl fancied that when he stopped working his soul would fly from his body like the freed mainspring of a clock.

He had not always lived alone. The girl's predecessor had been a silent old scholar, who had worked with Ward for five years, and had slept on the couch in the back office every night.

In his own peculiar way David Ward grieved sorely when he found old Scott dead there one morning. He advertised again and again for a man like Scott. After a while he decided that there had never been but one of that sort created, and told the girl who had haunted the office for days that she might come and help him out of a labyrinth of manuscripts.

He had a thorough dislike to womankind, but the girl's industry struck him as a good quality in an assistant. Somebody must come to his aid, and the girl came.

She was not pretty. She was too tall, and carried herself with a nervous stride. There was a certain drabness about her that made her fit almost at once into her place among the office fixtures. Her brown hair curled crisply about her rather colourless face, and seemed at variance with her steady grey eyes and sober manner.

At first the rustle of her gown about the office disturbed Ward, but later he became accustomed to it, and even raised his head from a mountain of manuscripts at nine o'clock every work-a-day morning, to listen for the click of her boot-heels upon the tessellated floor of the hall.

If she had taken a solemn oath that she would never weep, faint, indulge in hysterics, or even in adjectives, she could not have been less emotional than she was in his presence.

Once, when she was suffering acutely from nervous headache, she uncorked a bottle of ammonia, which had been standing in the sunshine on the window sill. It exploded, full in her face and eyes. She cried out at the sudden smart, then she thought of Ward and became silent. He appeared not to have heeded at all, but after a few minutes he pushed back his chair and went over to her.

"That wasn't a very bright proceeding," he began in his peculiarly irritating way.

Digitized by Google

The girl remained silent. She felt as though she should scream if she opened her mouth at all.

Then she heard Ward busying himself about the room and expected presently to hear a tirade against women in general.

By and by he came back to his desk.

"Take your hands from your face," he said rather roughly.

The girl paid no attention to him.

"Take down your hands! Don't be an idiot!" he said, still more harshly.

The girl's hands came down suddenly. She was about to pour forth some scathing remarks, when there was laid upon her hot eyelids something cool and soothing.

"It's milk," Ward explained briefly.

It was the first time she had ever known him to interest himself in anything save the manuscripts, and it warmed her heart to him.

"That was so good of you," she said gently, resting her head against the back of the chair and trying to smile. If she could have seen through the bit of his handkerchief, she would have beheld a face transfigured by inward joy and light into a real loveliness, such as no man had seen upon it before. Something new and beautiful had found the heart of David Ward, and made the girl seem a very queen to him.

Then his glance fell upon one of his hands. It was like the hand of an old man, wrinkled and yellow. He sniffed contemptuously and went back to his work. But the girl never forgot that one act of kindness.

One day her father died. He had been a scholar, and had taught the girl nearly all that she knew. He was the last of her immediate relations, and she had looked up to him, and had loved him dearly.

She fancied when she went back to Ward again that he would say something, if ever so little, about her sorrow. He failed even to look up from his desk when she came in as usual. The truth was that his heart was so full of sympathy for her that he could say no ordinary thing. When, after an hour or so of silence, he did speak, it was of something entirely foreign to her troubles.

"That abominable Mrs. Tweed has been here again with another lot of rubbish tied up with pink ribbon," he said.

The girl had to smile at his cross face.

"It was blue ribbon last time," she said, trying hard to keep the tremble out of her voice.

A week later, when she had settled her father's affairs and taken a room for herself, she came into the office one morning red-eyed and dispirited.

Ward glanced at her several times before he could bring himself to speak. Then:

"You look as though you'd been tied up in a bundle," he said, with one of his rare smiles.

She knew that she was not a pretty girl. She looked up at him rather curiously.

"I feel worse than I can possibly appear," she answered simply. Then, as she saw the customary half-sneer coming back to his face, "you must try not to notice me for a few days," she said; "by then I shall be used to this," she touched her black gown. Ward turned his face to his work and went on scribbling.

The new, strange state of being went hard with him. In all his life he had never loved before. He thought he had enough of that sort of thing in the tales of woe which he marked with the great cross of his disapprobation, or dug into with his pruning knife, the blue pencil.

After a while he wheeled about in his chair again.

"Girl," he said, "you'd think a man a fool to covet suffering, wouldn't you? I've never had anybody of my own to lose since I can remember. It makes a fellow feel hard not to have any memories. I've tried often to fancy what it would seem like to have known her," he pointed up towards the lady on the wall, over his desk. "After all," he went on, "she is only a myth to me, not my mother. You've no reason to feel so wounded and miserable, girl; you have known joy. I'm a poor sort, body and soul, but I believe I should have loved her, I do."

It was a long speech for Ward to make. The girl sat silent, partly from astonishment, partly from habit.

Ward returned to his work. He was very sorry that he had spoken, and angry because his hands shook like reeds in the wind. He was more than ever an enigma to Mary Hall.

The third year of her stay at Ward's she was discovered by her ideal, a young lawyer with a small practice and a big bump of ambition.

With his keen insight he saw, through the drabness of Mary Hall, a nature strong and brave and womanly.

Unconsciously, at first, he let her influence him to high aspirations and keep him straight and honourable, when there were plenty of chances for him to be otherwise.

And MacGregor grew to love her with all his Scotch might, which was not little.

When he could keep the secret no longer he told her.

They were coming home from the opera of Martha at the time.

She was humming a piece of the music, and she seemed to him very sweet in her trim black jacket, straight gown and velvet toque.

MacGregor never beat about the bush much. They were walking briskly homeward.

"Mary," he said suddenly. He had never called her Mary before. "Mary," he said again, "I love you with all my heart."

The girl made no response, her heart was beating to a glad song, no part of the opera of Martha. She walked along, looking straight in front of her.

They were nearing an electric lamp.

"Look at me, dear," MacGregor pleaded.

In the midst of the light the girl turned her glad eyes on his. She seemed wondrously beautiful to MacGregor.

He slipped his arm within hers and they walked in silence to the house in which the girl occupied an upper room.

When near the door she stopped for a moment to take her latch-key from her pocket.

MacGregor put his arms about her.

"Aren't you going to speak to me at all, darling?" he asked.

She answered him in the quick, jerky way, common to her.

"It doesn't seem possible," she said. "Not possible at all, you know. Thank you for—for caring, and good-night."

MacGregor laughed boyishly, leaning forward and placing a hand at either side of her face.

"Does this seem possible?" he asked, pressing many kisses on her lips.

"Say 'I love you, Don,'" he urged.

Digitized by Google

She looked at him frankly. "I do," she said earnestly. "I do love you, Don."

The girl was very happy. It seemed almost impossible that she should find Ward as grey and skeleton-like as ever that next morning.

But she found him quite unchanged, his face buried in a heap of papers. He nodded to her when she came in.

He was struck by her look of youth, and felt insignificant. He vented his feelings, as usual, by sniffing.

The girl longed to have him happy. She noticed that he had not washed his breakfast things, and she went to work and did them herself.

He watched her dreamily and let himself fancy how it would seem to have her always near him, where he could see her whenever he looked up from his work.

He remembered the strange pipe suddenly, and shuddered.

Somehow, whenever he thought of telling her, the pipe came into his memory.

He had not touched it for a good month, never since he had made up his mind that he must let her know how much she was to him.

Sometimes of an evening a great longing for it would come over him, and he would go to the fire-proof box and take out the evil thing and look at it hungrily. Once he had gone so far as to touch its bowl with the head of a hammer in a menacing way.

But it had a terrible fascination for him, he could never quite finish it with one good stroke.

It had been his friend for so long, his consolation for the lack of human friendship.

By and by he would destroy it for her sake. Somebody had said that a man could not break from its awful charm.

He would disprove all that.

After he had told her that she was his first of women, a beautiful and sweet and comforting thing sent to bless him, he would destroy it.

He tried to write her a good, manly letter; but he thought it read like the poor swashy things which he had corrected for so long.

Then he decided that he would tell her very soon.

"I'm a poor thing," said he, addressing himself in the glass. "A poor thing to be thinking of love. Look at me!"

"I'm a fit subject for the museum," he said, grinning up at the lurid painting of the Battle of Waterloo.

And so it was, that, day after day, he put off telling her, and was more gruff to her than ever before, and he loved her with all the heart in his weazened little body.

One morning she came into the office and straight across to Ward's desk.

"Look, Mr. Ward," she said, smiling down at him. "Read and say that you are glad." She spread out a periodical before him.

Ward looked at her. He had noticed before that she had put off her mourning. She was gowned in brown. Afterwards he recalled her as she appeared to him then.

Mechanically he read the heading of the paper. He saw that it was a society paper, and he followed her finger down a certain column, where he read:

"Mr. Donald MacGregor, the young lawyer who is fast making a name, is engaged to Miss Mary Hall daughter of the late John Hall."

Ward read it through twice. He had never had anybody to lose, he had told her. Drearily he began reading the item a third time, a strange mist made the words dance, and finally blurred them altogether from his sight.

"Is it true?" he heard himself ask in a commonplace way.

"Perfectly true," the girl answered, smiling. "Say that you are glad, Mr. Ward."

"I am glad," Ward said gently. She waited, half expecting that he would say something more. She was removing her wrap when Ward spoke again. "Go out and take a holiday," he said urgently. "Go and enjoy yourself. I want you to be happy. You were meant for happiness. Take a holiday. There's plenty of money in the drawer," he reached over his desk and took out a little roll of notes. "I want you to go out and buy my wedding present for you, whatever you wish for most," he said. He smiled one of his rare smiles and pushed her gently towards the door.

The expression of his eyes struck the girl as infinitely sad.

"I don't want to go," she said with a half sob.

Ward smiled again. "Good-bye, girl," he said very gently, then he shut the door after her and locked it

He came back into the room and stood with folded arms before the painting of his mother.

The refinement of anguish lifted him for a moment above the mere creature that he was. Then a hurt, almost child-like, expression came upon his face.

"I'm a miserable liar, mother!" he said brokenly. "A miserable liar! I am not glad! I loved her so! I needed her so!"

When he had stared at the picture for a while, his face softened. His lips quivered into a smile of adoration for those compassionate eyes.

He went over to the little cupboard suddenly and got out the opium pipe and its trappings.

"For her sake, and for mother's, I will do it," he said musingly.

He took the pipe to a back window, and, leaning out, flung it, with all his might, into the yard, where it struck the bricks and fell in a hundred pieces.

"When I was a boy," he said meditatively, coming back into the room and flinging himself wearily into a reclining chair, "when I was a boy, I never did wrong without being punished severely for it at once."

Ever since his love for the girl had become assured to him he had been under a severe nervous strain. Now that there was nothing to hope for, or to look forward to, he felt strangely calm.

He fell asleep after a time and dreamt happily of the girl. There was not an atom of bitterness in his dreams, and he slept as peacefully as a child.

He was lying in the chair, with his face turned to the window, when the girl unlocked the door the next morning and came in with a little song on her lips.

"You see I have come back to you," she said gaily, crossing over to him.

The sunlight coming through the window slantwise, just touched his forehead and hair.

The rare smile that had now and then transformed his plain face rested full upon it.

Concerning David Ward's heartaches God had called a halt.

JEROME FITZGERALD.

Digitized by Google

A Strange Welcome.

MARK WARNER sat in the shade of the big oaks that grew by the kitchen door. He was in his shirt-sleeves, and his coarse hat lay on the grass at his side.

He was leaning forward, his chin resting on his hands, his elbows upon his knees, calmly puffing a short pipe. Near to him sat his wife, busily engaged in stringing beans for dinner.

"It's almost ten years since Ted went away," observed Mr. Warner, blowing a cloud of smoke over a vagrant bumblebee that was buzzing about a hollyhock.

"Ten years this autumn," remarked his wife, without looking up.

"This harvest time," corrected Warner. "I recker-lect it well. He went off just when I was busiest cutting corn, and I had to employ Dick Johnson in his place. Dick wasn't worth his salt, and it was a clear loss of a sovereign and more to me."

"But you can't blame Ted for that," said his wife.

"He might 'a' stayed till the corn was cut."

"He said you wasn't treating him just right—then Ted was our only child."

"I was an only child myself," complained Warner; "and I wasn't treated any better 'an Ted; but I didn't go running away. You remember, my dad wouldn't hear of our being married in a busy time. Says he to me: 'Mark, I ain't going to have a wedding going on right in ploughing time. Wait till the corn's laid in and that'll be plenty of time for wedding arrangements.'"

"Yes," said Mrs. Warner, "and we had to wait, too. My mother was against our being married in the midst of gardening time. She said to me: 'Mary, it ain't no use talking about being married this spring, to say nothing of the work that's got to be done, it would be a waste to kill them chickens till harvest; an' then there's nothing in the garden worth mentioning to make pies, and it's a bad time altogether. Wait till after harvest, Mary,' says she, 'and the blackberries will all be ripe.' Mother was dead against extravagance, and believed in young people minding their parents."

"So she did, and so did father," said Warner, "but things are different now, and p'r'aps I was a little hard on Ted."

"Ted was a good boy."

"Yes; but he kept going with them Jones boys when he knowed that old Jones had treated me like dirt; then he was for ever working that foolish machine idea of his, when he ought to have been at work on the farm."

"He said the machine might make us all rich if he got it right," suggested Mrs. Warner.

"But such foolish things don't ever git right," declared Mark, "and I spect he's found it out by this time. Ted was a good hand to work, though, when he did work, and p'r'aps I ought to have allowed him to have his way about them ideas of his."

"It would have been the best thing—boys will be boys."

"So they will, and Ted was only sixteen—just when a boy knows the least and thinks the most!"

Warner rose and stood leaning against the big oak. His wife got up and went into the kitchen. Presently Sam White came along the lane, carrying a reaping-fork, and stopping, he leant against the fence.

He was a young man of spare build, with a half-inch of downy beard upon his freckled face.

"Father thought you might want someone to help you cut corn," he said, after exchanging greetings with Warner.

"I dunno just yet," the farmer replied. "I'm intending to commence to-morrow morning, though it does seem a bit early. My corn is later 'an yours."

"Yes; about two weeks. Father said if you needed any help he'd come in the morning."

"Well, I shall want a couple of hands for a few days, and I think you an' yer father might both come."

"He'll come; but I've to see to something else."

"I might get another hand. Tell your father to bring one if he can."

"All right. Heard anything from Ted lately?"

"Not for a long time."

"How is he getting on?"

"He don't say. Just says he's well, and working every day."

"Don't talk of coming home?"

"No. S'pose he ll sow his wild oats first."

"Course he will! I was never allowed to sow no wild oats. Well, I must be going. Good day."

He was walking away when Warner called out:

"I say, Sam, you didn't see anything of my ole speckled cow as you came along, did you? She hain't bin up to-day, dang her ole hide, and the calf's 'most bawled itself to death."

Sam stopped abruptly and came back, and stood by the fence.

"I must be losing my senses, that I must!" he said, with an air of vexation. "I was going to tell you and fergot it. I seed her down in the woods as I came along.

Digitized by Google

A branch had fell off that big ellum and killed her, an' there she lay as dead as a door nail."

Warner took a long pull at his pipe.

Nothing ever disturbed or excited him in the least.

"She hadn't bin milked this morning, neither," he said, "and I s'pose the tree has spoilt the hide. You can tell your father to come over in the morning, if it ain't raining, and we'll get to work."

The next morning, as Mr. White was starting for Warner's, he saw a young man coming down the road from the direction of the little railway station. He was dressed in a neatly-fitting suit of grey and carried a small leather bag.

The young man looked eagerly at White, and nodding, said:

"Good-morning, Mr. White."

He held out his hand, smiling as he did so.

Mr. White took the proffered hand, looking very much puzzled.

"You seem to know me, but—w'y, bless my soul! it's Ted Warner!"

"So it is," laughed the young man. "I am glad to see some one who remembers me."

"I knowed you as soon as you laughed," said White. "But how you have growed! W'y, you are a man now, bigger 'an your father."

The two walked on in the direction of Warner's farm.

Farmer White was not especially inquisitive, but he was not altogether devoid of a certain amount of curiosity regarding the affairs of his neighbours, and before the two reached their destination, he had learnt several important facts relative to young Warner.

Among other things he learnt that Ted had perfected a most valuable piece of machinery which he had been working on for years, and having patented his invention, he had disposed of it to a wealthy firm in London for a small fortune, and was coming home to share it with his aged parents.

White speculated on the surprise in store for Warner, and he chuckled inwardly as he thought of the joy and amazement Ted's sudden return would bring to the parents.

As they arrived before the farmhouse they saw Mrs. Warner coming from an out-house, carrying a pan of milk.

As Ted came towards her she looked at him keenly, then set the pan of milk upon the ground, her form trembling.

"It's Ted!" she said, in an agitated voice.

She took his hands and kissed him. Then he put his arms about her neck, while the tears ran down his cheeks.

"You have growed so," she said, holding him at arm's length and gazing fondly into his face.

"I was afraid you wouldn't recognise me," he said, "but you cannot deceive a mother's eye."

They stood talking for some moments. Some of the little ducks that were running about the yard came up, and pouncing into the pan of milk, began to swim about in the liveliest manner.

"Where's father?" asked Ted.

"In the house, eating his breakfast. He's late with it. Come, let's go in."

She stooped to pick up the pan.

"Them ducks have spoilt the milk," she said, emptying ducks and milks out into the grass.

"Ted's father'll be very glad to see him," said White, as the three walked towards the house.

"Don't say who I am," said Ted, "and we'll see if father will know me."

"That's good," chuckled White. "I'll bet he won't know you at all."

Warner was sitting at the table eating his breakfast when the three entered.

"I've brought you a hand," said White, nodding towards Ted.

"All right," responded Warner. "Sit up to the table and have breakfast."

"I've had mine," replied White, "but I s'pose the hand hain't."

"No, I haven't," said Ted, taking a seat at the table.

"He don't know him, by jingo!" chuckled White inwardly.

"Just help yourself," said Warner, and Ted was not backward in obeying.

Little was said during the meal, and when it was finished, without Warner having shown any signs of recognising his son, White's excitement rose to the highest pitch.

"It's a good un, Warner, that it is," was his mental comment.

"Warner," said White, as the two rose from the table, "I 'spect yer don't know this feller I brought?" and he nodded towards Ted.

Warner slowly drew a pipe from his pocket, and filling and lighting it, said:

"Know him? I know'd him soon as he come in the door. It's about work time, ain't it? Ted, there's an extra knife out in the shed." C. DICKINSON.

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XXXII. (continued).

At first de Vismes had an easy task at Dushakh.

Taken unawares, like the rest of the scattered troops on the line, the few defenders of the post surrendered at the first onset, and for a couple of days de Vismes, and his able coadjutors, Adams and Hutchinson, were free to devote their whole time to consolidating their position.

Of course, the news of the raid soon spread from Tejend to Merv, Bokhara, and Samarkand; but beyond the latter point tidings travelled slowly. Applin's conjecture that there was no telegraph line north through the Amu Daria district, was right.

Beyond the Oxus bridge, which is 280 miles from Dushakh, the Russian officers left by Alikhanoff to collect stores for the use of subsequent levies from Siberia, gathered together as large a force as they could muster, and conveyed them by train to Tejend. Sarakhs and Penjdeh were also requisitioned for men from their already depleted garrisons, and at last, about June 18th, a desperate attempt was made to recapture Dushakh.

But the British officers, ten of whom were now on the spot, had not been idle.

They had 20,000 men present, and one half of those had been labouring day and night to throw up extensive lines of earthworks, whilst the remainder of the tribesmen had been rapidly initiated into the Boer method of warfare, being a judicious blending of prone marksmanship and rapid galloping towards or away from an enemy.

The nomads quickly perceived the advantages of steady shooting over their antiquated method of wild firing from the saddle. Long before Colonel Anitchkoff had brought his Bokharans and Siberians within range of the earthworks he had received most convincing testimony of the rapid progress made by these unexpected students in the art of warfare.

In the place of being the attacker he was attacked, and his native allies were routed before he well knew what had happened.

He retired to Tejend and consolidated all his European troops, resolving to force the defences of Dushakh by their aid, and leave to his untrained auxiliaries the congenial task of pursuit.

Peyton had now arrived from Usun-Ada, and the best possible preparations were made to withstand the more determined assault which was made on the early morning of the 22nd.

The Russian skirmishers, consisting mainly of men from the 103rd regiment of the line, were not to be denied. They resolutely pushed the attack home, and Peyton saw, to his grief and dismay, that if once the entrenchments were carried, his host would begin to crumble away into nothingness.

The Turkomans were not cowards, but this manner of fighting was new to them. Were it not for the great gallantry displayed by de Vismes and the other Englishmen, the nomads would long before the end came have flown to their horses and raced back to their hills across the desert.

Peyton, resolute in his despair, had made every arrangement for destroying the railway line, when his gaze was suddenly arrested by the sight of a cloud of horsemen coming up rapidly on the left rear of the Russian attack.

This, then, was the finish. If they had secured cavalry support, it was all over with his hillmen.

He had almost given the order to tear up some hundreds of yards of rails when he was restrained by a growing sense of amazement at the tactics of the approaching cavalry.

Why, they were charging the Russians! Were not those British dragoons? Those streaming puggris were assuredly worn by Bengal Lancers?

There was, to all appearance, some midsummer madness about this astounding apparition. Dream, as the whole thing seemed to Peyton, it was backed up by very tangible reality. This was Colonel Doyne's cavalry brigade, which had reached its destination in the nick of time, to render the utmost service, after a superb march from the Helmund.

Regardless of danger from the scattering enemy, Peyton rode wildly towards the British force.

Recognising Colonel Doyne, he shouted, without any preliminary salutation: "The train, the train!"

The brigadier followed Peyton's emphatic gesture and saw at once what he meant. Standing on the rails a couple of miles away were the engine and eight carriages which had conveyed Anitchkoff and his principal followers to the scene of action.

Digitized by Google

A squadron of the Royal Irish Lancers captured the complete fitout in less than twenty minutes, and when Peyton had rapidly explained the great success of his advance on the Caspian, the brigadier detailed one hundred British and one hundred native troops for similar work on the eastern section of the line.

"The train, the train!"

De Vismes was given command and that night the long wooden bridge over the Oxus, stretching in rickety evenness over two miles of swamp, sand, and river, was ruined so completely that no train could possibly cross it during the next couple of months.

The way was now quite clear for Sir George White to effectually dispose his force between the Oxus and the Caspian.

During a lucid interval, Captain Peyton said to the brigadier:

"Well, sir, I am glad to be able to hand over to you an army, such as it is, of 40,000 men, and stores for 400,000, together with a railway line and fourteen ships."

"What do you mean?" said Doyne, smiling and searching for a letter in his pocket book.

"Of course you take command!" replied Peyton.

"Not so," said the other, handing him the letter he had sought for. "My orders are to co-operate with you; I command my cavalry."

The note was from the Commander-in-Chief. It ran:

"Colonel Doyne has undertaken to give you this dispatch if he finds that you are still alive and have been successful in your mission. You are hereby brevetted to the field rank of colonel. If Captain de Vismes be with you, he receives his majority, and the native officers who accompanied you are, if approved by you, raised to the next rank above that they now hold. Other rewards are reserved until I am more fully acquainted with your work."

Peyton did not speak for a moment. He turned his head and looked across the desert, whilst Colonel Doyne lit a cigarette.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Another Agincourt.

"Comrades," wrote Lord Roberts in a proclamation issued to the army on June 1st, "in the forthcoming battle with the French, England demands our services under circumstances that have seldom, if ever before, occurred in her glorious history.

"We must, at all hazards, utterly rout and destroy the enemy.

"This is the crucial struggle of the campaign. The best troops of France are opposed to us. Their numbers far exceed our own, but I know that they cannot equal us in courage, in discipline, in every splendid quality that is found in the British soldier.

"To our hands are committed the destinies of our beloved country. Strong in that sacred trust, I feel in my heart that the issue is already determined. Let us resolve that, God willing, our confidence in victory shall be justified by the result. We must deal the enemy such a blow that the power of France will stagger helpless from our path."

The Commander-in-Chief would not have uttered these stirring words to his men had there not been desperate need for the display of that calm courage which recks not of the chances of war.

There were 400,000 British troops massed in two great armies of similar proportions on both sides of the Seine, in the pastoral valleys between Yvetot and Rouen.

Taught prudence by their previous experiences, the French commanders resolved that their next blow should be a decisive one. For a wonder, therefore, their national vanity was subordinated to the rigid necessities of the moment; and, beyond some trival outpost affairs, no engagement was risked with the invaders until they had assembled such overwhelming forces that, under the ordinary conditions of warfare, they must succeed in hopelessly crushing the two sections of the British army.

On the north bank of the Seine General Saussier contemplated, with the conscious pride of superiority, a superb army of 500,000 men, whilst, on the south, General Mercier commanded a well-equipped force of 450,000.

France had strained every nerve to place these phenomenal numbers rapidly in the field.

All bridges across the river had been blown up to a point far below Yvetot; junction between the different portions of Lord Roberts' troops was rendered apparently impossible without retreat or delay.

The former course meant a moral victory for the French; the latter they resolved to render impossible by delivering a concerted attack at dawn on June 2nd.

Like Trochu during the siege of Paris, General Saussier had his plan; like von Moltke, on the same memorable occasion, Lord Roberts also had a scheme, and it differed materially from that of Saussier.

During the afternoon of June 1st, thirty-eight stout barges were towed up the Seine from a point below Yvetot, where willing hands had for some days past been engaged in fitting substantial level platforms upon them at a uniform height of 6ft. from the water.

Between the two wings of the British army nineteen roads led to the river, and at ten o'clock that night there were nineteen substantial floating bridges spanning the stream in each locality where a crossing was practicable.

About the same hour General Massy, who now controlled the operations on the south side of the river, pushed some 10,000 men close up to the French lines—"Just to keep them awake," he explained to his staff—and whilst the French generalissimo marvelled at the audacity of the English in anticipating the attack of the morrow, 190,000 of the said English were quietly taking up the positions allotted to them on the extensive lines of the northern force.

Shortly before dawn the 10,000, who had made things exceedingly lively for the French in the dark, rapidly withdrew, and when General Saussier was calmly drinking his morning coffee and glancing over the final arrangements for the attack, to commence at 5.30 a.m., it being then four o'clock, the actual disposition of his adversary was as follows:

Three miles in front of his position were 350,000 Britons. General Massy, with 50,000 men, was intrusted with the comparatively easy task of holding the river flank, whilst the barges, having served their purpose, were drawn up on the British bank of the stream and by prior efficiency of design, now formed thirty-eight excellent floating forts in the most exposed localities.

General Saussier did not know of these unexpected events, nor did he know, as he asked for a second cup, that at that precise moment, the British were advancing to attack him.

Lord Roberts resolved, from the outset, to risk annihilation for the sake of complete success.

A partial or merely strategic victory would be as bad as a defeat.

The superior French army lay crescent-shape in front and almost overlapping him. He therefore sent the whole of his guns and cavalry to the extreme left with orders to irresistibly pound the French right until it was driven in upon the centre. He split up his forces into six divisions of ten brigades, and in each brigade there were 5,000 men

Digitized by Google

He personally kept at his immediate disposal eight additional brigades as a reserve.

Divisional commanders and brigadiers received the most precise instructions that they must each fight on their own line of advance without reference to proceedings elsewhere, and the only deviation from this definite scheme would occur when the French right was obviously driven in, and concentration towards the Rouen road and the Seine should be aimed at.

In a simple phrase, the battle was fought as though the British troops were travelling along the radii of a fan, of which the French constituted the outer circumference. As the fight progressed the fan commenced to contract.

General Saussier finished his second cup of coffee that night in Paris.

He was about to complete his early breakfast when the sound of firing, rapidly growing in volume over a wide segment of the French front, startled him exceedingly.

A staff officer exclaimed: "This is an attack in force."

"Impossible!" shouted the General. "They have impudence the most sublime, but surely not such as this."

An aide-de-camp rode madly up to the house occupied by the Commander-in-Chief.

"My General," he cried, "the English have driven in the pickets, and the whole army is threatened."

"It is unbelievable!" roared the astonished Frenchman, rushing towards his charger. "Fly," he continued, addressing his staff, "to order a general advance, and telephone to Mercier to offer battle at once. We must drive these imbeciles into the sea forthwith."

There could now be no doubt concerning the nature and magnitude of the engagement.

Along a front of seven miles, a determined conflict was already in progress, and the mad fury of the combat rent the air with its din, whilst affrighted birds mingled their cries with the screaming of shells and the whistling of bullets.

The French guns were caught in a most disadvantageous position, being massed in rear of the centre, and the fierce and wholly unexpected onslaught of the British momentarily drove back the French line, and hampered the exertions of the artillery.

At last General Saussier ordered ten batteries to the front, to stop the British advance at all hazards.

Miscalculating the position of his opponents, the French artillery officer intrusted with the movement actually galloped his guns into the fighting line of a brigade composed of the London Scottish, the Queen's Westminsters, the Artists' Corps, and the Inns of Court Volunteers, strengthened by a battalion of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers.

"Bayonet the gunners, Westminsters!" shouted Colonel Sir Howard Vincent, as he perceived the endeavours of the French to wheel rapidly and extricate themselves.

"Shoot the horses, 23rd," yelled Colonel Blyth, who knew the most effective method of throwing guns out of action.

This combination of effort soon achieved its purpose. The French artillerymen fought like men possessed, for the gunner in all lands cares not for life when his beloved weapon is in danger. It was the first experience of the Volunteers in the dread realities of war, but they took up the points of the situation like puppies lapping new milk. They absolutely climbed over men, guns, and horses, and it seemed as though, in a fit of Gargantuan rage, they desired to pound the lot into fragments, until their officers hastily persuaded them to form up in column again.

Not a moment too soon was order restored.

Even the brief diversion created by the mad exploit of the artillery enabled the commander of the French centre to rally his disgusted, but unbeaten troops. In the small town of Les Petits Osiers, a congeries of narrow streets and lanes, he took his stand, and when the British brigade resumed its advance, it was met by a murderous and well-sustained fire from a vastly superior force.

For a little while the Brigadier, Colonel Blyth, made his men lie down until he sent to Major-General James Alleyne, who was in charge of the division, for reinforcements.

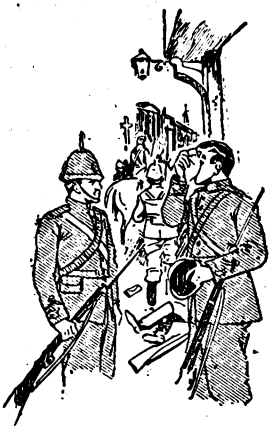
But every brigade was hotly engaged, and relief was impossible.

Colonel Blyth hesitated no longer. Whatever the result to himself and his men, the French must be driven out of Les Petits Osiers. Calmly trotting his horse into the bullet-swept zone in front of his men he shouted, pointing to the town with his sword: "Now, who leads?"

Few could hear him owing to the noise of the firing, but all understood his action. Every man sprang to his feet and a race ensued between the different regiments as to which should be first to close with the enemy.

Alas, many fell by the way! Of that fine brigade it was afterwards computed that 400 men were lost during that frightful onrush.

But heroism such as this was not to be denied, and in a few minutes they were at close quarters with the French. The latter, nothing loth, sought to engulf them in a sea of lead and steel, and in a few minutes the entire brigade must have been annihilated had not help arrived.



Wiping the blood from a cut across his forehead.

Lord Roberts, at first anxiously noting the progress of the fight from the tower of an ancient church, was assured by about 5.30 a.m. that all was well on both wings. He descended, therefore, and moved up the reserve division to strengthen the centre attack where he counted upon the most stubborn resistance.

Among the troops under his direct command was a splendid brigade of 6,000 men, composed exclusively of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

Unequalled throughout the world for physique and steadiness on parade, these stalwart troops were much more at home in active service than when engaged in their ordinary duties, and there had been no little grumbling among the men when they were not selected to take part in the first attack. But, unknown to themselves, fate had reserved for them a predominant share in determining the fortunes of the day.

Perceiving with quick glance the momentary check of Colonel Blyth's force, and intuitively realising the difficulties against which he was contending, Lord Roberts now dispatched the Royal Irish Constabulary to his assistance.

At the precise moment when the Fusiliers and the London Corps were seemingly swallowed up by overwhelming odds of fresh troops, the Irish Military Police dashed at the double into the town and set about the congenial and oft-practised task of clearing the streets.

Now, street-fighting is an art in itself, and the French soon found that Ireland had developed the pastime to a pitch of excellence never dreamt of on the Continent. Whether using bullet, bayonet, or butt-end of a rifle, the Irish policeman was an expert of the first quality, and the small, if active, Frenchman was no match for the genial giant who proceeded to mercilessly instruct him in the science of an election fight.

In ten minutes there were over a thousand French soldiers stretched, killed or badly injured, on the paving stones of Les Petits Osiers, and the rest were swept into the open country at the rear, as though a tornado had struck them.

"Faith," cried a pleasant-looking leviathan, wiping the blood from a cut across his forehead when a moment's halt was possible, "that reminds me of nothin' in the world so much as like a Cork demonsthration."

Digitized by Google

"It's a thrue word you spake, O'Reilly," said the man whom he addressed. "Th' only difference is that a Cork mob wouldn't have quit so aisy."

Lord Roberts, informed by signals from the church tower that the artillery and cavalry had driven in the French right, and that the extreme British left was already beginning to swing round, made up his mind at this moment to strike a tremendous blow at the discomfitted enemy.

Rouen was but three miles distant.

He had determined to attack the city next day with a portion of his forces, but the remarkable rapidity with which the huge French force had melted away before the ardour of his men, suggested the possibilty of capturing the place forthwith, when organised resistance was least probable.

Hastily explaining his design to Alleyne, to whose division he united the entire reserve, he sent off several aides to secure the co-operation of the mounted arms, which, by-the-way, were led by Lieut.-General Sir Drury Lowe.

Some further minor details were arranged with lucidity and dispatch, with the result that by 9.30 a.m. a fresh set of ideas were in full operation, having for their objective the capture of Rouen itself.

Alleyne's division marched in two columns along parallel roads straight for the gate known as the Port de Havre, and the cavalry and guns were instructed to press hard for the same point, eleven o'clock being the hour fixed for the combination of the attack.

The flying French were by this time seized with absolute panic.

To their excitable nature it seemed as though fate forbade that they should prevail against the British. General Saussier, after in vain risking his life repeatedly in the effort to stem the tide of disaster, had been forced by his staff to desist.

He hurriedly gave his second in command orders to defend the town at all hazards until Mercier could come to his assistance, and then resolved to proceed by special train to Paris.

He was captured by a dragoon, without the slightest attempt at rescue.

In view of the inflammable condition of that fickle city, this resolution was a wise one. He was the head of the army, and it was far better that the Government should be made aware of the magnitude of the disaster by himself than by the necessarily more unconvincing means of a dispatch.

Sir Drury Lowe was vigorously shelling the retreating force with shrapnel—his cavalry delivering charge after charge in the successful endeavour to more hopelessly crowd the French into the centre—when news of Lord Roberts's fresh design reached him.

By a mastery stroke of genius he at once changed his tactics.

Hastily massing his cavalry, he caused them to charge into the scattered but still numerous foe for a distance of about 800 yards. The division was then to wheel to right and left, thus opening up a clear path for the guns which followed in their track, and enabling them to decimate their opponents from the closer range.

This terribly effective manœuvre was repeated again and again, and the French losses during the next hour were simply colossal.

There was no time to think of any other consideration but the one object in view. The claims of humanity were necessarily thrown to the winds. Gunners and horsemen individually were but insignificant portions of this awful engine of death and destruction.

Digitized by Google

The French general intrusted with the defence of Rouen, to which not a thought had been given prior to the battle, was madly urging his horse along a crowded and hopelessly encumbered road, when he was struck heavily by a section of a shell.

He was captured by a dragoon without the slightest attempt at rescue by the frenzied and heedless mob of soldiers, whose desperate rage was now centred upon one consideration only—the desire to save their lives.

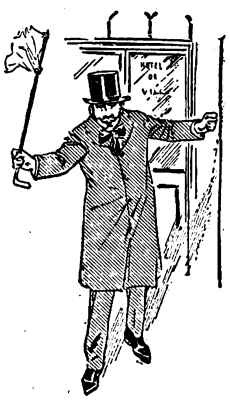
There were many opportunities when, had they rallied in the slightest degree, they must have hindered if not wholly stopped the murderous attacks of the British guns and cavalry.

Fewer men would, indeed, have been lost in attempting such a deed than in the blind fury of the flight. But arms, ammunition, knapsacks, belts, even coats and headgear, had been thrown aside, and the human torrents poured on, they knew not how nor whither.

Many died from sheer exhaustion, some went mad and danced and sang wild snatches of familiar ballads—whenever there was an obstacle in front lifelong comrades tore savagely at each other to gain another pace towards safety.

When the Lincolnshire regiment reached the outer line of fortifications it was hard to distinguish them from the dishevelled crowd of fugitives pouring into the city.

The sous-officier in charge of the guard did, it is true, realise what was happening, and strove to close the iron doors and raise the drawbridge.



It was the Mayor of the city.

He was promptly seized, and almost wrenched limb from limb by those of his own countrymen who would have been shut out by his action.

So well had the attack been timed that Lowe's cavalry and Alleyne's infantry entered the town together. The two British commanders rode into the Grande Place almost at the same moment. Of organised resistance there was practically none, but the stern necessity of war rendered it imperative that the ghastly slaughter should continue, for even yet a moment's breathing time given to the enemy might mean the complete failure of the bold movement.

One portion of a battery had managed to struggle up thus early—four guns of D Battery of the Royal Horse Artillery—and Major Eustace was ordered to at once open fire along the broad straight boulevards. He rapidly placed his guns in position. In a few seconds the shrapnel would have gone shrieking down the thoroughfare into the mass of fugitives, now, unfortunately, containing women and children as well as panic-stricken men, when a gentleman in plain clothes, bearing a white handkerchief tied to a walking-stick, ran through the main entrance of the Hotel de Ville, and bravely advanced up the street in the very face of the guns.

General Sir Drury Lowe rode forward to meet him.

It was the Mayor of the city, and he took it upon himself, in the absence of any proper military authority, to yield unconditionally.

* * * * *

Early that morning General Mercier had advanced with a splendid display of horse, foot, and artillery, to sweep the English out of France on the south side of the Seine.

He quickly discovered that he was fighting the air, and the flanking parties on the right also found to their cost that the Seine was held in force. Shortly afterwards the telephone from General Saussier's headquarters informed him of the fierce attack made by the British, and he continued to receive conflicting messages until all communications suddenly ceased.

As a matter of fact, any further information must have been conveyed in a strong Irish brogue, as the Royal Irish Constabulary had just entered the building.

Mercier, of course, wasted both men and temper in a useless duel with the well-posted and considerable army corps under Massy's command. At last came definite tidings. Saussier was irremediably beaten and Rouen was occupied.

The French General vowed, in all manner of strange expletives, that the English should yet be worsted, and he forthwith put into operation the most brilliantly-conceived and deadly tactical movement that Lord Roberts had so far been called to face.

He valiantly set out to march to the estuary of the Seine, with the intention of crossing the river by hook or by crook, and recapturing Havre, thus imperilling the British base and totally destroying their lines of communication for supplies and reinforcements.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Mercier's Mistake.

General Massy kept keen watch and ward at his post on the north bank of the Seine. By midday he became aware that the vast French army beyond the river was engaged in some definite move, but he could not discover its purport.

A captive balloon which he sent up for the purpose of finding out the direction taken by the enemy was destroyed by a shell filled with an explosive specially designed to cover an immense area. These missiles were in possession of both forces, and ballooning was, early in the campaign, rendered practically impossible by this means.

Foiled in his endeavour, and knowing well the futility of dispatching scouts across the river to ascertain the line of march of such an immense host as that commanded by General Mercier, the Englishman adopted the last resource of the modern philosopher—he lit a cigar, and proceeded to calmly reason out the situation, choosing Major Harington for his confidant, as the latter happened to be near him.

"Mercier has three courses open to him," he said reflectively. "He can attempt to recapture Rouen, in which case the chief will know about his intention before I do. If he is wise, he will retreat to Le Mans, and compel us to follow him before we advance on Paris. In this case we can do nothing to-day or to-morrow, and by the time we are ready for an advance we will have learnt his position. His third course—and, by Jove, I hope he won't take it—is to advance towards Havre and try to cut into our lines of communication."

"Well, sir," said Harington, "it seems to me that the last alternative is the only one to guard against immediately. There is a gunboat about five miles down the river. Shall I ride there, get ferried across, and see if I can find out where the heads of his columns are?"

"The very thing," cried the General. "Is your horse fresh enough?"

"He has done nothing but eat all the morning."

"Off you go, then. Take a small escort with you in case of accident. Report to me here, if possible, between three and four o'clock."

Harington chose a sergeant and six troopers of the Queen's Bays to accompany him and the party rode away at a sharp trot.

They soon found the tiny warship, and the Commander lowered a boat to row them across, the horses swimming whilst the men held the bridles.

Once on the other side they struck straight into the country and made for the highest point in the vicinity, some two miles distant. There was neither desire nor

Digitized by Google

It was not three o'clock when Harington dashed up to the divisional headquarters.

necessity for caution. Speed was the chief requirement, and there were no hostile vedettes to be seen.

By 1.30 p.m. they were breasting the hill from the westward, and on nearing its summit Harington and the sergeant dismounted so as to reach the crest without showing against the skyline.

Both men whistled softly to express their amazement as they saw the entire French force heading towards the coast in dense masses, with a vast commissariat in the rear, and a cloud of cavalry rapidly advancing towards the place where they were standing concealed by some brush wood.

Harington waited a few minutes to take accurate note of the enemy's disposition. Then the Sergeant exclaimed anxiously: "If we don't hurry, sir, they'll see us."

"You are right," said the Major. "It will certainly be better that we should not be noticed."

They rode at a breakneck pace down the hill and were soon hidden by the trees on the road at its base. Once there Harington told the non-commissioned officer to keep in touch with the enemy's whereabouts so far as he could, and whenever there was anything definite to communicate, to send one of his party to the river with orders to cross by some means and give his information to the nearest officer, with a request to forward it immediately to Lord Roberts and General Massy.

It was not three o'clock when Harington dashed up to the divisional headquarters, covered with dust, and his charger steaming from the combined effects of the double bath and a fast gallop.

"Take one of my spare horses," cried the General on hearing the news, "and go to the Commander-in-Chief. I have just heard he is at Rouen. It is four miles and a good road."

Harington was desperately hungry, but he did not dare to suggest a moment's pause lest some other staff officer should be selected for this important mission.

Declining the offer of a fresh mount he set off again at a good hunting pace, and in half-an-hour he was clattering over the paving-stones of Rouen to the Hotel de Ville, where he found Lord Roberts seated in the vestibule, with the Duke of York and several divisional commanders, partaking of a hasty meal.

His lordship listened to the recital in silence, only interjecting a question as to the probable number of Mercier's guns.

Harington's diplomatic experiences now stood him in good stead, else he would have been slightly nervous. As it was, he spoke quite collectedly, and evidently impressed the distinguished soldiers present by his lucidity and powers of observation. His final arrangements for obtaining further news by means of the dragoons elicited a nod and a smile from the Chief, but as he concluded a deep silence fell upon the company.

Every man present felt that the situation was one of unusual gravity, and they all waited until Lord Roberts should express his views.

After a marked pause the hero of Kandahar, who had been scrutinising the marks left on his boots by the stirrup-leathers, suddenly looked at Harington and said; "When did you last have anything to eat?"

This wholly unexpected query went straight to the youngster's soul, for his eyes had unconsciously travelled towards some meat pies and sandwiches on the table. He blushed furiously beneath his outer crust of perspiration and dust as he stammered: "At five o'clock this morning, sir."

Digitized by Google

"I thought so," said Lord Roberts. "Sit down and have a snack. Don't hurry. Orderly, bring some more bottled beer."

Teddy required no second invitation. His youthful appetite was simply ravenous, and a lot of men would give pounds for the thirst which he slaked with a first long draught of honest English beer.

Lord Roberts was discussing Mercier's move with the Duke of York and the other generals present, when a cavalry orderly drew up outside, and a moment later the sentry at the door announced "a letter from General Massy for Major Harington."

Everyone, Harington included, imagined that some fresh incident bearing upon the French tactics had happened, and the common thought was that it was curious the information had not been sent direct to the Commander-in-Chief. The moment that Teddy glanced at the envelope he saw, to his bewilderment, that the handwriting was Irene's, and the cover bore the unmistakable London postmark.

Shortly after his departure Massy had received the post-bag, and, finding this letter, thought it would be a kindly thing to send it on to Harington—or it might not reach him for hours. But now the young officer was utterly at a loss to explain the occurrence, and the entire party were looking at him, eagerly awaiting the expected intelligence.

"Come, Major Harington, why don't you open it and learn what's the latest development?" said Lord Roberts, for Teddy had laid the note on the table.

Harington answered with the calmness of despair: "It's not from General Massy, sir."

"Then who on earth is it from?" was the Chief's very natural question.

"From a lady, sir." Teddy positively glowed.

Not a man in the room except Harington but laughed heartily at this unlooked for explanation.

"From a lady!" repeated Lord Roberts, with affected astonishment. "Do you mean to say that, in addition to your other activities, you find time for the affairs of the heart?"

If he did not wish to appear for ever ridiculous, Teddy knew that he must now tell the complete truth.

"It is from my fiancée, sir," he said, "Lady Irene Vyne, and I presume that it came to hand shortly after I started to find your lordship, so General Massy was good enough to send it after me."

"Ah," said the Commander-in-Chief, "you are a lucky fellow. You get your rewards quickly. Please ask me to the wedding. Meanwhile, you are transferred to my staff. I will explain to General Massy. You had better send a note back with the orderly, directing your servant to bring your baggage to the Hotel des Bains, Havre. We go there by train within an hour."

What talisman was there in Irene that she was so constantly associated with her lover's good fortune? It was the memory of her words that impelled him to the brave deed which won him promotion and the Victoria Cross. And now that fortune had again sought him—for it was no small thing to be thus pitchforked into the headquarters staff—her sweet personality became interwoven with his fate at the precise moment the fickle goddess had smiled upon him. No wonder he furtively kissed the note before he stowed it away beneath the left lappel of his field tunic.

His scattered senses returned as he heard Lord Roberts say: "Mercier has done the best possible thing to help us. By retreating on Le Mans he would have forced us to pursue him. An advance on Paris must be regarded as suicidal with such an army on our flank. As it is, Massy's division and the fleet can hold him in check until our men have had a night's rest, and are fit to cross the Seine in pursuit. Be good enough, gentlemen, to see to it that an abundance of rations be issued, and that none but the most necessary duties be performed. We are quite safe from attack. Divisions will commence to cross the river tomorrow at 7 a.m. I will return from Havre about that hour. You, Alleyne, will make all arrangements for holding Rouen, and a strong corps of observation should be pushed forward five or six miles along the Paris road tonight."

A little later the assembly broke up, and after Harington had seen to the care of his gallant charger he was ready to attend the Commander-in-Chief and the Duke of York on their way to Havre.

Here they met Lord Charles Beresford. Telegrams from the front announced that two of Harington's scouts had recrossed the Seine to bring tidings of the steady advance of Mercier's corps, and the latest news showed that the French were in bivouac for the night at a point nearly opposite Yvetot.

* * * * *

At noon on June 3rd, over 250,000 British troops were so posted as to cut off General Mercier's line of retreat towards Le Mans, and at six o'clock the same evening Lord Charles Beresford, who, conjointly with the Duke of York, was intrusted with the defence of Havre, was informed of the French advance through the woods opposite Caudebec.

Each vessel in the fleet had sent half her crew and all her boats to the river, and when darkness shrouded the landscape in gloom, there was not a yard of water unpatrolled for a distance of nearly eight miles.

Mercier laid his plans well. Strong rafts were hastily knocked together and carried to the banks on gun carriages. At midnight a combined attempt was made to effect a crossing, and thenceforth a series of murderous affrays commenced between the sailors and the French. It was during those few terrible hours before dawn that the British navy suffered greater loss in men than resulted from any other engagement throughout the war.

Every combat was a personal one. Small parties of equal strength and determined courage attacked each other resolutely, and the swift current of the Seine carried out to sea many a ghastly token of the fury of the fight.

But daylight came at last and the weary sailors were able to leave the task of defence to Massy's division, which had now arrived.

Not a Frenchman had reached the opposite shore alive, and Mercier had lost a great number of men and even more valuable time in a fruitless enterprise.

Furious with rage, he brought up all his artillery and commenced to shell the opposing heights. But the fleet soon took a strong hand in this game. When the tide permitted, the gunboats and lighter cruisers stood into the estuary of the Seine and effectually engaged the French artillery, whilst the heavier ships threw shells far inland amongst the thick clusters of troops, who were compelled to stand galled and inactive beneath this fresh infliction.

And so the day wore, amidst wild galloping of the French staff and objectless movements of divisions and ceaseless attempts, ever becoming more faint-hearted, to cross the river.

As night came on the French leader received unmistakable tidings of Lord Roberts's advance. The pursuing army was now only four hours distant, and, to cap all else, a colossal mistake by the transport had resulted in a scarcity of ammunition for the Lebel rifle.

Provision had only been made for two days' operations, and the reserve was in Rouen!

Summoning his divisional commanders, Mercier told them the exact position of affairs. He concluded by announcing that if they failed to reach the north side of the river at the next attempt there was nothing left but to capitulate.

Digitized by Google

Nerved by his words, his subordinates swore that they would succeed, and every preparation was made for a tremendous effort on the lines adopted during the previous night.

British audacity, however, supplied another solution to the problem which distracted the French Commander-in-Chief and his Staff. At ten o'clock Alleyne led his division across the river. Without a moment's hesitation he forced in the French vedettes and delivered a strong assault upon the enemy's position. In the darkness the numbers of the French were of little avail. The fighting was mostly between regiments and brigades; with energetic purpose on the one side, and irresolute uncertainty on the other.

An hour later Lord Roberts's first division surprised the French rear, and when dawn broke over the scattered combatants, his second division had outflanked the enemy on the south-west.

The rapidly growing light showed the British position to be a very favourable one. Even under equal conditions they would probably have beaten the French after a severe fight. Lord Roberts knew that his opponents must be dispirited, but he did not know that they were practically disarmed.

He realised that the crucial point in the campaign had now been reached, and the severe physical and mental strain under which he had lived for many weeks, and especially during the past three days, rendered him haggard and pallid in the extreme.

But the indomitable spirit of the great soldier who is so loved by the rank and file of the British army sustained him even in this desperate moment, when the fortunes of England apparently trembled in the balance.

He proceeded quietly, if somewhat slowly, to give the necessary directions for a combined attack by all arms, but suddenly Harington cried: "An officer with a small escort is riding towards us with a flag of truce!"

The Commander-in-Chief's iron nerve did not desert him at this momentous intelligence. He examined the party carefully through his glasses before he said: "What is the meaning of it, I wonder?"

The French envoy was soon before him. Saluting respectfully, he said: "My name is General Forêt, and I am commissioned by the Commander-in-Chief to arrange terms of capitulation and thus prevent useless bloodshed."

"The only terms I can offer," replied Lord Roberts, "are those of unconditional surrender."

The Frenchman looked the Englishman squarely in the face ere he strove to utter a protest. But he saw that argument was useless with this slight, stern Briton, who gazed at him so resolutely with his steel-blue eyes.

Yet he clung to his mission to the last. "Surely," he went on, "in view of our superior numbers, and taking into consideration the fact that unfortunate circumstances alone prevent us from offering battle, in which case—I say it with all esteem for yourself and your brave troops—we would probably beat you, you should grant the officers liberty on parole and disband the army corps."

"It is impossible, sir," replied his lordship. "The conditions under which this war is fought do not permit of such terms being accorded. Do you refuse? I am about to order the advance."

General Forêt hesitated a moment before he uttered the fateful words: "My orders are to yield, unconditionally or otherwise." Then, as if to excuse himself, he cried, with tears of anger in his eyes: "France is ruined by her own acts. Our men are armed with empty rifles!"

The "Cease Fire" was sounded, and before night fell arrangements were in progress for the speedy transportation to England of this host of prisoners of war.

France had now lost over a million of her best troops.

(To be continued.)

The Pearson Idea

Is to give the public the most and best for the smallest; in other words, to give them high-class literature, and plenty of it, for a small sum.

A SHELF FULL OF BOOKS FOR 5s.

Our latest sensation in the way of cheap literature is our edition of the Romances of Sir Walter Scott. Entire set delivered to you free on payment of 5s. only, balance payable 5s. per month, making a total of 25s. only, or 1s. per volume.

Absolutely Complete. This edition of the Waverley Novels is absolutely complete, with all the original introductions and notes.

It is printed on good paper, in clear type, and each volume contains a Collotype Frontispiece, with book plate, title pages, binding, and devices in two colours, by James Allan Duncan.

It is issued in a decorative cloth binding, and the publishers have endeavoured to make this edition as pretty a series as possible. The Frontispiece in each volume will depict the principal heroine of the volume in question, such as Rebecca of "Ivanhoe," or Flora Melvor of "Waverley." The series consists of Twenty-five Volumes.

The cheapness, combined with the generous style of this series should render it an event to all lovers of class fiction, who ought certainly to find in it the edition of Scott which combines most advantages, including that of being the cheapest artistic edition ever published.

LIST OF VOLUMES:

Ivanhoe; Waverley; Guy Mannering; Old Mortality; Rob Roy; The Antiquary; The Heart of Midlothian; The Monastery; The Abbot; Kenilworth; The Pirate; Peveril of the Peak; The Bride of Lammermoor; The Legend of Montrose and Black Dwarf; The Fortunes of Nigel; Quentin Durward; St. Ronan's Well; Red Gauntlet; The Betrothed and Highland Widow; The Talisman; Woodstock; The Fair Maid of Perth; Anne of Geierstein; The Surgeon's Daughter and Castle Dangerous; Count Robert of Paris.

14,000 PAGES OF READING FOR 5s.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM.

The Publisher, C. Arthur Pearson, Limited, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

PLEASE send me the twenty-five volumes of the Waverley Novels, carriage paid, as advertised by you. I inclose 5s., and agree to make my next payment of 5s. when I receive the twenty-five volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole 25s., I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

A "Hero" and a "Martyr."

DAY by day he thought of it, and night by night he brooded upon it, till gradually there developed in his mind a direful purpose, born of a fixed idea that so often pushes the one possessed of it to success and fame, but still more often becomes the propelling agent to crime.

But to comprehend what follows we must go back a little—ten years—to the time when Jacques Fleurnois, a young and unknown physician, a native Marseillais, and without a sou in his pockets, had come to settle and practise his profession in Paris.

Cold and wet and semi-starvation were daily visitors to his garret in the Rue Nouvel before he could secure patients enough to provide for his simplest wants. Then one day, without the slightest warning, that fickle jade, Fortune, took a turn in his favour. Amelia Flint, an English maiden lady of mature age but ample means, true to thrifty instincts of her British nature, came to take up her quarters in the cheap little hotel where Dr. Fleurnois lodged, and to "do" Paris at her leisure.

Taken suddenly ill one night, a physician was needed in haste, and Dr. Fleurnois was called. He was as shrewd as skilful, and Miss Flint as susceptible as the rest of her sex who had reached forty years without suffering from a touch of Cupid's dart. He was ten years her junior, but what did that matter when she had a hundred thousand pounds secure in her own right, was absolutely alone in the world without a single living relative, and exactly the wife for a needy wooer?

In six weeks' time, so well did the Doctor exert his fascinating powers, Miss Amelia Flint, spinster, had become Mdme. Jacques Fleurnois.

Suffering and privation were of course gone for ever, but, alas for the plans of the happy bridegroom, he had forgotten to reckon in his calculation the fact that his wife was not a fool.

He had wanted and expected to get absolute possession of her money in making Miss Flint his wife, but Amelia, though willing to commit the folly of marrying a foreigner ten years her junior, had a clear head for business.

She held fast her property, both principal and interest, though she agreed to the securing of her income to her husband for life should he chance to survive her, the bulk of her property to be distributed at his death according to her will.

She cared for his comfort, looked after his home, catered to his taste, and made him a handsome allowance, but neither caresses nor wrath could induce her to sign over to him any portion of her estate.

One might almost say that she knew or felt instinctively the important factor her wealth presented in the maintenance of the peace and happiness of her home life.

He had married her for her money, and he did not get it, at least, not all. He hated his wife for this and, as I say, a direful purpose began to develop in his mind, a purpose all the stronger and more determined because, as the years passed on, Dr. Fleurnois fancied himself on the verge of an important medical discovery, which money was required to perfect—money by the thousand francs—and which could not be saved from his allowance or his wife's judiciously invested income.

Again and again he had appealed to his wife and urged her to peril her property in behalf of this enterprise, but persuasion, tenderness, anger, and threats—and turn by turn, he tried them all—were equally unavailing. Madame Fleurnois had been poor herself once, and never again, if she could help it, should the bitter bread of poverty be pressed to her lips. Her money was safe in sound Treasury bonds, and there it should stay. Such threats, too, as he persisted, would speedily oblige her to appeal to the protection of the British consul.

"And then, mon cher mari," said she, looking her husband full in the face, "I should go back to my own country and leave you to your own devices. A good home and a comfortable living, as you have, is worth at least a civil tongue in your head; I'd advise you to keep it."

The little conjugal tempest had left its mark, though Fleurnois was too alive to his own interests to permit it to stand long in the way of a reconciliation with his wife.

A drive in the Bois, a little dinner in the Café Anglais, and to all appearances the Fleurnois household had settled again to its former peaceful train.

In the husband's mind, however, was that ever malignant and darkening purpose. His invention absorbed his entire thoughts; the money needed for its developement he longed for as hungrily as a starving animal longs for a bone.

If only his wife could be brought to reason, or only be brought—to die. The terms of the marriage contract assured him her entire income, and, perhaps, after all, she had made no will.

* * * * *

The cholera was now raging in Europe, had reached Marseilles, and was suspected at Havre. Paris was tremulous with apprehension, nobody could be certain where its ravages would end or where next the dread plague would fasten its tentacles. Still, in spite of the rapidly growing shadow of a terrible epidemic, Dr. Fleurnois thoughts hovered always about the malignant idea that had now taken entire possession of him. Naturally, from wishing his wife's death to laying plans to accomplish it was only a step, and a step easily taken.

Poison must be the means, poison that left no traces before or after death, for, like all criminals of his calibre, Jacques Fleurnois was afraid of the law.

Sitting one morning reading the daily bulletin of the progress of the cholera plague, the following paragraph in a treatise upon the subject by a well-known authority caught his attention:—

"Timidity and fright," said the great authority, "in the handling of the plague, was doubly to be deprecated, for the reason that it not only predisposed persons to the contract of the disease, but also because it blinded justice and assisted crime; briefly, the effects and symptoms of certain mineral poisons were exactly similar to those of the first stages of the cholera disease, and therefore

Digitized by Google

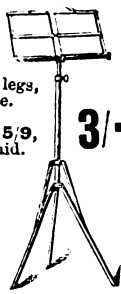
ORGANETTES! 4/- MONTHLY

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Hornpipes, &c. A mere child can play it. Cash or easy payments. List of tunes and full particulars free.

DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

Who would be without a

MUSIC STAND



Folding and Portable, Square legs, Gold bronzed, very durable.

3/- parcel post free. Two for 5/9, Three for 8/6. Carriage Paid.

3/-

Send for Catalogue A, Post Free, for Band Instruments, Fittings, Strings, &c.

Joseph Riley & Sons, Constitution Hill, Birmingham.

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

DINN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £300 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

and 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

£100 in Prizes

1st Prize, £25; 2nd, £20; 3rd, £15; 4th, £10; 5th, £5; and 25 Prizes of £1 each.

CASH PRIZES, as above, will be given away as an advertisement for PRAIRIE POWDERS, the unequalled pleasant and harmless remedy for Headache, Neuralgia, Nervousness, Rheumatism, and Tic, among competitors who succeed in turning into the names of five common ailments the following letters:

ACHEHEDA, GANRLEUAI, ESNUOVSRENS, HEMSATIMUR, ITC.

Post your solution, together with a Stamped Addressed Envelope, for result, to

THE PRAIRIE POWDER CO., Dept. 40, 19 Borough, London, S.E.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

Digitized by Google

such poisons feloniously administered would produce—as many times he believed they had—a death that was really a murder, but that passed unnoticed and unsuspected. It was well to be warned."

Jacques Fleurnois read the passage again carefully, laid the paper aside, and two hours later announced to his wife that he had made up his mind.

"I'm ashamed of myself," said he: "I ought to have gone before; I'm a Marseillais and I'm going now, at once, to volunteer my services for duty in my native town; the cholera is hourly increasing there, and the Government has issued an appeal for all the skilful attendance that Paris can spare. You, of course, will remain here——"

"Remain here, Jacques—I!" exclaimed Madame Fleurnois, surprised. "Certainly not; I shall go with you. Someone must look after your food and the proper condition of your home to keep you in health for your work. I'm a doctor's wife, and a doctor's wife's place is at her husband's side. I go, and that settles it."

Dr. Fleurnois had calculated upon this decision and laid his plans accordingly.

His wife, he said, was right; cleanliness and good nourishment were two-thirds the battle, in his opinion, and she certainly would be of great assistance to him if she was not afraid, etc., etc.

Two days later the thing was done, and they were installed in a comfortable little apartment in the healthiest and airest part of the town, with a stout, strong-armed bonne to wait upon them.

Neither husband nor wife seemed to fear the infection, and so, for nearly a fortnight, their stay in the dirty and pest-ridden city passed without a break or special incident in their busy lives. Then the epidemic began to abate, the cases grew fewer, and deaths less frequent, and Mdme. Fleurnois began to talk of the return to Paris.

For two days now everything had been bright and cheerful. The sultry heat of September had fled before a rapidly freshening sea-breeze that seemed to sweep from its path all illness and death, and this morning Mdme. Fleurnois had gone to the Cannebière market to lay in a stock of flowers. She stayed so long that the Doctor, apparently impatient for breakfast, at last touched the bell, and told the bonne to bring in the coffee—he would wait no longer.

He really had seen from the window his wife returning, though he did not say so, as he hurried Toinettei with the plates and coffee-pot, and when she had gone again to the kitchen for hot milk to fill up the cups, he hastily dropped the contents of a little white paper that he took from his pocket into the sugar already placed in the cup for his wife.

He had scarcely resumed his seat and his paper when she entered the room, her hands full of flowers, and a face of concern that she had kept her husband waiting so long.

"I am truly half-starved," she cried, "and you were right, Jacques, not to wait for me longer. There's a man too, from the board of physicians, calling for you down stairs at the door."

And the Doctor, anxious as he was to see his wife drink the coffee, was obliged to rise and go and see what the messenger wanted, while Mdme. Fleurnois threw off her bonnet, laid aside her flowers, and took her seat at the table.

As she did so, she glanced with the instinct of a housekeeper at her husband's cup; something was floating on the liquid, an insect of some kind shaken probably from her roses, and helplessly bobbing about in the steaming fluid. She took up a spoon and lifted it out, but spilled the coffee into the saucer as she did it in a way that still more offended her fastidious eye.

Really it was too bad! What a mess she had made of it. And not time, with Jacques so hurried, to have a fresh cup drawn for him. Ah! she had it—she didn't mind for once a splash or two, while Jacques was always so particular.

The exchange was made, the coffee drunk, and Mdme. Fleurnois all ready to help her husband to a fresh piece of omelet when he returned to the table, as he did in a moment, to swallow his coffee at a gulp and hastily excuse himself.

Fresh cases had broken out in the suburbs and he must go at once. He wouldn't return for lunch, but she could look for him for dinner."

And the Doctor, with a strange, wild glance at his wife's empty cup, turned and was gone.

Left alone, Mdme. Fleurnois fidgeted and pottered about the neat little apartment, and finally went into the kitchen to make a strong stock soup for dinner.

Jacques didn't seem well, she thought, and would be sure to neglect his lunch and need something strengthening. How white he looked, too, poor fellow, when he went away.

And all day long the wild eyes and drawn lines of her husband's face, as she had seen him last, haunted her memory and made her restless.

Six, seven, eight, and far into the night, the little table with its flowers and its delicate larded roast remained set and waiting for the master who did not come.

Instead there came with daylight a rap at the door, and a messenger from the Prefect of the Police apprising her that her husband would never return.

Dr. Fleurnois was dead, seized by the plague that he had fought so gallantly and so far with impunity.

They could not send for her, of course, and in accordance with sanitary laws then in force, she could not even claim the body.

"A hero and a martyr, madame," the Prefect added, "to the cause of suffering humanity."

To-day, as a "hero and martyr," Mdme. Fleurnois continues to mourn her husband, and to view with pride the Medal of Honour sent her as his representative, which hung in her prim little drawing-room in the prim little New England village to which she speedily returned. She remembers nothing but the days of self-devotion and self-sacrifice that they spent together in plague-ridden Marseilles, and is happily still ignorant of the fact that she owes her own escape from death at the hero's hands to the simple accident of an insect in a cup of coffee.

M. ALDERSON.

THE £100 PRIZE

In "Pearson's Weekly" Football Competition has been won altogether three times this season. This competition is simplicity itself, and you should certainly go in for it.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

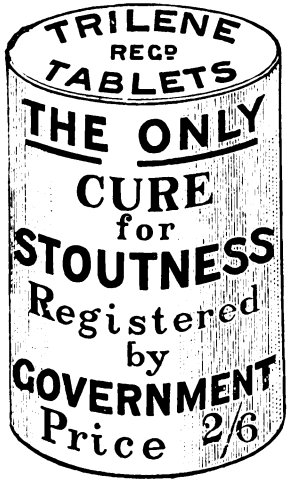
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

Miss S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

Mrs. F. HARPER, 61 Portland Crescent, Leeds, writes: "My doctor persuaded me to try a box, and I find they have done my breathing a lot of good and I can get about much better. My doctor did not wish his name mentioned, but they have done him good personally."

A. BROWN, of 25 Edwin Street, High Pallion, Sunderland, says: "You have no idea what a most wonderful effect the Tablets had. I am a great deal thinner, and better in health."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Rischolme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe diets, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if the had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity.

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cumbridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I think you on his account."

Mrs. JAMES SMITH, of Cowell Terrace, Soham, says: "Your 2s. 6d. box of Tablets reduced my weight 12lb."

Mrs. WOOD, 447 Cowbridge Road, Canton, Cardiff, says: "Tablets have a most marked effect, and I shall take every opportunity to make known the wonders of your remedy."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lanes, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

"Miss HUMPHREYS, of Claremont Buildings, Shrewsbury, has lost 1st. in weight already, and thinks the Tablets do every success."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 39 inches. I hope soon to be 42. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess G. FURSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 5lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Miss J. GUISE, 3 North End, Croydon, says: "I cannot speak too highly of the Tablets; I was stout as my life until a few weeks ago, when I first began your treatment. I was surprised to find they acted so admirably. I am now getting quite a slender figure, besides being better in health."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

I'VE FOUND IT AT LAST.

I would particularly call the attention of every reader to the offer on page 654. If you have not already read the conditions under which the £50 is distributed, you ought certainly to do so at once. A sovereign is not to be sneezed at nowadays, especially when it may be obtained practically for the asking. The names of those people selected are taken not only from directories, but from the previous lists of prize-winners in Short Stories, and from many other sources in which your own name may possibly appear. "Of course," you will say, "it is not likely that I shall be chosen." Well, perhaps not. Still, on the other hand, it is quite possible that your name may be down to receive a sovereign, and if on looking through the list of people who would have received the money had they applied, you find your own cognomen in all the glory of type, you would have very good cause to wish you had taken your Editor's advice, and sent along a postcard.

G. J. T.—There are about 70,000 more words in the English language than in the French, German, Spanish, and Italian put together.

H. M. T. wants to know which is the most popular name for British fishing-boats.———"Mary." There are no fewer than a thousand vessels round our coasts bearing this name.

D. E. K.—Eating hair is certainly a disgusting habit, but one far more popular than you would suppose. Many girls bite off the ends of their hair and chew them in the same way as certain folk find solace in biting their finger-nails. Some time ago a British medical man found four pounds of hair in the stomach of a woman about thirty years old.

L. J.—I have never seen jackets of fish skins in this country, but they are widely used amongst the Esquimaux of Alaska. The Dolly Varden is the fish utilised, and the skin is prettily decorated with red spots.

M. G. H. would like to know when the "new woman" first made her appearance.———It would be difficult to say, for even Isaiah the prophet, who lived more than 2,500 years ago, complained that the women of his time overstepped the old rules and customs of their sex. In ancient Greece the question was constantly cropping up. Aristophanes, the comic poet, had many a hit at the women of his day, and in his "Ecclesiazusæ" he showed them on the stage, dressed as men, transacting the business of the state, and deciding on a community of goods—and of husbands.

P. S. B. has a dim recollection of hearing somewhere or the other about a regiment of soldiers being selected according to the shape of their noses. He would be glad if I can tell him if there is indeed such a regiment, and, if so, where.———Probably the one you are thinking of is a regiment of infantry of the guards in the Russian Army, founded by the Emperor Paul. That gentleman was the possessor of a typical Kalmuck nose of the most excruciatingly uptilted pattern, and, since then, out of compliment to him, all the officers and men of that particular regiment have noses of the same shape. The sight which they present when on parade is, as you may suppose, somewhat startling.

J. F. B.—You are right; many old glass bottles are ground up and used in the manufacture of mortar instead of sand. The reason is that it binds much better.

H. S.—Copper, brass, zinc, and silver are fatal enemies to microbes, so that if you want to abolish the festive microbe you have only to drop a piece of either of these metals on it. Pure gold, when cleaned and purified, will have no effect.

A. F.—No pictures are hung on the walls of the Louvre, in Paris, until the artist has been dead ten years.

F. M. G.—Yes, it is quite possible to plunge your bare hand into a basin of water without wetting it, by means of spreading a layer of lycopodium powder upon the surface of the water, which prevents all contact of the water with the hand.

Rechabite. — No, the temperance society you mention is not the oldest in the world. There is at least one that can boast of greater antiquity, and that is the abstaining commune of Achlyka, in Siberia, all of whose members are strict teetotalers every day in the year—except one.

L. D. H.—A general election in France differs from our election in many ways a great deal more than that it is fought on Sunday. For instance, all men when they have attained their majority are registered voters, whether they are householders or not. Everyone qualified is inscribed on a poll list, and is armed with an electoral card, giving his name, profession, and his passport of citizenship; this also serves for purposes of identity. Each card is numbered and corresponds with the number on the register. When a voter enters the polling station he gives up his electoral card, the number is compared with the number in the register, and when his identity is established he is allowed to vote. Before the card is returned to him an official tears off a corner of it, which renders it useless. This precaution renders fraudulent voting exceedingly difficult.

Swede writes in reference to the marriage customs of Sweden, dealt with in a recent number of S.S., to say that the bride is seldom loaded with all kinds of ornaments, although she may wear occasionally a belt of silver, with articles suspended from it, and that the struggle between the married and unmarried guests has been abolished for some time.

Cissie.—Yes, there were men dressmakers before Worth. The first celebrity who made his mark in this particular line was Rhömberg, the son of a Bavarian peasant from the neighbourhood of Munich.

Moses writes: "Is there any period in the year during which no actual night occurs in England?"———Yes, from May 22nd to July 21st. Twilight lasts until the sun has disappeared eighteen degrees below the horizon, and during these sixty-one days this limit is never passed. There is, therefore, no actual night.

N. J.—German women do not go in for the "Women's Movement," and have very little sympathy with new ideas. In this they are unlike the men. There are twenty-six and a half million women in the Empire, and as the sexes are fairly equal in numbers, it is perhaps well for the men that they restrict their energies to the home circle.

N. M. W.—The navy of Persia consists of one dispatch vessel—the Persepolis—of 1,200 tons and ten knots speed. She is armed with five small breech-loading guns. Egypt has no efficient war-ships at all.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,, ...	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 22nd, if intended for the Issue on sale Dec. 6th, and dated Dec. 10th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KITTY—"None of your soft soap, Pat."
PAT—"No, darlin', it's WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSORR I've brought ye."

The Cheapest, Purest, most Economical Soap made in this Country is

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER.

It does the work QUICKLY.
It does the work CHEAPLY.
It does the work THOROUGHLY.

Lathers Freely in the Hardest Water,

and is equally successful in the Household as in the Laundry.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER
IS A FULL-WEIGHT SOAP.

Each Tablet weighs SIXTEEN OUNCES as against Twelve Ounces in the Short-Weight Soaps.

OF ALL GROCERS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

A 16-ounce tablet for 3d. equals 3 l. per lb.
A 12-ounce tablet for 2½d. equals 3½d per. lb.

A 16-ounce tablet for 3½d. equals 3½d. per lb.
A 12-ounce tablet for 3d. equals 4d. per lb.

AT ALL STORES.

SOLID SILVER
£21 TEA & COFFEE SERVICES
(Or £21 IN CASH)
AS FREE PRIZES.

THIS IS A BONA FIDE COMPETITION.

PERFECTLY FREE. NO ENTRANCE FEE. NO DIVISION.

WE WILL PRESENT ONE OF THESE TEA AND COFFEE SERVICES TO EACH PURCHASER OF

The "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK,

who fills in correctly the missing letters in the words below, relating to the "Onrios" Dream Book.

1. THE O----S B--K OF D--M I----------S
2. E---------Y E--D AND I---------D
3. WILL A----D YOU A F---------S D---------N OF YOUR F----E
4. AN I---------E A-----R TO YOUR P---------Y
5. WILL S----Y L--D YOU TO U---------E F-----E

The "Onrios" Book of Dream Interpretations is a handy publication, beautifully bound and illustrated, and will afford you a faultless definition of your future. It is an infallible adviser to your prosperity, and will surely lead you to undeniable fortune.

WHAT TO DO.—When you have found what you think are the missing letters, write the words out on a sheet of paper, numbering them 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, as above, and send same to us, with a P.O. (not stamps) for 2s., and stamped addressed envelope for results, and we will forward to you, post free, a copy of the "Onrios" Dream Book. (Foreign orders 3s., payable in London.) We offer the above prizes to purchasers of our Book, in order to make this remarkable publication known to the public, and we are prepared to expend some thousands of pounds on this method of advertising our unique Dream Book.

REMEMBER, EACH ONE who correctly fills in the missing letters will receive a Solid Silver Tea and Coffee Service, value £21. These Services are of Solid Sterling Silver (Hall-marked), and consist of a 2½ pint Coffee Pot, price £7 10s.; 2 pint Tea Pot, £6 10s.; Full-size Sugar Basin, £4; Full Size Cream Jug, £3—Tea and Coffee Service, £21. They are manufactured and catalogued by one of the best-known London Silversmiths, and cannot be purchased for less than £21. As a proof of this, should you be a winner, we will give you one of the above Tea and Coffee Services, OR THE CASH whichever you prefer.

The "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK (COPYRIGHT) is a book which will tell you the meaning of all your dreams, and may thus be the means of guiding you to the acquisition of Fame and Fortune. This book is a translation of old Arabic, Hebrew, Persian, etc., Oneirological manuscripts, parchments, and scrolls, which have come into our possession, some of them dating as far back as 379 B.C. It is a high-class publication, beautifully printed and bound, with 19 Engravings of well-known pictures by some of the Greatest Masters. These pictures alone are worth more than the price we ask for the book. Everyone, whether they be in the highest or lowest station in life, should possess this Marvellous Book. Nothing like it has ever been published before.

DO NOT DELAY, but send AT ONCE for the "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK, and grasp this opportunity to win one of these beautiful solid Silver Tea and Coffee Services, as a certain portion of the issue will be reserved for Foreign and Colonial orders. Write your name and full address very distinctly, and put the name of this paper on the top of your letter. Keep the number of your Postal Order in case it goes astray. This competition will close on December 30th, 1898. The solution of this Competition has been sealed and deposited with Messrs. Hibberd, Wall Street, London, N. Prizes will be awarded and results posted within the following week.

YOU CAN HAVE THE SILVER SERVICE AT ONCE

before the Competition closes. Full particulars regarding this will be sent you with the "ONRIOS" DREAM BOOK.

Please address your letter to THE "ONRIOS" PUBLISHING CO., SYDNEY AVENUE, MOOR LANE, LONDON, E.C.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED PUREST & BEST.

EXTRA REFINED THEREFORE NO WASTE

NO BETTER IN THE MARKET

DICKSON'S SCOTCH BEEF SUET

GAINED HIGHEST REWARD AT COOKERY EXHIBITION 1897.

One lb will go as far as two lbs of ordinary suet.

Sold at all stores & throughout the United Kingdom.

THOS. DICKSON & SON, LTD. EDINBURGH.

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH.

WARNING TO LADIES.

BEWARE of POLISHES containing injurious ACIDS which RUIN your metals & SPOIL your HANDS.

TEST

TRY IT ON A PENNY. Dab a small quantity of Polish on a penny and leave it overnight IF it contains ACID, it will turn quite green by the following morning. BUT "MATCHLESS" WON'T!

FREE FROM ACID POISON OR GRIT.
LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD.
PATON, CALVERT & Co. MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL

ZEBRA Grate Polish.

In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

£25 FOR JONESES ONLY. See inside.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 517. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 26TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

"MATCHLESS"

WARNING TO LADIES.

BEWARE of POLISHES containing injurious ACIDS which RUIN your metals & SPOIL your HANDS.

TEST

TRY IT ON A PENNY.- Dab a small quantity of Polish on a penny & leave it overnight. If it contains ACID, it will turn quite green by the following morning. BUT "MATCHLESS" WON'T!

FREE FROM ACID, POISON OR GRIT

LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD

METAL POLISH.

PATON, CALVERT & Co MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL.

LYLE'S PURE SOLUBLE COCOA

GUARANTEED TO BE THE PRODUCT OF THE FINEST COCOA BEANS.

ABRAM LYLE & SONS LTD MAKERS OF LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP.

ALFOSCO REG. ALLEN FOSTER AND CO., ALFOSCO REG.

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

"ALFOSCO" JACKETS & COSTUMES.

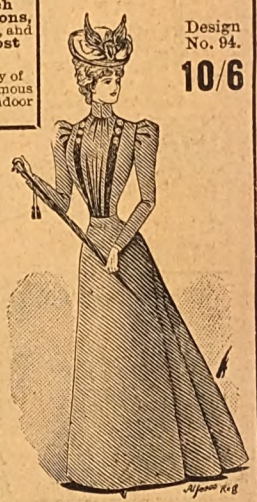
The "ALFOSCO" JACKETS and CAPES are recommended by thousands of delighted customers, who acknowledge them to be GREATLY SUPERIOR in MAKE, STYLE, and VALUE to any Garments they have ever seen at anything approaching the same prices.

New Sketch Book of Fashions, Order Forms, and Patterns Post Free.

A Large Variety of Styles in our Famous Half-Guinea Indoor Costumes.

Design No. 950. 6/11

Design No. 94. 10/6



PATTERNS AND SKETCHES POST FREE.

Design No. 950. 6/11.

Great Value! Look at the Jackets! Look at the Price. Allen Foster & Co. offer to the Public a Special Line in this Jacket. Order at once. Price only 6/11 (carriage 6d. extra). The Jacket is made in heavy President Cloth, Black, Brown, and Green. In ordering give measurements round bust under arms.

Design No. 94. 10/6.

Velvet Trimmed Costume Consists of fashionably made Skirt and Bodice, tight fitting at back with full front, tastefully trimmed with Velvet and Buttons. Great Value for Money. This Costume is made in the Specialite Serge, all colours, 10/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra.

'XMAS, 1898.

AMAZING OFFER! FREE 'XMAS GIFT.

Allen Foster & Co. are presenting a DIAMOND BROOCH, consisting of seven beautifully cut imitation Diamonds, in chaste gilt setting, as a 'XMAS PRESENT to every purchaser of their goods mentioning this Journal.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

HOMES BRIGHTER.

AS SUPPLIED TO THE QUEEN

FOR ALL CLEANSING PURPOSES ~

THE GREAT DIRT EXTRACTER

BORAX

THE QUEENS BOROK PATENT ROYAL

EXTRACT OF SOAP

IS "PERFECTION"

MAKES LINEN WHITE AS SNOW AND ALL CLOTHING SWEET AS NEW MOWN HAY.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE

LABOURS LIGHTER.

The READIEST WRITER

. . THE . .

"RELIANCE" Fountain Pen,

Fitted with 14-carat Gold Nib (Iridium Tipped), Fine, Medium, or Broad Points.

Double Feed, Handsome Chased Vulcanite Holder.

THIS PEN WILL LAST FOR YEARS

EVERY PEN GUARANTEED.

WILL NOT GET OUT OF ORDER.

Sold at 10/6.

We send this pen, complete in box, with filler and directions, post free for 5/-

WONDERFUL VALUE.

THE RELIANCE PEN CO. LIMITED

26 IVY LANE, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Reduced Facsimile

REMEMBER, a 10/6 FOUNTAIN PEN for 5/-

Agents Wanted.

Reduced Facsimile

WHELPTON'S PURIFYING PILLS.

SIXTY YEARS' SUCCESS.

8, 14, or 33 stamps.

3 CRANE COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C

For Indigestion, Headache, Biliousness, Constipation, Invaluable for Ladies.

8840

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations.

In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

MANDOLINES.

FINE ITALIAN MODELS, 13 Red Maple Ribs, 7s. 6d.; Brown and White Ribs, 10s. 6d.; GENUINE ITALIAN, with 15 Maple Ribs, 15s. 6d.; ditto, 17 Rosewood Ribs, 17s.; 19 Rosewood Ribs, Pearl Inlaid, 24s.; ditto, superior, Closed Machine, 30s. Magnificent De Meglio Model, Rosewood, 50s.; ditto, superior, 63s. Genuine De Meglio, finest-toned instrument made, £5 15s. For cases, strings and pick, see list post free. All with machine heads and bent sound boards. Crate and carr. free.

JOSEPH RILEY'S, ON CONSTITUTION HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

THE "ENGLISH" ORGANETTE

EASY PAYMENTS.

With Expression Stop.

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Polkas Waltzes, Horn Pipes, etc.; any tune can be played with Artistic effect by anyone

A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

PRICE 30/- TERMS 4/- DEPOSIT AND 4/- MONTHLY

Organette delivered when first 4s. is Paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. (Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

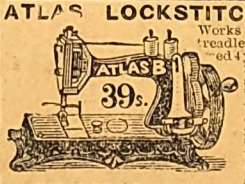
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 186a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

No. 517. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending
November 26, 1898.

THE BLACK KNIGHT.

PRINCESS MYRA KOLJASSOW was in the habit of passing the winter months every year in Berlin. There were various reasons for this.

She was not content to be in St. Petersburg, nor at her estates in the Crimea; she did not like Russia—hated it, in fact

She was a Berliner by birth, and a rich Russian prince, whom she had met at one of the court balls, had chosen her, on account of her rare beauty, to be his wife.

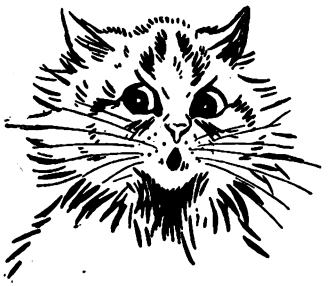
Naturally she could not refuse him. She was as poor as a church mouse; next to the youngest of eight children, and the countess' coronet that rested on her glorious dark hair forbade her seeking a way out of her poverty by her own exertion.

For two seasons Countess Myra Hildhausen had reigned as queen of beauty, and had had an unusual number of admirers, but no earnest wooer; and at the beginning of the third season she metamorphosed herself into the Princess Myra Koljassow with millions at her command.

Prince Dimitri Koljassow was not a very agreeable man; he was moody and tyrannical. Myra had to use wiles and coquetry, and degrade herself by many devices which, strictly speaking, were

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google



beneath her dignity, in order to keep him in good humour and his pocket open.

Nevertheless, she was content with her lot.

"You know I have no heart, mamma; that I don't know what love is; I don't believe that it exists; that I have striven to catch a rich husband so that I might have money to spend and satisfy all my desires."

She said this in a confidential talk with her mother, the old Countess, who lived in a pretty apartment near the Tiergarten, one that was worthy of her social position, and the rent of which came out of Dimitri's pocket.

The old Countess was a small, nervous woman, who was afraid of about every thing in the world, and of her son-in-law, Prince Koljassow, beyond all else.

"I cannot understand where Myra got the courage to marry him," she once said to her maid, in whom she had confided for many years, "nor how I ever managed to have such a daughter. It almost seems like witchcraft. Just compare all my other children with Princess Koljassow, dear Schmiedeck, particularly my youngest daughter Countess Melitta."

"Dear Schmiedeck," was of the opinion that the Princess was more of a demon than a woman, but she was wise enough to hold her tongue. Countess Melitta was the only one of the eight children who had stayed at home with her mother to care for her, and to be a companion to her. The others, that is, the girls, were judiciously distributed among rich relations; each one possessing her little drawing-room accomplishment, with which she, in some measure, paid for the hospitality shown her.

Melitta alone was without a talent, and not nearly as pliable as her sisters, rather austere in fact. Perhaps this was the reason why the old Countess clung to her more than to the others. She could always depend upon Melitta, and in her intercourse with her the girl showed an affectionate tenderness that the old lady missed from her other children. Her brothers and sisters looked upon the youngest as a sort of Cinderella, and in no respect equal to themselves. The brothers, indeed, appreciated her housekeeping when they came home on leave from their different military academies, and condescendingly dubbed her "a good creature." But that was all. On the other hand, they all looked up with respect to Myra, "the child of fortune."

Only the old Countess doubted Myra's happiness; and with maternal anxiety she would ply her again and again with questions during her stay in the Tiergarten villa, in regard to the details of her inner and outer life, but she always received the same answer: "I am content with my lot."

Princess Myra spoke the truth. She had no heart. The old Countess acknowledged it to herself one day when she sat at the tea-table with her daughter, who had arrived from St. Petersburg only a few days before. Myra had been talking of her adventures, of her triumphs, had told stories of men who had done the wildest deeds through love of her, and some of whom, in consequence, had gone to ruin. While the old Countess opened her eyes wide with horror, Myra laughed at her, and every now and then the sharp, white teeth crunched down on a piece of cake, and she marked the time of a few bars of "Madame Angôt" on the edge of the table with her spoon.

"So it is, mamma! It is not my fault that poor Marcel d'Aubray fell in the duel. Why did he anger Dimitri by admiring me too openly?"

"Because you are a coquette," answered Melitta, who was just passing through the room. "Because you play with human beings as if they were puppets. Tell her that it is despicable, mamma; and that she will rue it bitterly some day."

"Melitta is right," the old lady corroborated, fired by the earnestness of her favourite daughter. "Poor Marcel! He was so handsome in his white uniform, and his grave, brown eyes were so full of love for you. I believe he will come to you in your last hour, Myra, with others, perhaps, of whom I know nothing, and make it hard for you to die."

"Spare me your sermons!" cried the Princess angrily. "I am mistress of my own doings, and do not fear their consequences. There are only two things I do fear—age and satiety, and these are both still far off."

Just then the piquant, mouse-like face of the French maid appeared at the opening of the copper-coloured portières that shut off the next room.

"Your Highness, the hairdresser! He says he can wait no longer."

"You have indeed kept the man waiting a long time, Myra," the old Countess observed.

"Nonsense, mamma; a hairdresser is no one, and he must learn to wait, 'c'est son métier!' I have no intention of leaving this tea-table until I have enjoyed my second cup."

There was an artistic confusion in the next room, the boudoir of the Princess. Parts of the brilliant costume in which the handsome Princess was to shine at the masked ball at the embassy, lay scattered about over all the furniture. The wax candles in the high brackets in front of the dressing-table were already lighted, and the hairdresser stood near in a respectful attitude. He did not lift his eyes from the ground until the rustle of a woman's skirts were audible. Melitta had come in in her noiseless fashion.

"I am sorry you have had to wait so long. You should have sat down," she said kindly.

"The gracious Countess is too good. I hope that the Princess will be ready for me soon, as my time will be up in a quarter of an hour."

What an agreeable voice the man had, and how genteel he looked in his black suit! "Irene would paint him as Childe Harold," said Melitta to herself, thinking of the most talented of her sisters, and her liking for Byronic figures. She studied the tall, handsome figure for a few seconds with objective interest, and the pale, oval face, with the thoughtful expression about the eyes and mouth. Perhaps this man, like so many of fortune's step-children, had been born to something higher, and was suffering now under the slave's chains that bound him down.

"Your business is not an easy one," she said hesitatingly.

The shadow of a smile crept over his face. "It, too, has its pleasant moments," he answered; and though his tone was perfectly respectful, his speaking brown eyes said plainly: "This is one of them!"

Melitta felt that she blushed, and an expression of disapproval came over her face. She turned to go, and said coldly, without looking round, "I will tell the Princess that your time is nearly up."

Digitized by Google

Then the graceful figure, with the fine, intelligent face, that had called up the forbidden light of admiration in the man's eyes, disappeared, and a moment later Princess Koljassow rustled into the room. She did not look at the hairdresser, but at herself, as she sat before the mirror, giving her orders.

"I wish my hair dressed to suit the rôle of Cleopatra," she said listlessly. "Have you had instructions to that effect?"

"I have received minute instructions from the court hairdresser, Your Highness."

A flood of raven black hair, loosed from its bonds, fell down over the snow-white dressing gown. With such material to work with much may be accomplished. The classic coiffure, on which the golden fillets were artistically arranged, soon crowned the beautiful head. Princess Myra was a perfect Cleopatra, when, an hour after, she went to say good-bye to the old Countess. Her costume was dazzlingly beautiful and costly, copied faithfully, to the smallest detail, from a Parisian fashion-plate. The old Countess, however, thought it rather immodest, but she learnt from her daughter that she was old-fashioned, and had no idea of the spirit of the age.

"Others show more of their figure than I, without being favoured by fortune, as I have been," said Princess Myra fretfully, as she went off. "Dimitri said so only lately."

* * * * *

The fashionable masked ball had reached its height when Cleopatra entered the hotel of the embassy. She had driven thither in her own elegant troika, familiar to all Berlin (as her husband always liked her to drive three horses) and had been received there with flattering distinction. She had been made much of as the poor Countess Hildhausen, now, as the rich, independent married woman, she reigned supreme in the world of beauty and pleasure.

The Cleopatra costume of the Princess (who wished to be, and was recognised at once, in spite of her black half-mask), was universally admired; all the more, as it suited her bewitching and dangerous style of beauty so admirably. Princess Myra was forced to listen to numerous compliments, in which there was much exaggeration and little wit. She enjoyed them for the first half hour. The social triumphs of several years had blunted the freshness of the sensation, and she now saw with horror, although no one yet guessed it, the demon of satiety creeping nearer. "Not yet! It is still far enough off," she said to herself. "I still enjoy my diamonds, dancing and playing with human hearts."

"Let us dance," she said to her partner, as an inspiring waltz of Strauss began, and then she noticed that Chamberlain von Boethlingh in his artistic brigand costume no longer stood by her chair, but another in his place—a Spanish knight, tall and slender, dressed all in black, wearing the Calatrava order of the Cistercians on his breast. She did not recognise him for the minute, but was sure he must belong to her circle of acquaintances, for he offered her his arm, and led her to the dance. And how he danced! Princess Myra knew that she had never met him in a ball-room before. She would have been sure to have remembered his unusually light and yet firm way of holding her, and the peculiar rhythm of his motions. She was sorry when the waltz was over, and she asked her partner as he took her back to her seat if he would not lift his mask for her, using, as she spoke, the familiar "thou" of the carnival.

"No, Cleopatra," he answered. "It would not be worth while for thee, for I am no Antinous."

"But, perhaps a Cæsar?" she asked mockingly, angered by the sneer in his voice.

"No; nor that either. I have not come to fight with you, and you possess nothing that I think worth my striving for!"

His voice was cold, and seemed familiar to her. His dark eyes shone behind his mask, and reminded her of Marcel's, who had died for her.

"You are trying to rouse my curiosity," she said, bravely repressing a slight shudder; "but that is love's labour lost."

"You should not use the word love, oh queen! Your lips, whose wonderful beauty I acknowledge, change it into a serpent."

"What do you mean by that?"

"That you have no heart, Cleopatra; that you are superficial, egotistical and pitiless; in short, all that a true woman is not."

The Egyptian queen breathed heavily.

"And who or what art thou that darest overstep, in this unheard of manner, the limits of carnival license, already sufficiently vague?"

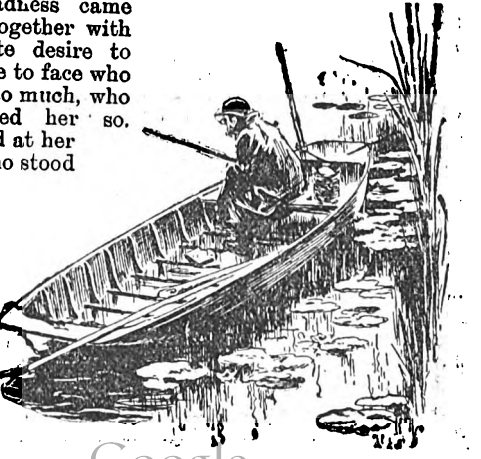
"I speak the truth," he answered coldly, "and dare speak it since I am not one of your vassals. I am a free man, who seeks not for your favour, and who uses the carnival license to show you that there are armours which your charms are powerless to pierce."

Princess Myra thought her anger would stifle her. "If my husband were here he would answer you better than I am able to," she hissed between her teeth. "Luckily, I do not lack for friends who will act for me."

"And whom, in gratitude for their devotion, you will expose to your husband's deadly weapon," he continued cold-bloodedly. "Remember Marcel d'Aubray."

She shuddered; her heart began to beat tumultuously. At that moment the music began again, and the black knight bowed gracefully to her and said, "May I have the honour, queen?"

"Never! not one step, nor one more word, with you," was what she tried to say, but it died away on her lips, for the eyes that reminded her so of Marcel's, now looked so commanding that they forced her to rise. Half against her will she let him lead her back to the dancers. A glorious gallop forced her anger momentarily into the background, and they glided along as if supported by wings, and every other sensation was lost in an indescribable intoxicating rapture. But when the dance was over she could not feel the same anger again. A new and curious sensation, a gentle feeling of soft, longing sadness came over her, together with a passionate desire to see him face to face who had dared so much, who had insulted her so. She glanced at her partner, who stood silently beside her.



"Listen to me, black knight," she said, and her voice had never before been so gentle in speaking to any man. "You have misused your masker's right, but I will not be angry with you for it, but will show you that I am magnanimous enough to bear the truth. Let us be friends."

Digitized by Google

"That cannot be. No woman without a soul can charm me. I have only one feeling toward you—that of pity!"

"Idiot!" she cried, with quivering lips. "Do you not know that I have everything to make existence worth living for—that I stand on its summit?"

"I know it; but one day you will have to descend," he answered indifferently. "Every one must. You will grow old and lose your charms, and then your life will be poor and empty."

Princess Myra trembled with anger. Never before had anyone dared hint that her youth and beauty were not immortal.

"Do those in the kingdom whence you come always stay young and beautiful?" she asked derisively.

"By no means; but in my kingdon every one possesses a talisman against satiety."

There it was! That was the word she had always hated and feared above all others, that tortured her in secret. Cleopatra waved her fan of shining peacock feathers nervously to and fro. She was forced to master her emotion, for some of her admirers had again surrounded her. They wanted to learn something from her of the knight of the Calatrava. They guessed first one person, then another of her circle, but Myra was sure that no one had guessed correctly, and she determined to solve the riddle alone. Her head throbbed, her pulse beat rapidly.

What had that man not said to her! How pitilessly he had called all her faults by name! How well he seemed to know her, and how cold her beauty left him! This last hurt her most. Her glance followed the mysterious man as he mixed with the crowd. His proud bearing, the unusual taste shown in his costume of black armour was noticed by everyone. Elegantly dressed female maskers approached him, trying to open a conversation, but t ey held him only en passant. He seemed to prefer to be a silent spectator.

Princess Myra managed to get near him again, as if by accident; his personality had for her a mysterious charm.

A commanding gesture of the hand, in which her fan seemed a sceptre (and one which she always used to order about her crowd of admirers), called the black knight back to her side.

"I shall not wait for the unmasking, but am leaving the ball at once," she said; "let me see your face before I go, and tell me who you are."

He bowed, but did not raise his visor.

"For you I am no one. Farewell, queen, and if you wish to truly enjoy life, then try to be kinder, gentler, and more unselfish. Those are qualities which keep off satiety, and are more enduring than youth and beauty."

He was gone. Princess Myra was again surrounded by her friends, but a curious numbn ss overcame her. Something she could not have named burnt within her and pierced her soul, even after she had left the ball.

The Princess spent almost the whole of the next day in bed. She wanted to sleep it off, but her slumber was disturbed by feverish dreams, in which the black knight raised his visor and showed Marcel's pale dead face, and then aga'n a skull grinning in derision.

She was pale and looked worn-out as she sat before her dressing-table again that evening to have her hair done for the entertainment at the Nobles' Club.

"I want my hair curled loosely to-day, and put one or two of these pomegranate blossoms on the side," she said to the haird esser, who was a ready beginning his work. "I am a little fatigued from yesterday evening, and shall have to use a touch of rouge. What do you think?"

This question was directed to the hairdresser, and as she spoke she looked at him for the first time—a quick, indifferent glance.

"If your Highness wishes my opinion, I prefer under all circumstances, natural pallor to artificial colour."

That voice! Where had she heard it before? With a violent twist of the head she obliged him to stop in his work, and now, with vivid interest, she scrutinised the proud pale face with the almond-shaped eyes that were so painfully like Marcel's.

"Do I dream?" she whispered, pressing her brow with her slender fingers. "You are—you are—speak! I will know who you are!"

A satirical smile played about his mouth. "If Your Highness wishes to know exactly, I am the first assistant in the shop of Ferdinand Herzberg, the court hairdresser in Dorothea Street. That is, I was until yesterday. I work to-day for the last time at my profession, voluntarily, from—love of it."

"You rascal! You have dared force yourself into a social circle closed to your class, to play the cavalier, to insult a lady of the highest aristocracy! You have—"

"Your Highness will do well to speak in a little lower tone," the calm, melodious voice interrupted, "or the servants may piece together things that have no connection with each other, and tell the world a dangerous romance about the Princess Koljassow."

"You are insane, a fiend!" the Princess hissed between her teeth. "How did you learn all the details of my life and character? I order you to answer me truthfully."

"And I gladly obey the command of Her Majesty, Queen Cleopatra. All that I know and that I spoke of under my mask Your Majesty's own charming mouth betrayed to me. I was forced to listen to what you were saying yesterday evening when I spe it nearly an hour of my valuable time waiting in this room."

"Do you know that this unfortunate joke of yours may cost you your position, and even more—that I can destroy you?"

"No," he said smiling, "but I know that the story of Princess Koljassow and the black knight may become the most piquant anecdote of the season. Your Highness will therefore do well to let me finish your coiffure quietly, then the carnival 'frolic,' which, as we know, has its grave side, will remain the secret of Queen Cleopatra and the black knight."

Princess Myra was forced to acknowledge that he was right. His quiet energy conquered her will. Quivering and almost fainting from anger, she yet remained quiet under his hands.

Quickly and gracefully he arranged a coiffure of the heavy black locks. But when the last hairpin was in place the Princess, in her trained white dressing gown, drew herself up to her full height and faced him. Her large black eyes threatened him with their fire.

"Never come under my eyes again! Do you understand? If I have need of a hairdresser——"

"I have already had the honour to tell Your Highness that I left my place yesterday, and therefore, in any case, my hands would never again touch this beautiful hair. But I cannot prevent our meeting in some other place."

Digitized by Google

She gave him a look of deepest disdain.

"My position will render that impossible. And now you may go. But stop! I wish to know one thing more. What was the reason of your most presumptuous behaviour at the carnival?"

"A few words from your mouth, Your Highness, that you forced me to listen to, and which, had a man uttered them, should have been differently answered."

"Repeat them!" she commanded.

With one hand on the door he made a low, disdainful bow:

"'Nonsense, mamma, a hairdresser is no one!'"

* * *

"Never come under my eyes again!"

"Good evening, Myra Twanowna, my turtle dove."

"Good gracious! You have frightened me to death again, Dimitri! You know my nerves can't stand such shocks."

"They'll have to learn to, duschinka! And now, come and give me a kiss."

The Prince delighted in surprising his wife in this manner when she thought him furthest away and had almost forgotten his existence; and the fright she always showed never failed to amuse him heartily.

Myra rose, sighing resignedly, and laid down her novel, "Journal d'une Rapture," by Maizeroy.

"Have you seen mamma yet? Has anyone given you anything to eat?"

"I lunched at the club with Pawal Jaruschkin and some other jolly fellows. I tried to see your old lady, but she wouldn't admit me. Melitta, whom I saw for a minute, told me you were both going this evening to the Marzdorf's dinner."

"To be sure Melitta goes out so seldom; but as Baroness Marzdorf, whose birthday we celebrate, is her godmother, she couldn't well refuse. Are you going with us?"

"Of course, my love; the husband of the much-sought-after Princess Koljassow must be seen with her a few times in the year instead of some other favoured cavalier." With this his fingers closed caressingly around Myra's bare arm, and she gave a little cry of pain.

"You press me too hard! You'll leave a red mark."

"Wax doll! Cover it over with one of your thousand bracelets. Now I'm off to get an hour's snooze. Have me called when you are ready."

The Marzdorf Hotel contained this evening only a select company. "To-day we serve thee up a celebrity, Myra," said the old Baron Marzdorf to the Princess, whom he "tutoyed" as he did all the Hildhausens.

"You excite my curiosity, uncle; who is it?"

"No less a person than Herbert Wilnau, the author of the 'World's Children,' that everyone is talking and writing about."

"We know the novel, uncle; Melitta is completely charmed with it; and it kept its interest up for me, too, until the end, although the author doesn't deal exactly gently with us poor children of the world. If, however, he belongs to the rich Courland Barons of Wilnau Schoningen, he does not have to earn his bread and butter by his art."

"He is not working for that, nor yet for laurels. Wilnau has the courage to be truthful. He will talk, will be heard, and will do good with his words."

"A modern apostle, then," said the Princess mockingly. "I can imagine a fitting exterior."

The old Baron laughed with amusement.

"Thou shalt judge of that thyself, thou little malicious creature. I'll bring thee my apostle."

A moment later Princess Koljassow opened her black eyes wide, as if she saw a ghost. She gasped for breath, her fan nearly fell from her hand, and, for the first time in her life, she could not smile the conventional smile, with which she was wont to entrap her victims at the first sight.

"Baron Herbert von Wilnau, dear Myra," and then the host slipped off quickly to greet some new arrivals. Again they faced each other—Queen Cleopatra and the black knight.

Yes; there was no mistake. It was he. It was he in the faultless evening suit, with the faultless bearing, and with the faultless chivalrous manner in which no one but herself could discover the slight trace of derision. He stood before her, and with social dexterity began one of those momentary conversations which take place in a salon between two strangers. Myra had to answer in order not to excite attention. She could not show her anger, for with the exposure of his bold intrusion she would compromise herself. So there was nothing to do but control herself and wait for the right moment; but she could prepare Dimitri, could set him on him, as it were.

As soon as she could do so without attracting attention, she drew her husband aside.

"You will have to fight for my honour again, Dimitri. There is a man amongst the guests of this house who has mortally insulted me." The Prince did not answer, but the vein that ran across his low forehead was swollen and blue—a bad sign. Myra knew that now he would follow his quarry doggedly, and that the proud man with the cold glances upstairs was as good as lost, let him choose what weapons he would in the duel.

"When you know all, Dimitri——"

"Has he paid you court in an unauthorised fashion?"

"No; but——"

"Very well, then, the matter can wait until we get home. And now put on a brighter face, Myra Twanowna, or hang me if I don't make you! I won't have people think there has been a conjugal quarrel between us."

Willing or not, the Princess was obliged to resume her social mask. The evening seemed endless. The ease with which Wilnau moved among those present, the open admiration shown him by everyone, and not least by Prince Koljassow, increased her unhappiness, until it was scarcely to be borne. At dinner, Wilnau was her sister's neighbour. Melitta, who looked dainty and charming in her gown of sea-green silk, seemed to enjoy his company. Well, to-morrow, she, as well as Dimitri, should know all the truth. She would tell them the story of the black knight, even though there was the danger of bringing her husband's merciless ridicule upon herself. Prince Koljassow was a proud man. He would consider an insult to his wife as his own, and the fate of her enemy would be sealed.

Digitized by Google

The morning, however, gave her no opportunity for her disclosure. The Prince was absent almost the entire day. In the evening he returned from the Russian Club in a fine humour, and, as was his wont, expressed it by caressing Myra in a clumsy fashion, who lay on the sofa suffering from ennui.

"Don't pull my ears off, Dimitri," she said, pushing away peevishly one of his large hands. "It was very impolite in you to stay away all the afternoon when we had arranged to pay calls together."

"Bosh! One day is as good as another for that nonsense of paying visits," the Prince answered indifferently. "Why should I have to do penance and leave the club, where everything was so amusing? Wilnau gave a superb little breakfast, to which he kindly invited me. He leaves Berlin this evening for his estates, but he says he will soon be back. He is truly a clever, interesting man, this Wilnau! Just imagine the original way in which he learnt the details of the life of the Berlin aristocracy that are to appear in his new novel. He became the assistant of the court hairdresser, Herzberg, for several months, and was so diligent and showed such aptitude in the practice of the noble art of the coiffure and being, moreover, so refined-looking, that his master trusted him to attend his most aristocratic customers. In this manner Wilnau was able to study his subjects in negligée, without their rouge, physical or moral; and gained a deep insight into much which he will use—naturally with the finest tact and delicacy—so that no complaint may be made against the book or its author. Isn't that a fine joke, Myra Twanowna?"

The Princess made no answer. Everything was swimming before her eyes. It was several minutes before she could master her emotions sufficiently to speak.

"I really do not know if one ought to believe such romantic tales," she said at length. "Has the thought never come to you that this man, whom you so much admire, might be an adventurer, a deceiver, who has assumed the good old name of the noble Courland family from some sinister motive?"

"Of course not. This Wilnau is as genuine as myself. Many in the club know him well; moreover, I wish you to keep what you have just heard secret for the present. The Baron doesn't exactly make a secret of it; still, for various reasons, that you can easily surmise, he doesn't care to have the matter spoken of all over town."

After her husband had left her the Princess fell into a mood not easy to describe. The little romance, the centre figure of which was the mysterious black knight, appeared to her in an entirely new light. Why had she not recognised the man of rank at once under the disguise of a hairdresser—at least, then, when during their last conversation, he had opposed her with so much firmness and boldness? How would Melitta take the news? Myra rang the bell and told her maid to send the Countess to her. Melitta came, and listened to the marvellous tale with her own peculiar calm.

"I recognised at once yesterday evening the hairdresser whom you kept waiting so long in your dressing-room in Baron Wilnau, when he was introduced to me," she said. "The mystery perplexed me at first, but then I resolved to see in Wilnau for that evening nothing but the author of the 'World's Children,' whom I have so long been anxious to meet, and to wait patiently for the solution of the riddle. As far as you were concerned, dear Myra, you could not have ignored the Baron more completely than you did. Naturally, he felt it, and he looked over at me several times with an expression on his face that I couldn't comprehend."

"I know nothing about that," the Princess answered, "but if you think that the Baron felt hurt at my behaviour, I will try and make up for it at the first opportunity. Besides, we have something to forgive him also."

"Without a doubt," answered Melitta smiling. "We and many others. Wilnau will have to take patiently the scoldings he so richly deserves. But he gained his object."

From that day on Princess Koljassow's thoughts were occupied almost constantly with the black knight, although in an utterly different manner, for she could no longer despise him. He had taught her some hard lessons.

He was the only one whom her beauty could not influence, but also the only one (this she now thought, or believed she thought) whose favour seemed to her really worth striving for. She must win, if she took the trouble.

To take the trouble to please a man! That was something new; but also exciting and exhilarating, and promised a glorious reward. What a triumph it would be to conquer that proud man, and to see love soften him!

One afternoon, when Myra Twanowna had received her first violets from one of her admirers—for spring had come to Berlin—the Prince brought her the news of Wilnau's return.

"I have just spoken to him, and he asked me only a moment ago to bring him to call on your mother," he said, blinking at his wife through his half-closed eyes.

"Do it if you like," she answered indifferently; "but speak to mamma about it first."

"She will have no objection when she learns how anxious he is for it," the Prince said. "I think we might invite Wilnau to dine with us in a day or so."

Never had Myra paid so much attention to her toilet as on that occasion. She tried to outdo her own beauty.

A gown of heavy black satin, relieved about her neck, and the wide, open sleeves by a narrow band of white swans-down, suited her purpose best. There was a necklace, a triple string of rare black pearls, called devil's tears, which would match the costume perfectly, but they were still lying in the jeweller's case. Dimitri must buy them, and in order to compass this, Myra had to play one of her little comedies of affection, in spite of her distaste for it.

Digitized by Google

The Prince was willing. "You shall have the devil's tears, and adorn yourself with them for my friend Wilnau," he said. "Send after them. Here is a cheque that will be sufficient."

"I only adorn myself for myself, Dimitri."

"Very well, that's six of one and a half a dozen of the other," he said, giving his beautiful wife a little caressing slap on the cheek, which might have been a little lighter, however.

Princess Koljassow had to acknowledge to herself, that never had she deserved to be admired more than on the evening that was to bring the one for whom she was longing.

"He will forgive me. He will not be able to escape loving me," she said to herself, smiling gaily at the beautiful creature in the mirror. "Perhaps he is conscious of it already, for what else could make him call on mamma? He will come and will discover that Cleopatra has a soul now, and her eyes will say to him, 'Thou hast given me this soul, it is thine.'"

Her hands were stretched out toward the pearls in their white velvet bed, and she was just about to put on the costly ornament when the Prince, dressed for dinner, came in.

"I come myself to decorate your beautiful neck with the devil's tears," he said, dismissing the maid with a look. Myra glanced up in amazement. That was not his usual way of doing. What could have put him in such good humour? But it was wise to keep him in it, so she bent her head gracefully.

"Thank you. And now tell me, Dimitri, do I please you?"

"I am fascinated," the Prince answered, "and Baron Wilnau, our honoured guest, will doubtless share my enthusiasm, and be almost as proud of his gloriously beautiful sister-in-law, as of his fiancée."

"Sister-in-law! Fiancée!" The words faltered on her lips.

"Perfectly true, my love. Baron Wilnau is about to ask for your sister Melitta's hand. That was the object of his introduction to your mother. I thought that with a woman's quick wit you had foreseen this, and that your bewitching toilet was a delicate homage to the new brother-in-law."

"You are mistaken. I am most thoroughly surprised."

"It is to be hoped agreeably," he said emphatically, grasping her wrist with a hand like an iron ring. "Should you look at the matter differently from your husband, the harmony of this betrothal might be sensibly disturbed. Do you understand me, Myra Twanowna, my little gold heart?"

The Princess shuddered, her teeth chattered as if she had a chill. He offered her his arm and she let herself be led into the drawing room.

She looked entrancing, but like a statue, with the classically moulded neck on which rested the black devil's tears—the symbol of her own solitary genuine feeling, and of her own defeat—and with her stony, marble-white face, in which nothing seemed alive but the large gleaming eyes, black as night.

JESSIE TOMPKINS.

FIFTY GOLDEN SOVEREIGNS GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses fifty envelopes to fifty people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign, and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD and address it to the Editor under the following conditions:

☛ Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 8 distribution must reach us by November 28th, addressed to The 8th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of the Fifth Distribution appears on page 681.

No. 2 of THE ROYAL MAGAZINE Will be Ready on November 22nd. Still 3d. only.

The second number contains an article of absorbing interest entitled "Death by Electrocution," by one who witnessed it.

Digitized by Google

THE WRONG WOMAN.

I HAD no business to see it, or to know anything about it, being a trained nurse out for my half-hour's constitutional, and not supposed to be hanging about a church gaping at a wedding.

The bride was tall and pale and composed, and the bridesmaid was a lovely, large-eyed, chestnut-haired, ruby-lipped girl, who seemed to think of nothing but the bride and the way her train and veil hung, and so on.

There were other bridesmaids and many smart guests, but once I had looked into the first bridesmaid's eyes I forgot all about them. Her eyes were large and deep, dark blue, with a look of some dumb creature in mortal pain. As for one moment I stared into them I could scarcely refrain from a cry of wonder, sympathy, fright.

She sailed in alone after the bride, and two by two the other eight white visions sailed after her, and I hurried out into the sunlight and, glancing at my watch, saw I had exceeded my time.

It may have been an hour after sunset that day when the superintendent rang for me.

"I wish you would take a special case for a few days. A young lady fainted at a wedding this morning and has developed some sort of fever—some brain trouble—since. Will you take it?"

A memory of the wonderful eyes and strange look I had seen in them, flashed into my mind.

"Certainly," I replied. "Must I go at once?"

"The carriage is waiting," said the superintendent. "Be as smart as you can."

And so it happened that I saw the bridesmaid again, lying in a stupor broken now and then by fits of delirium.

She opened her great eyes and said quite brightly:

"Ah, I saw you looking at me! You understood, did you not?"

"Yes, my dear, I know all about it," I said in a reassuring voice.

There were a mother, a father and a sister who hovered about the bed.

"Send them away," said the bridesmaid, as I took my seat beside her. "I want to talk it all over with you, because you understand."

So I sent them away, and she began a long, incoherent discourse, to which I confess I listened as I never before listened to fever ravings. The poor lamb broke off now and then, and dozed; then she renewed her talking, pausing once in a while to question me.

"You understand?"

And when I assured her I did, she rambled on again. Suddenly she started up.

"Nurse," she said wildly, "can't the wedding be stopped? Isn't it a sin for him to marry her when he loves me? She is rich and he is poor, and he is marrying the wrong woman, do you hear? The wrong woman! No one seems to notice it; you see, the minister doesn't know he loves me, not her! It's frightfully wicked of him to pray that way. No one knows but me. He knows, nurse; his face is as hard as iron, as white as marble; his eyes don't see me.

"Don't you think I had better just say his name out loudly? That will wake him. You see, he's asleep, and they are marrying him to her when it's I he wants to marry. Arthur! wake up, love. It is Alice you want, not Gertrude, Arthur!"

The young voice rang in passionate intensity through the quiet room, while I brushed sudden tears that were disgracefully unprofessional from my eyes. So this was the story of the bridesmaid!

They came in at her cries, and with drooping heads looked at her, but she said no more. Some remnant of reason closed her lips until we were alone again.

We were often alone, and after the ravages of the fever were past and she lay a shattered wreck of girlhood, her exquisite complexion pale, and her glorious hair cut close, she made me tell her again and again of how I happened to see that wedding, and she told me how her eyes read the startled sympathy in mine.

"I remember it so well," she whispered, "and I don't remember any more, except that I called out his name when I saw him put the ring on Gertrude's finger. It was too much for me, nurse."

One day she said gently: "He is coming to see me before I go away."

"How do you know?" I asked carelessly, not knowing what to say.

Digitized by Google

"How? Oh, I feel it! You will see; he may come to-day, he couldn't get away before. You see, they have just come home. Then, after he is gone, I shall go away contented. But I couldn't go and not say good-bye, could I?"

"But, dear child, you won't be able to go away for a fortnight," I said hastily. "Don't begin to get restless, now; just lie quite still and good, and get up your strength."

The great eyes, greater still in their hollows, met mine steadily.

"You don't suppose I am going to live?" she said in surprised tones. "Why, you know better than that, nurse. After I have said good-bye I shall go quietly away, only I want to say good-bye first."

This as calmly as if she had said: "After I take my medicine I shall go to sleep." I went into the ante-room and wept, which was, of course, unprofessional, but somehow I'd never nursed a patient like this one.

* * * * * *

Not two hours later, just before sunset, he came. Everyone was out, and I met him in the ante-room. His face was like stone, his eyes strained, his mouth drawn. I knew it must be he.

"Are you the nurse who has been with her all through?" he said in hoarse whispers.

"Yes, my patient has been all mine," I said. "She is very weak. She must not be excited, but she must see you, because she knew you would come, and I dare-say she knows you are here now."

He looked at the closed door.

"May I——?" he paused.

"Alone?" I asked. "I am afraid not. But perhaps you won't mind me—we have spoken of you a good deal. I dare not leave her alone for fear it will be too much for her." And with that I went before him into the room.

She was so sweet and calm and happy, bless her! and just put her shadow of a hand where he could take it as he sat in my chair.

And I waited so long for them to speak that at last I turned and looked at them.

His face was marble no longer; his eyes flamed until they were fairly beautiful with the fire in their brown depths; his lips trembled and his white teeth gripped them desperately; the man's soul transfigured his countenance as it shone through.

She lay smiling at him, as sweet and quiet as an angel, and now and then her free hand, that was merely a wraith of a hand, softly stroked his, and I had not the heart to look again, but went quietly away to the ante-room.

Presently I went back, afraid for my bridesmaid. The man was kneeling by the bed and she had dragged her arms up and put them about his neck, and he had her little snowdrop-face between his hands while she spoke to him.

"And I am going away, dear," she said gently, with a ring in her sweet voice I had never heard. "That is why I wanted to see you so much to say good-bye. Don't forget me altogether, for I have loved you very, very dearly. Don't say it, Arthur, I know, but all the same I'd rather you didn't say it. You and I will love each other truly, purely, just as long as we live, and after—yes, dear, I know it. And now, good-bye."

And she kissed him and died.

J. PRINCE.

RESULT OF DISTRIBUTION No. 5.

Two applicants have succeeded this week in receiving a sovereign each in connection with this distribution. Their names are given below:

Se-gt. F. H. Pannell, Army Pay Corps, Northampton.
Miss E. Cramphorn, 28 Woodlands Road, Leytonstone, N.E.

It seems marvellous that so few of the fifty people selected should have been wise enough to apply, in view of the fact that many of the names are selected from previous prize lists in Short Stories, while others are from the various directories. Surely there is a good deal of apathy about the matter! If you don't care to apply yourself—that is, if you are not sufficiently in want of a sovereign to feel that the trouble and expense of writing a halfpenny post-card is justifiable—then, of course, you will be entirely a loser through no fault of ours. If, however, you were ignorant of this distribution scheme until your name in print has been called to your notice, then you are not to blame in the matter.

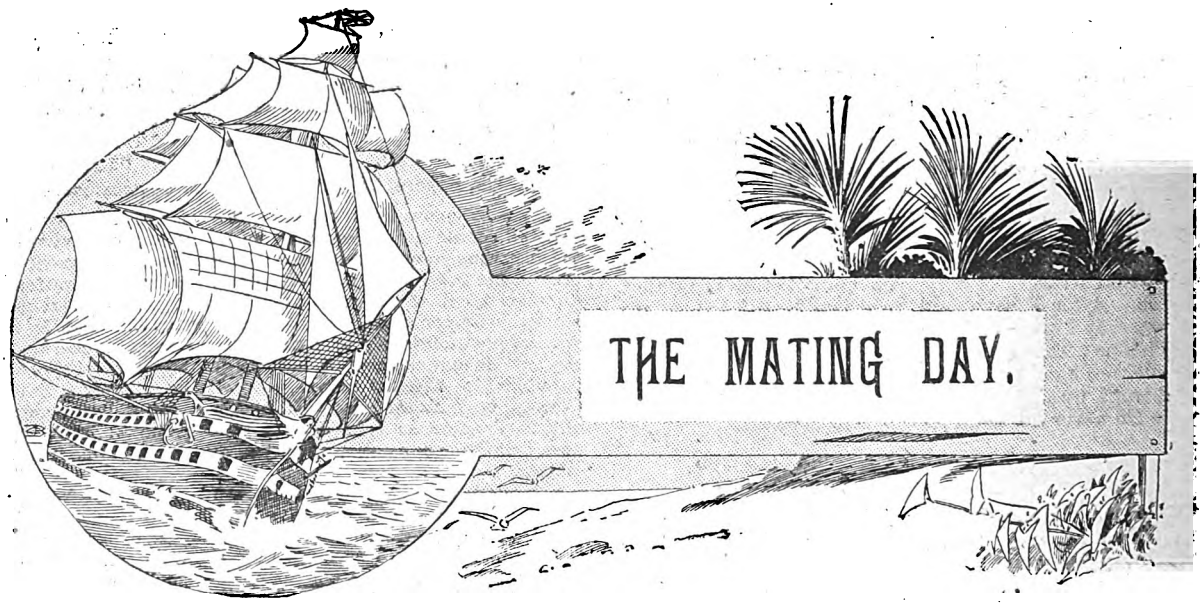
Some correspondents want to know if, once a name having appeared as one of those who would have received the sovereign if he had applied, there is any use in continuing to send post-cards. I may say that there certainly is, as I propose to select at least one name a week in future from the previous lists.

Below will be found the names and addresses of those people who would have been a pound the richer had they applied.

J. E. Long, Inland Revenue, Watlington, Tetsworth; Miss B. Roela, 13 Castle Square, Swansea; Arthur Bailey, 15 Archer Street, Osmaston, near Derby; C. Ambler, Prospect View, Thornton, near Bradford; R. H. Williams, Wellington Road, Camborne, Cornwall; T. Marsden, Studley House, Upper Belgrave Road, Clifton, Bristol; H. Robinson, The Parsonage, Heywood, Westbury, Wilts; F. C. Spendelow, 45 Ling Street, Holt Road, Liverpool; Miss A. Walker, 14 Esk Terrace, Whitby; R. Phipps, 16 Hall Street, Sale, Cheshire; G. Butty, 13 Regent Road, Morecambe; G. S. Knight, 15 Penygraig Road, Mount Pleasant, Swansea; F. T. Gibson, 24 Elmwood Street, Sunderland; Mrs. Allan, 13 Sydney Street, Glasgow; W. Back, 10 Edward Street, Brighton; A. E. Lower, 51 Station Road, Horsham, Sussex; E. Lambert, 1 Sunnyside, Sandgate, Kent; Mrs. McCourt, 47 High Street, Airdrie, N.B.; G. E. Mitchell, 333 Raglan Street, Lowestoft; Mrs. H. A. Green, Bengeo Street, Bengeo, Hertford; Mrs. Charity, 16 Sth. Brink, Wisbech; Robt. Howlett, Market Place, Aylsham; Thos. Wells, 12 Bury Street, Unthanks Road, Norwich; C. Keneely, 8 Patrick Street, Kilkenny; P. Creagle, District Inspector of Police, 6 Montenotte, Cork; John McGrath, 5 Lombard Street, Waterford; James Colhoun, 14 Pump Street, Londonderry; W. Hughes, Great Whitcombe, Carisbrooke; Joseph Murrin, Queen's Hotel, Queen's Road, Bournemouth; J. Goodwin, 3 High Street, Worcester; S. J. Griffiths, 15 Cradley Road, Netherton, Dudley; Jas. Methuen, 79 King Street, Wellington; W. Hobson, 24 Frith Street, Huddersfield; A. Britton, 12 Harehills Terrace, Leeds; Wm. Backhouse, 106 Upper Hanover Street, Sheffield; W. E. Rees, 26 Parkfield Road, Rotherham; Miss Hurt, The Nest, Castle Hill, Maidenhead; J. R. Cook, 1 Market Place, Reading; Mrs. Collins, 16 Bath Road, Banbury; James Dodds, 11 Erith Terrace, Bishopswearmouth, Sunderland; Mrs. Smart, 20 North Bailey, Durham; John Kelly, 16 Race Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne; A. Douglas, 3 Thistle Street, Aberdeen; John Carmichael, 17 Airlie Place, Dundee; John Fraser, 1 Summerside Place, Leith, Edinburgh; Miss L. Grey, Clovelly, 100 King's Head Road, Catford, S.E.; E. Shallcross, 71 Middleton Street, Clerkenwell; Miss A. E. Gilmour, 35 Helix Gardens, Brixton Hill, S.W.

Mr. JONES, Sir,—This is your week. Twenty-five of the fifty names that have been selected are those of people named JONES.

Digitized by Google



THE MATING DAY.

Gouigi the hunter lay motionless beneath a wide-spreading yacca that towered far above the other trees of the forest. The moon was out, and its beams, penetrating the leafy barriers, threw a network of fantastic shadows across the brown body of the islander.

He lay upon his back with hands clasped firmly beneath his head, and his bright black eyes staring at the branches above him. A long, double-pointed spear was beside him, the ends drawn to the fineness of a needle's point, its length well-polished and greased save for the handles near the centre.

Gouigi was thinking, and he had lain in nearly the same posture since the dawn of the previous day. For custom decreed that all those islanders who intended to take part in the mating tournament should absent themselves for the period of a day and a night from the society of their fellows, and Gouigi had made declaration to the chief that he would fight at the tourney.

One day each year the natives of this island of Macheki, in the South Seas, set apart for the mating of the maidens with the young braves of the tribe, and on this day took place a series of conflicts among the aspirants to determine which should have first choice from the bevy of eligible maidens. Usually, upon such occasions, the victor was content to triumph over his adversaries without seriously injuring them, and those vanquished had thus an opportunity to fight among themselves for second choice, and so on, until the maids were all chosen.

And upon most mating days there were many of the young warriors to take part in the conflict, yet now Gouigi counted upon his fingers and found there were but seven all told, who had declared their intention of fighting upon the morrow. For amongst the maidens to be chosen was Cheluilka, the daughter of the chieftain, and whoever won the first choice would thus in time become the first brave of the tribe, since the chief was very old and unlikely to live more than a few moons longer.

Therefore this time the duel would be fought to the death, the prize being the greatest fate had ever yet placed within reach of the mating-day champions, and only the strongest and bravest of the young men had dared to undertake the task of winning the Princess Cheluilka, and with her the leadership of the tribe.

Gouigi mused on all this as he lay under the yacca awaiting the return to the village. Somewhere amidst the forest were six other warriors resting or preparing themselves for the fray, but he did not dwell upon them long. True, they were the pick of the tribe, well skilled in the use of the spear, and of great and powerful build.

But he, Gouigi, was the strongest of them all—save, perhaps, Mati the Tiger, and Mati was a brute, whom he loathed and would delight to kill. He spat upon the ground when he thought upon him, and turned his musings into more pleasant channels.

Soon he would be chief of the tribe and able to command where he had before served. He would fight the Kankine for one thing, and drive them from the little neighbouring island, whence they so frequently descended upon his people to annoy them with their poisoned darts. And he would move the village over into the little harbour at the south, where the winds were less fierce. There were many things he had in mind to accomplish when he should become chief.

What a fortunate thing he had waited until Cheluilka was to be mated instead of choosing little Natka last year, as he had at one time intended. It was Mati the Tiger who had put it into his head to wait.

"For my part," Mati had said at that time, "I shall wait for the mating of the Princess Cheluilka, for whoever wins her will be chief."

And he, because he hated Mati and wished to fight him, had also waited, and so there was no one to choose little Natka, who had looked at him reproachfully, but said no word.

It had been a long year, in which he had repeatedly quarrelled with his rival; but the end was nigh at last, and his ambitions would not only be fulfilled, but supplemented by a triumph over Mati the Tiger. True, it would be a struggle to the death; there was no doubt of that. But he, Gouigi, would win. As for Cheluilka, he knew very little about her, for he had been several years with the other young men at the wars, and the fishing, and the hunting grounds, and the Princess had grown up in the village. But he had noted that Cheluilka was a handsome maiden, proud and reserved, and mixing little with the other girls of the tribe. He could recall, as he lay musing under the big tree, her full, rounded form, her piercing dark eyes, the erect carriage of her head and her disdainful smile. Yes, Cheluilka would do very well for a mate. She was not so lively as little Natka, nor could he expect her to mend his lines so deftly or to polish his spear so carefully as the laughing maiden who often followed him to the shore when he went fishing. But she was the chief's daughter, and with her he gained power and position, which, in their way, meant as much to the simple islander as to his civilised brethren.

Digitized by Google

The moon was waning now, and the light breeze which fanned his brow and fluttered the leaves of the trees heralded, he knew, the dawn.

He sat up, drew a piece of dried meat from his pouch, and leisurely ate of it, drinking afterwards from a little stream that flowed near by. Then, sitting down again, he examined with care his spear, testing its strength in every possible way.

Apparently satisfied with his inspection, he proceeded to bind up his long hair, heavy with grease, into a knot, fastening it upon the back of his head with a fish bone. Afterwards he made his toilet by rubbing every part of his body plentifully with grease, and then, seizing his weapon, he started through the forest on his way to the village.

With the first streak of dawn every member of the tribe was astir, and soon men, women and children were assembled upon the green slope that led to the sea. In two long lines that faced each other they squatted to witness the coming spectacle, and at the head of these lines sat the old chief, with the row of maidens just before him who were eligible to be mated.

The girls were calm enough, for it was well understood that but one would be chosen this day, since the fight was to the death. The surviving champion would, of course, select the Princess. The daughter of the chieftain, proud and self-contained, sat at the feet of her father, while the maidens on either side cast many curious and some envious glances at her dark, immobile face.

Little Natka was there, nearly at the end of the line, but her eyes were red with weeping, for on this day she knew that Gouigi was destined either to fall in death or to mate with the Princess, and either event would rob her of him for ever.

At the other end of the double row of spectators and facing the chief and the maidens, was the dark edge of the forest, and now, as the sun shot its first ray over the tree-tops, the aged chief rose painfully to his feet and exclaimed:

"It is the day of mating. The maidens await their lords. Who demands to choose first amongst them?"

"I demand the choice!" cried a voice, and a tall, powerful warrior stepped from the forest and advanced into the square. A loud murmur arose from the people, for this was Mati the Tiger, whose prowess was well known and respected.

But scarcely had he taken his place, spear in hand, when a lithe, slender form darted from the thicket and said boldly:

"I am here to choose first from the maidens. Who denies my right?"

"I!" returned Mati, and poising his spear he advanced upon his rival, who quickly sprang to meet him.

The contest was short. For a moment both whirled their slender spears rapidly before them, and then, quicker than the eye could follow, they came together—and separated. Mati stood upright, but his antagonist, uttering a great cry, fell writhing upon the ground and lay still, pierced to the heart by the sharp-pointed spear of his foe.

Again from the crowd rose a murmur of approval, and the Princess Cheluilka, aroused from her customary reserve, laughed aloud and clapped her hands together.

"Who now disputes my right?" cried Mati, strutting up and down in evident pride.

"I!" answered a voice, and another youth stepped from the forest to confront him.

The combat was longer this time, for the new champion was wary, and twice the warriors came together and separated before Mati's powerful arm could drive his spear-point home. Again he received the plaudits of the spectators, and again the Princess laughed.

The dead bodies were drawn from the square, and Mati turned to face another foe. But none were able to combat him long, and within the hour five dead forms lay side by side upon the green, silent evidences of his wonderful skill.

The Princess was fairly transformed by excitement. A deep red glowed beneath her brown cheeks, her eyes glistened like a serpent's, and as each warrior fell before the strong arm of Mati, her little hands were the first to demonstrate approval. She seemed to revel in the bloodshed, and Gouigi, watching her from the concealment of the forest, wondered at her high spirits, and glanced anon from her radiant face to where little Natka sat shrinking backwards and shielding her eyes from the ghastly scene.

But his turn had come now. Mati was already shouting:

"Who now challenges my right to choose first?"

Gouigi grasped his spear firmly and advanced with slow strides into the open. The crowd greeted the newcomer with a growl of applause.

His great form, erect and firmly-knit, glistened bravely in the morning sun. His head was thrown back in an attitude both dignified and defiant, and his clear eyes, steadfast and piercing, sought his rival's face and questioned it gravely. He looked every inch a chieftain, and the people, quick to judge a warrior's powers and resources, glanced at one another and whispered:

"Mati has found his match!"

Mati himself undoubtedly realised that his most desperate fight lay before him, but he did not flinch. Shaking his spear in bravado and casting a look at Cheluilka, who smiled and nodded her head to encourage him, he advanced with quick strides towards Gouigi the Hunter.

Swiftly the spears of the antagonists whirled above their heads and then, with a sudden rush, they met, and the crash of the spears, both splintered into fragments, echoed sharply through the forest.

The natives looked at each other in amazement, for such a thing as this had never happened before in their experience. Gouigi and Mati, each astonished at the force of the other's blow, stood face to face glaring defiance.

Then Gouigi turned his head.

"A spear!" he shouted.

Instantly two young men leapt from the ranks of the spectators and thrust their spears into the hands of the combatants.

Digitized by Google

"Good!" cried the Princess, leaning eagerly forward.

The fight began anew, and so fiercely did it wage that for a time nothing could be distinguished but a mass of struggling brown limbs and the flash of the greased spears as they whirled in the sunshine. Then arose a wild cry, for Gouigi's spear had broken near the middle and the Tiger was pressing him furiously. But Gouigi managed the half weapon that remained to him with such consummate dexterity that a minute later Mati's spear was wrenched from his grasp and sent flying through the air. The Tiger reeled backward, and fell upon his knees, and now, as in a flash, the sharp point of Gouigi's spear was at his throat.

But ere he had time to strike, a piercing scream cleft the air, and Cheluilka rushed forward and threw herself between the warriors.

"Hold!" she commanded, "he shall fight again!" Then, as a murmur arose, she added; "I am Cheluilka, the daughter of your chieftain, and I say he shall have another chance!"

Mati, still kneeling with bowed head, never moved from his place, while Gouigi with spear still poised, seemed as if carved from stone.

The aged chief tottered to his feet and looked round at his people with a troubled air.

"It is wrong," he said; "it is very wrong, and you all know it! But Cheluilka is a woman, and she is my daughter. It shall be as she says. Mati shall have one more chance."

The people were silent, sitting with knit brows and angry faces. But Gouigi drew back and cast down his broken spear.

"It is well," he said calmly. "Arise, Mati the Tiger, and choose your weapon."

Cheluilka rushed back to where the chief sat, and drawing two great knives, fashioned from tusks, from his girdle, cast them upon the ground before the duellists.

"There are the weapons!" she cried.

